e very interesting. Do let me see it, h —— Uh, as I was saying, Claire outless has a tremendous social career ere her. So many people expecting her arry well. Of course she has a rather nual combination of charm and intellice and—in fact, I think we may both be la that ——"
Yes. That's right. And the best thing bit her is the way she can shake off all social stuff and go camping and be a glar human being," Milt caressed.
Um, uh, no doubt, no doubt, though—f ourse, though, that isn't an inherent a of her. I fancy she's been rather tired yhis long trip, poor child. Of course she r very strong."
That's right. Real pluck. And, of rse, she'll get stronger by hiking. You've er seen her bucking a dangerous hill; I il of feel that a person who hasn't seen hein the wilds doesn't know her."
I don't want to be contradictory, old n, but I feel, on the other hand, that no n who has failed to see her at the Junior gue Dances, in a Rue de la Paix frock, n know her! Come! Come! Don't w how we drifted into this chorus of rse of Claire! What I wanted to ask was r opinion of the Ferocious Four. I'm hiking of buying one. Do you think h ——" ll the way home Milt exulted: "I put t ll over him. I wasn't scared by the Da't-butt-into-the-aristocracy-my-youngfrnd stuff. I lied handsome. But—darn t now I'll have to live up to my New Eng-la aristocracy. Wonder if my granddad's k was a hired man or a wood sawyer?
N mind; I'm Daggett of Daggett from w on." He bounded up to his room vaingliously remarking: "I'm there with the arestors. I was brought up in the hand-sme city of Schoenstrom, which was nded by a colony of Vermont Yankees, ded by Herman Skumautz. I was er allowed to play with the Dutch kids, a"—he opened the door—"the Schoenstm minister taught me Greek and was m bosom frien' ——"
He stopped with his heart in his ankles.
Lling on the bed, grinning, waving a garette, was Bill McGolwey, proprietor
the Old Home Lunch, of Schoenstrom, Mnnesota, Milt's chum of old-slack days.
"W-w-why, where the heck did you come frm?" stammered the deposed aristocrat to his bosom friend Bill.
"You old lemon-pie-faced, lollygagging, flb-footed, crab-nosed son of misery, gee,
bt it's good to see you, Milt!"
Bill was off the bed wringing Milt's hand wh simple joy, with perfect faith that in filing his friend all the troubles of life were ov. And Milt was gloomily discovering th art of diplomacy. Bill was his friend, y, but ——
He pictured Jeff Saxton leering at the dr, and while he pounded Bill's shoulder al called him the name which, west of Ekomo, is the token of hatred and of ex-tme gladness at meeting, he discovered tat someone had stolen his stomach and lt a piece of ice in its place.
They settled down on bed and chair, Bill's ears red with joy, while Milt demanded: "How the deuce did you get lre?"
"Well, tell you, old hoss. Schoenstrom gt so darn lonely after you left, and when Jn and Neinie got your address and fught the garage, thinks I, lez go off on a ltle bum."
Milt was realizing—and hating himself fr realizing—that Bill's face was dirty, his lir linty, the bottoms of his trousers fuyed masses of mud, while Bill chuckled:
"I figured out maybe I could get a job here i a restaurant, and you and me could jom together. I sold out my good will in te Old Home Lunch for a hundred bucks.
I was going to travel swell, riding the rshions. But Pete Swanson wanted me to g down to the Cities first, and we run into sme pretty swift travelers in Minneapolis, nd a couple of girls—sa-ay, kid, some ass!"
Bill winked, and Milt—Milt was rather sk. He knew Bill's conception of class in young women. Was this the fellow he had ked so well? These the ideas which a few onths ago he had taken as natural and xtremely amusing?

"And I got held up in an alley off Washington Avenue, and they got the last twenty bones off'n me, and I was flatter'n a pancake. So I says, 'Ish kabibble,' and I sneaks onto the blind baggage, and bums my way West. You'd 'a' died laughing to seen me throwing my feet for grub. There was one frau sicked her dog onto me, and I kicked him in the jaw and—oh, it was one swell hike."

Milt was trying to ignore the voice that was raging: "And now he expects to live on me, after throwing his own money away. The waster! The hobo! He'll expect to meet Claire. I'd kill him before I'd let him soil her by looking at her. Him and his classy girls!" Milt tried to hear only the other inner voice, which informed him:

"He looks at you so trustingly. He'd give you his shirt if you needed it—and he wouldn't make you ask for it!"

Milt tried to make hearty his question: "What're you going to do, old kid?"

"Well, the first thing I'm going to do is to borrow ten iron men and a pair of pants."

"You bet! Here she is. Haven't got any extra pants. Tell you: Here's another five, and you can get the pants at the store in the next block, this side of the street. Hustle along now and get 'em!" He chuckled at Bill; he patted his arm; he sought to hurry him out. He had to be alone, to think.

But Bill kissed the fifteen dollars, carelessly rammed them into his pocket, crawled back on the bed, yawned:

"What's the rush? Gosh, I'm sleepy. Say, Milt, whadyuh think of me and you starting a lunch room here together? You got enough money out of the garage ——"

"Oh, no, no-o! Gee, I'd like to, Bill, but you see—well, I've got to hold onto what little I've got so I can get through engineering school."

"Sure, but you could cash in on a restaurant—you could work evenings in the dump, and there'd be a lot of city sports hanging round, and we'd have the time of our lives."

"No, I—I study evenings. And I—the fact is, Bill, I've met a lot of nice fellows at the university and I kind of go round with them."

"Aw, how d'you get that way? Rats, you don't want to go tagging after them Willy boys! Damn dirty snobs. And the girls are worse. I tell you, Milt, these hoop-te-doodle society Janes may look all right to hicks like us, but they're a covey of lemons."

"What do you know about them?"

"Now don't get sore. I'm telling you. I don't like to see any friend of mine make a fool of himself hanging round with a bunch that despises him because he ain't rich, that's all. Met any of the high-toned skirts?"

"Yes—I—have!"

"Trot 'em up and lemme give 'em the once-over."

"We—we'll see about it. Now I got to go to a mathematics recitation, Bill. You make yourself comfortable, and I'll be back at five."

Milt did not have to go to a recitation. He marched out with briskness in his step and a book under his arm; but when he reached the corner the briskness proved to be spurious, and the mathematics book proved to be William Rose Benét's Merchants From Cathay, which Claire had given him in the Yellowstone, and which he had rescued from the wrecked bug.

He stood staring at it. He opened it with unhappy tenderness. He had been snatched from the world of beautiful words and serene dignity, of soaring mountains and companionship with Claire in the radiant morning, back to the mud and dust of Schoenstrom, from the opera to city sports in a lunch room! He hated Bill McGolwey and his sneering assumption that Milt belonged in the filth with him. And he hated himself for not being enough of a genius to combine Bill McGolwey and Claire Boltwood. But not once in his maelstrom of worry on that street corner did he expect Claire to like Bill. Through all his youthful agonizing he had enough common sense to know that though Claire might conquer a mountain pass she could never be equal to the social demands of Schoenstrom and Bill McGolwey.

He wandered for an hour and came back to find that in a dry city which he had never seen before the crafty Bill had obtained a quart of bourbon, and was in a state of unsteady beatitude. He wanted, he announced, to dance.

Milt got him into the community bathtub, and soused him under; but Bill's wet body was slippery and Bill's merry soul was all for frolicsome gamboling, and he slid out of Milt's grasp; he sloshed round in the tub, he sprinkled Milt's sacred good suit with soapy water till he was seized with sleepiness and cosmic grief and retired to Milt's bed in tears.

The room dimmed, grew dark. The street lamps outside sent a wan wavery gleam into the room. Evening crowds went by, and in a motion-picture theater a banging piano struck up. Bill breathed in choking snorts. Milt sat unmoving, feeling very old, very tired, too dumbly unhappy to be frightened of the dreadful coming hour when Claire and Jeff should hear of Bill, and discover Milt's real world.

He was not so romantically loyal, not so inhumanly heroic that it can truthfully be reported that he never thought of getting rid of Bill. He did think of it, again and again. But always he was touched by Bill's unsuspecting trust, and shook his head and sank again into the fog.

What was the use of trying to go ahead? Wasn't he, after all, merely a Bill McGolwey himself? If he was he wouldn't inflict himself on Claire. For several minutes he gave up forever the zest of climbing.

When Bill awoke, brightly solicitous about the rest of the quart of bourbon, and bouncingly ready to go out and have a time, Milt loafed about the streets with him, showing him the city. He dully cut his classes next morning and took Bill to the wharves.

It was late in the afternoon, when they were lounging in the room and Bill was admiring his new pants—he boasted of having bought them for three dollars and pointed out that Milt had been a galoot to spend ten dollars for shoes—that someone knocked at the door. Sleepily expectant of his landlady Milt opened it on Miss Claire Boltwood, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Gilson and Mr. Geoffrey Saxton.

Saxton calmly looked past him at Bill, smiled slightly and condescended: "I thought we ought to call on you, so we've dropped in to beg for tea."

Bill had paused midway in scratching his head to gape at Claire. Claire returned the look, stared at Bill's frowzy hair, his red wrists, his wrinkled, grease-stained coat, his expression of impertinent stupidity. Then she glanced questioningly at Milt, who choked:

"Oh, yes, yes! Sure! Glad see you! Come in, get some tea. So glad see you. Come in."

XV

"MY FRIEND, Mr. McGolwey—I knew him in Schoenstrom—come on to Seattle for a while. Bill, these are some people I met along the road," Milt grumbled.

"Glad to meet 'em. Have a chair. Have two chairs! Say, Milt, y'ought to have more chairs if you're going to have a bunch of swells coming to call on you. Ha, ha, ha! Say, I guess I better pike out and give the folks a chance to chin with you," Bill fondly offered.

"Oh, sit down," Milt snapped at him.

They all sat down, four on the bed; and Milt's inner ear heard a mute snicker from the Gilsons and Saxton. He tried to talk. He couldn't. Bill looked at him, and perceiving the dumbness gallantly helped out: "So you met the kid on the road, eh? Good scout, Milt is. We always used to say at Schoenstrom that he was the best darn hand at fixing a flivver in seven townships."

"So you knew Mr. Daggett at home? Now isn't that nice?" said Mrs. Gilson.

"Knew him? Sa-ay, Milt and I was brung up together. Why, him and I have bummed round together, and worked on farms, summers, and we've fished for bullheads—— You ever catch a bullhead? Damnedest, slipperiest fish you ever saw, and got horns that sting the stuffin's out of you —— Say, I wonder if Milt's told you about the time we had at a barn dance once. There was a bunch of hicks there, and I says: 'Say, kid, lez puncture their tires, and hide and watch the fun when they come out.' I guess maybe I was kind of stewed a little, tell the truth, but 'course Milt he don't drink much, hardly at all, nice straight kid if I do say so——"

"Bill," Milt ordered, "we must have some tea. Here's six bits. You run down to the corner grocery and get some tea and a little cream. Oh, you better buy three-four cups too. Hustle now, son!"

"Attaboy! Yours to command, ladies and gents, like the fellow says!" Bill boomed delightedly. He winked at Jeff Saxton, airily spun his broken hat on his dirty forefinger and sauntered out.

"Charming fellow. A real original," crooned Mrs. Gilson.

"Did he know your friend Mr. Pinky?" asked Saxton.

Before Milt could answer Claire rose from the bed, inspected the Gilsons and Jeff with cold dislike, and said quietly to Milt: "The poor dear thing—he was dreadfully embarrassed. It's so good of you to be nice to him. I believe in sticking to old friends."

"Oh, so do I!" babbled Mrs. Gilson. "It's just too splendid. And we must do something for him. I'm going to invite Mr. Daggett and Mr.—Mr. McGollups, was it?—to dinner this evening. I do want to hear him tell about your boyhood. It must have been so interesting."

"It was," mused Milt. "It was poor and miserable. We had to work hard—we had to fight for whatever education we got—we had no one to teach us courtesy."

"Oh, now, with your fine old doctor father? Surely he was an inspiration?" Jeff didn't this time trouble to hide the sneer.

"Yes, he was. He gave up the chance to be a rich loafer in order to save farmers' babies for fees that he never got."

"I'm sure he did. I wish I'd known him. We need to know men like that in this pink-frosting playing at living we have in cities," Claire said sweetly—not to Milt but to Jeff.

Mrs. Gilson had ignored them, waiting with the patience of a cat at a mouse hole, and she went on: "But you haven't said you'd come this evening. Do say you will! I don't suppose Mr. McGollups will care to dress for dinner?"

With saccharine devotion Milt yearned back: "No, Mrs. Gilson. No, Mr. McGolwey won't care to dress. He's eccentric."

"But you'll make him come?"

Milt was tactfully beginning to refuse when Gene Gilson at last exploded, turned purple, covered his dripping too-red lips with his handkerchief.

Then abruptly Milt hurled at Mrs. Gilson: "All right, we'll come. Bill'll be awfully funny. He's never been out of a jerkwater burg in his life, hardly. He's an amusing cuss. He thinks I'm smart! He loves me like a dog. Oh, he's rich! Ha, ha, ha!"

Milt might have gone on. If he had Mr. and Mrs. Gilson would have gone away, much displeased. But Bill arrived, with some of the worst tea in the world and four cups tastefully done in cupids' heads and much gilt.

Milt made tea, ignoring them, while Bill entertained the Gilsons and Saxton with Rabelaisian stories of threshing time when shirts prickly with chaff and gritty with dust stuck to sweat-dripping backs; of the funny thing of Milt and Bill being hired to move a garbage pile and swiping their employer's mushmelons; of knotting shirts at the swimming hole so that the bawling youngsters had to chaw beef; of drinking beer at the livery stable; of dropping the water pitcher from a St. Klopstock hotel window upon the head of the constabule and escaping from him across the lean-to roof.

Mrs. Gilson encouraged him; Bill sat with almost closed eyes, glorying in the saga of small-town life; Saxton and Gilson did not conceal their contemptuous grins.

But Claire—after nervously rubbing the tips of her thumbs with flickering, agitated fingers she had paid no attention to Bill and the revelation of Milt's rustic life—had quietly gone to Milt to help him prepare the scanty tea.

She whispered: "Never mind, dear. I don't care. It was all twice as much fun as being wheeled in lacy prams by cranky nurses, as Jeff and I were. But I know how you feel. Are you ashamed?"

"No, I'm not! We were wild kids—we raised a lot of Cain—but I'm glad we did."

"So am I. I couldn't stand it if you were ashamed. Listen to me, and remember little Claire's words of wisdom: These fools are trying—oh, they're so obvious!—they're trying to make me feel that the prim Miss Boltwood, of Brooklyn Heights, is a stranger to you. Well, they're succeeding in making me a stranger—to them!"

"Claire, dear! You don't mind Bill?"

"Yes, I do. And so do you. You've grown away from him."

"I don't know, but—to-day has been quite a test."

"Yes, it has. Because if I can stand your friend, Mr. McGolwey ——"

"Then you do care!"

(Continued on Page 110)

When You Eat

If, when tomorrow morning rolls around, you wouldn't need to go near the kitchen stove to cook breakfast—

If you could sit down at the table and not have to get up once during the meal—

If, while you're eating your grapefruit, the bacon and eggs would be sizzling and sputtering, the toast turning to a golden brown and the coffee bubbling in the percolator—all right at the table—making you hungrier and hungrier every minute—

If you could serve it all when everything was done just right and nothing had a chance to get cold—

Wouldn't it be just the kind of a breakfast to start the day right?

That's the kind of breakfast you can have with Westinghouse Electric Ware.

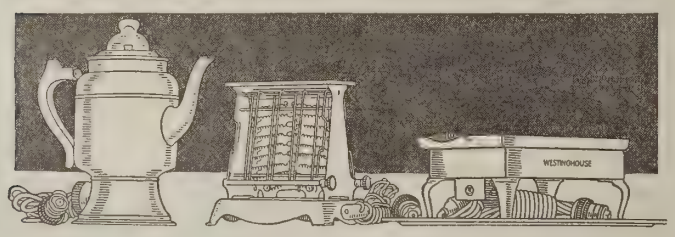
When you're provided with a Westinghouse Electric Toaster-Stove, Turnover Toaster and Percolator, moreover, the help problem is less of a worry.

You eat whenever you are ready—you don't need to wait to be served—you're more independent of the kitchen and the failings of incompetent servants.

The Toaster-Stove fries bacon and eggs, broils steaks and chops, bakes griddle cakes and cooks various other dishes. Price $10.00.

The Turnover Toaster toasts two pieces of bread at a time, and you can turn the toast without touching it. Price $7.00.

The Percolator, by applying the heat within and preventing the boiling of water and coffee together, makes superior coffee and makes it more quickly. Prices, $13.00 to $20.00.



When You Iron

No stove — no flame — no heat — no changing of irons—no steps;

Freedom to iron anywhere there's a lamp socket or base plug;

Ability to iron standing or sitting, as you prefer;

Quick, steady heat right where you need it—

These are some of the advantages that come with a Westinghouse Electric Iron.

No wonder the electric iron has swept the sad-iron-and-stove method into the discard wherever electricity is available.

Whether it's a shirtwaist to be pressed or a day's washing to be ironed, a Westinghouse Electric Iron eliminates three-fourths of the work and shortens the time surprisingly.

And in these days especially, time has a value that makes wasting it inexcusable.

Look for the name "Westinghouse" on the iron. Prices, $6.00 to $8.50.

W WESTINGHOUSE
ELECTRIC

Westinghouse Electric Ware is sold by light and power companies, electrical and hardware dealers and department stores.

Westinghouse

SMALL MOTORS. FANS. ELECTRIC WARE FOR THE HOME

Westinghouse

ELECTRIC RANGES AND OTHER HEATING APPLIANCES

Look for the Westinghouse name or trade-mark in the dealer's window and on the appliances you buy. It's your guarantee.

W WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC

When You Sew

Party dress—house-dress—clothes for the children—hemming—tucking—mending—they're no problem at all with a Westinghouse Electric Sew-Motor on your sewing machine.

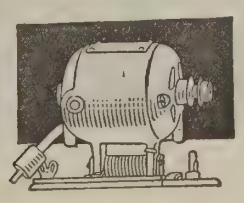
The Sew-Motor relieves you of the hardest part of the sewing job—that constant push-push of the treadle.

It is easily attached to your machine, and when it's on the job you can give all your attention to the stitches.

A touch of your foot on the treadle gives you any speed you want up to 1,000 stitches a minute. Thus the Sew-Motor not only lightens the task but also greatly shortens it.

This little Westinghouse Electric Motor is built with just the same attention to every feature of design and construction as the bigger motors that have helped make Westinghouse Electric famous.

Be sure that the name "Westinghouse" is on the motor you buy. Price $15.00.



When You Cook

Six o'clock—dinner all ready to serve—and not a soul in the house since noon.

You don't need to stay at home to cook with a Westinghouse Automatic Electric Range, nor hurry home when you're out for the afternoon.

Set the range-clock, pull up the oven-switch knob, and you can forget dinner's to be cooked.

For example, set the clock control for 4 o'clock and on the stroke of four the electricity is turned on automatically. As soon as the proper heat is reached, the current is cut off and cooking continues by stored heat.

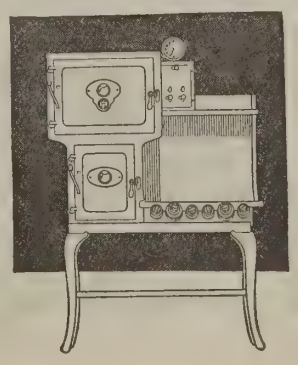
The food can't burn because the temperature is not allowed to rise above that at which you've set the indicator. It doesn't dry out, whether it's in the oven two hours or six.

The steady, even heat of a Westinghouse Automatic Range means more juicy and tender meats, better-baked bread, vegetables, cereals and desserts cooked as you've never cooked them before.

Moreover, it means economical cooking because it requires comparatively little current, saves time, decreases food shrinkage. Tests show the loss of food weight is from 20 to 50 per cent less than with a gas or coal range.

The Westinghouse Automatic is the only electric range that turns the current on and off automatically. Prices, $73.75 to $352.50. Ask your electric power company for full information.

WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC & MANUFACTURING COMPANY
East Pittsburgh, Pa.



(Continued from Page 107)

"Perhaps. And if I think that he's, oh, not much good, and if I remember that for a long time you had nobody but him to play with, then I'm all the more anxious to make it up to you."

"Don't be sorry for me! I can't stand that! After all, it was a good town, and good folks and Bill was the kind that stuck by you, and ——"

"No, no! I'm not sorry for you! I just mean, you couldn't have had so terribly much fun after you were eighteen or so. Schoenstrom must have been a little dull, after very many years there. This stuff about the charm of backwoods villages—most of the people that write it probably take jolly good care to stay in Long Island suburbs!"

"Claire!" He was whispering desperately. "The tea's most done. Oh, my dear, I'm crazy with this puttering round, trying to woo you and having to woo the entire Gilson tribe. Let's run away!"

"No; first I'm going to convince them that you are—what I know you are."

"But you can't."

"Huh! You wait! I've thought of the most beautiful, beastly cruel plan for the reduction of social obesity."

Then she was jauntily announcing: "Tea, my dears. Jeff, you get the tooth mug. Isn't this jolly!"

"Yes. Oh, yes, very jolly!" Jeff was thoroughly patronizing, but she didn't look offended. She made them drink the acid tea, and taste the chalklike bread-and-butter sandwiches. She coaxed Bill to go on with his stories, and when the persistent Mrs. Gilson again asked the pariahs to come to dinner Claire astonished Milt and still more astonished Mrs. Gilson by begging:

"Oh, yes, please do come, Milt!"

He consented savagely.

"But first," Claire added to Mrs. Gilson, "I want us to take the boys to—oh, I have the bulliest idea! Come, everybody! We're going riding."

"Uh, where?" hinted Mr. Gilson.

"That's my secret. Come!"

Claire pranced to the door, herded all of them down to the limousine, whispered an address to the chauffeur.

Milt didn't care much for that ride. Bill was somewhat too evidently not accustomed to limousines. He wiped his shoes, caked with red mud, upon the seat cushions, and apologized perspiringly. He said: "Gee whillikens, that's a dandy idea—telephone to bawl the shuffer out with," and "Are them flowers real, the bokay in the vase?"

But the Gilsons and Jeff Saxton were happy about it all—till the car turned from a main thoroughfare upon a muddy street of shacks that clung like goats to the sides of a high cut, a street unchanged from the pioneer days of Seattle.

"Good heavens, Claire, you aren't taking us to see Aunt Hatty, are you?" wailed Mrs. Gilson.

"Oh, yes, indeed! I knew the boys would like to meet her."

"No, really, I don't think ——"

"Eva, my soul, Jeff and you planned our tea-party to-day, and assured me I'd be so interested in Milt's bachelor apartment. By the way, I'd been up there already, so it wasn't entirely a surprise. It's my turn to lead." She confided to Milt: "Dear old Aunt Hatty is related to all of us. She's Gene's aunt, and my fourth cousin, and I think she's distantly related to Jeff. She came West early and had a hard time, but she's real Brooklyn Heights—and she belongs to Gramercy Park and North Washington Square and Rittenhouse Square and Back Bay, too, though she has got out of touch a little. So I wanted you to meet her."

Milt wondered what unperceived bag of cement had hardened the faces of Saxton and the Gilsons.

XVI

SILENT save for polite observations of Claire upon tight skirts and lumbering, the merry company reached the foot of a lurching flight of steps that scrambled up a clay bank to a cottage like a hen that has set too long. Milt noticed that Mrs. Gilson made efforts to remain in the limousine when it stopped, and he caught Gilson's mutter to his wife: "No, it's Claire's turn. Be a sport, Eva."

Claire led them up the badly listed steps to an unpainted porch on which sat a little old lady, very neat, very respectable, very interested, and reflectively holding a dainty handkerchief and a black clay pipe.

"Hello, Claire, my dear. You've broken the relatives' record—you've called twice in less than a year," said the little old lady.

"How do you do, Aunt Harriet," remarked Mrs. Gilson, with great lack of warmth.

"Hello, Eva. Sit down on the edge of the porch. Those chickens have made it awful dirty, though, haven't they? Bring out some chairs. There's two chairs that don't go down under you—often." Aunt Harriet was very cheerful.

The group lugubriously settled in a circle upon an assemblage of wind-broken red-velvet chairs and wooden stools. They resembled the crowd at a farm auction held outdoors. Claire was the auctioneer, Mrs. Gilson the grief-stricken widow. Claire waved at Milt and conversed with Aunt Hatty in a high, brisk voice.

"This is the nice boy I met on the road that I think I told you about, Cousin Hatty."

The little old lady screwed up the delicate skin about her eyes, examined Milt and cackled: "Boy, there's something wrong here. Why, you don't belong with my family. Why, you look like an American. You haven't got an imitation monocle, and I bet you can't talk with a New York-London accent. Why, Claire, I'm ashamed of you for bringing a human being into the Boltwood-Gilson-Saxton tomb and expecting ——"

Then was the smile of Mrs. Gilson lost forever. It was simultaneously torpedoed, mined, scuttled and bombed. It went to the bottom without a ripple, while Mrs. Gilson snapped: "Aunt Hatty, please don't be vulgar."

"Me?" croaked the little old lady. She puffed at her pipe and dropped her elbows on her knees. "My, ain't it hard to please some folks!"

"Cousin Hatty, I want Milt to know about our families. I love the dear old stories," Claire begged prettily.

Mrs. Gilson snarled. "Claire, really——"

"Oh, do shut up, Eva, and don't be so bossy!" yelped the dear little old lady in sudden and dismaying rage. "I'll talk if I want to. Have they been bullying you, Claire? Or your boy? I tell you, boy, these families are fierce. I was brought up in Brooklyn—went through all the schools—used to be able to misplay the piano and mispronounce French with the best of 'em. Then Gene's pa and I came West together. And we went broke. I took in washing. I learned a lot. I learned a Gilson was just the same common stuff as a red-shirt miner, when he was up against it. But Gene's pa succeeded—there was something about practically stealing a fur schooner—but I never was one to tattle on my kin. An way, by the time Gene come along his was rich, and that means aristocratic.

"I'm kept pensioned up here out of t way, but I read the social notes in the p pers and I chuckle. When there's a l reception and I read about Mrs. Vogelan pearls and her beautiful daughter-in-law remember how she used to run a boardi house for miners.

"Well, a good share of the aristocracy just as shoddy in the East, if you go f enough back. Claire, you're a nice, co forting body, and I hate to say it, but t truth is your great-grandfather was hostler, and made his first money betti on horses. Now, my, I oughtn't to tell th Do you mind, deary?"

"Not a bit. Isn't it delightful that t is such a democratic country, with castes?" said Claire.

At this, the first break in the little o lady's undammable flood, Mrs. Gils sprang up, yammering: "The rest of y may stay as long as you like, but if I'm be home in time to dress for dinner ——

"Yes, and I must be going," babbl Saxton. Milt noted that his lower showed white tooth marks.

It must be admitted that all of the rudely ignored the little old lady for a m ment. Milt was apologetically hintin "I don't really think Bill and I'd bett come to dinner this evening, Mrs. Gilso Thanks a lot but—it's kind of sudden."

Claire again took charge. "Not at a Milt. Of course you're coming. It w Eva herself who invited you. I'm su she'll be delighted."

"Charmed," said Mrs. Gilson, with t expression of one who has swallowed quinine pill and doubts the unity of t universe.

There was a lack of ease about the far wells to Aunt Harriet. As they all turn away she beckoned Milt and murmure "Did I raise the dickens? I tried to. It the only solace besides smoking that a mor old lady can allow herself after she gets be eighty-two. Come and see me, bo Now get out; and, boy, beat up Gene G son. Don't be scared of his wife's hoit toity ways. Just sail in."

"I will," said Milt. He had one mo surprise.

Bill McGolwey, who had sat listening everything and scratching his cheek in

(Concluded on Page 112)

DRAWN BY CHARLES HARGENS, JR.

Look for the Red Star

THE Detroit Vapor Stove will hereafter be known as the "Red Star" Detroit Vapor Oil Stove. By this bright Red Star you can now quickly recognize this famous, advanced type, all-the-year-'round oil stove, which has all the beauty, sturdiness and efficiency of a fine city gas range.

—the oil stove without wicks or wick substitutes.

—the oil stove that makes gas from kerosene, gasoline or distillate, and burns it like a gas range.

—the oil stove with big 8½-lb. grey iron burners that produce enough heat for any cooking or baking need—at a 25% saving in fuel.

—the oil stove that bakes, boils, roasts or fries anything—from a delicate custard, to a big rib roast, as deliciously and as quickly as on any city gas range.

Sold by leading furniture and hardware dealers. Look for the Red Star. Write for a copy of the Red Star book of cookery tests.

THE DETROIT VAPOR STOVE CO., DETROIT, MICH., U.S.A.

30

RED STAR

Detroit Vapor Oil Stove

(Concluded from Page 110)

puzzled way, seized Milt's sleeve and rumbled: "Good-by, old hoss. I'm not going to butt in on your game and get you in Dutch. Gosh, I never supposed you had enough class to mingle with elittys like this gang, but I know when I'm in wrong. You were too darn decent to kick me out. Do it myself.

"You're best friend I ever had and—good luck, old man! God bless you!"

Bill was gone, running, stumbling, fleeing past Aunt Harriet's cottage off into a sandy hilltop vacancy. The last Milt saw of him was when, on the sky line, Bill stopped for a glance back, and seemed to be digging his knuckles into his eyes.

Then Milt turned resolutely, marched down the stairs, said to his hosts with a curious quietness: "Thank you for asking me to dinner, but I'm afraid I can't come. Claire, will you walk a few blocks with me?"

During the half minute it had taken to descend the steps Milt had reflected, with an intensity which forgot Bill, that he had been selfish; that he had thought only of the opinion of these nice people, of himself, instead of understanding that it was his duty to save Claire from their enervating niceness. Not that he phrased it quite in that way.

What he had been muttering was: "Rotten shame—me so scared of folks' clothes that I don't stand up to 'em and keep 'em from smothering Claire. Lord, it would be awful if she settled down to being a Mrs. Jeff Saxton. Got to save her—not for myself—for her."

It may have been Aunt Harriet, it may have been Milt's resolution, but Mrs. Gilson answered almost meekly: "Well, if you think —— Would you like to walk, Claire?"

As he tramped off with Claire Milt demanded: "Glad to escape?"

"Yes, and I'm glad you refused dinner. It really has been wearing, this trial by food."

"This is the last time I'll dare to meet the Gilsons."

"And I'll have to be going back East. I hope the Gilsons will forgive me, some day."

"I'm afraid you didn't win them over by Aunt Hatty!"

"No. They're probably off me for life. Oh, these horrible social complications—worse than any real danger—fire or earthquake ——"

"Oh, these complications—they don't exist! We just make 'em, like we make rules for a card game. What the deuce do we care about the opinions of people we don't like? And who appointed these people to a fixed social position? Did the president make Saxton High Cockalorum of Dress Suits or something? Why, these are just folks, the same as kings and coal heavers. There's no army we've got to fight. There's just you and me—you and I—and if we stick together, then we have all society, we are all society!"

"Ye-es; but, Milt dear, I don't want to be an outcast."

"You won't be. In the long run, if you don't take these aristocrats seriously, they'll be all the more impressed by you."

"No. That sounds cheering, in stories and these optimistic poems in the magazines, but it isn't true. And you don't know how pleasant it is to be in. I've always been more or less on the inside, and thought outsiders dreadful. But—oh, I don't care! I don't care! With you—I'm happy. That's all I know and all I want to know. I've just grown up. I've just learned the greatest wisdom—to know when I'm happy. But, Milt dear, you —— I say this because I love you. Yes, I do love you. No, don't kiss me. Yes, it is too—it's far too public. And I want to talk seriously. You can't have any idea how strong social distinctions are. Don't despise them just because you don't know them."

"No, I won't. I'll learn. Probably America will get into the war. I'll be an engineering officer. I'll learn this social dope from the college-boy officers. And I'll come to Brooklyn with shoulder straps and bells on and—will you be waiting?"

"Oh—yes! But, Milt! If the war comes you must be very careful not to get shot!"

"All right, if you insist. Good Lord, Claire, I don't know what put it into my head but—do you realize that a miracle has happened? We're no longer Miss Boltwood and a fellow named Daggett. We have been, even when we've liked each other, up to to-day. Always there's been a kind of fence between us. We had to explain and defend ourselves and scrap. But now—we're us, and the rest of the world has disappeared, and ——"

"And nothing else matters," said Claire.

XVII

IT WAS the farewell to Claire and Jeff Saxton, a picnic in the Cascades, near Snoqualmie Falls—a decent and decidedly Miltless fiesta. Mrs. Gilson was going to show Claire that they were just as hardy adventurers as that horrid Daggett person. So she didn't take the limousine, but merely the seven-passenger touring car with the special body.

They were ever so rough and wild. They had no maid. The chauffeur was absolutely the only help to the Gilsons, Claire, Jeff, and the temporarily and ejaculatorily nature-loving Mrs. Betz in the daring task of setting out two folding camp tables, covering them with a linen cloth and opening the picnic basket. Claire had to admit that she would have liked to steal the picnic basket for Milt. There were vacuum bottles of hot coffee. There were sandwiches of anchovy and pâté de foie gras. There were cream cakes with almonds hidden in the suave cream, and there was a chicken salad with huge chunks of pure white meat wallowing in a sea of mayonnaise.

When the gorging was done and the cigarettes brought out—the chauffeur passed a spirit lamp—they stretched on rubber blankets and groaned a little and spoke well of Nature and the delights of roughing it.

"What is it? What's wrong? They're so—oh, so polite. They don't mean what they say and they don't dare to say what they mean. Is that it?" worried Claire.

She started. She discovered that she was looking at a bristle of rope-colored hair and a grin projected from the shelter of a manzanita bush.

"For the ——" she gasped. She was too startled to be able to decide what was for the —— She spoke judiciously to Jeff Saxton about Upper Montclair, the Subway and tennis.

She rose to examine the mountains, strolled away, darted down a gully, and pounced on Milt Daggett with: "How in heaven's name ——"

"Found out where you-all were going. Look! Got a bug! Rented it. Come on! Let's duck! Drive back with me!" At the end of the gully was a new Teal bug, shinier than the ancient lost chariot, but equally gay and uncomfortable.

"Can't. Like to, but—be awfully rude to them. Won't do that—not more than is good for their souls—even for you. Now don't be sulky."

"I won't. Nev' be sulky again, because you're crazy about me, and I don't have to be sulky."

"Oh, I am, am I! Good heavens, the inconceivable conceit of the child!"

She turned her back. He darted to her, caught her hands behind her, kissed her hair, and whispered: "You are!"

"I am not!"

"Well, then, you're not. Lord, you're sweet! Your hair smells like cinnamon and clean kittens. You'd rather go bumping off in my flivver than sailing in that big car they've got there."

"Yes"—defiantly—"I would, and I'm ashamed of myself. I'm a throw-back to my horrid ancestor, the betting hostler."

"Probably. I'm a throw-back to my ancestor, the judge. I'll train you to meet my fine friends."

"Well—upon—my—word—I —— Oh, do stop being idiotic. We talk like children. You reduce me to the rank of a gibbering schoolgirl. And I like it! It's so—oh, I—don't know—so darn human, I suppose. Now hurry—kiss me, and get out, before they suspect."

"Listen."

"Yes?"

"I'll accidentally meet your car along the road. Invite you to ride. All right?"

"Yes. Do. Oh, we are two forlorn babes in the woods! G'-by."

She sauntered back to the picnic and observed: "What is that purple flower up on the mountain side?"

The big car was sedately purring back when it was insulted by an intermediate host of a machine that came jumping out of a side road. The vulgar driver hailed them with uncouth howling. The Gilsons' chauffeur stopped, annoyed.

"Why, hello, folks!" bawled the social bandit.

"Oh. How do you do," refuted Mrs. Gilson.

Jeff Saxton turned a ripe purple.

"How do you like my new bug, Claire? Awful little object. But I can make fifty an hour. Come and try it, Claire, can't you?"

"Why ——" Claire was obviously shocked by the impropriety of the suggestion. She looked at Mrs. Gilson, who was breathing as though she were just going under the ether. Claire said doubtfully: "Well—if you can get me right back to the house ——"

"Sure!" agreed Milt.

XVIII

WHEN the Gilsons were gone Milt drove the bug to the side of the road, yanked up the emergency brake, and carefully kissed the girl, who was snuggled down into the absurd low tin-sided seat.

"Do we have to get back soon?" he begged.

"Oh, I don't care if we never get back. Let's shoot up into the mountains. Side road. Let's pretend we're driving across the continent again."

Firs dashing by, rocks in the sunshine, clouds jaunty beyond the inviting mouth of a mountain pass, even the ruts and bumps and culverts—she seemed a part of them all. In the Gilsons' huge cars she had been shut off from the road, but in this tiny bug, so close to earth, she recovered the feeling of struggle, of triumph over difficulties, of freedom unbounded. And she could be herself, good or bad, ignorant or wise, with this boy beside her. All of which she expressed in the most eloquent speech she had ever uttered, namely:

"Oh, Milt!"

And, to herself: "Golly, it's such a relief not to have to try to be gracious and aphoristic and repartistic and everything with Jeff."

And: "But I wonder if I am aphoristic and subtle. I wonder if when she gets the rice powder off Claire isn't a lot more like Milt than she thought?"

And, aloud again: "Oh, this is ——"

"Yump. It sure is," Milt agreed.

They had turned from a side road into a side road. They crossed an upland valley.

The fall rains had flooded a creek till it had cut across the road, washed through the thin gravel, left across the road a shallow violent stream. Milt stopped abruptly at its margin.

"Here's where we turn back, I guess," he sighed.

"Oh, no! Can't we get across? It's only a couple of feet deep, and gravel bottom," insisted the restored adventurer.

"Yes, but look at the steep bank. Never get up it."

"I don't care, Let's try it. We can woggle round and dig it out somehow. I bet you two bits we can," said the delicate young woman whom Mrs. Gilson was protecting.

"All right. In she goes!"

The bug went in—shot over the bank, dipped down till the little hood sloped below them as though they were looping the loop, struck the rushing water with a splash which hurled yellow drops over Claire's rose jersey suit, lumbered ahead, struck the farther bank, pawed at it feebly, rose two inches, slipped back, and sat there with the gurgling water all round it, turned into a motor boat.

"No can do," grunted Milt. "Scared?"

"Nope. Love it! This is a real camp—the brush on the bank, and the stream—listen to it chuckle under the running board."

"Do you like to camp with me?"

"Love it!"

"Say! Gee! Never thought —— Claire! Got your transportation back East?"

"My ticket? Yes. Why?"

"Well, I'm sure you can turn it in and get a refund. So that's all right."

"Are you going to let me in on the secret?"

"Oh, yes; might's well. I was just wondering —— I don't think much of wasting all our youth waiting. Two-three years in engineering school, and maybe going to war, and starting in on an engineering job, and me lonely as a turkey in a chicken yard, and you doing the faithful young lady in Brooklyn —— I think perhaps we might get married to-morrow and ——"

"Good heavens! What do you ——"

"Do you want to go back to Brooklyn Gilsons?"

"No, but ——"

"Dear, can't we be crazy once, while we're youngsters?"

"Don't bombard me so! Let me thi One must be practical, even in crazines

"I am. I have over a thousand doll from the garage and I can work evening as dear Jeff suggested! We'd have a tw by-four flat, Claire ——"

"Oh, let me think. I suppose I could to the university, too, and learn a lit about food and babies and building hou and government. I need to go to schoo lot more than you do. Besides auction a the piano—which I play very badly—a clothes and how to get hold of tickets successful plays, I don't know one sin thing."

"Will you marry me, to-morrow?"

"Well, uh ——"

"Think of Mrs. Gilson's face when s learns it! And Saxton, and that M Betz!"

It was to no spoken sentence but to kiss that she added: "Providing we out of this river, that is!"

"Oh, my dear, my dear, and all the mantic ways I was going to propose! had the best line about roses and stars a angels and everything."

"They always use those, but nobo ever proposed to me in a bug in a flood fore! Oh, Milt! Life is fun! I never kn it till you kidnaped me. If you kiss again like that we'll both topple overboa By the way, can we get the car out?"

"I think so if we put on the chains. W have to take off our shoes and stocking

They swung out on the running boa now awash. With slight squeals th dropped into the cold stream. Drippi laughing, his clothes clinging to him, ducked down behind the car to get the ja under the back axle, and with the wa gurgling about her and splashing its hilarating coldness into her face she stoop beside him to yank the stiff new chains o the rear wheels.

They climbed back into the car, joyous raffish as a pair of gipsies. She wiped a d of mud from her cheek, and remarked wi an earnestness and a naturalness whi Jeff Saxton who knew her so well wou never have recognized as hers: "Gee, hope the old bird crawls out now!"

Milt let in the reverse, raced the engi started backward with a burst of mud water churned up by the whirling whee They struck the bank, sickeningly hu there for two seconds, began to crawl up, with a feeling that at any second th would drop back again.

Then, instantly, they were up on t shore, and it was absurd to think that th had ever been boating down there in t stream. They washed each other's mud faces, and laughed a great deal, and resum something of a dull and civilized aspe and singing sentimental ballads turn back, found another road and started ward a peak.

"I wonder what lies beyond the top this climb?" said Claire.

"More mountains, and more, and mo and we're going to keep on climbing the forever. At dawn, we'll still be going And that's our life."

"Ye-es, providing we can still buy ga

"Lord, that's so."

"Speaking of which, do you know th I have about five thousand dollars of m own?"

"But—that makes it impossible. You tramp marrying lady of huge wealth."

"No, you don't! I've accepted you. you think I'm going to lose the one r playmate I've ever had? It was so lon on the Boltwoods' brown stoop till M came along and whistled impertinently a made the solemn little girl in frills pl marbles and —— Watch out for that tur Heavens, how I have to look after you! there a class in cooking at your universit No—do—not—kiss—me—on—a—turn!

This is the real beginning of the story Milt and Claire Daggett.

The prelude over and the curtain ris on the actual play, they face the anxiet and glories of a changing world. Not wit out quarrels and barren hours, not fr from ignorance and the discomfort of fin ing that between the mountain peaks th must for long gray periods dwell in t dusty valleys, they yet start their dra with the distinction of being able to lau together, with the advantage of havi discovered that neither Schoenstrom n Brooklyn Heights is quite all of life, w the cosmic importance to the tedious wo of believing in the romance that mak youth unquenchable.

(THE END)

Handsome Roofs at Moderate Cost—

HALF the charm of a house is in the first impression, and no small part of that impression is in the roof. A roof that is beautiful, durable and not expensive is what every owner wants. To meet this general need The Barrett Company offers its line of Everlastic Roofings for all steep-roofed buildings.

The separate shingle and strip-shingle forms, with their slate surface of soft natural colors (red or green) are highly artistic, while moderate in price and extremely durable. The two types of roll roofing are suitable for cottages, garages, boat-houses, stables, and farm and factory buildings.

Read the brief descriptions of the four styles below:

Everlastic Multi-Shingles. The newest thing in roofing—four shingles in one. Tough, elastic, durable. Made of high-grade waterproofing materials and surfaced with real crushed slate in art-shades of red or green. Weather and fire-resisting to a high degree. Fast color; need no painting.

Everlastic Tylike Shingles. Same material and art-finish (red or green) as the Multi-Shingles, but made in individual shingles; size 8 x 12¾ inches. A finished roof of Tylike Shingles is far more beautiful than an ordinary shingle roof and, in addition, costs less per year of service.

Everlastic Slate-Surfaced Roofing. The most beautiful and durable roll roofing made. Surfaced with crushed slate in art-shades of red and green. Very durable; requires no painting. Nails and cement in each roll.

Everlastic "Rubber" Roofing. This is one of our most popular roofings. Thousands of buildings all over the country are protected from wind and weather by Everlastic "Rubber" Roofing. Tough, pliable, durable and very low in price. It is easy to lay; no skilled labor required. Nails and cement in each roll.

Write today for free illustrated booklet.

The Barrett Company

TRADE B MARK

New York	Chicago		New Orleans	Birmingham	Philadelphia
Boston	St. Louis				Pittsburgh
Cleveland	Cincinnati	Detroit	Peoria	Atlanta	Kansas City	Minneapolis
Nashville	Salt Lake City	Seattle	Lebanon	Youngstown	Duluth	Milwaukee
Bangor	Washington	Johnstown	Bethlehem	Elizabeth	Toledo	Columbus
Richmond	Latrobe	Dallas			Buffalo	Baltimore

THE BARRETT COMPANY, LIMITED
St. John, N. B. Montreal Halifax, N. S. Toronto Sydney, N. S. Winnipeg Vancouver

SHERWIN

Which varnish?

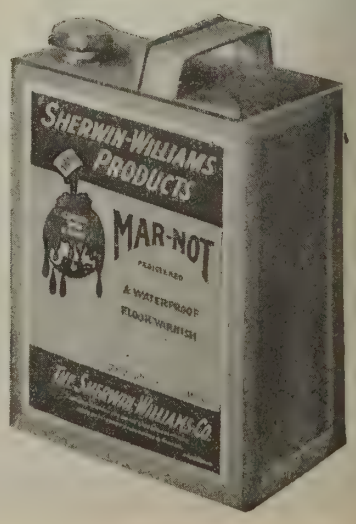
This may help you choose

WHEN you read the wonderful thing some varnishes will do, possibly you are confused as to which you should select for your use.

If you knew the problems put up to us by those who manufacture articles on which varnish is used and which they sell to the public — pianos, furniture and other articles for the home, besides hundreds of outdoor things, from yachts to airplanes — you would realize that we know what to put into varnish to meet these widely different conditions. We supply hundreds of manufacturers with varnishes. Our varnish demand running up into millions of gallons a year, requires the continuous operation of 105 varnish fires.

We are the largest purchasers of varnish gums in America and enormous users of oil, turpentine and thinners.

As specialists, we make precisely the right varnish for you. You can know it is right if it bears the Cover-the-Earth trademark.



WILLIAMS PRODUCTS

We make a special varnish to meet exactly such special need

YOU will realize readily that the varnish that gives that wonderful polish to your piano, would never do to apply to your front door. Your piano doesn't have to stand exposure to rain and snow, or to the broiling sun and the freezing wind. And your front door doesn't require that high polish.

You don't scrape your front door with your heels as you do the varnish on your floor, or move furniture around on it. It doesn't require the same toughness that a floor varnish needs.

You don't spill hot water on your piano as you may on your dining room table, or put hot dishes on it. The needs of your dining room table are different from the needs of your piano and your front door.

This is why we recommend a separate varnish for each individual purpose, according to its use. No one varnish will serve all of these purposes equally well.

No varnish has stood such rigorous tests as Sherwin-Williams Rexpar Varnish. It was made to meet the severe Government tests for use on its airplanes.

It resisted air, light, water, the fumes of gas, rode through the cold and storms of the upper air, plunged under water without turning white or dulling, remained clear, transparent, lustrous and flexible, dried quickly, set firmly and would not crack with sudden bending.

We recommend Rexpar Varnish for all outside uses. We recommend Mar-not for floors, Scar-not for woodwork.

If you want a single varnish for all purposes, no varnish will stand up and last as long as Sherwin-Williams Rexpar Varnish.

THE SHERWIN-WILLIAMS CO.

Address Main Correspondence Office, 601 Canal Road, N. W., Cleveland, Ohio

PAINTS, VARNISHES, DYESTUFFS, COLORS, PIGMENTS

CHEMICALS, DISINFECTANTS, WOOD PRESERVATIVES

S-W Scar-not—
A varnish for furniture and interior woodwork which withstands hot and cold water and steam.

S-W Rexpar Varnish—(store front)
A general varnish for exterior surfaces, made to withstand the severest exposure.

IN THE BIG TIMBER

(Continued from Page 21)

long cables and powerful donkey engines snaked down the skidway to the flume.

Water from a mountain stream had been diverted into the flume and on this current the logs were carried swiftly to the lake, where a sturdy little steamboat rafted them down to the mill. Here men poled them into the maw of an incline where the teeth of the endless log slip carried them up to the hungry saws.

At the top of the incline a boy stood with scaling rule and tally pad. As a log passed it was scaled and the dimensions recorded. Then the pressure of the boy's heel upon a lever released two steel arms that lifted the log as if it were a pencil and rolled it toward one of the log carriages. The next log was scaled and recorded. Another lever released another pair of arms that lifted and rolled it toward another carriage. Operators changed at regular eight-hour intervals, but the procession of logs was endless and unceasing.

Powerful automatic jacks lifted the logs to the carriages, where by the movement of levers they were locked in place. Forward and back like the swift movement of shuttles the logs were carried past the band saws. At the first cut bark-covered slabs of wood fell from the saws; were carried forward on power-driven rollers; were dropped to parallel chains moving at right angles to the band saws and carried through a battery of circular saws spaced four feet apart. The four-foot lengths of slab wood dropped to another endless carrier. Here they were sorted. Some pieces were transferred to another moving table and carried to the lath saws; other pieces were dropped into a chute from which they were loaded on flat cars and hauled away to be sold for fuel; and the odds and ends, the short and broken pieces, were allowed to drop to another endless carrier that led out from the mill and up into an enormous flue where the waste from the mill was dried and burned and its value returned to the power plant in the form of steam. The sawdust, chips of wood and small pieces of bark were carried direct from the saws and planers through suction pipes to the power plant. The material gathered by the suction pipes was usually sufficient to maintain the twelve fires—the four batteries of furnaces that furnished steam for the great engine-driven dynamos.

Following the first slabs that came from the sides of the logs came one-inch bark-edged boards that fell from the band saws and were carried on the power-driven rollers forward through the edging saws. Beyond the edging saws stood a young husky, who seized the bark-covered edgings and tossed them to the parallel chains that led to the cut-off saws. The boards, now with squared edges and of standard widths, went forward to another table where they were carried at a right angle through the trimming saw. Now cut to standard lengths, they were carried on endless parallel chains out of the mill and down to a long platform where they were sorted and loaded, and thence into the yard where they were piled for seasoning. Certain grades were taken direct to the great drying kilns, there to be seasoned in from five to nine days. The process of air seasoning took from thirty to ninety or more days, according to weather conditions.

After the lumber was suitably seasoned it was hauled to the open planing shed and thence from the battery of planers into spacious sheds for storage or else loaded for immediate shipment.

Ten thousand board feet each hour was the mill's capacity; one hundred and fifty thousand board feet the usual average for two eight-hour shifts. A daily production of almost a quarter of a million board feet of lumber was possible by working three eight-hour shifts.

Ben was willing to argue that this was more than Paul Bunyon had ever dreamed could be cut by one mill in the course of one day. And he had been told of a mill in Louisiana with even a greater capacity. He had decided—not definitely but as a matter to be considered, depending, of course, upon what Molly might say—to drift down to that mill when winter came.

But that was a winter proposition. It was summer now. Ben was working as a fire guard in the forest service. This was his idea of a real vacation. He had a cabin to live in; a fenced meadow where there was an abundance of grass for his saddle and pack horses; and a ranger as boss who didn't have to dog a man's heels all day to know whether or not he was on the job.

Each morning he came to the edge of that sheer cliff and watched as the rising sun rolled back the coverlet of morning mist that veiled the other far divide. When the timber slopes lay stark and boldly revealed he commenced his search for the slow-rising eddying haze that warns of a kindling forest blaze.

Ben had dealt with forest fires all his life. He had learned from the forest-service bulletins that there is an average of twenty-eight thousand forest fires in the United States annually with an attendant loss of more than ten million dollars' worth of timber. Ten million dollars seemed like a powerful lot of wealth to Ben. And twenty-eight thousand seemed like an awful lot of fires. Ben could not quite comprehend such a figure. But he felt he had been rather lucky. He had not yet had a blaze within the limits of his patrol and he knew that usually a man had to contend with seven or eight and sometimes as many as a dozen. And yet he had increased his vigilance. For several weeks there had been no rain and the grass and brush were parched and dry—timber through which fire might race without check or hindrance.

For a few moments Ben gazed at random over the slopes of the distant divide. Then he swept the scene in long parallels with his field glasses and cross-sectioned the parallels vertically until he was satisfied no danger lurked there. The ridges and cañons nearer he searched without the aid of the glasses. When he was certain all was well he crept back from the edge of the cliff. At a telephone sheltered between two close-growing trees he reported to the ranger in charge of his district. Then he caught the mare and started back to his camp. He had begun to feel hungry, and urged the mare.

He entered one of the innumerable little glades along the trail. There was a fluttering in the tall dry grass and he pulled the mare to an abrupt stop. A covey of grouse had been disturbed at their breakfast and stood peering with bright uncomprehending eyes at the cause of the disturbance. Ben slipped out of the saddle and took a small-caliber rifle from its boot under the stirrup fender. He did not hunt for sport. He selected a fat complacent cock and fired once. He retrieved the bird and dropped it into a sack tied behind the saddle.

"A hiyu lickum dinner," he commented as he remounted.

The distance was seven miles from the lookout point to his camp. This fourteen-mile round trip was his regular before-breakfast exercise. At half past seven that morning the gray mare was grazing in the meadow again and Ben's breakfast was ready. He ate as was befitting a hungry man—a bowl of rich ripe blackberries gathered in a near-by thicket the night before, a bowl of oatmeal porridge with a liberal helping of condensed milk from an open can on the table, several cups of steaming aromatic coffee and a sufficiency of griddle cakes.

When the meal was finished and the dishes washed and put away he leisurely saddled another horse and started toward his next lookout station. From this second point, a cliff commanding a stretch of timber hidden from the first lookout station by a ridge leading down from the divide, could be seen a system of ridges and draws that dropped away toward a narrow valley that opened miles beyond into the larger valley.

Ben tarried here just long enough to make sure that all was well. Then he started across the divide to his third lookout point. The trail led through the thick timber. Here and extending down into a third valley, where only an occasional settler lived, was the finest body of timber in that reserve. In this timber and in the trails that had been cut through it Ben took an almost personal pride. He had cleared one of the trails during a preceding summer. Now he was spending his spare time in opening another one.

His lookout stations were the three points of a triangle. The distance between the first two points through the meadow where he was camped was approximately ten miles. From the second to the third station across the divide was about six miles. From the third it was necessary to return to the meadow in order to travel back to the first. The ranger of the district had helped him survey and blaze a direct trail between these two points. They planned—when the work of opening the new trail was completed—to run a short trail from it to a fourth lookout point, thereby increasing the efficiency of the guard's work.

When Ben reached his third observati station that morning he lingered longer th was his custom. The view was much t same as the view from his first lookout the other side of the divide, timbered ridg and cañons leading down into a distant f tile valley, a magnificent sweep of timber hills rising height upon height beyond.

As he contemplated the scene he recall prophecies he had heard when a boy. Th the wise ones, the men who can prove much with figures, were predicting th within a generation at the rate the timb was being cut the hills would be denud of their trees. They had spoken in wise a vaguely worried tones of water famines d to streams'—deprived of timber wate sheds—drying at their sources.

But shucks! It hadn't happened a cording to predictions. Now other m were prophesying the same things. B shucks again! Ben knew that according the most authentic estimates there w 2,800,000,000,000 board feet of standi timber in the United States. What if t mills were sawing more than thirty-five b lion board feet annually? He had figured for himself that at that rate the standi timber would last for nearly eighty yea Another growth would be ready for cutti then. And if a man could believe what t timber owners said they would still ha the lumber they are sawing now piled in t yards seventy years hence—what with t rotten market, besides sawing at a loss a all that sort of thing.

But big figures did not appeal to Be To see 2,800,000,000,000 in print did n mean much of anything. He had often se logs aggregating more than one milli board feet in the water at that Idaho mi But he had comprehended them simply a right sizable mess of logs. His figuri was more of a five-on-this-hand and fiv on-that-hand proposition. For instanc there was a certain grove of hemlocks a firs on the divide not far from his camp.

Ben had his eye on a little shoe-stri ranch in this valley below him. He h saved enough to make the first payment the purchase price. There was a ranch farther down the valley who had a migh neat looking girl. She had lived all her li in the timber and wasn't flighty like t girls a fellow met in the towns. He h been setting out with her lately. Wh they married he was going to build a ne house on the ranch. Molly had helped hi plan it. There was to be one room as lo as the house was wide with a fireplace one end of it. There were to be two be rooms with a bath between. Molly h insisted upon this bit of foolishness. A of course there would be a kitchen and di ing room.

In the grove of trees he had in mind w a fir he had marked for their own. Of th one tree they wou build the hou they had planne He had measure the tree and if h estimate was co rect it would sca more than sixtee thousand boar feet—enough fo the little house the wanted. There wa a sawmill down this narrow valley When Molly sa the word he woul buy this tree an cut it. When wi ter came he woul sled it down to th mill and have sawed.

Ben finall turned reluctantl from his musin and rode into th forest along th new trail he wa opening. His ax h carried in a holst tied to his saddl His other tools— six-foot saw and cant hook—were i the trail where h had finished wor the day before he ne had been surveyed through thicks ounderbrush, over open grass-covered ad, through groves of centuries-old for- t patriarchs, across old burns where dead eeslay—an intricate barrier of fallen ni and interlocking skeleton limbs. Though the underbrush he cut a path denough for a laden pack horse to pass; er ted little monuments of broken rock gde the way across the open places; ough the timber trees were blazed to r the trail.

(Continued on Page 119)

He Rode Down to a Place Where a Crowd of Hunters Were Camped

(Continued from Page 116)

It was a few minutes after ten when he menced work. When noon came he d eached the edge of one of the old n Here it would be necessary literally ct his way through the maze of fallen es Usually he started back to his camp n, but he wanted to make some show- re before he left. So he labored on j the blazing sun for a while longer. e the few yards he gained into the burn re satisfaction to him when he decided rn for his dinner.

It was a few minutes past one when he delp to the cabin. A girl standing in a doorway greeted him.

"If you'd been five minutes later I'd have te that grouse myself," she told him.

"You'd have been welcome to it, Molly," answered. "If I had known you were ng I'd have brought a mess of them u to take down to the folks."

He unsaddled and turned his horse loose d hen prepared for dinner. He washed the considerably more care than he had ow earlier in the day. As he brushed his hair before a small metal mirror he obrvd ruefully that his beard was of sevl ays' growth.

"I have shaved, too, if I had known you recoming," he apologized.

Molly laughed in wholesome enjoyment. "arned if I won't get you woman broke t, she said.

They sat down to a dinner of grouse fried itter Molly had brought from the nc with her, hot biscuits such as docs orbid and hungry men delight in, gables from Ben's store of canned oc, coffee, and more berries from the any thicket with thick cream Molly d rought with the butter.

While they ate Ben told of a band of deer ad recently come to the top of the dil

"If you can get up here some morning fo sunrise I'll take you to where you aye able to get a picture of them. If we e cky we'll find them grazing near that stookout. You can hide in the brush d'll try to round them up and drive em past you."

"I can't come to-morrow or the next y she said. "Dad and the men will be acing the grain and I'll have to help in e itchen. But I should be able to come e ay following."

"Is your dad isn't through hauling in e rain how comes it you got away toy" Ben demanded.

"Old stupid! This is Sunday. Dad n a government man. He can rest once wk if he wants to."

"I'll bet he's mighty glad this kind of aer the government men in these hills n feel the need of resting on Sunday." rspoke without jest.

"He is," Molly answered quietly. For fr weeks each year the threat of fire r like an evil shadow over the hills, a rt those who lived within the shadow d ot jest about.

When Molly had washed and put away e lishes Ben caught and saddled her r and one of his and together they rode o the trail that led to his first lookout abn. They spoke again of the deer Ben cieen.

"This is Sunday," Molly said. "If you'll o ise me a picture of them I'll surely be ie cabin by five o'clock Wednesday o ing."

"I'll close herd them for you until then," rtold her.

They rode along leisurely; stopped at a e camp near the trail to chat for a few o ents with the camp tenders who were i there. Farther on they turned out e trail to talk with a herder whose o moving scattered band of sheep added pstoral touch to the tranquil scene. Ifarther on where a trail from one of the ets that had its source near the top of edivide joined the summit trail they o ped to watch the ascent of two riders t their pack horses.

"Hunters," Ben surmised. The deer seaad opened a short time before and the sportsmen from the near-by towns were beginning to work up into the high hills. Along with his other duties Ben was a deputy game warden and he must needs keep a paternal eye on the visitors who made the forest reserves their playground.

The men who rode up the trail were strangers to Ben and Molly. They paused for an exchange of courtesies; asked if Ben had seen any deer lately.

"No," Ben lied gravely. "There is no room for game here any more, what with all the sheep and cattle that are being summered in the reserve this season."

The men accepted his statement seriously; said it was a shame the Government allowed the stockmen to use the reserves; that things were coming to a pretty pass when a man had to go into Northern Canada for a good day's sport—or maybe into Africa.

Ben noticed that one of the men was smoking a cigarette. He wished Congress would pass a law prohibiting the use of them in the timber. The darned things caused more trouble than camp fires by careless travelers.

They Had Built a Flume Into the Timber for a Distance of Nearly Six Miles

He directed the men along the trail that led past his third lookout station; hoped with due politeness they would have luck in getting a buck or two on the next divide.

Then he and Molly rode to the lookout station. Together they crept to the edge of the cliff and found that all was well here. Then Ben telephoned to the ranger's office and gossiped for a moment or two.

He was in no particular hurry. Molly was with him, and they rode leisurely back over the trail and on to the next observation point. There they crossed to the third, where she would leave him and go on down into the narrow valley to her home.

It was nearly six when they reached this point. They dismounted and went out to the edge of the cliff together. Near this cliff the summit trail divided. One branch swung round the cliff to the left and led down to the head of the valley and up the slopes of the divide beyond. The other branch dropped down to the right of the cliff into a cañon that opened into the valley not far above Molly's home.

When they came to the edge of the cliff Molly put her hand on Ben's arm and pointed. Ben nodded.

"Sometimes you can prove it on them when they leave a camp fire," he said stoically. "But those damned cigarettes ——"

He shrugged his shoulders expressively. Down the slope below them to the left a faint haze of smoke hovered and eddied in the tree tops above the trail over which the two hunters must have passed not many hours before.

"You trot along home," Ben said. "I can handle this to-night. If I need help I'll telephone to your dad within a few hours."

He took a long-handled shovel he had cached there, called a hasty word of parting to Molly and then rode at a headlong gallop down the steep trail. Some two miles down the slope a blanket of heavy smoke patterned with little leaping spurts of flame barred his way. A gentle breeze was blowing down the slope and as a fire burns but badly downhill the breeze had in a measure held this blaze in check. But the creeping tongues of flame had spread in a wide-fronted arc along the slope. The timber was scattering where the blaze had started, too far apart for the fire to run in the tree tops, but one edge of the widening arc of flame was winning toward a thicket that fringed the great body of trees that lay along these slopes and crowned the plateau above.

Ben knew that if the fire reached this thicket the timber beyond—the finest in the forest—was doomed. He stripped off his chaps and flannel shirt and tied them to his saddle. He took from the saddle his canteen and ax and turned the horse loose to graze.

There was no time to ride for assistance. He commenced work at a point on the slope beyond which he believed the breeze would prevent the fire from spreading. From this point between the advancing flames and the thicket he began scooping a shallow trench. He worked with terrific speed. The long strokes of his shovel stripped the sod to the loose earth beneath; the gray path of his digging lengthened behind him. He followed a tortuous route, avoiding the large trees, swinging wide of the tall brush.

Once during a lull in the breeze on the slope above him the fire swept suddenly across an open grassy place toward the thicket. Ben raced to meet it; forced his shovel like a plow through the sod at the edge of the open space; widened the little furrow; worked with the speed of desperate necessity until he had completed a U-shaped trench in front and flanking this one menace. Then he returned to the other trench and worked until the two segments were linked together. When this was done he moistened his parched lips from his canteen, dropped prone on the ground and lay until his laboring lungs and pounding heart were normal once more. Then he drank again and returned to the unfinished task. He worked at an angle up the slope in front of the ever-advancing flames.

As he worked he suddenly sensed a saving coolness. He realized the sun had disappeared on the other side of the divide. He knew that without the drawing heat of the sun, checked on its dangerous side by the trench he had dug and held in check by the chill night air of that high altitude, the fire would but smolder and threaten until morning. He climbed wearily up the slope to where his horse grazed contentedly. He put on his flannel shirt and chaps, mounted and turned slowly toward the top of the divide. But instead of returning immediately to his camp he crossed the divide and rode down on the other side to a place where a crowd of hunters were camped. He knew these men. They lived in one of the towns in the valley on that side. He told them of the fire; asked them to report at his camp by daybreak the next morning. This was the way the forest service drafted its fire fighters.

From the camp of these hunters Ben rode back to his own cabin and on to the camp of the sheepmen. There were three of these men who could help. Then he rode back to his cabin and telephoned to the ranger.

"We know about that fire," Ben was told. "It was reported by the guard on the other divide."

"Yes," Ben said aggrievedly; "reporting them is all that lad ever does. Now me, when I see one a-getting started I go and scratch a ring round it."

"Have you this one under control?" the ranger asked eagerly.

Ben told briefly of the situation.

"I'll have nine or ten men to help me," he said, concluding his report. "You bring as many more and we'll hold this without much trouble."

Before sunrise the next morning Ben and the men who had volunteered to help him rode down to the scene of the blaze. The hunters doubted the ability of so few men to cope with the situation.

"Sure we can handle it," Ben assured them. "The ranger will be up here soon with another gang. We'll have it under control by noon. Why," he added with a reassuring grin, "the ranger will bawl me out now for asking for help with a bonfire like this."

"What time did you discover it yesterday?" one of the men asked. They were divesting themselves of their heavy garments as they talked.

"Along about six in the evening," Ben said.

"How much help did you have?" another asked, appraising the trench that had been dug.

Ben grinned and winked furtively at one of the sheepmen.

"I had two right good men," he answered. "Old Paul Bunyun and his foreman, the Big Swede, happened along. They both savvy hiyu much with a shovel. All I had to do was stick round and show them where to dig."

"Paul Bunyun!" one of the hunters exclaimed curiously. "And his foreman, the Big Swede! I never heard of those two before and I thought I knew everybody in these parts."

But Ben was too anxious to work to continue the jest. He strung the men out far in advance of the wakening flames and showed how to work to the best advantage; how wide and how deep to dig the trench.

Day dawned fiercely hot. A gentle fitful breeze coaxed the flames to intensity. The ranger came with a half dozen volunteers. He appraised Ben's line of defense approvingly; strung his men along the line, extending and strengthening it. Then he took a shovel and with Ben set a killing pace for the men to follow. When the morning was half spent he and Ben stopped their work and looked at each other with questioning eyes. The fitful breeze had increased to a steady wind that blew upward and along the slope.

"Boss," Ben said, "I wasn't betting on such a wind when I started. Our line is too close."

The ranger nodded.

"I'm beginning to believe so," he acknowledged. Already the flames were beginning to find the weak places in the line; were spreading beyond the trench in isolated spots. Time was being wasted combating these individual fires.

The ranger laid out a new line farther back. If they could not hold it here where the trees grew far apart, if once it spread into the timber where it could run from tree top to tree top, then no human agency could stop it. For a crown fire, unchecked by rain, burns as long as there is timber in its path.

The men worked more slowly along this new line and still they worked steadily to the limit of their powers. The fierce pace they had followed earlier in the morning had had its effect. Several of the men were nearing the point of exhaustion. Two had already dropped out and were lying with blistered hands and aching bodies down in a cool draw below the path of the fire.

The ranger called to one of these.

(Concluded on Page 122)

1

There's only one sure-fire preventive against aging on the shelf—that is to store the batteries in true bone-dry condition, which is possible only with the Willard Battery containing Threaded Rubber Insulation.

2

The life of the battery is largely up to the man in the car, but Threaded Rubber Insulation adds greatly to its chance of long service, because it removes one of the commonest causes of battery trouble—breaking down of the insulation.

3

Nearly every battery with ordinary insulation has to be re-insulated at least once during its lifetime. Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation never has to be replaced.

WILLARD STORAGE BATTERY

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

Battery Life Depends Upon INSULATION

Threaded Rubber Insulation has these three distinct advantages over any other:

1. Threaded Rubber Insulation eliminates depreciation in the dealer's stock.

Willard Batteries with Threaded Rubber Insulation, since they have no wood insulation in any form, can be shipped and stored bone dry—since neither plates nor insulation in the battery have ever been wet.

The storage battery with ordinary insulation can not be kept in a dealer's stock without depreciation, because the insulation must be put into the battery wet at the factory, and, once the insulation is wet, a continuous chemical action begins; and furthermore, the insulation can not be allowed to be dried out, as it would become damaged. Hence the battery must soon be filled.

2. Threaded Rubber Insulation returns bigger dividends to the user.

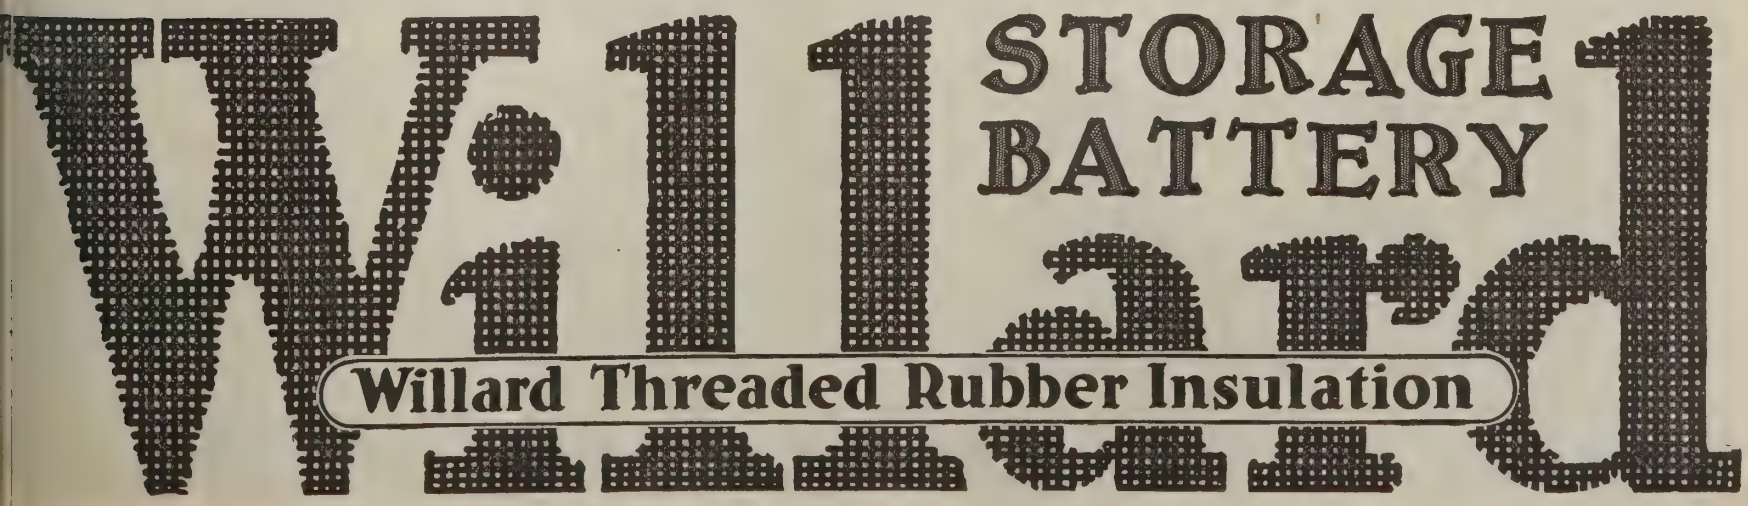
Threaded Rubber Insulation is a manufactured product held to rigid uniformity, more durable and long-lived than any wood can be. The car owner is not wholly relieved of caring for his battery, but the battery will stand more abuse, and function at high efficiency for a much longer time.

3. Threaded Rubber Insulation makes re-insulation unnecessary.

When installed in the car no one can say just how soon ordinary insulation will begin to break down, on account of the impossibility of securing absolute uniformity in any material which is the product of natural growth, not of scientific manufacture. During this period even careful driving and faithful attention to battery care will not absolutely insure long life.

Re-insulation—at considerable expense—is almost certain to come before the ordinary battery is worn out, and the life of any battery after re-insulation is uncertain.

Threaded Rubber Insulation outlasts the plates and re-insulation is, therefore, unnecessary.



(Concluded from Page 119)

"Do you want to take a little ride?" he asked.

"If you'll lift me into the saddle," the man answered.

"We'll do that much for you," the ranger told him. "We want you to ride up to the cliff above and telephone to the supervisor's office. Tell him this will get away from us before night unless we have help. Tell him to bring at least twenty men with shovels and axes."

At two that afternoon the supervisor came with men he had gathered together in the town where his headquarters was and with ranchers and riders who had joined him along the valley road. At seven that evening a wide, shallow trench encircled the fire and the supervisor himself said there was no further danger.

The men gathered round him and he made a list of their names. At the end of the month the Government would send each a check as payment for one day of labor.

"This is the first day's work you've done for a long time," he said, jesting, to one of the men, a rancher whose wealth in land and cattle was estimated at half a million.

"Yes, and I've earned the three dollars the Government will pay me," the rancher assured him. "If you had followed the pace I've been setting this afternoon you would have earned a day's pay yourself."

The crowd grinned appreciatively, for the rancher was a fat man whose every move for the last hour had been a labored agony.

The rest of the men dispersed quickly, but Ben and the ranger remained. They walked along the encircling trench together to note any weak places that might need strengthening in the morning. Then the ranger told Ben to ride to his camp for grub and blankets; they would stay there at the fire for the night.

It was twilight when Ben reached his cabin. He had not spared the horse he rode and so he caught the gray mare and turned the other loose. He tied a roll of blankets across the back of his saddle and then slung a sack containing bread and some canned food over his shoulder and started back. Night had fallen when he left the meadow and there in the deep forest the darkness was absolute. Even the gray mare he rode seemed a dark phantom moving against a curtain of darkness. The trail led into a little clearing. Still there was no rift in the darkness. But the mare's sure instinct informed her that here there were no trees and she tried to turn back toward her own pasture. The change in her easy shuffling gait warned Ben of this, so he stopped and dismounted. By the light of a match flaring in his cupped hands he found the way back to the trail. Here he removed his heavy boots and tied them to his saddle. He went forward again, this time leading the mare, and by the feeling of the ground under his stockinged feet he followed the trail until a faint crescent moon rose to light his way.

The ranger had hollowed a place in the ground not far from the smoldering fire and had filled the place with fir boughs for a bed. He had a camp fire burning, ready for heating the food Ben brought. During the night they took turns watching.

When morning came they continued their vigil until the smoldering fire within the intrenched area burst into renewed activity, flared and died away again for lack of fuel. A few of the larger trees still stood on that charred slope burning slowly to their death. Now and again one fell with a dull crash that reverberated and echoed along the ridges below.

When they felt sure there was no further danger the ranger rode on down into the valley toward his home and office and Ben started back to his camp. There were two other lookout stations he felt he should visit yet that morning. He reached the top of the divide and stopped to cache his shovel. Then he led the mare out to the edge of the cliff and stood for a moment looking down on the little spirals of smoke that rose lazily to the tree tops and dissolved into a film of haze.

"Well, old girl," he said, patting the mare's arched neck, "it was a tolerably hard day's work, but we saved a million dollars' worth of good timber."

It was habit that caused him to scan the slopes of the other divide before he left the cliff. And as his eyes searched that distant timber he began to curse softly to himself. There was nothing picturesque in what he said, but it was none the less earnest and heartfelt, for he beheld a column of smoke rising from the far side of a little pass that led across the summit of that distant divide. It was through this pass he had directed the two hunters. A camp fire left smoldering or a cigarette butt shot carelessly into the grass beside the trail had doubtless started this second blaze.

Ben telephoned to the ranger's office and learned that no fire had been reported from that locality. He learned also that the fire guard on that patrol had not yet made his morning report.

"Tell the boss to ride to my other lookout stations," Ben said briefly. "I'll ride across and see what's stirring."

By section line across to that pass was seventeen miles. By the trail it was almost twenty. For breakfast Ben had eaten a part of a can of beans.

"If that lad over there hasn't a bit of lunch with him I'm going to be hungry by the time I get back," he thought as he was tightening his saddle cinch. Three hours later he hailed a lone guard who labored in the face of a racing ground fire.

"Having lots of fun?" Ben asked.

"Gosh, yes," the man answered. He heaved a windy sigh of relief when he saw that Ben carried a shovel.

"Don't stop to tie the mare!" he pleaded. "Just hop along to that ridge of rock yonder and dig back to meet me."

It was long past noon when they had their first line of trench completed. It was four when they dragged their weary selves up the mountain side to a spring that bubbled out of the rock. They were satisfied that their work was done for one more day at least.

"A couple of hunters?" Ben queried when they had rested for a while.

"Yes," the other fire guard replied indifferently. "I talked to them yesterday morning. They loafed in here most of the day, I guess. One of them was smoking those damned tailor-mades. He must have shot a butt into the grass. I wish I could have caught him doing it," he added with a note of regret. "I'd have made him just hate those cigarettes."

Ben grinned good-naturedly. There was no need to get excited about it. They both knew who had started the fires. But knowing wasn't proving.

"Got any fodder with you?" Ben asked. "No? Then so long, son," he said as he rose and whistled for the mare. "Don't get the habit of working hard," he called over his shoulder as he started back toward his own district.

It was past his usual supper time when he started up the last long climb toward the cliff that marked the summit of the divide. At some of the steepest places he dismounted and led the mare. They came to the scene of yesterday's fire and found only little heaps of ashes and a few charred and crumbling stumps to mark the place.

When they reached the summit trail Ben once more cached his shovel. From force of habit he went to the edge of the cliff for a final survey before calling the day's work done. No sound reached him to disturb the restful silence. Twilight softened the harsh bold lines of the ridges and cañons that stretched away below him, and all the discordant colors and sights of the day were blended and made harmonious and restful in the deepening purple haze of the encroaching night. Far down in the valley the lights of a ranch house gleamed. He thought of Molly. He remembered she had promised to be at his cabin before five the next morning; wondered if they would have luck in getting the picture she wanted.

He realized that he had better be getting along toward camp. The gray mare had had a hard day of it. She should be grazing in the meadow even now. Ben was tired and hungry himself. He had had a couple of rather strenuous days and he had missed his regular breakfast and his dinner. But he did not mind the labor. He was being paid for that. And what does a meal or two amount to in the scheme of man's life?

Ben turned the mare into the home trail and she broke into a quick canter. They came into one of the many clearings along the trail and Ben pulled to an abrupt halt. Across the clearing a splendid five-point buck gazed at them with curious eyes. He sniffed the air for a moment and then lowered his antlered head and plunged into the timber.

"Well, old fellow," Ben said as he remembered the hunters, "they didn't worry you any, but they certainly gave us hell."

When he reached his cabin he decided to eat a cold supper. He wouldn't bother to start a fire. He had seen all the fire he cared to see for some time to come. He opened a can of beans and dumped the contents of the can into a tin plate. It looked like a mighty small helping, so he reached for another can. But he changed his mind. He didn't intend to make a hog of himself just because he had missed a couple of meals. So he contented himself with opening a can of tomatoes for relish and a can of peaches for dessert. He quartered a loaf of bread of his own baking and then stood looking down at the table trying to make up his mind what the meal lacked. Coffee! That was it. He would have to start a fire after all. When the fire was going well and the coffee had boiled to suit him he sat down to his supper. He ate the beans and the tomatoes and half of the loaf of bread and then decided he would open that second can of beans. He did not keep count of the cups of coffee he drank.

Once one of the white-collared lads from the biological department had stayed at his camp for a few days. This young fellow had argued that coffee was a drug—hard on the nerves and all that sort of nonsense. He even said it had a tendency to keep folks awake at night. But shucks! Ben didn't go much on what such lightweight fellows told him. When his coffeepot was empty he decided he had had enough. He rather complimented himself that he had left a few of the peaches for another time.

He spread his blankets down on his couch of fir boughs. He decided sleepily that the bed was losing some of its springiness. Within a day or two he must bring in another load of boughs. He folded his chaps for a pillow, took off his boots and vest, opened the collar of his shirt and th crawled in between the blankets. In t minutes he was sound asleep.

He slept without stirring until a subc scious activity warned him that dawn w near. There was no fretful tossing, stretching of fatigue-drugged muscles. O moment he was lying relaxed and st The next instant he was sitting erect, n thodically folding back his blankets.

He performed his usual morning toil Then he stood for a moment in the op door of his cabin inhaling the frosty a The gray mare was again lazying at t salt trough.

"Well, old girl," Ben said, "yesterda jaunt ga'nted you up some. It sure d take visitors to keep us from getting t fat," he added with a quick good-natur smile. But he was watching across t meadow as he spoke. This was Wednesd morning. He wondered if Molly wo come; hoped that band of deer was s feeding out near his morning lookout. saw Molly ride into the meadow. She w carrying her camera strapped across h shoulder. He caught the mare and rode meet her.

When they neared the cliff he led the w into a clearing at the head of a draw th dropped away from the shoulder of t cliff. Here in a thicket of brush at the ed of the clearing he left Molly. Leadi her saddle horse he rode down the far si of the draw. He had ridden about a m when he heard a scurrying of wild thin in the underbrush across the draw fro him. He turned back toward the clearin

Molly was waiting for him out in t morning sunshine that flooded the op space.

"There were seven of them," she to him delightedly. "An antlered buck and spike and two does with spotted fawns

"Did you get your picture?" Ben aske

"You can bet I did!" she assured hi "The sunlight was just right when the b buck reached the center of the clearing. whistled and he stopped long enough for m to get a picture of him alone. Then I took snapshot of the bunch before they brok for the timber."

"I hope they are good pictures," Be said. He smiled as he spoke, for Molly w almost dancing in her excitement.

She understood his smile and tossed h head.

"If they are not good you'll simply hav to round up another bunch for me," sh told him.

They went to the edge of the cliff t gether and then turned back toward h camp. They came to a faintly marked tra that led from the summit trail blindly int the timber. With a nod of understandin they turned aside and followed where th trail led. They came into a grove whe stood the patriarchs of that forest. The stopped before one at the edge of the grov an unblemished towering shaft of fir.

Their horses stood side by side and Be put his heavy weather-roughened hand o Molly's arm.

"Molly, girl," he said, "may I cut down soon?"

She caressed the heavy hand resting o her arm.

"If you'll let me make the undercut, she answered.

"I was sure you would want to do that, he told her. Then he smiled. "It will tak a moose of a long saw to make the big cut, he said. "You'll have to help me with tha too."

"And then," said Molly, "we'll get ol Paul Bunyun and the Big Swede to haul down to the mill for us."

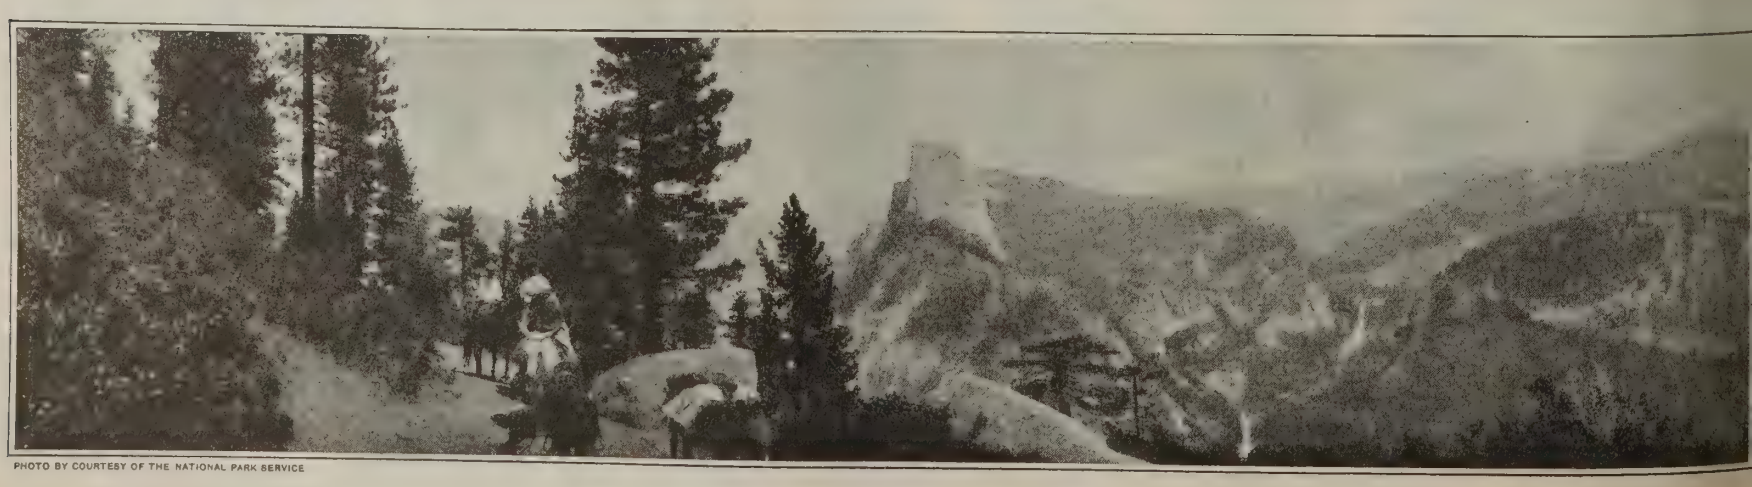


PHOTO BY COURTESY OF THE NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

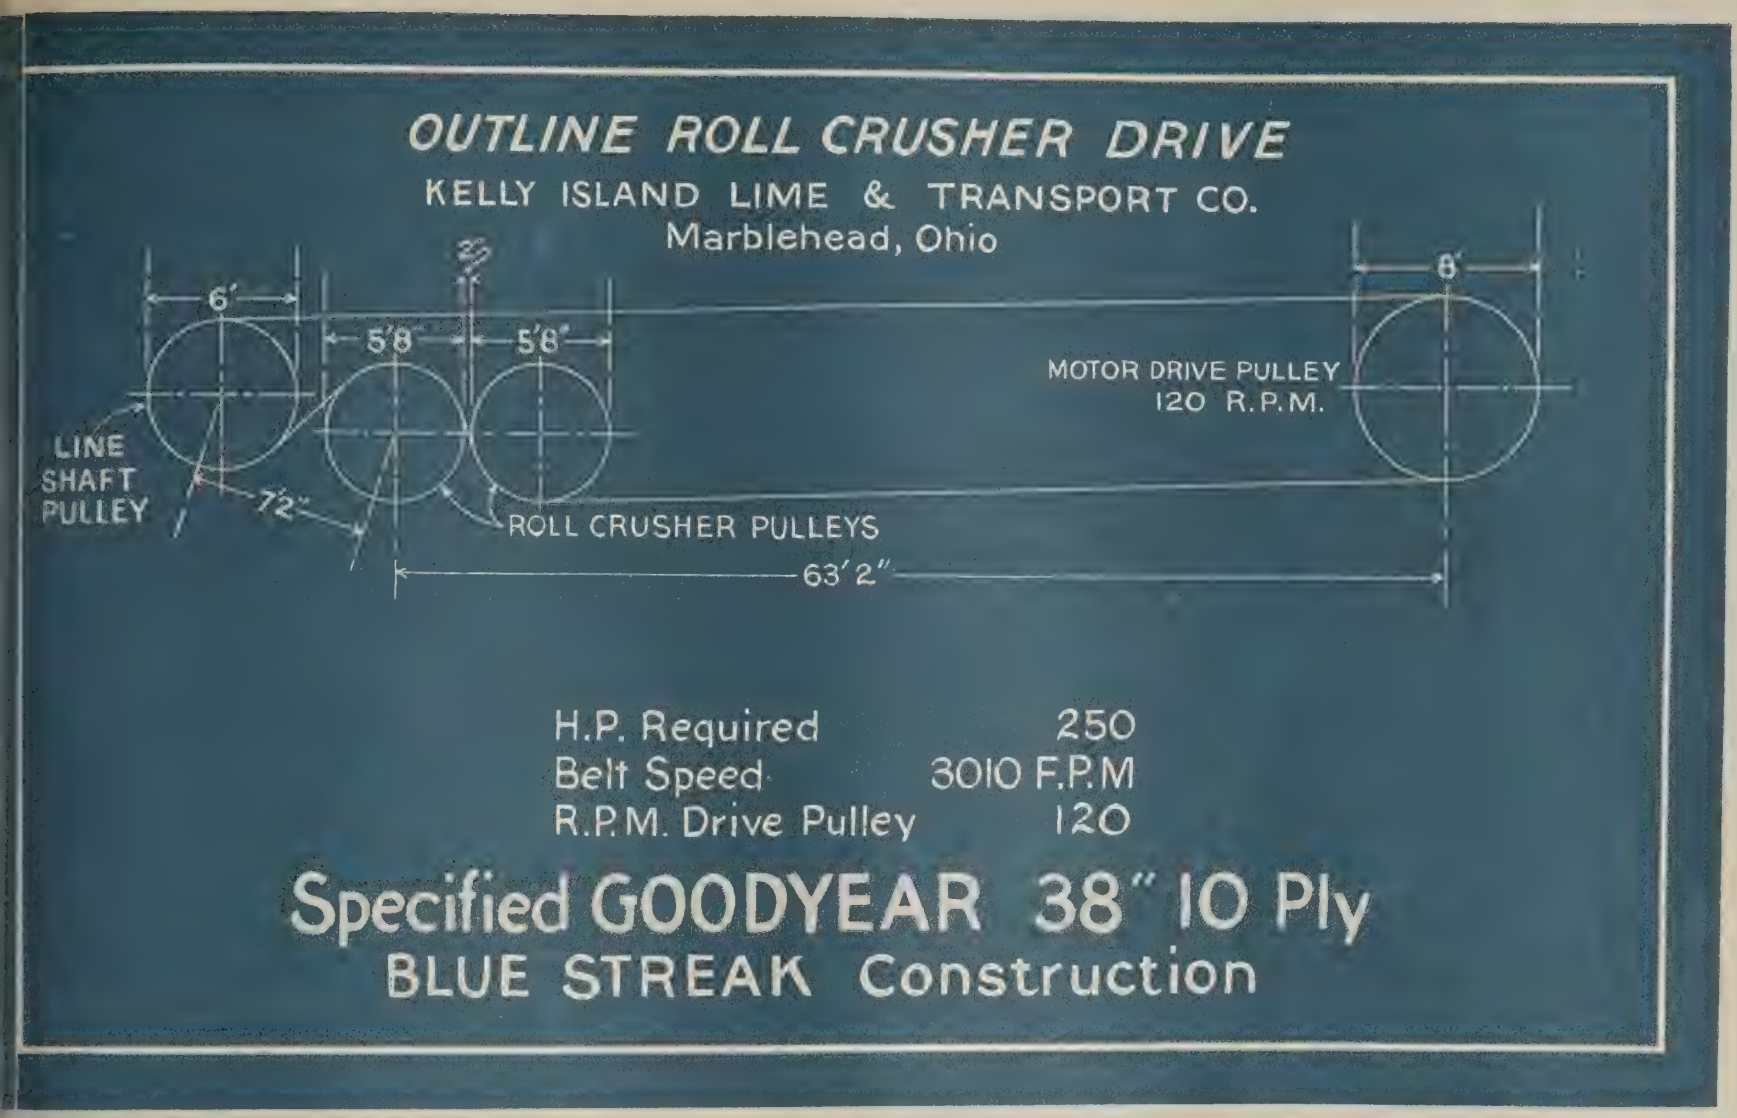


Copyright 1919, by The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

23 More Months for the Money—and the G. T. M.

Up to four years ago the Edison roll-crusher drive shown in the blue print used to be driven by belts that gave an average of 18 months' service. Then a properly specified Goodyear Belt was applied. It cost 40 per cent more than the 18 months' kind. It has already given nearly 48 months of service. The same amount of money invested in the cheaper belt would have provided 25 months of service. The Kelly Island Lime and Transport Company have received from the Goodyear Belt 23 more months of service than they got from that amount of money before they came to Goodyear.

They have gained more than 23 months. When our Mr. Foster called four years ago he found that the belts then in use gave much trouble. In damp weather they tightened so much that they endangered the bearings. In hot, dry weather they stretched so that frequently they had to be taken up several times a week in order to move the rolls at all. In addition, the grit and dust of the crusher used to chew up the belts and make them ragged and inefficient some months before they had to be discarded.

After careful study, Mr. Foster recommended a Goodyear Belt of Blue Streak construction—absolutely waterproof, friction surfaced, unstitched, supple, and extraordinarily strong.

The Goodyear Belt has never had to be taken up in its four years of hard work. The grit, dust, exposure and hard work have affected it so little that it looks good for two more years.

After the Goodyear Belt had been working for some months, Mr. Foster called again. They wanted to know why that belt did such wonderful work. He explained its construction. Then he explained that even that construction might be of little help if it didn't fit the conditions. He pointed out how he had studied the drive, how he had specified for it a belt built to fit the conditions, and had his recommendations checked by the Belting Engineering Department at Akron to be absolutely sure of proper first application. A 10-ply belt seemed too heavy for the power, but it was certainly necessary to start the heavy rolls.

Then he told them about the Goodyear Plan of Plant Analysis—of having a G. T. M.—Goodyear Technical Man—study every drive in a plant and specify the proper belt for it. They had a plant analysis made—not only in the Marblehead plant, but in all the plants of the company—and have since ordered many belts according to specifications of our engineers.

If you have a belt-eating drive, ask a G. T. M. to call. He will do so without charge when next he is in your vicinity. The G. T. M.'s services entail no obligation, because the savings they effect for belt users are so considerable that a gratifying volume of business is almost certain to result after a trial of his recommendations has been made.

THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER COMPANY, AKRON, OHIO

BELTING · PACKING · HOSE · VALVES

GOODYEAR

AKRON

CHINESE COOLIES AND THE WAR

(Continued from Page 20)

So it was the lure of wealth that enticed these coolies to labor for three years thousands of miles distant from the shrines of their ancestors; wealth—or health. Many a bandit's lot, a murderer's lot, a thief's lot is not a happy one, even in China. So many a Chinese bandit, murderer, thief or other equally interesting individual saw in this advertisement a means of escape from a not altogether agreeable position in his own country. This class was particularly prevalent during the formation of the earlier companies. Later coolies came from more prosaic occupations, such as farming. The destructive floods of the spring of 1917 also turned many Chinese toward the British camps. During the entire period of enlistment 197 companies were enrolled. As the pioneer coolies arrived in France and found their work so much lighter, their pay so much more ample, their treatment so much fairer than that to which they had been accustomed in the land of their birth, they wrote to their friends urging them, to report at the compounds at Wei-hai-wei.

The Captain and an Incorrigible in France

The Official Chinese Laundry

Almost immediately upon my arrival in the compound with its great chimney a stick was placed in my hand and I was taught the liquid phrase, "Hsi hsi t'oa; hsi hsi t'oa." Then I was led to one of the whitewashed buildings, into a room in which stood a large cement pool of hot medicated water. A door opened and a supply of dirty, naked Chinamen began to enter in a seemingly unending line. It was my duty to stand by the pool and cry commandingly "Hsi hsi t'oa! Hsi hsi t'oa!" waving my stick and tapping the yellow heads, unaccustomed to water, until each individual submerged. Hsi hsi t'oa; hsi hsi t'oa signifies Wash wash head; wash wash head. Of course they were forced to scrub all parts of their bodies, but the head was their pièce de résistance. After my two-hour task had ended my voice had the hoarseness of November in football season. More than 1000 coolies had passed under my stick, and each of them had needed individual admonition before he would duck his head.

But I anticipate in relating this first incident of mine. The bath was the fourth turn in what the other officers termed the sausage machine. A coolie arrived at the gate of the compound in all his native filth. As soon as he entered he began to pass through a series of transforming experiences. The finished coolie was as different from the original as any sausage in Germany during the latter phases of the war was different from its uncertain sources.

The coolies were a docile lot when they first arrived; awe of white men, nervousness in the face of unknown experiences subdued them. Later, in France, they came to learn that the white man is not really the superior being they had been led to believe in China. For familiarity breeds disagreeable results, and in France uncomprehending Tommies too frequently fraternized with the rapidly learning coolie. One drunken Tommy, making a wretched inferior of himself before a crowd of delighted coolies, damaged to an appalling degree the respect of the coolies for all white men. Too, they learned that not all white women stand upon a pedestal as they do in China. It bodes ill for the white women of China that 100,000 coolies have learned a half truth. In France there were Maries and Belles who if they had known the English equivalent to the French of their social position would have said of the coolie: "Ain't he cute?" Their pleasure in this quaint yellow toy from vague and far-away China added gruesomely enough its bit to the problems of war babies.

To return to the transformation of the coolie: Each day at the gates of the compound there gathered 200 to 300 new coolies, uncertain fear in their eyes but an urging desire for sixty cents a day at their hearts. Each coolie was clad in nondescript rags, the unwashed accumulation of years. Anyone who has experienced the odors of China understands the variety of unsuffused scents that hung about each. Matted and meager, a queue drooped from every dusty head. Picturesque they undoubtedly were, but just as undoubtedly filthy. After the total of the day had gathered all were led into one of the buildings, the floor of which was covered with matting. There they spent the first night, cupped close together because of the night chill and because of the lonely pain in each coolie heart.

Early the next morning they were conducted in line to a neighboring building, where they protestingly shed every rag of their attire. Even their secreted knives were confiscated. The coolies now passed into the adjoining room, where sat three English doctors. Large numbers went no farther than this. The diseased and the unfit were turned back, dejected.

The fit men went their bewildered labyrinthic way into the next room, where rapid barbers relieved all of their honorable queues. Too nervous at the kaleidoscopic experiences to make strong resistance at this indignity, each was given five coppers, salve to pride and harbinger of new wealth.

Shaved, they entered the bath, and after protestingly submitting to a complete disinfection they were herded on to the next room, where fresh, purified clothing awaited them.

Pleased like little children they straightened their backs and entered the office of records. Here began the unwinding of a tedious amount of red tape. Elaborate records were kept of each—name, age, family, and so on. Then came measurements. When the measurements were finally recorded the coolie felt his hand suddenly seized by an aide, his thumb thrust into a black ink pad, and then as quickly rolled upon a waiting paper. His identification was now beyond all subterfuge; a possible later substitution of one coolie by another was sure to be detected—the British Government possessed his thumb-print. All these records were to prove of great value in France. And now the coolie, with vacant eyes, passed on to a desk where a metal band was fastened about the left wrist, an identification number. After that, for three years, Sam Sing Wang or Joy Me Lo or Wo King Yuan was to be known only as 7981 or 82657 or 97846.

Hsia in the Compound at Zeneghem

Later, in France, I was to see a remarkable feat of memory in connection with this. The sergeant in charge of the records of a coolie company to which I was attached, upon seeing any one of the 500 coolies of our company, would say: "Well, 5-1-6-9-4,"—or 2-8-9-9-8, as the case might have been—"plenty work-a?" And the coolie would answer plaintively, recognizing his number: "Plenty work-a-la. No plenty sleep-a-la."

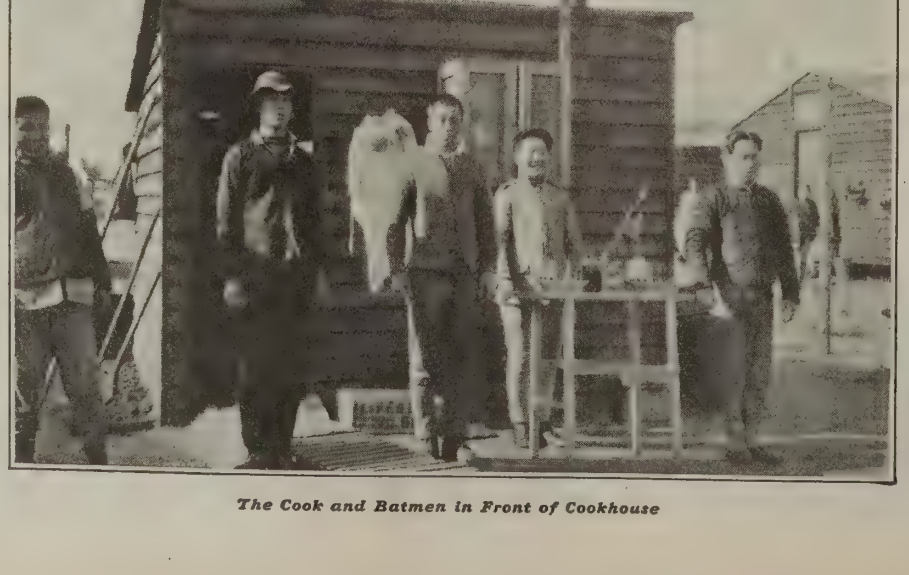
Yet more turns in the complicated machinery of purification and registration were to follow. There was the eye parade, which began now and was repeated every week, because of the ravages of the dread disease trachoma among the coolies. Then followed the ordeal of the inoculation against typhoid. Many a coolie showed fear of the evil-looking needle, and many another laughingly bared his breast to the unknown experience, shut his eyes, winced as the needle gave to him its protecting fluid, and departed smilingly, proud of the great blot of iodine that encircled the spot.

Finally the coolie was led to a clean bunk in a clean building where fresh straw and individual blankets awaited him. There he was provided with a kit bag to be slung over his shoulders, a change of clothing and a tin for meals. Never before had any of the coolies possessed such an elaborate wardrobe or dwelt in such cleanliness. Investigating fingers were busy far into the night, and smiles were radiant. One coolie who had found a piece of mirror was besieged.

The original dress given to the coolies was a uniform in that it consisted of a gray or blue coat trousers, g socks and b slippers, w straw hats for summer a round felt for the win But as time on the coolies lected article apparel m suited to t personal fan In France s even wore la hats, Parisi purchased French shops many times t value. Oth fortunate in t gambling, bou gayly colored and made t into coats trousers after Chinese mode these, when was ended for day, the late s of China sw gered along roads of Fra as if they had been mandarins. No won Marie and Belle thought them cute.

Thus was accomplished the transfor tion of the coolie who only a short space fore crouched in tremulous rags at the g of the compound.

Now, while waiting at the silk fact for transport, each of us white men dri his own particular company of 500 stra yellow beings. None of us had assista of any sort except those we chose from more intelligent of the coolies allotted us; these we honored with the title of poral or sergeant. And, too, each of us one Chinese student who, of course, kn Chinese, and who claimed he knew E lish. My first interpreter said "Yes, ye or "No, no," as the devil prompted h not as my questions demanded.



The Cook and Batmen in Front of Cookhouse

A Long Way From Wei-Hai-We

We began drilling with Chinese words command. Most of them had never und gone any sort of discipline. Soon, howev we were calling "Right turn," "Left tur and "About turn." As the days of conc tration on these three commands passed, t coolies gradually began to turn uniform to the right when the command "Right turn." And even, as time went the majority began to "turn on the heel the right foot and the ball of the left, bri ing the rear foot up" quite in accordan with the king's regulations.

After two weeks of iterative drilling, eig of us—controlling 4000 coolies—were no fied that on November 24, 1917, His M esty's transport Tyndareus would sail fr Tsingtau for Vancouver and that we w our coolies, under an officer commandi would sail too. During the first mont of the transportation of coolie labor it had been the custom to sail by way Suez, but the increasing depredations the enemy in the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea had made t route via Canada and the two ocea appear safer. Indeed, H. M. T. Ty dareus had but just recovered from co tact with a mine off the African coa The advantage of the voyage throu Suez had lain in its simplicity; t coolies entered a vessel at Tsingtau a a few weeks later disembarked at Ma seilles. But the route via Canada manded eight different vehicles of loc motion. The frequent changing from o to another caused many delays and tria

Finally—and here I leap many trib lations, such as the march throu the hundreds of pitiable beggars w thronged the road to the ship whini for farewell alms—finally the O. C., ty doctors, we eight officers, our eight i terpreters, and our 4000 coolies, ea with his pack upon his back, we aboard H. M. T. Tyndareus, skirting t barren coast of Southern Korea, th the green slopes of Japan, and finally were nosing eastward across the Pacifi

(Continued on Page 127)

(Continued from Page 124)

No the Tyndareus had originally been ar ship of 11,000 tons; so there was a y mited amount of deck space. By ercrowding the various holds had been ned with 4000 bunks, in high tiers h arcely inches enough for the pros- e ody of a coolie, and with the nar- es of aisles wandering about.

h igh some coolies sought the freshen- nof the deck most preferred to remain h more familiar atmosphere of the d holds; many felt that uncertainty or plexus which roughening waves go most landsmen.

tus the duty of the eight white officers ; ie be on guard at all hours of the r-four, making continual tours of in- t n of the infernal regions. When the d became earnest and blew with a pur- , ith the waves leaping at the ship s ringing caressingly over her decks, t coolies became visibly dejected. n he officer whose duty it was to tour h ds was to be pitied.

u after a week the sea slackened and r naining ten days of our leisurely a were, speaking comparatively, calm; n ough at least so that the 4000 could e nore be inoculated, thumbprinted e e-washed. To amuse our charges we n a canteen as soon as many had e their sea legs; a canteen containing a s, rock candy and Chinese violins. i ter cost but forty coppers, and we r rosin. Every coolie who had ever p d a musical instrument in the most a away bought one. At all hours of the a l night unrosined wails wept through s lp. We officers shuddered. But the ie were entranced. Cleaning up pea- s sells kept busy those who admitted e ere not musicians. However, there p nty of water sloshing about. Many e coolies did not understand that faucets e to be turned but once. Frequently a h ig coolie would completely unscrew f acet and then gape at the unrestrained j t sprang forth in consequence.

Christmas at Vancouver

h thirteenth of December we reached c uver Island, where we were destined p d a Christmas with one rose bloom- i n the camp. After the treeless wastes S ntung the beautiful green of the n even in December, delighted the ie Our tents stood in a small mud ; the water's edge; across rose the t Washington range of snow-capped s h camp was very badly prepared for n large number of coolies. Among r racks was the lack of wood for the s oves. So each day the coolies were h lf a mile along the road to a bay, r great heaps of driftwood lay piled h shore. The wood was in very large a kward pieces. The coolies grumbled. l ong the road ran a snake fence of r gs; fences were an experience to e Shantung coolies were unaccus- e How kind of the gods, they prob- t ought, to stack these comfortably d ogs conveniently along the road. d ily we discovered long stretches of r were missing. An irate fence owner v at camp. For two weeks my 500 ie and I split saplings and made f ences. It was a task like Penelope's e-though the coolies now knew the r as not a gift of the gods, yet as we t, others slyly tore down.

t ntervals when we were not building r I taught my coolies the intricacies " rm fours" and "Form two deep." b egan, with the aid of my interpreter, S u, the simplest of lessons in geogra- , eginning with the great country of c the neighboring range formed a t. Yes, they had heard of America; but n aa, half as large as China? They n' know it. Then I attempted to tell m ow they were going halfway round g be. Globe? Many of them smiled u ently at this quaint idea. Of course b boss—Da Ren, the flattering term a officer—was playing with them. g oss knows," one made bold enough v ture through the interpreter, "big s ows we'd all slide off." And then a l laughed, many a yellow head nod- g ncurrence.

n more we embarked, early in Janu- , nd reached the city of Vancouver, e trains were awaiting each company. e days the journey from Vancouver H fax endured, my 500 pets shut into e coaches, not one allowed to stir from his own particular coach. I did not wonder that on a preceding train a coolie had lost his reason and thrown himself through a closed window of the moving car. But during this tedious trip my cares were greatly reduced, for in Vancouver thirty Canadian soldiers joined the train as guards, and a doctor and a lieutenant became members of the party. Twelve days in the most pioneer of C. P. R. tourist coaches produced incidents: A runaway lake in the Rockies, which had fled across our track, and two avalanches; in the plains, blizzards and snows; somewhere on the stretches of white Saskatchewan we discovered the mumps car—isolation car for a few humorous cases—was lost. Retracing our tracks we picked it up, solitary in the snows, its worried occupants much relieved to see us again. Of the twelve days not one passed without a delay of several hours.

Each morning the doctor, the British lieutenant and I made a tour of the fifteen uneasy coaches, to hear the state of 500 stomachs. The Chinaman's greatest worry and greatest source of delight is his stomach. The Chinese greeting is not "How do you do?" but, no matter the time of day, "Have you eaten?" Chih liao fan mo yo? Daily the number of complaints from the confined coolies grew greater; aches of every description were rampant. The doctor felt sure that it was only the irksomeness of the journey that bothered the coolies and that most of the ills were imaginary. The stock of pills was growing low without avail. Then the lieutenant, originally of Scotland, made a suggestion. For the next imaginary headache the doctor placed a square of white court plaster upon the sufferer's temple. It was a novel substance to the coolies, a new remedy, something that could be dawdled with. The patient found he was almost instantaneously cured. News of the restorative spread rapidly from coach to coach. Soon not a car but had its coolies with squares of white court plaster upon yellow foreheads, cheeks, toes, ears, and various other portions of Oriental anatomy. Suddenly every coolie found he had an ache. But as there was plenty of court plaster and as the cures were speedy everyone was pleased.

At Halifax, where the gaping windows brought home to us the tragedy of the then recent disaster, we marched directly from the train into a lighter which carried us out into the bay. There, at anchor, rode a convoy of extravagantly camouflaged ships. The lighter took us to the most gigantic, F-8261. In time of peace her name had been the Justicia, a magnificent vessel of four funnels and 32,000 tons. Built in Belfast, she was unfinished when the war broke out, and only great vacant halls hinted of what a glorious pleasure liner she would have made. The coolies did not care for the halls; they complained of drafts. Six months later the Justicia sank after a twenty-four-hour battle against the Huns.

Crossing on the Justicia

On the Justicia we found the 3500 other coolies, who had escaped through the Rockies just before the lake broke loose and the avalanches fell. The hugeness of the ship may be imagined from the fact that our 4000 coolies could form fours and form two deep all at the same hour on the spacious decks, still leaving comfortable space for 100 Canadian soldiers and two score Canadian aviators.

After five days in the harbor, waiting for the entire convoy to assemble, we set sail. Though the eight other ships labored through the January seas of the North Atlantic the Justicia rode serenely on. Never a morning nor an afternoon did the coolies miss their familiar drill beside their assigned lifeboats—never but once, the last day, of which I shall speak later.

Shortly after losing sight of land we discovered that the coolies had eaten all the hard-tack out of the lockers of the lifeboats. We were speechless. The coolies thought somebody, they didn't know who, had been very kind to them.

One morning as I made my tour of inspection through the airy holds, listening to the scraping of the violins we had so unwisely sold aboard the Tyndareus, a ship's steward came to me and said: "Three hundred and fifty large soup spoons belonging to the Justicia are missing. Also, I feel that the coolies are fond of the ship's towels." Three hundred and fifty soup spoons and an indefinite number of towels! We eight officers held a council of war. We knew

(Continued on Page 129)

A Beautiful Miller Lamp At A Lower Price $10.75

in U.S.A. except west of Rockies $11.75

This splendid Table Lamp is offered at a lower price than has ever been set upon such a combination of artistic design and splendid construction.

It appeals to those persons who appreciate the beautiful when offered at a moderate price.

Enjoy its golden glow through the evenings which are constantly growing longer.

See this Lamp at any display room or order by mail from the nearest company who will send it express collect.

Brooklyn Edison Co.	Brooklyn, N. Y.
Commonwealth Edison Co.	Chicago, Ill.
Consolidated Gas, Electric Light and Power Co.	Baltimore, Md.
Subsidiaries of Henry L. Doherty & Co.	In various cities
Eastern Shore Gas & Electric Co.	In various cities
Edison Electric Illuminating Co. of Boston	Boston, Mass.
The Electric Shop	Providence, R. I.
The Hartford Electric Light Co.	Hartford, Conn.
Indianapolis Light & Heat Co.	Indianapolis, Ind.
Kansas City Light and Power Co.	Kansas City, Mo.
Nashville Railway & Light Co.	Nashville, Tenn.
Nebraska Power Co.	Omaha, Neb.
Penn. Central Light & Power Co.	In various cities
Philadelphia Electric Co.	Philadelphia, Pa.
Potomac Electric Power Co.	Washington, D. C.
Public Service Electric Co.	In various cities in New Jersey
Public Service Co.	In various cities in Northern Illinois
Sioux City Gas and Electric Co.	Sioux City, Iowa
Utah Power and Light Co.	Salt Lake City
Union Electric Light & Power Co.	St. Louis, Mo.
United Electric Light and Power Co.	New York City

And Electric light companies in other cities in the United States

CANADIAN DISTRIBUTORS

Canadian General Electric Co., Ltd. Toronto, Ont.

22 in. high
Shade 16 in. diameter

Pat. May 19, 1919

Edward Miller & Co.

Established 1844

Meriden, Connecticut

MILLER LAMPS

A Snug Shelter from the Snow and Sleet

That's what you get from your Detroit Weatherproof All-Season Top—closed car luxury the whole year round!

A handsome coupé out of your Ford Roadster or a dignified Sedan out of your Touring Car.

During the summer you may have your car all open allowing both vision and fresh air—but still ready for instant enclosure at the slightest sign of rain. In the winter you ride along cosily sheltered from the snow and the bitter cold.

Light, sturdy, non-rattling, easily installed by yourself. Fits any Ford from 1915 to 1920.

Send for beautiful booklet with prices and name of dealer nearest you.

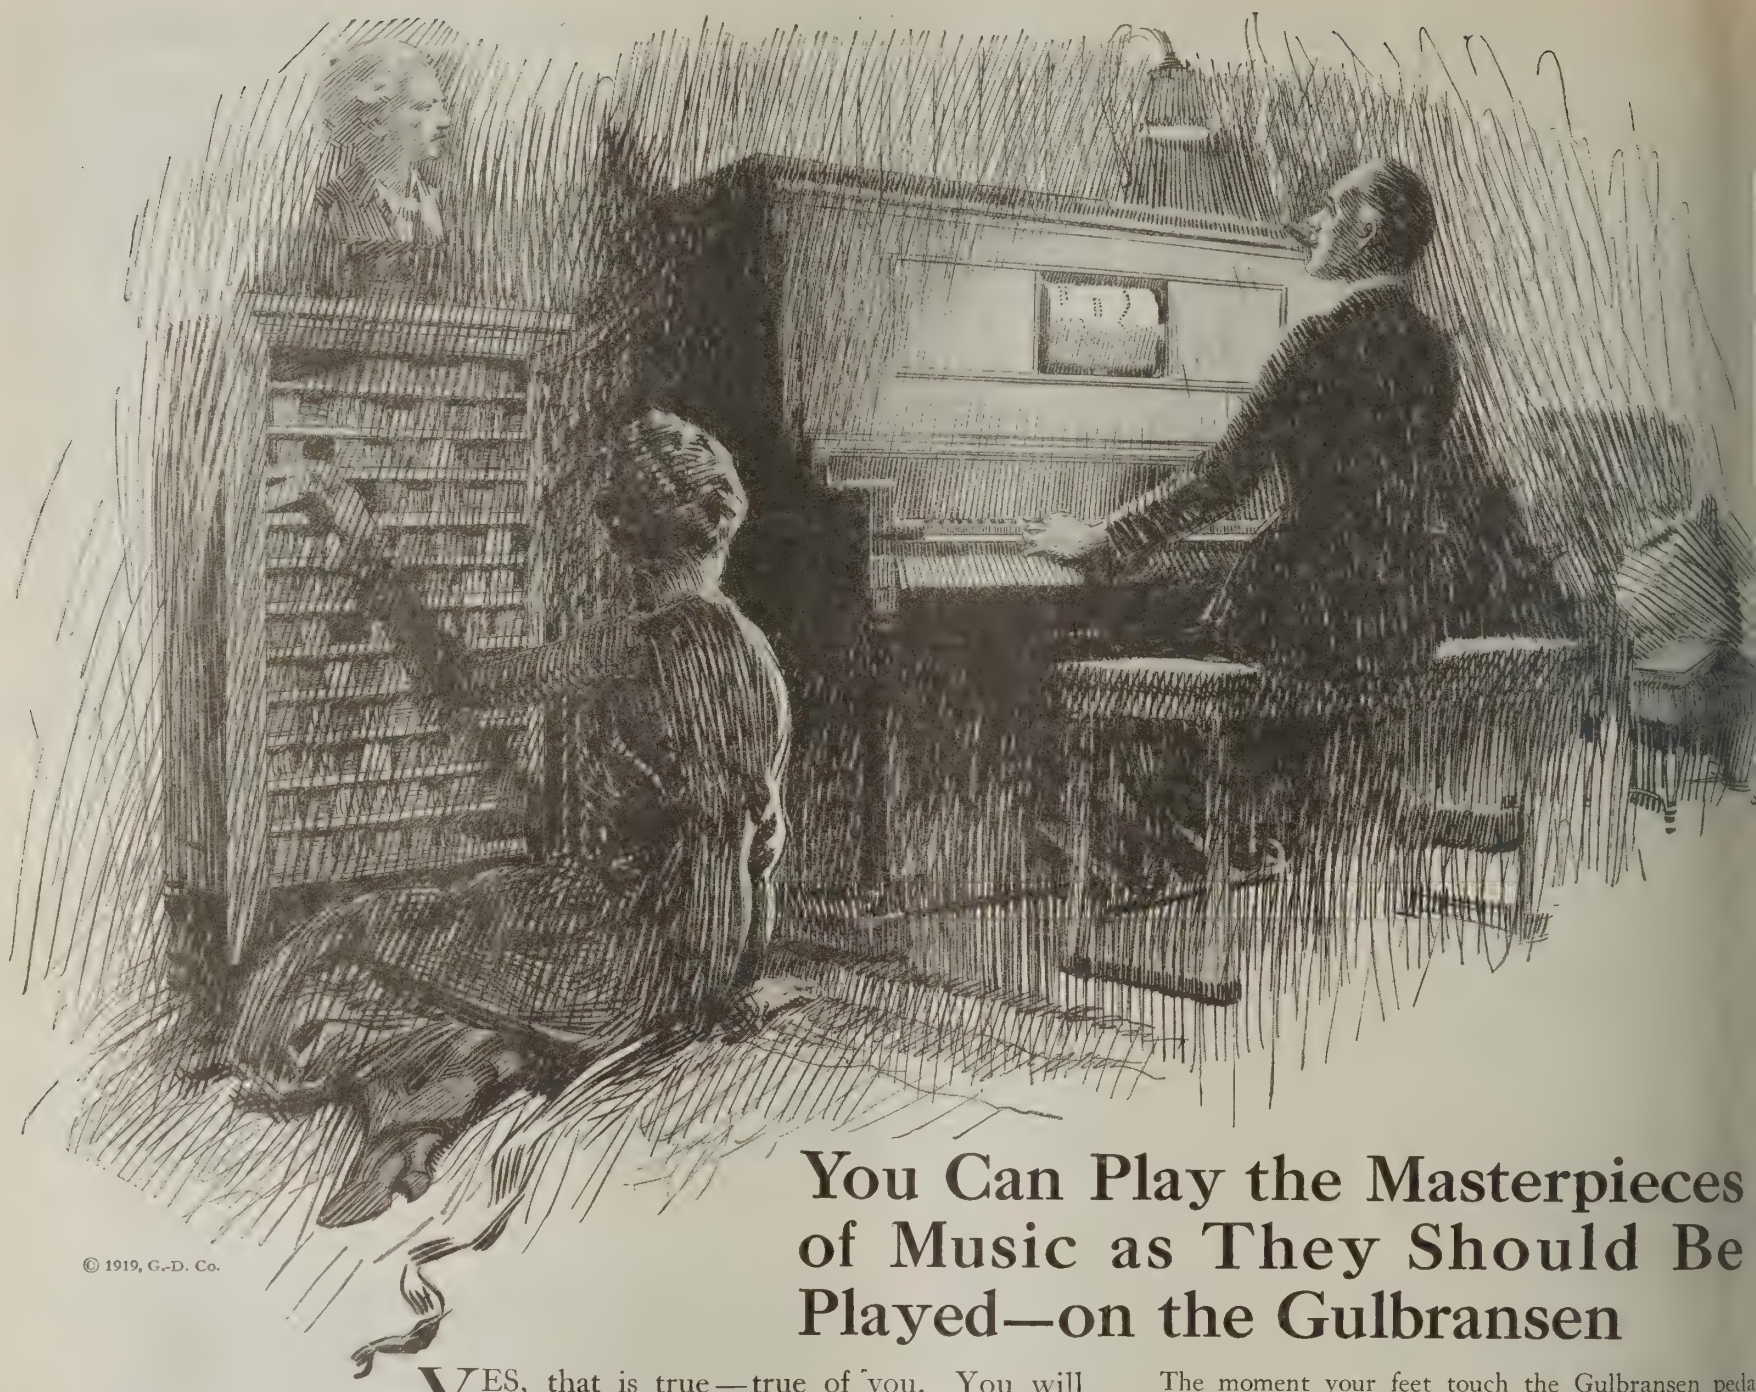
Hudson Owners — Write for Special Offer on Tops for 1916-1917 Touring Models H and J. Also made for Chevrolet 490 Touring, 1916, 1917, 1918, and Chalmers 6-30 Touring Model 35A

Partly open for changeable weather.

All open—allowing both vision and fresh air. Changed back in a minute.

Detroit Weatherproof Body Company
Pontiac, Michigan, U. S. A.

Detroit Weatherproof All-Season Top for Fords



© 1919, G.-D. Co.

You Can Play the Masterpieces of Music as They Should Be Played—on the Gulbransen

YES, that is true—true of you. You will realize it the first time you try a Gulbransen.

You will feel for the first time in your life, the ability to make music sound the way you like it.

You will find a new delight in exercising this new ability—studying how to play better—selecting music to broaden your knowledge and improve your taste.

All the great compositions are now available in player-rolls, the actual playing of artists like Hofmann, Bauer, Godowsky, Henry, Paderewski, electrically recorded. Every delicate phrasing is perfectly reproduced. You can play as the artist did, or vary it to suit your own ideas.

And for this, the Gulbransen is your ideal instrument. Easy to Play beyond anything you now imagine. Once you are accustomed to it, it seems to read your thoughts, so responsive is it to your intention.

The moment your feet touch the Gulbransen peda you know you are playing a better player than any y ever tried before.

And the Gulbransen requires so little effort that a ba once played it as shown in our trade mark, suggesting t idea to us. You can play for hours without tiring.

Prove it at the Gulbransen dealer's store. You c locate him by the Baby at the Pedals in his window a newspaper advertising. Or write us for his address.

Try the Gulbransen with the music you like best. A if you want to get an idea of how beautifully you can pl the famous masterpieces of music, select some of thes

Harold Bauer
Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brilliante.
Chopin's Scherzo in B Minor.
Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata.

Rudolph Ganz Chaminade's Air de Ballet.
Moszkowski's Valse in E.
Chopin's Valse Brilliante.

Leopold Godowsky
Tschaikowsky's Song Without Words.
Rubinstein's Barcarolle.
Liszt's Dance of the Gnomes.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch
Chopin's Prelude, Op. 28, Nos. 16 and 19.
Henselt's If I Were a Bird.

Teresa Carreño
Chopin's Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3.

Edvard Grieg
Grieg's Berceuse, Op. 38, No. 1.
Grieg's Erotik, Op. 43, No. 5.

Harold Henry
Chopin's Prelude No. 1.
MacDowell's Joy of Autumn.

GULBRANSEN-DICKINSON CO.
3232 West Chicago Avenue, Chicago

NATIONALLY PRICED

Three models, all playable by hand or by roll, sold at the same prices to everybody, everywhere in the U. S., freight and war tax paid. Price branded in the back of each instrument at the factory:

White House Model	$675
Country Seat Model	585
Suburban Model	495

Gulbransen Trade Mark

GULBRANSEN

(Pronounced Gul-BRAN-sen)

Player-Piano

(Continued from Page 127)

vhier they had vanished. We also knew ha let us once commence searching the oos' packs all the spoons would drop hrugh near-by portholes into the sea. n e language of the coolies, if we insti- ute a search there would be "plenty oos finish-a-la." We did nothing. The sia put in a bill against His British asty.

I til the time we reached the Irish Sea e oyage had been undisturbed by sub- anes. It had been necessary for the sia to humble herself to the speed of he owliest vessel of the convoy, a ship of uis. But when we reached the north oa of Ireland Allied destroyers met us, nd with six as escort the Justicia leaped rurd at top speed for Liverpool. At the oil where only a month later the tragedy f le Tuscania was to bring home to nicans even more poignantly the horror f te war, a boche submarine lay in wait. ucenly men on our decks saw something uring through the waves toward the e from the port side; too late to warn e aptain, who was at the wheel. And e at that moment, the course of the demanded a slight veer to port. The r do, instead of crashing into the ship, ped past by the narrowest of margins ndid on toward the shore. Not yet were e oolies to become guests of heaven.

Te following night my 500 coolies and ocefully rolled across moonlit England Ilkestone, where in a sudden rain of the sthour of darkness we marched to a n. There in mud and English fog we refasted, and at the first gray of dawn t rth for the channel boat. After a few ou of placid travel we found ourselves Iance, on the streets of Boulogne.

A we marched from the wharf to La a Centrale our eyes were everywhere. hsound of distant firing came to us. A oe pointed upward, laughing excitedly. gnst the deep blue sky of midmorning nwhite clouds were suddenly appearing. vs our first view of an aërial battle, and y o means our last. So high were the as in the blue that we could see only e moke. Then without warning blood rcked across the temple of one of the oes. A splinter of shrapnel falling from a distant battle had grazed him. Al- a, their first day in France, the coolies er beginning to learn that the safe zone leir contract was only a comparative n. Fortunately we were already at the oscars reserved for us. Into them the oes clambered with their kits until they er as tightly fitted as was the bully beef i tins, our lunch that day.

New Movement Orders

After a journey of several hours, which pacetime an hour easily encompasses, e rrived at Noyelles, the base depot of h ese labor. Extensive accommodations v ted us there, and there the coolies f med into companies of 500, each with e egulation quota of five white officers nd twenty-one white noncommissioned fi rs. Here each company waited until on was received in what part of France us needed. Some coolies remained in n and to work, but the great majority en employed in France. Also, it should e entioned that the French Army had Chinese labor corps of 25,000 coolies on the French possessions in the Orient. air in the war the British lent to the rrican forces a small number of coolies. Unexpectedly one night I received orders l ave Noyelles and to proceed northeast- al to a camp not far from the Belgian ier, where I should join a coolie com- an that had been one of the very earliest a rrive. I was honestly sorry to leave the oes with whom I had been experiencing ve icissitudes of wartime travel for two ller months. Their nervousness in the e of strange experiences had kept fairly ominant certain disagreeable characteris- es that usually developed as coolies be- an accustomed to the new sights and ees. Never again did I see these par- ular coolies. Probably to-day they are i g away on the docks of some French on or building roads through the devas- ted area, their stomachs longing for their oes and families in far-away China, yet ing comfort in the daily franc which vi them the opportunity of solace in a ti game by night.

The movement order read: "Proceed to Berghem, changing trains at Calais." At Berghem I should find Coolie Company 29, to which I was to be attached. What and where was Zeneghem? No one at Noyelles knew.

I boarded the train for Calais, in whose darkened streets I found myself at two in the morning. Vague groups of women and children were hurrying homeward silently from raid shelters. The boche had but just departed from their nightly bombing party.

Zeneghem proved to be twenty miles southeast of Calais, not far from the Belgian border. It was a huge ammunition dump of the British and lay beside the River Aa. On moonlit nights the treacherous silver of the water led the boche unerringly along their path toward Calais. On clouded nights the devil led them.

Forty-five hundred coolies worked at the ammunition depot of Zeneghem. But the passage of German planes never worried them. Night after night, near twelve o'clock, whether the moon shone or clouds hung low, the sirens whined and screamed their warning. Out of the eastern blackness the soft purring of enemy planes came to our ears. In each of the nine coolie compounds of Zeneghem coolie police banged away delightedly at pendent brass shell cases, making clangor enough to waken every sleeping comrade. Even their distant families 8000 miles below them must also have heard and stopped a moment in their quaint life to think of the absent soldier.

I used the words "banged delightedly," for in Zeneghem the boche had not yet destroyed any of the coolies and they did not realize the horror an air raid can produce. Even the mad clanging upon brass was not sufficient to rout them out from the fragile huts into the safer dugouts. An officer had to go to each coolie hut and with much rattling of a stick against the door order the recumbent occupants into the sandbag shelters.

"Plenty German Eggs"

Soon from the dugouts we could hear the boche planes whirring overhead. Then the antiaircraft guns hidden in groves and fields spat forth in hysterical attempts to bring down the enemy ships. The hail of shrapnel began to fall, clattering noisily on the hut roofs, dropping impotent upon the sand dugouts. It was in these small hurtling pieces of iron that the most immediate danger lay for coolies who were reluctant to leave their blankets. During one raid a heavy nose cap ripped through the roof of our hut and descended through my cot. Fortunately at that time I was off on Paris leave.

Occasionally the boche dropped "plenty German eggs," as Hsia termed them; but only occasionally. In spite of photographing frequently the enemy did not know what a valuable camp lay camouflaged on the flat meadows below them. Once a bomb struck one of the sheds of ammunition and amused the coolies during the rest of the night with fireworks, even more noisy and impressive than those to which they had been accustomed in their own land, where fireworks are an important pastime. Once a hut of white sergeants was struck. Five were killed. The other five, badly wounded, were immediately placed under arrest for having been gambling during an air raid. That's army efficiency.

But these deaths did not seem to warn the coolies of the danger. Probably they remarked casually to one another: "Hm! only some whites." Generally the bombs fell in fields between the compounds, digging holes but doing little damage. Once a bomb destroyed the water main. For two days we drank ditch water. But even in wartime French ditch water was purer than Chinese rivers. The coolies remained bland.

As the planes sailed away from our area the sirens cried us back to sleeping bags once more. Shortly after we would hear the dull explosions of distant bombs. Red flares would spring into the night sky far to the northwest. We knew Calais was once more suffering death and destruction. Then Hsia invariably would say in a bored tone as he turned over in his tent just outside my room: "Plenty busy-la."

Hardly had we fallen asleep, it seemed, but the alarms called out their warnings as loudly as ever. An illuminated wrist watch would gleam two or three o'clock. The boche was returning from Calais. Wearily we officers would crawl out of our sleeping bags and out to the dugouts. Not so Hsia, the cook, and the four other batmen who slept in the near-by tent. When I would shout to them to come along Hsia would

"It Clamps Everywhere"

A NEW, wonderful, convenient lamp that you can attach anywhere—to bed, shaving mirror, table, desk or chair.

Throws a clear mellow light, not too glaring—exactly where you need it most. It does not strain the eye. It cuts the lighting cost.

Gripping clamp is felt-faced and cannot scratch. Compact and durable—made of solid brass—guaranteed for five years.

Patented in U. S. A. and Canada

S. W. FARBER, 141–151 SO. FIFTH STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Adjusto-Lite

A FARBERWARE PRODUCT

TRADE FARBERWARE BROOKLYN MARK

Ask at the store where you usually trade for Adjusto-Lite. If they don't carry it, order direct.

Prices in U. S. A., complete with 8 foot silk cord, plug and socket. Brush Brass finish, $5, Statuary Bronze or Nickel finish, $5.35.

BEACON

THERE ARE NO BETTER

SHOES

FOR FIT FOR STYLE FOR WEAR

F. M. Hoyt Shoe Company, Makers, Manchester, New Hampshire

THE Lanpher trademark stands for style and durability. Whether it's on a leather reversible motor coat, like the one illustrated here, or on a sheep-lined winter coat, it always marks a garment of individual cut and long wear. Coupled with a style all their own, Lanpher Coats offer a sturdy front that will withstand the buffeting of many winters.

The leading clothier in your city can fit you in Lanpher Style. Ask us for his name if you do not know it.

Lanpher, Skinner & Company
SAINT PAUL MINNESOTA

LANPHER
COATS

answer, "German eggs plenty finish-la." Calais had received them all. The falling shrapnel did not worry them. Perhaps they were under the protection of a benign Buddha.

The story came down from Calais that the boche one night had dropped a bomb into a coolie compound there, killing several Orientals. Then Australians, nice gentle Australians, quietly went to the grieved friends of the dead and made them understand this: "The German swine killed your friends. See? There are some of the Germans' friends"—pointing toward a camp of German prisoners—"you take these hand grenades and get even." So the coolies took the hand grenades from the Australians, and extracting the pins threw them among the boche prisoners. It is only five seconds after the pin is removed that the grenade explodes. The coolies got even.

Though the coolies at Zeneghem were unafraid those at some camps sought shelter at the first whir of an enemy plane. Even during the day, when Germans flew high overhead, photographing, and when Allied antiaircraft guns did not hiss at them so venomously as at night, these wise coolies dropped all their work to hide under freight cars or hedges or any other shelter. But our coolies in a daylight raid merely stopped their work in order to gaze better at the altitudinous Germans, and when a bit of shrapnel whizzed to earth the coolies would pounce on it laughingly, crying, "Plenty souvenir-la."

Direct-Action Methods

In France each coolie company had its own compound with its sleeping huts, its orderly room, its dugouts and its cook hut. The cook hut was the source of most trouble and the source of contentment. If there was dissatisfaction we inspected the cook hut. Profiteering is a legitimate business with the Chinese, only they call it "squeezing." An extra titbit between meals could only be gained by crossing a certain yellow palm, the cook's.

Extra titbits weren't at all necessary, for the British fed the coolies remarkably well; in fact, it appeared to me that in all things the British treated the coolies very fairly and, what was not a matter of contract, kindly. The coolies' food consisted of rice, chopped-up meats and vegetables. We officers squeezed occasionally ourselves, the meat given to the coolies was so jolly tender.

But not everyone knew the preliminary rite before receiving a delicacy. One coolie entered the kitchen one afternoon. His stomach was sad and desired a little hot rice.

"No." The cook was too busy.

"Just a trifle."

"No! No time."

"But my stomach is hungry."

"Come round at the regular tea time."

Then the disappointed coolie, not knowing the necessary bribe, took matters into his own hands, along with a vicious meat chopper, and with one stroke cut off the disobliging cook's head. Then he helped himself to a trifle of hot rice. Later, arrested, his defense was, "But my stomach was hungry." A few mornings after, against a wall, his worldly hunger ceased forever.

The coolies lacked a proper regard for life. They perpetrated a number of murders within our area: A British officer, a Frenchwoman, a man and a boy. Other areas experienced similar tragedies. Two coolies of Company 29 brutally murdered an elderly Frenchwoman, the keeper of a neighboring wine shop. Both were eventually, after much red tape and delay, condemned to death. It was late at night when the sentence of death was read to them, telling them that the following morning at four the execution would take place. Not a tremor flickered across their faces; in fact, they had marveled that retribution had been so long on the way. In China justice is more summary. After a moment of silence one coolie, his face still impassive, remarked: "Tomollow—no more coolie." That was all.

Suicide was not infrequent. One midnight as the boche drove us to our dugout we found suspended in the entrance a dead coolie. This coolie had nursed a grudge against the captain and had decided to show his displeasure in this distasteful manner. Next morning the captain spoke to the company on parade. The coolies expected their captain to be deeply moved over the affair, even remorseful, though the original difference with the coolie had been of the pettiest. But, no; the captain was too astute. He did not even deign to spe directly to the coolies, though he kn their language well.

"Tell the coolies," he said to the int preter, "that last night one of them hu himself in the officers' dugout. Tell th if any more of them must hang themsel to be so good as to do it in their own du outs. We don't like such a mess in ours."

For the most part the reasons for suici were meager: A gambling debt; a fanci wrong; a loss of face—that precious Chin possession. There were two usual paths the waiting spirits of a coolie's ancesto Hanging was one; the other lay benea the River Aa.

After the hanging our five batmen a the cook requested that they be allowed sleep in the more distant huts with t other coolies; the spirit of the dead m would very likely visit the scene of death, and their tent was uncomfortabl close. So off they went, beyond our ey A few nights later we had reason to belie that a gambling game of great pretensio was being carried on nightly in the cooli bathhouse. They had a first-rate stea bath, which every coolie had to use at lea once a week. We noticed silent forms gli ing toward it at black hours. This co tinued for several nights, for thou gambling was against the regulations yet kept the coolies out of worse mischief. A besides, they were incurable.

But at last the discretion of the cooli deserted them and they began to be nois So one night we raided the place. My bo Hsia, was serving tea to the gamblers a raking in fat tips. The captain's boy, Wan was master of the tables and was appr priating a share of all winnings. The co was the doorkeeper. The three other ba men were acting as stool pigeons. T bathhouse was henceforth policed at nigh and our cook and the batmen had to retu to their tent, ghost or no ghost.

There were coteries of gamblers in eve company. In spite of receiving but a fra a day some coolies possessed hundreds, a a fortunate few, thousands of francs. Fo tunes of which the coolies had never eve dreamed in China they now lost with a fe sighs. The captain's boy, Wang, and m Hsia were the luckiest of Company 2 When these two had a day off they we to Bourbourg, a town four miles from th camp. There they thought nothing of pa ing sixty francs a plate for a dinner. T coolies never seemed to understand th value of money, and the French deale took care not to enlighten them. Warnin by British officers did little to deter th senseless extravagance of the coolies. Aft lunching Wang and Hsia would purcha some tender ducks or chickens or perha some new silks. Then the two would ro home in a fiacre, driven by a profiteerin Frenchie.

A Would-Be Evangelist

One evening Wang brought in for ou admiration 700 francs' worth of silks an furs that he had bought against his retur to China. He intended to return to h native land as a gentleman, though he ha left it a bandit.

Wang was a sharp lad. A Y. M. C. A for coolies had been opened across the roa from our compound, another instance the excellent treatment of them by th British. In that hut were benches, a stag a music box, a canteen. There after work ing hours a seething, chattering mas enjoyed a Chinese atmosphere. Speakers— Englishmen who knew Chinese—gav speeches here at intervals, trying to broade the horizon of the coolies. The coolies wer delighted with the hut. It was an idea place for the wilier to hatch plots of tru Oriental guile—which they at once pro ceeded to do.

But to return to Wang. One day he cam to the captain with a long face and said i Chinese: "Sir, my heart is heavy. Ther are many Christians in the camp who ar not given the chance of worship that the should have. Now I am of the true faith Let me once a week have one of the smal rooms in the Y. M. C. A. and I will help t keep alive the truth." The captain, know ing Wang, doubted. But he allowed th matter to progress. It turned out to be no a meeting of Christians but a gamblin party from which Wang had hoped to de rive great profit.

Such an offense was not deemed seriou and was disposed of by the captain in th orderly room. Coolies charged with seriou

(Concluded on Page 133)

(Concluded from Page 130)

isdmeanors or crimes were sent with witsse to Calais for a trial before a circuit ur composed of three officers who under-noche Chinese people and their language.
t most cases never passed beyond our ey room. First offenses were punished h eprimands or slight fines. As the r increased in seriousness the fine wheavier. Often threats were more ve than fines, for the fines were seln elt by the offending coolie. These ied people formed numerous brother-d when a brother was fined the erhood paid.
Th most effective threat was that of dg a coolie to the prison company at wles, for no coolie wanted to leave many 29 because of the deeply trusted
n. Captain James Ross, who had ned gallant service with the Scottish s at Gallipoli, was exactly the man to til Chinese. For fifteen years before ur he had held the position of postal ssioner in an interior province of . During that time he had gained a cable insight into Chinese character. and actions of the coolies which were icable to other officers were readily nehended by Captain Ross. Every had the greatest faith that under this his he would be understood and treated l Because of the black ribbons hangom his Glengarry cap the coolies re-to him, very respectfully, as "Little tal."
by the incorrigible coolies were sent to wles. The prison company there was sed of the worst of all the companies was punished with hard work, long r and confinement during leisure time
h a strongly guarded compound.
n of Company 29's incorrigibles was l off toward Noyelles under the escort a Yorkshire corporal. At one of the ediate stations the coolie disap-
d. Two weeks later he was found up Dnkirk, that city which the Germans do bomb from the sky, shell by land bombard from the sea, all at one time.
rk of course looks north, over the rt Sea.
"What do you mean by this?" he was e
a," he answered very nonchalantly, ieds told me there was a very pleasant ry north of Dunkirk. I thought I ul visit it." If we had not caught him erwe did he would have wet his feet.

The Disappearing Prisoner

Th coolie was sent off with another cora this time a Jock, whose kilties were nurvel of the coolies. But at Marquise, Jck was bending over an obstinate tin only beef, the coolie disappeared. Ten s later he was discovered down near
e.
"What did you mean by it?" The ques-n was very much of a menace.
"a," he said with protesting eyes, oting. I lay down in a near-by freight while the corporal with skirts was get-g inch. I fell asleep. When I woke up a far, far away. I did not want to leave corporal."
Th third time a Lancashire sergeant dected the coolie, and saw that he only entered the prison company's com-ar.
No a day passed but one or more petty mes were committed by our coolies; 6truck a threatening attitude and told he corporal he was "no bloody good-a, or 67243 nailed too few boxes for a f honest work, or 23407 threw an pty shell case at 23658 because the latter nted that the former's family tree con-ed a sow and two hogs; 8763 left the oc during work hours in order to buy h eggs from a neighboring farmer's ater.
"a," Hsia told me confidentially, "coolie od-a-la. Coolie—plenty promenade-a-mademoiselle."
Alhe coolies picked up a few phrases of gh and a word or two of French, always i; a statement with the Chinese termi-ic "la." Once given an opportunity a li would go through his entire vocabu-y, a very sanguinary vocabulary, show-te British influence.
A passing Tommy might say ironically a coolie lolling by the road, "Plenty ha?"
Th coolie would immediately answer in ne of a driven slave: "Plenty work-
. After a moment of grieved silence would continue in a desperate voice:
"Plenty work-a-la. No plenty sleep-a-la. No plenty chow-chow-la."

Silence for a moment, then with growing spirit:

"No sleep-a-la, no chow-chow-la, coolie no bloody work-a-la." Yet never until that coolie had entered the British service had he had so little work, so much rest and such excellent food. But it was their policy to grumble. Often they did it with a grin on their faces.

The spare hours of the coolies were not much given to play. On special Chinese holidays, which the British authorities recognized by a general stoppage of coolie work, the coolies had processions and games. Company 29 possessed two green and gruesome dragons, made of cloth such as neighboring demoiselles used for petticoats. These headed the procession, ambling harmlessly between French wheat fields. Behind them came coolies dressed in brilliant Chinese robes, the material bought in near-by towns and made up by the coolies themselves. Some carried graceful Chinese lanterns which would have been beautiful at night if fear of enemy planes had not forbidden illumination. Others held aloft festive pennants with strange characters painted upon them. But such a celebration occurred but three times during my eight months with Company 29.

The Coolie's Three Delights

The remainder of their leisure time they divided between their three principal delights: Eating, gambling and sleeping. It is true that some coolies occasionally played about with a football or listened to the raucous Chinese music of the music box of the Y. M. C. A., or strolled to town. But the majority, immediately upon their return from work, got their tin of rice, vegetables and meat, hied to their hut, and remained in its close atmosphere until the following morning. There they sipped tea, lolled and talked of past dinners and of dinners to come, played their gambling games and slept. During it all some drew forth doleful music from their cheap Chinese violins.

After a night of gambling our charges found it hard to appear at early morning parade. Many a heavy-lidded Chinaman lined up before us at half past six. In a neighboring company it was discovered that one coolie had not been out to work for three weeks. Yet his work was always done.

His was a clever scheme. It was the custom in many companies that one-seventh of the men rest each day. This particular coolie was a notorious gambler, often playing far through the night. Then he would hire a coolie, who normally should have rested the succeeding day, to take his place at the depot.

The substitute would receive perhaps two francs from the gambler, whereas the latter, well rested by a long vacation, won much larger amounts by night.

Some coolies consequently possessed large sums of money. Even those with little did not wish to lose it. Here once more the brotherhoods were of assistance. For one week a member of the brotherhood would carry the money of all. During that time he remained quietly in the hut while the other brothers did his work.

Finally, in July, 1918, the British Government established a banking system for the coolies.

Each could deposit as much money as he wished, but once deposited it could not be withdrawn until the depositor's return to Wei-hai-wei or Tsingtau. It saved the coolie's money from himself and from brother coolies and French friends.

In the fall of 1918 I finally succeeded in transferring to the infantry. Just after my departure Company 29 was sent to Calais to work on the docks, offloading ships. At the end of two weeks the company's usual deposits in the bank had doubled in amount. At the end of six weeks the deposits had tripled. The coolies found offloading ships very profitable—for the French were not averse to buying goods from the coolies which the latter had quietly extracted from the ships.

The last I heard of Hsia he had to his credit 7000 francs, whereas legitimately, counting every day of work since his arrival, he could have saved only 450. Before I bade him adieu he owned more silks than that paltry sum could have purchased. When Hsia finally returns to the slums of his home town in China, truly he will be a gentleman.

Enough Sta-so to Girdle the Globe

Enough Sta-so was sold last year to surface a roll of roofing 7 feet wide and 27,056 miles long

You will see Sta-so slate surfaced asphalt roofs the world round. You can identify a Sta-so surfaced roof by its soft distinctive color—either a rich Indian red or a cool sage green. These colors cannot fade because Nature created them. Time only softens their hues.

But Sta-so surfaced roofing is more than merely beautiful. It successfully resists any and all kinds of weather. Come rain or snow, come heat or cold, you will always be protected under your Sta-so surfaced roof.

Sta-so resists fire to the uttermost. It positively is proof against sparks or embers.

As for wear—the next generation will probably live under the Sta-so surfaced roof you buy today.

Finally—economy. The average first cost of tile roofing is three times as high; of solid slate roofing twice as high; the best wood shingles usually cost more. On the basis of cost per year Sta-so surfaced roofing is the cheapest roofing you can buy.

Before you next order roofing, look for and locate this label. You will find it on the rolls and the bundles of shingles carried by your dealer.

These manufacturers of roofing products bought enough Sta-so last year to surface one billion square feet of roofing.

Amalgamated Roofing Co. . . . Chicago, Ill.	McHenry Millhouse Mfg. Co. South Bend, Ind.
Barber Asphalt Paving Co. . Philadelphia, Pa.	National Roofing Co. . . . Tonawanda, N. Y.
Barrett Co. . . . . New York, N. Y.	B. F. Nelson Roofing Co. Minneapolis, Minn.
Beckman-Dawson Rfg. Co. . . . Chicago, Ill.	Pioneer Paper Co. . . . . Los Angeles, Calif.
Bird & Son . . . . . East Walpole, Mass.	Reynolds Shingle Co. . Grand Rapids, Mich.
Philip Carey Mfg. Co. . . . Cincinnati, Ohio	Richardson Paper Co. . . . Cincinnati, Ohio
Flintkote Co. . . . . Boston, Mass.	Si Fo Products Co. . . . . St. Paul, Minn.
Ford Manufacturing Co. . . . St. Louis, Mo.	Standard Paint Co. . . . . New York, N. Y.
The Heppes-Nelson Roofing Co. . Chicago, Ill.	Usona Mfg. Co. . . . . Aurora, Ill.
Keystone Roofing Mfg. Co. . . . . York, Pa.	H. F. Watson Co. . . . . Erie, Pa.
A. H. White Rfg. Co. . . . . New Orleans, La.

TWO BEAUS AND BOMAZEEN

(Continued from Page 13)

in this town will tell you anything for your own good. You're too tomdinged unpopular."

Mr. Hite was tortured by the forked flame of curiosity and suspicion and his manner confessed as much. He gave over trying to drive past the truck wagon.

"Shoot it out of you quick, whatever it is!"

"Now we're getting on together like relatives ought to," said Jordan complacently. "And here's my idea as regards the thing." He lounged back on the seat.

"I think that courting ought to be conducted genteel and proper and quiet instead of having a tin can tied to it! I don't say right out—as some do—that the widder is reciperkating. I know, like everybody else does, that she is partial to you and she has never showed no signs of being whiffleheaded in running her farm or her business. But I'm going to talk it right out to you, as I'd like a man to tell me in such a case. She has waved back to him!"

"She has?" muttered Mr. Hite, shouldering the Sheraton chair back to its own half of the seat of the buggy.

"She has! I've seen her wave. Once 'twas with a dishcloth, once with a handkerchief. P'raps with her it was only being flattered by being tooted at and she wanted to pass the time o' day. However, on t'other hand, a woman that's partial to a reppytable citizen of standing hadn't ought to be giving slander its chance by waving to a roving rambling character that's first to one end of a railroad line and then the other all day long.

"Furthermore, Ev," pursued Jordan, seeing that he was making an impression, "he has been giving her presents and she has took 'em."

This was a point on which Mr. Hite had been entertaining his suspicions. He managed to waggle his head, but he could not find voice to put his disbelief into words.

"She may have claimed to you that she bought that bulldog for to watch her premises and them Eye-talian bees to make honey for her, but she showed my wife the pome he wrote to go with 'em. It may be only neighborly to give a widder a bulldog and bees, but I have my own ideas when a pome goes with 'em."

"She said—well, I got the notion that she bought 'em," Mr. Hite allowed himself to state in defense. "I don't take no stock in there being any pomes."

"I ain't no hand to remember pomes—I don't load my mind up with such sculch. But my wife repeated it off to me, as she recalled it, and the chorus—or whatever it is a pome has—sort of stuck with me. Le's see!" Jordan tipped back his head and shut his eyes.

"'Oh, bark, good dog, and ——' Well, I don't just remember the rest of that line, but the thing winds up: 'And guard my honey-bunch and her bees.' If expressing them opinions and then toodle-de-ooing on that whistle every time he passes the house ain't courting, then I'd like to have you tell me, Hite, what you do think it is!"

Mr. Hite straightened the reins over his high stepper, drove into the ditch to avoid the truck wagon and departed in a cloud of dust. Brother-in-law Jordan started his own horses along at a more leisurely gait.

"He's got something on his mind now besides that false topknot he's been wearing on his head instead of the crape he had ought to wear on his arm," affirmed the news purveyor with venom.

Plainly it was not the state of affairs in the back pasture that was on Mr. Hite's mind. He lickety-splitted past the gate on which was posted: "No Trespassing, by order E. Hite." The sign must have suggested unpleasant thoughts in regard to trespassing on other preserves of Mr. Hite, for he shook his fist at the placard.

When he drove up the graveled roadway in front of the Widow Dawson's house he surveyed the trim buildings and the climbing vines and the big barns with jealous appraisal. He had the air of a man who had come in a hurry to guard property which he claimed and which was threatened. The house was there at any rate. As to the widow? She came out on the porch while he was hitching his mare at the corner of the house. Her amiable smile of welcome was answered by him with a growl. After a moment she frowned.

"Evander, why do you come here and glare at me in that style?"

"The business I'm up here on ain't the kind to giggle and be gay about."

"Are you going to shoot me? Is that a gun barrel—that thing sticking out past the buggy top?"

"That's a warming pan," he stated sourly.

Mrs. Dawson seemed to be mystified and a bit alarmed—a warming pan on a hot afternoon in August was a possession suggesting that Mr. Hite had been exposing himself to the sun too rashly. She was not helped by his further statement that he had brought it as a present.

He walked toward her, brandishing the ancient utensil. He had the demeanor of a man who had planned out a line of action and was grimly resolved to see it through to the bitter finish! That demeanor was far from suiting the style of a lover bearing gifts, and Mrs. Dawson did not appear to be especially reassured by his explanation.

"Maybe there's somebody who has been putting notions into your head that we're all slow up here in this town. But a man that meets as many smart traveling gents as I do in my line o' business hears what they're doing in fashionable circles. They're using these brass pans to decorate with—they're all the go."

"I have two up attic—grandmother's," she stated, but her forehead was wrinkled with doubt.

"Probably not as good as this one, but put 'em with it—plenty of ribbons on," he commanded with the assurance of an accredited interior decorator.

He laid the pan across the porch rail and returned to the buggy and brought the chair.

"And here's something else for you in the way of a antique—they're all the rage too. I'll admit I ain't up on the values of such things like she was when she was alive. But this was her favorite chair—and I want you to have it."

Mrs. Dawson winced.

"Some might hint that this was kind of a queer present, seeing that it was a favorite of Number One," Mr. Hite went on with added determination. "But I have been thinking the thing over the last few days and it settles down to this: Actions speak louder than words. I'm testing us both out. When I bring you a present like this—considering what this chair has meant in the case of Number One—you see the depth of my affection for you."

"I don't see it—not that way," protested the widow. "It isn't delicate. It would be like my giving you Mr. Dawson's watch."

"Well, why not? That would show that you was putting me first in your thoughts," declared the wooer. "I claim that we're keeping company." He began to exhibit increasing excitement. "But perhaps we have been too genteel about opening up our real thoughts to each other. My idea is to put everybody else out of our minds from now on—not having a look or word for anybody but ourselves in the way of attentions." He was staring hard at her. "So here's this chair—showing how I feel about you better'n any words could say it."

"I think I'd rather not have it," she faltered.

Mr. Hite ran to the buggy and came back with the box of candy in one hand and the bouquet in the other. Her attitude in regard to that chair, her unwillingness to meet him halfway in the matter of the Number Ones, suggested that the Widow Dawson was holding out on him in the point of affection in more ways than one.

"Now that we're on the subject of presents, you'll kindly listen to me for a minute, to avoid future misunderstandings. From this time on I'm going to tend to all the present making in your case."

Her flush indicated confusion. On the other hand her eyes sparkled in a way which indicated that the Widow Dawson had a temper to brace her natural self-reliance.

But Mr. Hite had been getting up steam for a long time. Now he was on his way and he paid no heed to the danger signals her cheeks displayed. The candy rattled savagely in the box when he shook it at her, and petals dropped from the bouquet. He broke in on her indignant retort:

"I have brought a general line of presents so as to hit your nature on all sides. There'll be more to come, as I find room for 'em when I drive up here. You can see that I mean business in the present-making line. You've got something fashionable to decorate with—that chair is for use. Here's sweetening—seeing that some folks seem to think you need to be sweetened—and if you have to be romanticked up here's your bokay. And there ain't no pomes to go with 'em. I'm giving you common sense instead of pomes!"

"Poems!" she repeated. She did show confusion then.

Mr. Hite beheld a bulldog's sour face between the balusters of the porch.

"It's easy enough to write portry and make 'fleas' rime with 'bees'," sneered the amazing suitor. "Probably he done it when he sent you them presents."

"What are you talking about?"

Mr. Hite was losing all control of himself. He delivered the bouquet and the candy by throwing them over the rail of the porch.

"You know well enough who I am talking about. I'm talking about that beef-and-cabbage advertisemunt that's rollicking and rambling and roving past here, tooting on that whistle to you so that folks fifteen miles away lay off from what they're doing and cock their ears and work their old jaws to the scandal and shame of both of us. He sent you that bulldog hoping that it would flare up and bite me. As for them Eye-talian bees and that honey-bunch stuff ——"

A bee had been attracted by the bouquet on the porch and did not show any liking for it. The insect started away in quest of something more promising. Any apiarist knows that an excited, angry, perspiring person is a sure target for a bee. Mr. Hite was shut off in his derogation of Ita bees by a jab that felt like a hot brad in back of his neck.

"Do you realize what kind of langu you have been using?" asked Mrs. Daw a few minutes later when he turned faced her.

"I'm ashamed of it," returned Mr. H with promptitude, and he added, "I thou I knew how to express myself better, se what I've been through whilst trai green hosses all my life. But I'm losing knack."

"Evander, you listen to me for a ment!" Mrs. Dawson behind the rail of porch was coldly and calmly the mistres that situation. "I have always gone on principle of being fair and square in ev thing. I am not going to be hasty beca you have made a fool of yourself in matter of a mere insect or because yo making more of a fool of yourself in reg to silly suspicions you seem to entert Now wait! I'm talking business! As this Mr. Twombley ——"

"There's a secret between you and and you can't deny it!"

"There's a matter of business betw Mr. Twombley and myself—nothing sir! He is a good-natured, friendly sort man."

"Hitching a cowbell onto his friendsh as you might say, by tooting that whistl

"The people in this town seem to understand any kind of friendliness th open and aboveboard—I'm sorry for th I'll own up to you frankly, Evan that I have given you cause to beli that your attentions to me have b agreeable. In the case of Mr. Twomb there's only the most matter-of-f friendship—plain for all to see. Now on and conduct yourself like a sens person!"

He dabbed his hand at the back of neck.

"I can't be sensible whilst things running on the way they are."

She continued to be serene.

"You're all stirred up and in no con tion of mind to talk now. Go home think it over."

"The thinking I'll do won't be help for either of us till I can stand in hear and listen to you tell that fly-by-night h toad never to step foot on your premmi again."

"I shall not insult the gentleman misconstruing mere friendship in that m ner, sir."

At that point Mr. Hite's feelings bu forth with something like an explosion.

"I see how it's drifting and I'm going fight for my rights."

"What do you mean—fight?" she manded tartly.

He came close to the porch and put u monitory finger. Those emotions that had been suppressing came out into the op and galloped like wild horses.

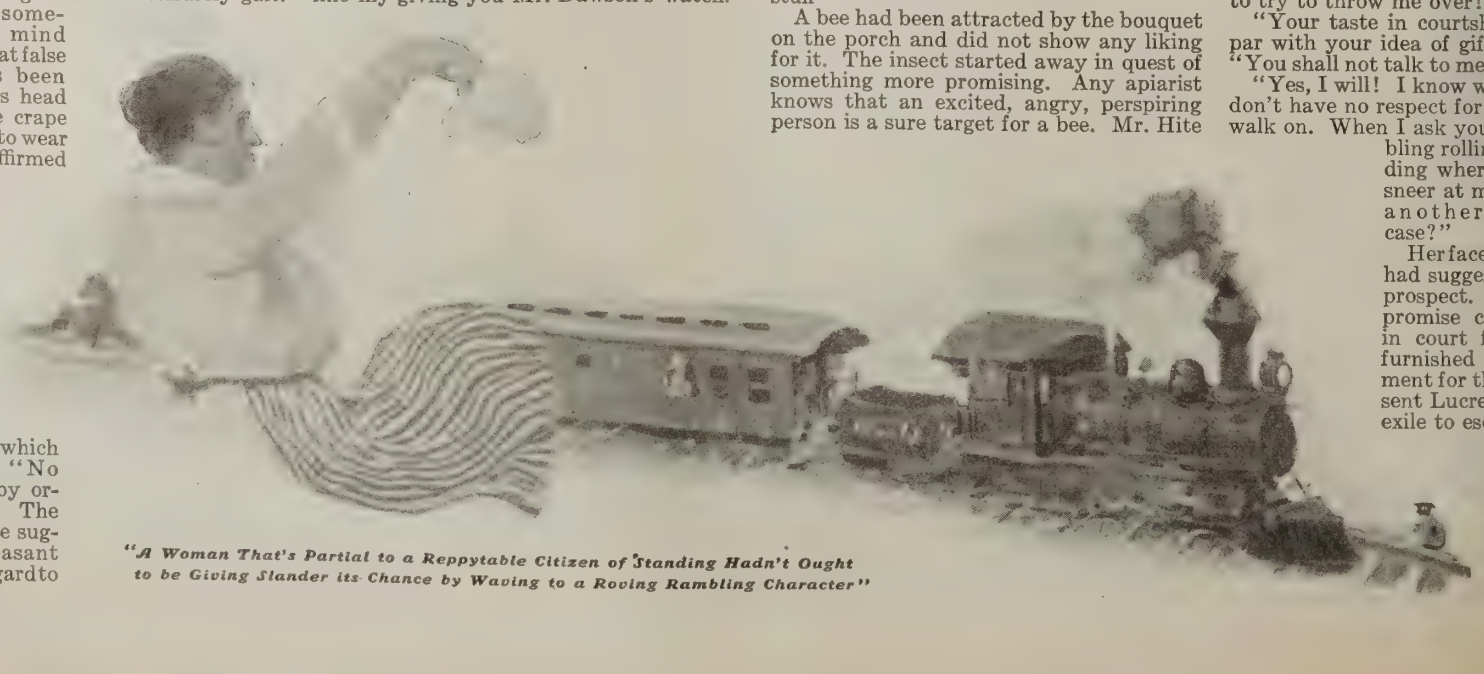
"My name and standing and credit this town is at stake, Nancy Dawson, s ing how it's generally considered that al arranged between us. That makes it hard-and-fast engagement, so far as speech of the people goes—and I do propose to be grinned at. Don't you da to try to throw me over!"

"Your taste in courtship is about on par with your idea of gifts," she retort "You shall not talk to me in that manne

"Yes, I will! I know wimmen, and th don't have no respect for the one they c walk on. When I ask you to set that ra bling rolling old bag o' pu ding where he belongs y sneer at me. Do you wa another Norton-Fo case?"

Her face became pale. had suggested an appalli prospect. That breach-promise case had dragg in court for a week, h furnished wild entertai ment for the multitude, h sent Lucretia Fogg off in exile to escape ridicule a was an eve that Cobboss reckoned fro just as the Ara reckon from t Hegira.

(Continued o Page 137)



"A Woman That's Partial to a Reppytable Citizen of Standing Hadn't Ought to be Giving Slander its Chance by Waving to a Roving Rambling Character"

(Continued from Page 134)

fasion?"

Yes'm, I do. That shows how desperati I am."

ıe walked up and down the porch, shwing more agitation than he had ever ₅ee before in the mien of Nancy Dawson. ⁻ın she went into the house and shut the .o'.

r. Hite stood in his tracks and fondled hiswelling on the back of his neck and polered. After about ten minutes of meitation, during which wrath cooled, ₅eond thought counseled him and memory ₅uested that Bill Norton did not come ffany too well in that suit which he brught against the Widow Fogg, Mr. Hite wet up and pulled the porcelain bell knob. I was obliged to ring again and again ₅ere Mrs. Dawson rewarded his perisncy by flinging open the door.

Nancy, I ought to have taken your adice about going away till my feelings roquieted down. I guess it was a regular ca: of blind staggers in my case."

Well, go away now!" was her uncomrnising suggestion.

I'm willing to come back halfway in th thing. If I'm handled right I shan't roff and be desperate."

was a warning. Mrs. Dawson's rabled expression indicated that certain coiderations were having effect in her ow case.

We don't want to fly off in no tangent an make a lot of trouble for ourselves," ₅uested Mr. Hite. "I'm sorry that I spke out—I'll say that."

You must prove that you are sorry."

Don't I look it?"

Irs. Dawson indulged her feelings with a 't of sarcasm:

You always look sorry—for something. I never seen you look cheerful yet."

I don't go round hiding cussedness urer an everlasting haw-haw. Tell me ac to prove that I'm sorry."

Think up your own way of doing so. If yc show enough earnestness you may be ab: to convince me."

But won't you give off your orders?"

Yes, I will. Go away at once and show mthat you have wit enough to plan some wa of making me know that you're really soy."

he shut the door.

Ir. Hite reflected that he could obey the ba: of her orders relative to going away. He climbed into his buggy with quite a dislir of nimble haste. But while he drove don the road he admitted with despair tht he could not think of any positive way of making her sure that he was sorry. His puzled thoughts dwelt on that word.

rother-in-law Jordan had walked his hoses slowly up Zion's Hill. When he saw th suitor coming back the volunteer advir swung his wagon across the middle of the road once more and Mr. Hite was compeed to halt.

Who come off high line in the set-to?" nuired Mr. Jordan bluntly.

None of your business!" barked Mr. He. "Pull out and let me past!"

Ir. Jordan dropped his reins and placidly rwed off a mouthful of tobacco.

If that's all the thanks a friend gets for pcting you on what you needed to know t only about what a friend might expect nsnap-and-bark times like these and I ui t going to complain. And I s'pose you'll se me that you don't need any advice."

You're only looking for a chance to stk your nose into my private business."

You were larruping away from me a ite spell ago, all torched up. You're still sc mad to be sensible. I can figger well erugh that you were a blamed sight maddi just now when you talked with Nancy Dwson. You hain't got no human notion pfiow to handle wimmen. Getting mad di't get you nowhere or nothing, Ev. Not nhe case of a woman like her, who is indepdent and all for running her own busiss. That kind of a woman likes to run the mn's business too. It's a good notion to e'em think they're running it—not really e'em run it, only think they're doing so." Hcrossed his legs and leaned back. "Now, let me be a friend in this. Did you get rwhere?"

Mr. Hite gulped back what he really wnted to say. He shook his head. A new rod—a melancholy one in which fears wre mingled with suspicions—had seized upn him.

She prob'ly told you to go off and cool lyn and then prove to her that you ain't kind that'll try to make home happy with a club after marriage," probed Mr. Jordan, a neighbor who knew the style of the Widow Dawson very well and had guessed sagely as to what the shortness of the interview signified.

Mr. Hite's solemn eyes opened and he mutely showed respect for Jordan's newly revealed abilities as an analyst of woman.

"Some wimmen is clinging vines," pursued Expert Jordan, "and relish the clinging, whilst others want to stand up straight and be clung to. There's nothing that gets to that last kind like a man being in a peck of trouble and depending on 'em to be got out of it. I hain't got to tell you what the Widder Dawson's class is. She wouldn't marry an angel, because an angel hain't got no 'outs' for her to get busy with. Now I don't see what she ever took up with you for. I'm being frank with you like a real friend ought to be. She couldn't save you from licker, because you don't touch the stuff. She says prob'ly: 'I'll make Ev Hite see some rays of light in the encircling gloom, as the hymn has it, and glory in doing so.'"

Mr. Jordan pulled down the corners of his mouth, knotted his eyebrows and opened doleful eyes.

"If I should come home looking like this—like you do now—my woman would let out two whoops and a howl and send for the doctor whilst trying first-aid home remedies. But you can't look any more sorry, put on all the extra frills you can manage."

That was the problem with which Mr. Hite had been struggling on his way down the hill, but he had his own notions about proffers of help in this perfidious world.

"I don't propose to set here any longer and be made fun of."

However, the expert was insistent and brutally frank.

"It's come to where you've got to show the widder her duty—show her good and hard—or else she won't take note that anything special is the trouble with you more'n usual. You might go up and rave round in her dooryard and shoot yourself through the flap of your ear or leave a note with your coat and vest on the shore of Toosic Pond or ——".

Mr. Hite urged Suse into the ditch, whirled past the obstructing truck wagon on two wheels of the buggy and escaped.

But he promptly pulled the mare down to a walk and set his elbows on his knees and pondered.

That tongue of Jordan's had nearly driven him out of his wits, but in what Jordan had said there was an idea.

"Something has got to be done to show her," admitted the probationer, "and there ain't no time to be lost."

When he came to the gate with the No-Trespass sign he opened it and led the mare inside and hitched her behind some bushes. While he was busy at this chore he spied a crowbar driven into the ground. A length of clothesline trailed away on the turf from the bar to the frazzled end. Being well posted on the delinquencies of the members of his back-pasture herd he knew that Britchy Bess, an especially unruly cow, had broken the tether which confined her upon her lawful premises.

Just then, however, Mr. Hite's thoughts were wholly taken up by female fractiousness in another quarter. He cut the length of the clothesline from the bar, coiled the rope on his arm and started on foot by way of a lane to the Dawson farm. The slurs of Jordan still pricked.

"I don't give the old fool credit for having more'n half wit, and he didn't know what he was talking about. But a thinking man like I am can take even a crazy hint and make something sensible out of it in the way of a plan. I've got to be convincing."

In order to be convincing Mr. Hite halted behind the Dawson barn, recklessly dented in his hard hat and unbuttoned the front of his celluloid collar and allowed the ends to stick up like horns past his ears. This play-acting with the collar not only expressed great wildness of despair, according to Mr. Hite's thoughtful view, but incidentally the pressure on the swelling bee sting was relieved. Then he noosed the rope round his neck and took the slack in his hand. He trudged slowly to the porch with despondent slouch in his gait and arrived in the presence of Mrs. Dawson, who was placidly making stitches in a fabric stretched over a hoop. She viewed the skewed ensemble presented before her and leaped to her feet with an air of concern that pleased Mr. Hite very much. He decided that he was on the right tack.

"Mercy!" She ejaculated that word several times.

"Use your eyes! Look at me as I am and form your judgment," counseled Mr. Hite dolefully.

"Evander, I never liked the way that mare has acted. I have told you to be careful she didn't run away with you."

"That ain't it. I'd like to see the hoss that could run away with me!" said Mr. Hite, pricked in his professional pride. But he promptly smoothed the temper out of his tone and demeanor. "Use your eyes, why don't you?"

"Are you hurt?"

"I'm hurt more than words can tell."

He put his hand on his breast.

"Get up here and sit down just as quick as you can!" She turned away and shouted excitedly: "Hannah!"

"Condemn it, I don't want no hired girl mixed into this! This is private betwixt us two," countermanded the lover. "You told me to go away and get into another state of mind. I've done it. And it's a state of mind that scares me. I don't know how high it was that Haman was hung, because I haven't kept up on scripture as close as I ought to. But if I ain't soothed and comforted I'll be found in the top of the highest tree in this town and the blame will be placed where it belongs."

Hannah arrived at that moment, displaying a state of excitement that fitted the occasion. But it was at once plain that her mental upheaval was in no way concerned with the affairs of Mr. Hite. She did not even glance in the direction of that distressed gentleman.

"I have drove her off three times to-day, but now she has gone and done it, Mis' Dawson. It's awful—it's terrible!"

Here was fresh distress of so vivid a nature that it outclassed the solemn woe with which Mr. Hite had been bewildering the mistress of the mansion.

"For goodness' sake, what has happened?"

"Them blueberry pies—the pies you made and set out to cool on the but'ry winder ledge! She has et 'em—every soop, sliver and scrimptom of 'em!"

Mr. Hite was immediately and properly incensed. The widow had turned her back on him; she was plumping questions at the hired girl. A mere matter of contemptible blueberry pies, eaten somehow by some unknown, was killing a dramatic situation right at its climax.

"Look here, Nancy," he raged, "you're seeing me at the end of my rope, ready to die if you don't say the word to save me from myself, and you're letting that girl take up the time with her yap about blueberry pies. This is a crisis, I tell you!"

But the agitated Hannah was handling a crisis of her own. Suddenly she jabbed a denunciatory forefinger:

"And there she is!"

The head of a white-faced Hereford cow was projected round the corner of the house. That is to say, the face was white by natural coloring, but blue stains were smeared from muzzle to eyes, an indigo-blue tongue was blandly and contentedly thrusting from one nostril to the other, licking off the remnants of the feast. The bovine countenance expressed complete satisfaction over a good job well done. That expression was calculated to put extra fire into a housewife's natural exasperation.

"Evander Hite, it's that breachy cow of yours!" declared Mrs. Dawson, getting her voice after a gasp.

Mr. Hite had recognized his property. He dropped the end of the coiled rope on the ground.

"She has been pestering us nigh to death and I have told you about it before. She has rampaged in my garden and ——"

"I had her hitched up special," he protested.

"Does that look as if you had that old scoop-mouthed, splay-footed pest of a thief hitched up? She has eaten my pies!"

"I'm here on something more important than blueberry pies!"

She came to the porch rail and leaned over it, her face white with wrath.

"It's plain enough to me what you're here for—leading that old cow onto my premises with that rope!"

"This rope ——" He was flapping his hand against the noose on his neck.

But Mrs. Dawson was not in a reasoning mood. Her housewife's sensibilities had been wounded in a vital spot.

"The two of you—that cow and you—stand here convicting each other. Keep your tongue still! I went and picked those blueberries in the hot sun and frizzled myself over a blazing stove so as to get those pies ready for the Beulah Band's supper this evening. It's my promised share of the vittles and now I'm dished, dolloped and disgraced, because they're depending on me. And you go and deliberately lead that cow up here ——"

"What do you think I'm wearing this rope for?" His ire matched hers. "I'm going to climb a tree, I tell you!"

"If you've got that rope to pull the tree up after you—and will only do it—it'll be good reddance. But first, you use it to tow that old cow back onto your own land where you brought her from. I tell you to go and go quick!"

"I won't go till I'm understood!"

Setting her teeth hard the Widow Dawson, controlled wholly by blazing wrath that took into account nothing except this intolerable case of trespassing, picked up the brass warming pan from the floor of the porch.

"Hannah, you go and fill this with hot water. Evander Hite, if you are in front of my porch when she comes back I'll scald you from top to toe—and it's got a long handle to save me from getting too near to you."

That proposed enormity in the employment of a recent gift took away Mr. Hite's breath and a lot of his courage.

"And look at that old devouring locust of Egypt with horns—look at what she is doing now!" railed the widow with added passion. The rover was showing that the repast of blueberry pies had inclined her taste to other delicacies in the way of provender. She was nibbling off the blooming tops of Mrs. Dawson's flower bed.

"Hannah, bring my shotgun!" called the mistress.

Mr. Hite's thoughts were flaming, but he possessed the truly rural sense of duty in the matter of taking care of a vagrant cow. He removed the noose from his neck and after a short chase arrived at the depth of an anticlimax by noosing the cow.

"Mr. Hite, if you say one more word to me in my present state of mind I shall not answer for the consequences!"

He was cowed by her decisiveness. He walked away, tugging on the rope. The points of his collar stuck up in grotesque imitation of the horns of the animal that plodded at his heels. But he halted suddenly.

There was the clank of iron on iron and Bomazeen came into sight on the curve at the foot of the hill. Bomazeen began to phrase a series of dulcet "coo-coos" and "hoo-hoos."

First turning her gaze in the direction of Mr. Hite as if to make sure of his attention, Mrs. Dawson boldly waved that something which was stretched on the hoop.

"That old pyoodle of a Jordan claiming to me that he understands wimmen!" he growled. "The hell he does—or anybody else!"

That evening after supper Mr. Hite sat in the window of his stable office and studied the problem that his heart affairs presented.

He directed baleful gaze across at Mr. Boomer, who was smoking an after-supper pipe on the veranda of the tavern. The magnate of the Cobbossee and Quebec railway system was rocking on the hind legs of a chair, discussing various topics and waking the echoes with his laughter. Mr. Hite was keen on all details—in his critical mood. He noted that Mr. Boomer was dolled up in a new suit of clothes, and while Mr. Hite was eying the rig-out jealously a clerk went across from Barrow's Gents' Furnishing Emporium and handed to Mr. Boomer a freshly cleaned straw hat, which the owner set on his head with a jaunty uptilt. Then he rose, buttoned his coat and surveyed himself as he was reflected in a store window near the hotel porch.

"I don't see how a critter with a pod like he's got can bear to take a second look at his figger, much less act as if he was proud of it," averred the hostler, who was in Mr. Hite's class of slab-sidedness. "And if I was a woman," continued the hostler, averting his eyes from Mr. Hite's side glance of ireful inquiry, "I'd just as soon have Bull Rip foghorn in the parlor as him with that laugh of his."

"What parlor?"

"Any parlor."

It was evident that Mr. Boomer had been waiting for that hat. He started away, but was hailed by Druggist Thombs, who was having considerable trouble in cranking his road beetle and was in need of the

Smart Utility

The Pelter is a mighty important portion of a he-man's wardrobe. It's his Fall coat and his Winter coat, and it's his all-weather coat for every season of the year. Yes—two or three years, because Pelters are built to wear that long.

"Gabardine and Leather—There's a side for Any Weather" and it's hard to choose between them for dashing, well-tailored style.

No other coat is quite as handsome as a genuine leather Pelter, and no other coat will give such faithful service.

You can wear a Pelter anywhere confident in knowing that it is appropriate and in the best taste. You can prove this by looking around you, by the type of men who wear them.

Pelters are made as well as leather coats can be made—carefully tailored out of finest, softest, most durable leather, to fit well, look well and wear well.

For men, women and children, $30.00 up. Look for the name on every "Pelter."

Go pick out your model at the store that sells Pelters. If you don't know one in your locality, write us.

International Duplex Coat Co.
Pioneer Makers of Leather Coats
114-116 Fifth Avenue New York City

a TORREY for a smooth, clean shave always

Get off to work with a clean face and a good humor—which goes with a Torrey shave.

If you use a Torrey, shaving never ruffles you. Its keen durable edge cuts clean without pulling, and without roughing the skin. More men are using Torrey Razors every year.

More are recognizing by actual use what the Torrey standard of quality means. Get in line with this army of satisfied Torrey users. Ask your dealer for a Torrey. If he cannot supply you, write us. Booklet "How to Shave" free.

THE J. R. TORREY RAZOR CO.
Dept. A, Worcester, Mass.

BECOME AN EXPERT
ACCOUNTANT

Executive Accountants command big salaries. Thousands of firms need them. Only 2,500 Certified Public Accountants in U. S. Many are earning $3,000 to $10,000 a year. We train you thoroly by mail in spare time for C. P. A. examinations or executive accounting positions. Knowledge of bookkeeping unnecessary to begin—we prepare you from the ground up. Our course and service are under the supervision of William B. Castenholz, A. M., C. P. A., Former Comptroller and Instructor, University of Illinois, assisted by a staff of C. P. A's, including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Low tuition fee—easy terms. Write now for information and free book of Accountancy facts.

La Salle Extension University, Dept. 1071-HA Chicago
"The World's Greatest Extension University" advice that was undoubtedly concealed in the system of a regular engineer.

"Want a ride?" inquired Thombs.

"Thank you kindly, but I've got a flivver of my own that's nearer my size. Have to keep old Bomazeen limbered up," declared Mr. Boomer humorously—for all to hear. "She relishes the evening air."

"I've heard of ingines being used for 'most everything," said the Iago at Mr. Hite's elbow, "but it's crowding the mourners to use one to go courting with. And by the mourners I mean the stockholders in our railroad. He don't own that road no more'n I do!"

"He's only being tolerated and tolled on till we can do something sensible," returned Mr. Hite, gritting his teeth. "And it's getting time to do it."

"If he's let run loose much longer he'll be having the cheek to call a meeting and have money voted to build him an ingine hitching post at the foot of Zion's Hill," prodded the malicious hostler.

"That's about enough of that kind of talk!"

The hostler retired into the bowels of the stable. When he was at a safe distance he flung back his reply:

"You're sure right, gov'nor! Talk don't get ye nowhere in a thing like this is getting to be."

The derisive barks of Bomazeen began and died away in the distance.

Mr. Hite pulled his hat down over his buzzing head, picked up his yellow gloves and strode into the stable.

"You hitch Wobbly Will into the road cart. I'm going—well, it don't make a damblasted bit of difference where I'm going! And you keep your yawp still!"

He cocked his ear and demanded to know what the hostler was muttering, while that sullen serf buckled the harness.

"I ain't muttering. I'm singing."

"Singing what?" Mr. Hite had decided to start in with detraction at home and follow it up through the community.

"Ditty I heard from a drummer about a red light on the track for Boomer—I mean Boozer Brown. But it hain't got nothing to do with your private business," the hostler hastened to say.

"I haven't got no more private business left," snarled Mr. Hite. "Seeing that it has been strung out into general public business, with 'em singing songs about it! We'll proceed to find out if some loose ends of that business can't be snugged up."

He snapped his whip close to the hostler's ear and drove away.

When he passed the tavern veranda the gentlemen of the Cobbossee Amalgamated Order of Ball-Bearing Tongues, assembled in regular conference, bestowed on him a united grin that torched up resolution in Mr. Hite's case more effectively than three cheers would have availed in stirring a person of different temperament.

In his implacability he felt a strange thrill of exaltation too. This must be love, after all. Mr. Hite had heard about love and its moods and longings and extravagances and vagaries and jealousies and had never put stock in any such nonsense. He had paid court to Nancy Dawson in the approved, smug, taken-for-granted, two-calls-a-week fashion—and had never felt his heart flutter.

"I'm in love," Mr. Hite told himself while he urged on Wobbly Will. "I've been in love right along without waking up to how much I'm in love. It don't stand to reason that a woman of her caliber is going to take up with a met-by-chancer like he is, but if some slip-up somehow should give him his chance to grab onto that stand o' buildings and that farm, which by good rights just nat'rally belongs with my land at the foot of the hill, and then he should stand back and give me one of them jackass haw-haws of his I'd drop dead. I could never live in this town after it happened. And if being stirred up like I am right now, when I think of it, ain't love, then it's—but timbelt it, it is love!"

He saw that Cascade Hall was all lighted up and he remembered what Mrs. Dawson had said about the supper of the Beulahs. Immediately his mind was easier. That's where she was—having a good time with the women.

Boomer had titivated himself up and had gone on a wild-goose chase if he intended to call on Mrs. Dawson.

Mr. Hite left his horse standing in the road and went to the door of Cascade Hall, his whip under his arm. With the confidence of the accredited suitor he purred the request that somebody would please ask Mrs. Dawson to step out for a minute. He was informed that Mrs. Dawson was not there; that she had sent down her hired man to say that she was not feeling well and had had some kind of a dreadful setback with her part of the supper treat—and the hired man had brought a freezer of ice cream from Gibbs' store.

Mr. Hite drove away from Cascade Hall. If that informing Beulah had hit him a smart tunk with a rolling-pin he would have felt happier and less dizzy. At home! A plot! Right then Mr. Hite would have given credence to almost any kind of calumny—even to a vindictive suggestion that his own Hereford cow had been a traitorous party to that plot somehow; at any rate the matter of those pies was mixed up in Mrs. Dawson's excuse.

He led Wobbly Will inside the gate that bore the no-trespass sign. The twilight was deepening and the shadows in the lane shielded Mr. Hite. Unashamed, he set about stalking his lady and her guest, for now jealousy was frankly asserting what destination the trigged-up Mr. Boomer had in mind.

And then jealousy was outvoiced by Mr. Boomer himself. There was no chance for guesswork when anybody came within half a mile of that gentleman. Mr. Boomer was with the Widow Dawson—her laughter was tinkling while his clanged.

Mr. Hite crept through the orchard shadows. He did not surprise a tête-à-tête on the porch. A lantern showed the two at a rock heap beyond the small-fruits patch.

Mr. Boomer was on top of the rock heap and the Widow Dawson was holding up the lantern and laughing while her guest posed in mock heroic attitudes. With palm held edgewise at his forehead he was "Aleck the great looking for more worlds to conquer," so he announced. With arms folded and the straw hat pulled somberly low he was "Napoleon crossing the Alps." He was also a great many notables according to his promulgation of identities—all the aforesaid notables, of course, looking extremely like Twombley Boomer until labeled by his word of mouth.

"I do like fun!" gasped the Widow Dawson.

"It's fun that makes the world go round," he agreed. "Some say it's love that does it—but fun has got to be mixed in with love."

When she heartily agreed with that dictum the concealed Mr. Hite gritted his teeth.

"And the next tableau will represent—I don't know exactly what it does represent, because I haven't had time as yet to go over into a graveyard that I can see from the cab window and find out, but it represents"—Mr. Boomer snuggled the straw hat into the hook of his elbow and struck a posture—"that old John Henry Somebody that has been set up to scare the robins and the chickadees of this town."

Mrs. Dawson did not laugh.

"Well, I guess it isn't very good manners to joke about a graveyard," said Mr. Boomer, accepting the silent rebuke. "Sometimes when I get to going it I don't know when to stop."

Mr. Hite by that time had a rock in each hand, though he despondently realized that he was too far away to hope to make a bull's-eye.

"I'll be tending to that matter I climbed up here to look into," stated the impersonator in propria persona.

"But be careful—please do," pleaded the widow with real solicitude. "It's awful stuff if it gets onto your hands."

"In your service, dear lady, I ain't afraid to tackle raging lions, much less this stuff—if it's what I think it is." He got down on his knees and pawed into a growth that masked the rocks. "And I find it is that stuff—it's poison ivy."

"Don't touch it any more!"

He backed slowly down the rocks and joined her.

"I don't say those bees will make salads out of that ivy if it's too handy by, or use the leaves for petticoats, but we'd better be on the safe side and move the hive into the orchard—and I hope you won't think that I have just made an excuse of the thing to come up here this evening," he said, plainly fearing that the widow might have apiarian knowledge that would discount his zeal. "Just as well be on the safe side," he insisted.

"You nigh take my breath away—you are so kind and obliging."

"As I have said to you before, I hope you don't think it was cheeky in me to give you the bees—or the dog. But the fir time I looked up here and saw what a fi place you had I said to myself that I'd li to add a little something. It's my natu to be neighborly—can't help it. Nev have had a home of my own to tend out and so I have to indulge my feelings doing neighborly kindnesses to those wl have a home."

Mr. Hite, hearing this, was an infuriate skeptic. There was no such sort of disi terestedness in the world, and he mutter profane remarks to that effect and wo dered what the matter was with t Widow Dawson's intellect. She was than ing Mr. Boomer demurely and saying th she understood the neighborly feeling e actly, because that was the way she tri to get along with folks.

She went ahead with the lantern and M Boomer followed with the hive, carrying stand and all. They passed close to M Hite and he put his hand on his swolle neck with the air of one who was n entirely sure whether bees of the Italia variety did or did not send out nig skirmishers. However, another of M Boomer's gifts was serving on the nig shift. The bulldog pranced up to Mr. Hi and sniffed at the calf of his leg and growle Mr. Hite growled back, expressing t venom of his emotions with such ferocit that the dog recognized his own languag of threat and was intimidated. He ran awa and sought safety in the circle of t lantern's radiance.

On account of the danger of alarm by th dog Mr. Hite did not follow immediatel when the party returned to the hous Finally he ventured on a tour of inspectio spurred by Mr. Boomer's very audibl reiteration of what a good time he wa having. There was also the tinkle of ic against glass.

Mr. Hite from his post behind some lila bushes saw Mr. Boomer sitting on th porch in the Sheraton chair. He was sip ping from a tumbler of raspberry shrub an was trying to make friends with Mrs. Daw son's big cat. The cat was not reciproca ing and would not budge from its perch o the rail.

"I want the entire family to like me, confessed Mr. Boomer when his overture to "nice kitty" had got him nothing excep a cold stare. "You say the cat isn't afra of the dog?"

"Oh, no! They play together."

"Then that isn't why she stays up ther on the rail, eh? My sakes! I'm afraid I'm in wrong. Come, kitty!"

The cat jumped down to the ground an strolled off across the yard.

"She seems to have it in for me all right A case of a nose out of joint because introduced another pet into the family Well, I'll be very nice to her just the same patience wins out, and being nice to the se counts in the long run."

The cat walked behind the lilac bushe and rubbed against Mr. Hite's familiar leg

"I know what you'd say to me if yo could talk," he muttered. "You see int his character just the same as I do. Ther ain't no shrewder animal than a cat is There sits a woman who is being gulled b gabble. You know it and I know it. An the longer he sits on that piazzy—if he allowed to stay here in this town, if he stay here, if his business keeps him here——"

Mr. Hite's mutterings were cautiously subdued, they kept growing fainter an then they died into silence. He was pon dering. His address to the cat had set hi mind upon a special line of procedure in th solving of the problem that confronted him

The immediate and pressing idea was t get that man off the widow's porch—awa from her—at once. Boomer's complacency sitting there in that Sheraton chair, sippin raspberry shrub and beaming on a hostes who seemed to be enjoying the situation made Mr. Hite feel as if a whole hive o Italian bees had been emptied into his soul

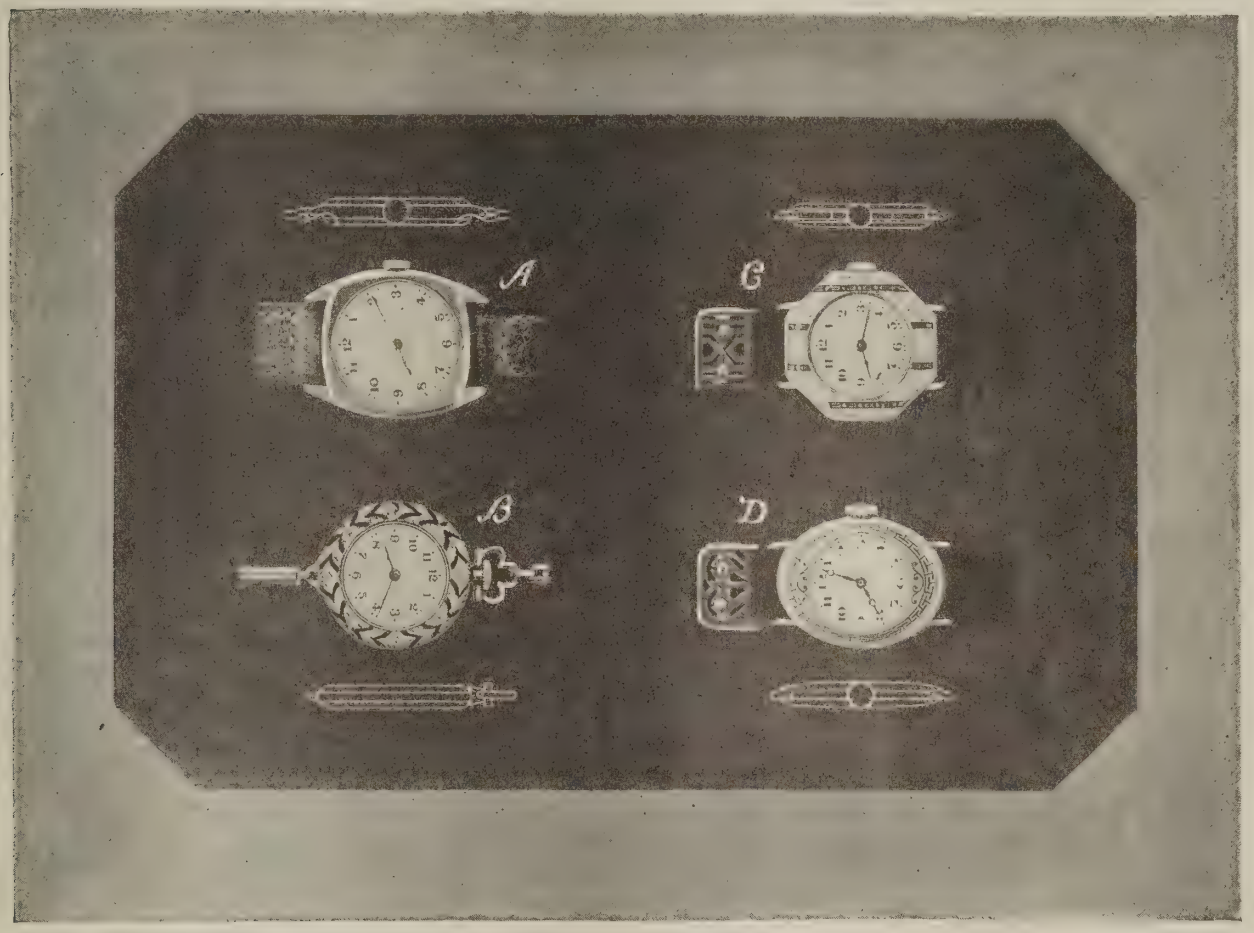
He slunk away from the lilac bushes made a detour to avoid all risk of observa tion from the porch and started dow Zion's Hill. An emergency scheme ha budded—now it burst into fuller bloom. I the way of fruit it promised everything Mr. Hite spanked his fist down into hi palm and thereby clinched his determina tion to go the limit. He steeled himself b reflecting on Cobbossee's grins, Boomer airs, the Widow Dawson's folly and fickle ness.

When he arrived at the railroad track h addressed a few words to Bomazeen, curlin his lip and shaking his fist.

(Continued on Page 140)

Wadsworth Cases

FOR FINE WATCHES



A—The Cushion Square. The strength and light, sure touch (attributes of American women in business and in sport) are well expressed in this excellent case. A sturdy pigskin strap makes it business-like and secure

B—The Round Convertible. Chased enamel inlay, just the right touch for the afternoon frock or chic street dress. It is usually worn with a detachable gold bracelet. And the design is exquisite

C—The Octagon. This watch, too, is chased enamel inlaid, but the narrow silk ribbon gives quite a different effect, especially becoming to the slim wrist slipping out of an old-fashioned sleeve. For evening wear or afternoon tea

D—The Oval. Worn on a silk ribbon, this case is appropriate for evening wear and many afternoon functions. Note the distinctiveness of the beautifully simple design

To meet the infinite variety of women's demands

IT used to be said that a lady could be told by her gloves, her handkerchief and her shoes.

Nowadays a fourth item is noted by observing eyes in drawing room or restaurant, business office or country club.

A wrist watch that is as substantial as those worn in the service will spoil the whole effect of a filmy, feminine, afternoon dress. And that tiny little jewel-frosted time-piece, so becoming to a frill-clad wrist, is a jarring note in the distinctive simplicity of the tailored suit.

The woman who knows the value of details sees to it that her wrist watch is not only attractive in itself—but appropriate to the occasion. The Wadsworth craftsmen have been building enduring and artistic watch cases for 30 years.

They are now supplying the demand for "a watch for every occasion" with a great number of beautiful and widely varied designs, examples of which are seen wherever women pay attention to correct accessories.

Select any standard movement that your jeweler recommends and have him "dress" it in a Wadsworth case. The name Wadsworth is all the guarantee you need, not only of correct design but of the best possible in material and workmanship.

THE WADSWORTH WATCH CASE CO., CINCINNATI, OHIO

Factories: Dayton, Ky.

(Continued from Page 138)

"About all you have ever done for this town, you snorting whelp, is to saddle stockholders with debts and knock me out of the good business I had hauling sample trunks and drummers from the Junction and back. Public spirit and good o' the town, hey? Well, let 'em grin after this—if they feel like it! Let your old fat wallopus hoof it! It'll give him something else to laugh at—maybe! As for you"—Mr. Hite had climbed into the cab—"you have kyoodled your last haw-haw for me and your last coo-coo for her!"

Mr. Hite was no expert as an engineer. But he pulled off the yellow gloves and went to work. He knew that a hot blaze would make steam and that an open throttle would allow the steam to make the wheels go round. He raked open the top of the banked coal in the fire box, unscrewed the caps of cans and poured in all the oil he could find, waited till the gauge needle promised action and then released the brake and yanked open the throttle.

He jumped off and let Bomazeen go it!

Where Bomazeen would fetch up was a secondary consideration, so far as Mr. Hite was concerned.

As a matter of fact, he did not devote any thought to that question until he was hidden in a gully near the track. He had been wholly absorbed in pondering on affairs more closely related to his personal peace of mind.

A little flare of momentary worry when the yappings of Bomazeen's exhaust were dying away in the distance was promptly extinguished by the flood of pure joy that poured over Mr. Hite's soul when he saw Mr. Boomer come pounding down Zion's Hill under the light of the stars and begin a stern chase, hat in hand and coat on his arm.

"Leg it, you old Percheron!" counseled Mr. Hite in a whisper. "You've had your mind took off'n one subject at any rate. And I guess it ain't much of a mind, seeing that you're setting out afoot to catch a railroad engine."

He climbed out of the gully and started off in the direction of his pasture.

"I ain't going to think about it. I ain't going to worry. Let other folks tend to their own troubles. This is the first thing I have found to take relish in for a good while and I ain't going to spoil the taste of it."

Mr. Hite chewed gustfully on that revenge on his way back to the village and until he went to sleep. He ruminated in the morning, but the piquant flavor was missing. He was afflicted with a melancholy disposition that naturally harbored forebodings. After breakfast he gazed out of his stable office window on the first stirrings of morning life in Cobbossee and wondered what sort of a devil had got into him when the night shielded and rage prompted and opportunity offered.

He did not exult when he saw Mr. Boomer arrive at the tavern, his bulk filling up the rear seat and sagging down the springs of a beach wagon in which a farmer served as charioteer. Mr. Boomer's laugh was stilled, his jowls sagged, he crawled down out of the wagon with grunts of pain and hobbled into the tavern, his collar and necktie in one hand and his new coat dragging listlessly from the other.

The farmer drove into the livery stable and told the hostler, so Mr. Hite's sharply cocked ear gathered, to "bait the critter and don't take off the harness. Orders is to be ready to start off again."

The hostler promptly began to ask questions, but the farmer turned his back on the subaltern and sauntered into headquarters. He picked up a bit of wood on the way and whittled and made casual inquiries about what Mr. Hite had for horse-kind and whether that gentleman would consider talking "shift." The farmer explained that the heft of the season's work was over and he thought he might like to trade into something a little trappier with which to visit the fall fairs.

Mr. Hite, avid for news, hoping to get information by shutting off that line of talk, stated curtly that he had nothing for swap stock on hand.

Then the farmer started a series of questions about other horse prospects in town, seeking advice from an expert.

Mr. Hite was obliged to control an impulse to grab this news container and tip him upside down and rattle out of him the knowledge he naturally must hold, considering that he had brought Boomer back to town.

"Ain't you taking no more interest in hosses?" demanded the farmer at last, realizing that this man of the wandering gaze and snappy retorts was not listening.

"No! Teaming business is too slack since they've been running an extra train to the Junction every time a drummer sticks up a finger."

But that provocative opening for comment on the most recent developments in the affairs of the C. & Q. R. R. produced no reaction. The farmer yawned.

"I d'know but I'll take a little nap on your l'unge there whilst I'm waiting for orders. I was routed out early this morning."

He sprawled on the couch where the hostler was accustomed to wait for belated buggy riders.

"What's the special news down the line?" faltered Mr. Hite.

"Nothing. It's a dead time o' year—August is."

"Didn't I see Boomer getting out of your wagon?" Mr. Hite had arrived at the limit of endurance.

"Ye-ap!" The farmer yawned again. He closed his eyes.

"How comes it he's riding round in a wagon instead of on that engine he's so much in love with?"

The farmer pulled one hand from under his head and tapped his forefinger on his brow. He winked.

"What do you mean?" demanded Mr. Hite, his impatience heating up his tone more than the occasion seemed to warrant.

"Oh, I forgot that he's a gent you've been booming up as a good town asset. I ain't saying anything against him. But it's what happens to a lot of folks when they get too much bound up in a thing."

"What happens?"

"They go daffy!" Mr. Hite's wild stare demanded so much that the farmer raised himself on his elbow and displayed more interest. "Now that I'm reminded how as you're considerably took up with him I'll tell you. He came into my yard about sunup and got me to the door and said he had mislaid his ingine."

"What kind of talk is that?" stammered the inquisitor.

"I don't know as he said it just that way, but that was the gist of it. Anyway, a man who comes round with his eyes sticking out and claims that he has lost a whole ingine round the neighborhood somewheres, and is lugging a lighted lantern that he borrowed and hasn't noticed that it has come daylight and says he has walked twice over the railroad, hunting all nooks and corners and is so plumb beat out that he can't walk a step farther and is willing to pay a dollar an hour to ride and keep hunting—well, he needs to be humored, whatever it may be is the matter with him. So I'm humoring him and asking no foolish questions. With me orders is orders at a dollar an hour. On the other hand, maybe he ain't crazy." Once more the farmer winked at Mr. Hite. "Judging from his looks he ain't up this way for his health, and if he ain't crazy then he's a wise one."

"An engine couldn't get lost," mumbled Mr. Hite.

"I ain't figgering whether it can or not—not when I'm paid a dollar an hour, no questions asked. I'll say this: Him and me has been in my hitch everywhere we could go with a wagon. Then we took the hand car and went from one end of the line to t'other, and that ingine ain't in the ditch and it didn't hit the bumper at the end of the road and it ain't in the roundhouse and it ain't in the top of any tree, and whilst I think he's crazy if he's sure he lost it, on t'other hand the public has got to stand by and expect almost any kind of skindinkulum in these times when it's a case of handling railroads. As far as I'm concerned, orders is orders and my time and pay is going on."

The farmer laced his fingers under his head, cocked one leg over the other and went to sleep in a jiffy.

And in a jiffy he was awake again.

Landlord Twiss appeared on the tavern veranda and began to beat on his meal gong with all his might and main. It was not the breakfast call—he had announced breakfast by his usual tattoo a long time before. When Mr. Twiss started down the middle of the street, pounding the gong and bellowing "Oh, yea!" Mr. Hite's first startled idea was that the landlord had lost his mind. The farmer offered an opinion to that effect, seeming to entertain pessimistic ideas as to sanity in Cobbossee on that day.

But Mr. Twiss halted in the square, kept up his din until he had collected a crowd and explained to the listeners that Twombly Boomer requested all stock holders of the C. & Q. and citizens in general to listen to some remarks that would be made from the hotel porch.

"I'm passing the word as an accommodation for him, hoping for a good attendance, one and all. Come as soon as you can." He led the parade back up the street, beating time.

Mr. Boomer, when he stepped out on the porch, had put off his finery, was back in his overalls and had an air of being down to business in earnest.

He twitched the sleeves of his jumper as a magician does when he assures his audience that he will perform without the use of cuffs. It may be that Mr. Boomer wished to impress upon his auditors that he was concealing none of his usual humor up his sleeve.

"Gents in general, what I'm going to tell you wasn't due to be spilled just yet. But seeing that the most of the business has been tended to as was planned and only a few tags to be tied up and nothing will be hurt by coming out with the facts I'll say that what is meant by all the land buying that has been going on round Bomazeen Falls up yonder is that The Consolidated Paper & Pulp Co. is proposing to develop the power and build a big mill and will take over this railroad and extend it up to the Falls by the old charter. It wasn't anything that would stand brass-band tactics and that's the reason why the railroad part of the plan has been soft-pedaled along, as you might say."

"That's the way the big schemers always operate when they grab—muffle their feet and tiptoe in and sneak away before anybody wakes up," complained somebody in the crowd.

Mr. Boomer pulled his cap down over one eye and wagged a forefinger in the direction of the detractor.

"I take it that the gent is a stockholder in the C. & Q."

"Yessir, I am! And I ——"

"Don't holler till you're stung! My crowd is too big a concern to start in by cheating folks where the plan is to settle and develop. That ain't a good business idea. I'm only one of their understrappers. I'm an honest working man who has been sent here to do what I was told to do, and I'm for the plain folks, like I have found here in this town—and good folks, the most of 'em are. I know this much about the big plans—that it's square business to play a shrewd game with rival operators and to bluff off the speculators who try for a holdup. And that's enough on that point. On this other point—about giving out the news—I can say I telegraphed to headquarters this morning, asking for permission to spring the thing—and I got that permission. And I can say that my folks propose to back the bonds of this road and buy all the common stock at par, figuring that the good will of the town is needed, along with a ready-made charter that will hold off the stick-up chaps."

"Well, that sounds good," admitted one of the throng.

Landlord Twiss banged the gong.

"I propose ——"

"Hold on!" shouted Mr. Boomer. "I ain't in any frame of mind to listen to three cheers right now. I can't ever use your three cheers in my business—and my bosses can't hear 'em in New York. I've told you what my folks are ready to do. Now let me tell you what some dod-hammered son of a hump-backed Hosea amongst your folks has done! He has stolen Bomazeen!"

Mr. Boomer's listeners grinned tolerantly. He seemed to be getting back into that humorous mood which was more natural in his case.

"What's the joke?" inquired a stockholder. "Give us the rest of it. We're feeling like laughing to-day."

"You'd best not do any laughing right now where I can see you and hear you—the way I'm feeling," returned Mr. Boomer with a savageness that astonished them. "I haven't had a wink of sleep all night. I have been up and down the line every way except in a flying machine—and, I tell you, that locomotive is gone! Now you'll kindly sidetrack snickers and give that fact the right o' way."

They were impressed by the temper he was showing.

"Where did you leave it laying round, as you might say?" asked another stockholder.

From all parts of the crowd popped q tions—where did he see it last, what t did he miss it, where was he when it stolen, whom did he suspect.

He pulled off his cap, crumpled it in hand and shook his fist and irefully bav them into silence.

"I ain't here as chairman of an old ma quilting bee! I've called you together get action. The charter calls for train be run over this road and the mails carr I'm only an engineer and I ain't a law and I haven't got time to hunt up the about that charter. All I know is that charter calls for trains to be run, or some kind of a land-pirate game can played here and will grease the rails on whole proposition. Is anybody at this p calling for a joke or wanting to laugh?"

His flaming gaze assured him that nob was hankering for humor.

"We have got to get busy and find things—that locomotive and the h skivered Jethro who has stole it! And whole of you ain't too many! This t has got a job cut out for it and you'd be go to it!"

He marched off the veranda and stood the middle of the street and gave the pression of a man who was fervidly ea to go somewhere but could not make up mind which way to go. His indecision h the citizens of Cobbossee in their tracks

"It's what has come from his ranting roving round all times o' day and night, and down the line, till he didn't know wh he was half the time," confided a stockhol to a neighbor.

"Have you telegraphed to headquart how you have lost your engine?" a v turesome citizen asked Mr. Boomer.

Mr. Boomer's tone and manner in a retort that it was nobody's business confession aplenty that he was pruden holding back on that subject.

He trudged across the street to the liv stable, having seen the farmer standing the door.

"All aboard!" commanded the employ and climbed into the beach wagon, squ ting the rear springs nearly to the a While he waited for the farmer to buc the headstall on the horse he exchan stares with Mr. Hite, whose thin form sli the sunlight that streamed through stable office door. The stares were mu ally unamiable and continued for so moments.

"Anything on your mind?" deman Mr. Boomer sharply.

Mr. Hite stated that there was not, t ing to hide a guilty conscience beh acerbity.

"Well, there ought to be if you've any public spirit in a time like this. A you going to hitch up and do your t hunting for that locomotive? Ain't yo stockholder?"

"I ain't fool enough to invest money i railroad that was started to hurt my b ness."

"It's too bad you're not more interes in hunting. There are some culverts small that they could use a knitting nee like you to good advantage."

"Are you trying to pick a fight?"

"Yes," declared Mr. Boomer with a rity. "But I can't tend to it right now good shape. Being pressed for time, simply say that I don't like you! A spe reason is I don't like your looks, I do like what you have been saying behind back and there are probably a lot of ot reasons that will occur to me later. N farmer, drive on—by way of the Can hook road. I remember now about t pipe I mislaid."

"If your mind was on your business way it ought to be you'd probably reme ber where you mislaid that engine," snee Mr. Hite.

"I'm going right where I can put hands on the pipe—we'll see about the gine later."

Mr. Boomer showed more cheerfuln and waved a derisive farewell when he hauled away.

Mr. Hite pulled down from a hook linen duster and told the hostler to hitch Suse—and hurry about it. After the dus was on the boss searched his pock spatted himself on breast and hips, loo on the floor and on his desk and in ot ways indicated that he was hunting something. But when he noted that mare was harnessed he abandoned search, jumped into the buggy and dr away. He raced past the Boomer conv ance on the slope of Zion's Hill.

(Concluded on Page 143)

(Concluded from Page 140)

H found Mrs. Dawson in her flower arn.
"have come up here to give you a piece f rws about that fly-by-night who has n o wreck and ruin that railroad prop-you're so much interested in. He has on to work and lost his engine."
"ou're a bit late with the news, Evan-er. I sent the hired man down to the ille early to find out for me. But it is ot Ir. Boomer's fault that Bomazeen is is g."
"ow do you know it isn't?"
"ecause Mr. Boomer was sitting on my or making a neighborly call when the ge started puffing away."
"re you backing him up?"
"idging from the rest of the news my ire man brought me from the village, Ir Boomer is very well backed without y elp."
"know now what he told you on the y at day when the Cobbossee & Quebec sold," affirmed Mr. Hite. "And it has e a plot and a frame-up on innocent ars all the way through."
Se marched close and faced him.
"ou take a good look at me," she manded, remembering Mr. Boomer's aner on the occasion that had been ened. "Do I look honest?"
"es," admitted Mr. Hite, struggling this own sense of guilt.
"ll tell you that Mr. Boomer has never ened to me any of the facts he has ve out this morning—and that's all I ted to tell you."
Se went up and sat on her porch and he llved her there and posted himself in e heraton chair.
" don't care to entertain callers this oing, sir."
"eeing that I'm setting on my own a, I ain't trespassing quite so much as ght be—and considering how you got rght up over a trespassing case yester-y I'll say that I stand ready to pay all ll of that cow's contracting. But that's ner matter. I serve notice on you that mere looking out for my interests and pose to hang round."
"esterday I told you to go away
d——" "es, that was yesterday—and I went," ad Mr. Hite, ominously calm.
"o-day I tell you to go away and stay vé!"
"o-day is to-day—and I won't do it!"
"ll compel you to do so!"
I leaned back in the chair and crossed s gs.
"ooks like the first chapter of a Norton-g story Number Two. Go ahead!"
Once more her pallor signaled the terror a such a threat stirred in Mrs. Dawson.
ewisted her fingers together and stared tnto vacancy and the dreadful pano-n of those scenes in court was unrolled fe her. She had been a witness in the s and her ears now echoed the sneering ies of the lawyers and the tumultuous uter of the listeners—mirth that the eff's gavel could not subdue.
Ir. Hite kept still, fully aware that her e ories were more effective than any of s rords.
When Mr. Boomer was hauled into the r and viewed the tableau he displayed o alousy when he saw Mr. Hite on the m. On the contrary, Mr. Boomer ned blandly, passed the time o' day and qired if Mrs. Dawson had seen his pipe a he had left on the porch rail.

"I—I took it inside," she said, having much difficulty in recovering from something that closely resembled a trance in which fright predominated. "I'll get it for you." She went into the house.

The particularly ugly scowl with which Mr. Hite then favored the caller was inspired by the thought that the Sheraton chair had been left to itself overnight on the porch—and Boomer's pipe had been given sanctuary.

Mr. Boomer remained in the wagon, whose front tilted up still more when the farmer obeyed orders and descended to receive the pipe.

"Chickens always come home to roost," observed Boomer amiably.

"I'm getting ready to start a few suits in this town—and I'd just as soon add on a suit against you for slander," shouted Mr. Hite, perceiving sly accusation in Boomer's remark.

"I'm not referring to you," apologized the other, preserving his wide smile. "You're no chicken. But that thought just came to me, and I'm pressed for time and I reckoned you might be willing to take a peek into Mrs. Dawson's hen pen and see whether Bomazeen didn't come up here last night and crawl in there after she got tired waiting down at the foot of the hill. Just a thought, that's all, figgering that if you're going to hang round here ——"

"I shall hang round here!"

"If you ain't willing to leave the porch and take a peek, keep your ear out. If you hear her saying 'coo-coo!' anywhere round the premises coax her up to you and trot her on your knee till I get back. I'll be back." He put much significance into that promise.

Mrs. Dawson did not send the pipe by the farmer—she carried it to the wagon and gave it into the hands of Mr. Boomer and he took off his cap and thanked her. He pulled out a pouch and began to stuff tobacco into the pipe bowl.

"I saw your hired man in the crowd when I was making my little speech and I don't have to repeat, I reckon!"

"It's wonderful news, sir."

But she did not display the joy that he was looking for in all C. & Q. stockholders that morning. He wrinkled his forehead and glanced from her plain distress to the uncompromising visage of Mr. Hite.

"I hope you ain't specially worried about that engine that has gone to playing hide and coop, Mrs. Dawson. I'll run a regular train over this road to-day, even if I have to gear Thombs' old Lazy Lulu on top of the C. &. Q. hand car."

"I'm not worrying about the railroad." He put the match to his pipe.

"Don't worry about anything"—puff, puff—he counseled while he puffed. "I'll be back! Lick up old Dollar-an-Hour, farmer!"

The farmer did not obey immediately. He was watching the approach of a man on horseback who was waving his arms and who began to shout when he was some distance away.

"They said I was li'ble to find you here," declared the messenger in a tone that carried as far as Bomazeen's whistle toots had previously winged in a declaration of the Boomer interest in the Dawson premises. "I guess they've found her!"

"You guess!" snapped back the general manager of the C. & Q.

"Well, she's in a funny place—if she's there. The crowd down our way that you routed out at sunup has been out hunting—and they cal'late she's there. They ain't going to disturb the remains, as you might say, till you get there."

"It sounds like being called to a coroner's inquest," Mr. Boomer said to the agitated widow, "but don't worry. I'll be back."

He rode out of the yard with pipe smoke streaming behind in a fair imitation of Bomazeen's best efforts on an upgrade.

"And I'll be right here when he gets back," Mr. Hite informed Mrs. Dawson when the lady walked across the porch on her way to the seclusion of her domicile. He blinked when she banged the door, but he settled himself in the Sheraton chair and was unmistakably determined to stick it out.

A few hours later Mrs. Dawson emerged from her house, hurrying. But it was not on account of any interest in Mr. Hite.

Far away a mellow "coo-coo!" was sounding. She went and stood in the middle of her yard so that no vines or porch pilasters could interfere with her hearing. There was no doubt about it—Bomazeen was coming! It puffed into view round the curve and stopped at the foot of Zion's Hill and indulged in an orgy of that harsh whistle laughter that had beforetime raked the nerves of Mr. Hite. Fully as odious was Mr. Boomer's laughter when he came hustling over the brow of the hill. The general-everything of the Cobbossee and Quebec was not hiding his hilarity or making any secret of his news.

"What do you think?" he panted. "She must have been dancing all so free and gay when she went down that Watch Hill grade. Jumped the switch of the old spur, run the length of that track and dove head first into the wall of the pit where they used to get out ballast gravel. That's all!"

"But how ——" gasped the Widow Dawson.

"Just a minute!" He stood in front of her and got his breath. "Being pretty much of a stranger in these parts, I don't know when the scenery has been shifted, you understand. I'd never have located her in a dog's age. The side of that gravel pit had been washed out and when she butted into the hole a big flap of turf with grass and bushes dropped behind her. I had looked into that gravel pit four times. It needed a native to know that the landscape had been transmogrified. Plenty of shovels, willing hands, a tackle and falls and all the oxen in the neighborhood—and there she is without a dent, chipper and gay and pleasant to be thrown amongst. The afternoon mail will go on schedule time."

He stepped back from Mrs. Dawson and put his hands on his hips. He did not lower his voice—in fact he made sure that Mr. Hite was listening.

"And tending on that mail makes me skimped on time for talking. But, my dear lady, I've got an eye for things—how they stand. The first time we met we got along splendid by not wasting words. Will you kindly look at me?"

She did look—timorously.

"It worked fine once! I'm going to try it again! Will you marry me?"

Mr. Hite leaped over the rail of the porch and started toward them, cracking his fists together.

"Pay no attention to him!" adjured Mr. Boomer.

"But I must."

Her demeanor and tone expressed much fright and anguish. The wooer perceived that this affair was not the simple matter he had hoped it would be.

"Have you promised to marry him?"

"You renegade imitation of old Mount Pisgy, of course she has!" clamored Mr. Hite, walking round the "mountain" at a safe distance.

"Hite, I wouldn't take your word on whether this is to-day or next Sunday! Mrs. Dawson, what say?"

"I have given him no promise."

"Then how about marrying me?"

"I cannot—not as things stand," she wailed. Mr. Boomer was taken aback for a moment.

"If she throws me over," declared Mr. Hite, "there'll be a breach-of-promise suit that will put the Norton-Fogg case so far ——"

"Say no more!" bellowed Mr. Boomer. His face cleared. "So that's it! I have heard the full story of that thing, along with the rest of the scandal in this town. Well, I never was intending to mix up private business with the railroad situation so much. I didn't have the notion to rub it in in your case, Hite. I'm no hand to go after revenge. Quiet and smooth, that's my motto, but ——"

Mr. Boomer slapped his hand on his hip pocket. Mr. Hite leaped away. The rival's quick movement signified the menace of gun play.

"But," pursued Mr. Boomer, tugging out the yellow gauntlet gloves, "here's 'Exhibit A,' as the lawyers say—and they all saw me pick 'em up from the floor of the engine cab, and it rests with you whether I'll claim 'em for mine or show the stockholders your name indelibled on the lining. They'll have a merry time with you, Hite, them stockholders will, on a day like this! Now this goes—and you look close at me when I say it—you be in the village attending to your business when I get there or ——" he patted the gloves significantly and stuck them back into his pocket. "I'm racing a steam engine against your hoss, I'll admit, but I've got to foot it down the hill and that ought to be handicap enough for a sporting proposition."

Conscience whipped and conviction goaded Mr. Hite. The conviction assured his natural forebodings that ebullition of feelings in Cobbossee citizens on such a gala day would not stop short of tar and feathers. He went away.

"Well," declared Mr. Boomer with an assurance that the flustered widow did not rebuke, "seeing that he has got the mitten from you, he won't be needing the gloves."

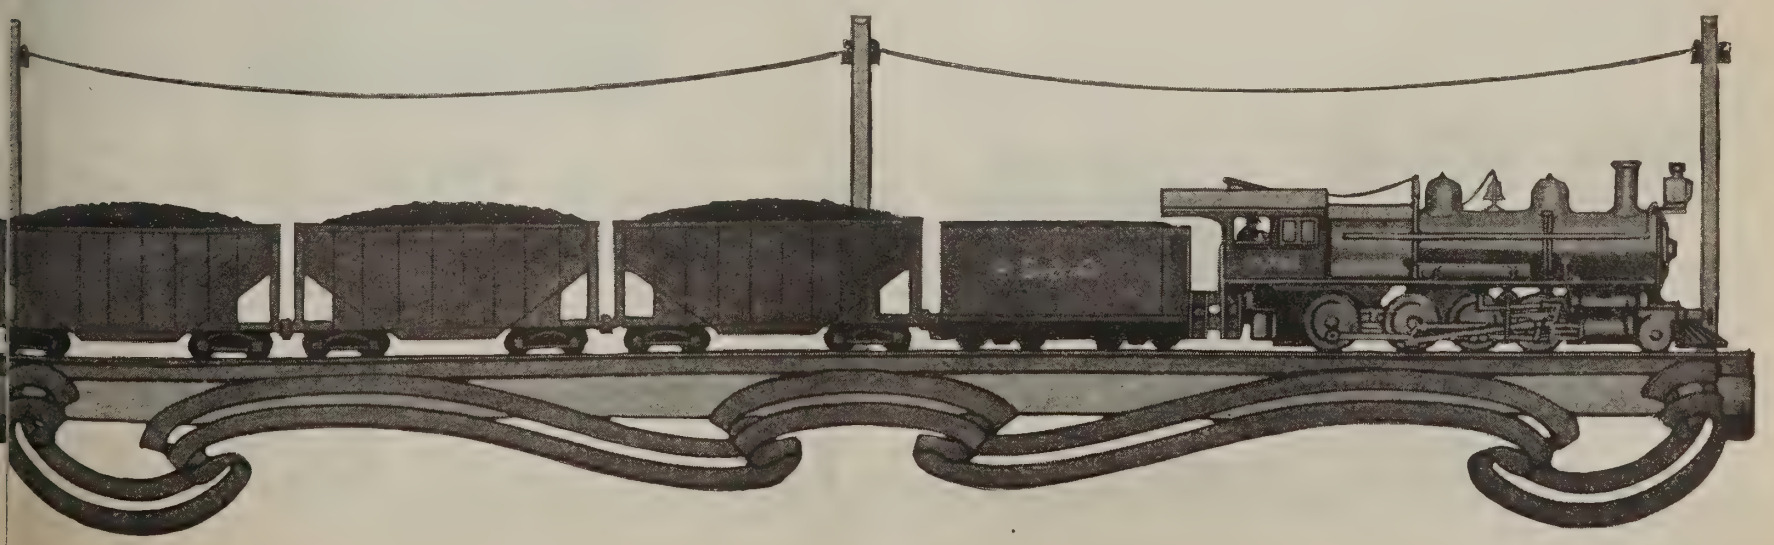
He pulled out his big watch.

"This is like sitting down to eat the biggest and best Christmas dinner that was ever spread before you and then being shot out through the window by a bomb going off under your chair." He drew Mrs. Dawson toward him and gave her a hearty smack. "But I'll grab one morsel at any rate—and keep the rest warm, Nancy! Keep it warm! I'll be back!"

He rushed away with such haste that he left her standing in a posture of utter amazement, her mouth opened to give full right of way to words that would not come.

Mrs. Dawson looked down at her cat, who was solemnly alternating her gaze between the mistress and the broad back that was disappearing over the brow of the hill.

"It was dreadful sudden, Kit!" confessed the mistress. "But if women who have been dozing along and not half knowing their own minds don't relish being swept off their feet at the right time by the right man, then I miss my guess." She expressed her content by a happy sigh. "And you're going to like him—you can't help it."



Built to Outlast the Guarantee

BACK of Victor Tires is more than a mileage guarantee. For 21 years the Victor factory has been content with a moderately increasing output and has held steadfastly to its principles—the use of most skillful handwork, only highest grade rubber and super-quality fabric.

Thus the Victor Sulpene Process was developed and improved year by year. This process endows the purest Ceylon and Para rubber with supreme enduring qualities and fully conserves its native resiliency.

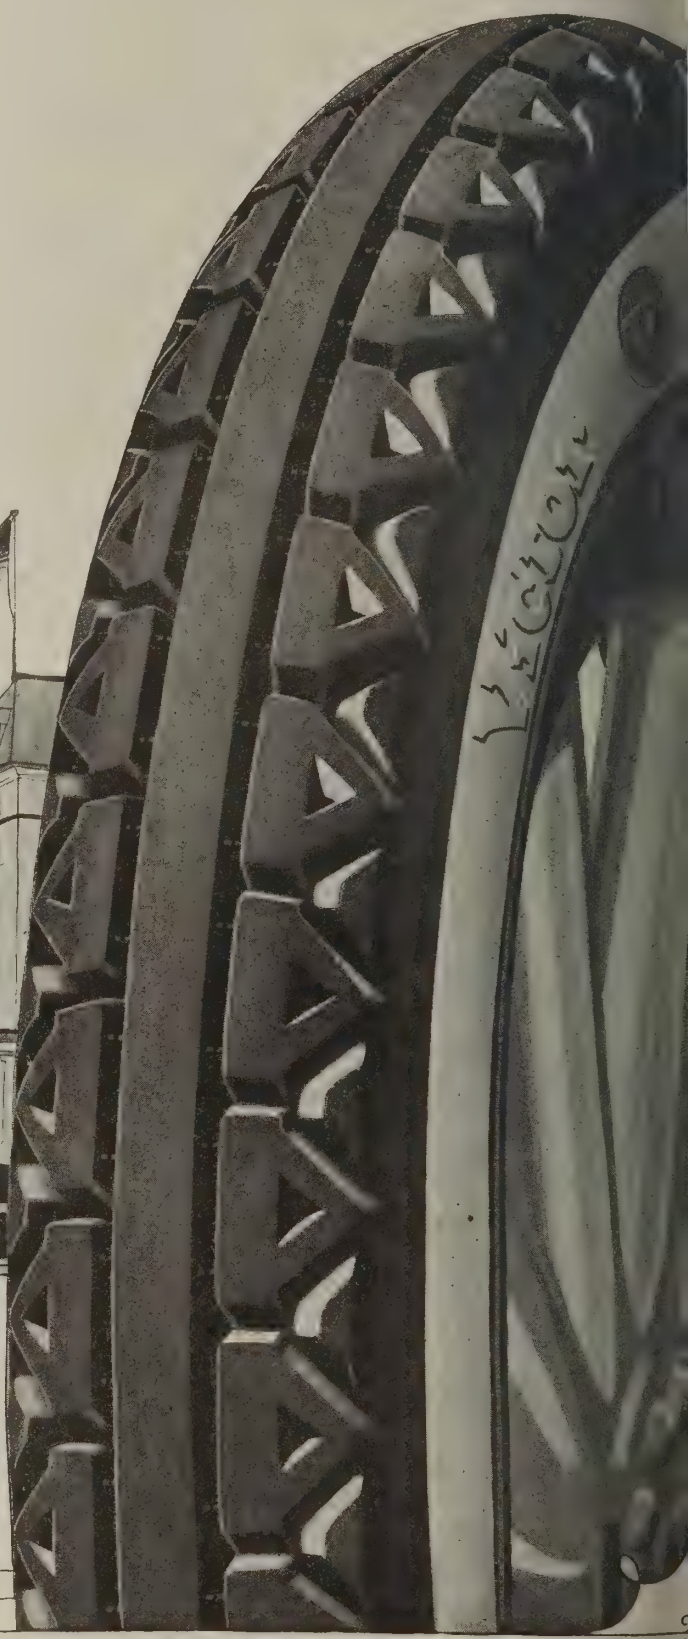
It is this unswerving purpose to build well and better and better, that brings many reports of Mileage Service such as this from L. N. Lang of New Orleans, La. He says: "I have for the past 18 months used VICTOR TIRES exclusively with great success; and up to the present time I have never had occasion to ask for an adjustment, for the reason that each tire has always exceeded the mileage of five thousand miles guarantee."

MILEAGE SATISFACTION alone has steadily built up the list of friends of Victors who have used the entire output year after year.

To these thousands who have solved their tire problem your name will be added if you will go to a Victor Dealer. He is pledged to give Satisfactory Mileage Service.

THE VICTOR RUBBER COMPANY, SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
ESTABLISHED 1898
Factory Branches: Chicago, 1720 S. Michigan Ave.—Kansas City, 1707 Grand Ave.
New York, 1991 Broadway

Victor Dealer contracts have the attraction of steady "repeat" orders from satisfied users. Some very desirable territory is available.



Victor
FABRIC AND CORD TIRES

MILEAGE
HOGS

FORTY YEARS OF A DIPLOMAT'S LIFE

(Continued from Page 17)

ese Government seemed to take a less ntal and more practical view of the ion.

T y seemed to reason approximately in is ay: Russia evidently needs an ice- e ort; she has been all the time on the kit for such a port on the coast of r , where we can never allow her to es- lh herself, as that would mean a per- n menace to our safety; now she has u d an ice-free port far nearer to and ore accessible from her own Siberian s sions, and we may therefore hope u enceforth she will abandon her ag- ave plans in Korea.

ad barely had time to dispatch my t to the admiral, in which I incidentally l his attention, as far as I can now re- ner, to some of the proceedings of our n aval authorities on the Korean coast were far more likely to get us into ule with the Japanese—a prediction i , by the way, was destined to be veri- l the following year—when I received thentic confirmation of the views I ttributed to the Japanese Govern- .

In the course of one of my usual weekly views with the Minister of Foreign as, Baron Nissi spoke with great ith of his earnest desire to bring about mplete and truly friendly understand- ith Russia. He said that hitherto the bone of contention had been Korea, dntly on account of our need of an ice- ort, the acquisition of which seemed ive been the aim of our aggressive li in that country, and that now, since ld acquired such a port in Manchuria, on need no longer be a stumblingblock te road to a friendly understanding and ase of friction between two countries ne interests did not come in conflict yhere else.

Finally he asked me how it would do if included an agreement on some such si as a reciprocal engagement to refrain n any interference with each other's li , Russia's in Manchuria and Japan's Korea.

I replied at once that I entirely agreed th him, and that if what he had said was be considered as a formal proposal I ul thank him to let me have it in writ- g, and I would gladly transmit it by b to St. Petersburg and do the best I u to press its acceptance on my gov- ment.

"Very well," said he, "I will submit the atter to the cabinet this very afternoon, d you shall have our proposal in writing is evening."

Baron Nissi kept his word, and in the ening I received the promised proposal writing, accompanied by a personal letter Russian, of which language the baron d perfect command, having completed s udies at the University of St. Peters- ir. In this letter he expressed the fervent p that the Japanese proposal would be v ably received by our government, and s onviction that its acceptance would nate all possible causes of friction teen Russia and Japan. The official posal was in the shape of a brief note rtle, in which the Japanese Government ered its willingness to consider Man- a with its littoral as being entirely out- le the sphere of Japanese interests, olded the Russian Government was eared to make the same declaration in g d to Korea.

The originals of both these documents—note verbale, as well as Baron Nissi's rnal letter to me—were, of course, duly rarded to the Ministry of Foreign ffairs at St. Petersburg. At the same time ansmitted to Count Mouravieff by h the full text of the Japanese proposal, a ly advocating its immediate and un- s ved acceptance as the best means of f uarding our interests in the Far East. h reply suffered the usual rather pro- ed delay, which, however, in this case a plainly justified by the importance of decision to be taken, which implied the essity of decidedly and definitely break- g with our vacillating and, after all, really ness policy in regard to Korea, in which e ad been muddling along with no other s t than that we had succeeded in strain- g our relations with Japan almost to the r king point.

But when the reply finally came, in the shape of a cipher telegram from Count Mouravieff, its purport proved bitterly disappointing to me no less than to Baron Nissi. Its exact wording I cannot now remember, but its precise meaning was that the Russian Government took note with great satisfaction of the Japanese Government's declaration that it considered Manchuria with its littoral as being entirely outside the sphere of Japanese interests, but that it could not make a similar declaration in regard to Korea. I must say again that I greatly regret not to be able to reproduce here the complete and exact text of all these documents, copies of which I have no longer in my possession, and I can only ask the indulgent reader to take my word for it that all I have related here about this unfortunately resultless negotiation is substantially true. When I read to Baron Nissi the text of Count Mouravieff's reply he merely smiled sarcastically and said regretfully that it was plain that nothing further could be said or done about it, and the matter was allowed to drop.

The idea of such an understanding was, however, not quite abandoned by the Japanese Government. It was taken up two years later by some Japanese statesmen under circumstances to which I shall have to refer later, and finally by myself on the very eve of our rupture with Japan, as a last forlorn hope of preventing the outbreak of a war which I felt sure would end in disaster to us.

In the meantime it was felt by both governments that something had to be done in order to allay the growing excitement of popular opinion in Japan in regard to Korean affairs, and I was empowered to begin negotiations with the Japanese Government on the subject, which resulted, in April, 1898, in the conclusion of a rather lame and pointless convention, in historical textbooks known as the Rosen-Nissi or Nissi-Rosen convention. It stated in substance that both countries recognized the sovereignty and entire independence of Korea, and pledged themselves not to interfere in her internal affairs, Russia agreeing not to interfere with the development of the commercial and industrial relations between Japan and Korea, and both countries agreeing not to send advisers to Korea without the consent of the other party to the convention.

As regards this agreement, I have just come across an interesting statement in Count Hayashi's—at the time Minister to Russia—secret memoirs, that he had telegraphed to Tokio, "suggesting that a clause might be inserted in the proposed agreement to the effect that Russia and Japan should mutually agree to take over the military and financial adviserships respectively." He seems to have apprehended that it would have been difficult to obtain from Russia the withdrawal of her military mission, whereas, in his opinion, it would have been much easier to insist on the withdrawal of our financial adviser and the substitution for him of a financial representative of Japan.

Such as it was, however, the convention served its purpose of allaying popular feeling for a while, but, as the reader will see a little further on, not for a long while. In our government circles a more optimistic view of the situation seemed to prevail. At any rate, early in the summer they thought it proper to instruct the Grand Duke Cyril—first cousin of the emperor, and next in order of succession to the throne after the emperor's brother and the yet unborn Czarevitch—who was serving as sublieutenant on one of our Pacific squadron's vessels, to proceed to Tokio on an official visit to the Japanese court. When I learned of it, as far as I can remember, not directly from the Foreign Department but from the admiral in command of the squadron, the negotiations with the Japanese court having evidently been conducted through the medium of the Japanese Minister at St. Petersburg, I suggested by telegraph to Count Mouravieff that the grand duke's visit had better be postponed for some months, considering that the state of popular feeling in Japan was still such that the Japanese Government, though naturally reluctant to decline the intended visit, might feel embarrassed to undertake the

On All Roads—
In All Weather—Giant Grips Keep Trucks Going

TRUCK-POWER is helpless without traction. Giant Grip Equipment provides reliable traction for every road emergency. It keeps trucks operating on schedule through mud, sand, gravel and snow. The time saved at one stretch of "bad going" more than pays for its cost.

Two minutes and his own two hands are all a driver needs to apply Giant Grip chains—no tools, no jacking up the wheels. Clamps remain on wheels permanently and outlast the truck. Chains and hooks are carried in the tool box when not in use.

A Size for Every Truck

There is a size for every truck and make of wheel, to fit both solid and pneumatic tires. Clamps are drop-forged and rust-proofed; chains are fire-welded and heat-treated.

Whether you operate one truck or a fleet you will find Giant Grip Traction Equipment essential to 100 per cent efficiency. It means better service to customers and a big saving in time and labor. Send for our booklet, "Truck-Time Insurance."

DEALERS: With Giant Grip Traction Equipment you have fewer models to handle than in any other line. One style fits over 400 makes of truck. Write to us at once for full particulars of our dealer proposition, Dept. 26.

CHALLONER COMPANY
Established 1863 Oshkosh, Wisconsin

Giant Grip Traction Equipment for Motor Trucks

FOR THE MAN F WHO CARES
The Florsheim SHOE

THE Florsheim Straight Last is a conservative style that never changes—a superior quality shoe that combines dignified appearance with absolute comfort. One of the many Florsheim styles.

Consider the wear, not the price per pair.

Look for the quality mark "Florsheim."

The Florsheim Shoe Company
CHICAGO, U. S. A.

Write for booklet "Styles of the Times"

The Reliance—

High School Course in Two Years

Lack of High School training bars you from a successful business career. This simplified and complete High School Course—specially prepared for home study by leading professors—meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions.

30 Other Courses No matter what your business inclinations may be, you can't hope to succeed without specialized training. Let us give you the practical training you need. Satisfaction guaranteed. Check and mail Coupon for Free Bulletin.

AMERICAN SCHOOL of Correspondence
Dept. H 877 Chicago

TRAINING THE KEY TO SUCCESS

Please send me booklet and tell me how I can fit myself for the position marked X. ASC

____High School Course	____Shop Superintendent
____Electrical Engineer	____Lawyer
____Telephone Engineer	____Business Manager
____Architect	____Auditor
____Draftsman	____Certified Public Acc'nt
____Building Contractor	____Stenographer
____Structural Engineer	____Bookkeeper
____Mechanical Engineer	____Fire Ins. Adjuster
____Civil Engineer	____Sanitary Engineer
____Steam Engineer	____Automobile Engineer

Name_____

Address_____

AGENTS AND SALESMEN
If you are earning less than $50.00 a week try selling our new Accident and Sickness Policies for $10.00 yearly. Pay $5000.00 death and $25.00 weekly for accidental injury or sickness. $100,000.00 deposited with the State for policy-holders' protection. Splendid proposition for full or part time workers. Openings for number of good General Agents. Write for free particulars.
North American Accident Insurance Company, 196 Market St., Newark, N.J.

BOHN Refrigerators
55 Different Styles and Sizes
ST. PAUL, MINN.

I WANT TO GO HOME!
Send me, with your name and address, to The Curtis Publishing Company, 459 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and I will tell you how by acting as a Curtis subscription representative you can make your spare time bring you $25.00 EXTRA EVERY WEEK.

responsibility for the grand duke's safety, remembering the attempt on the life of the Emperor Nicholas when as Czarevitch he visited Japan, an attempt which in spite of all the precautions taken to insure his safety could not be prevented.

No attention, however, was paid to my suggestion, and a couple of weeks later the cruiser Russia with the grand duke on board arrived at Yokohama. His standard was hoisted at noon and greeted with thundering salute from all the men-of-war, and from the fort at Kanagawa.

Prince Arisugawa, the head of the princely house which stands next to the throne in the line of succession, had been appointed to welcome the grand duke and to do the honors of the country to him during his stay. The prince awaited the grand duke's arrival in the admiralty building at Yokohama, where he was to land. A guard of honor was drawn up in the grounds of the admiralty, and school children lined up the short drive to the railroad station where a special train was in waiting to carry the royal party to the capital. The small palace by the seashore, kept in reserve for the accommodation of royal and other distinguished visitors to the court, was prepared for the grand duke's reception, and Prince Arisugawa having seen him to his apartments withdrew for a while and returned to take him to the Imperial Palace, where he was received by Their Majesties, the emperor and empress.

The royal party drove to the palace in a state carriage surrounded by an escort of cavalry through a part of the town distant from the populous quarters, and the crowds of sightseers were not large but their attitude was not unfriendly as far as I could judge. However, precautions on a vast scale had visibly been taken in order to insure as far as possible the royal guest's safety, and I dare say the responsible authorities' anxiety on that account was greatly relieved when after four or five days' sojourn unmarred by any untoward incident the grand duke took his departure and rejoined his ship at Yokohama.

During His Imperial Highness' stay in Tokio the usual round of official functions took place—a state banquet at the palace; dinners at the palaces of some of the princes and at the legation; and so on. The young grand duke—I think he was in his twenty-first year—tall and slender, very handsome, a model of supreme distinction in his manners and bearing, produced everywhere the best impression. Even my diplomatic colleagues, who had to come down from their various summer residences on the mountains into the sweltering heat of Tokio, and to put on their naphthalene-perfumed uniforms in order to present their respects to His Imperial Highness, were unanimous in singing his praises. On the day of his arrival, before we went to the palace to have his audience with His Majesty, I had a long conversation with him for the purpose of acquainting him fully with the political situation, its significant gravity and the great importance for us of the maintenance of the friendliest possible relations with Japan. The grand duke listened to me with the greatest attention and interest, took in the situation at once and conformed his behavior to it with unerring tact and winning graciousness. In short, the grand duke's visit, to which I had been looking forward with some apprehension, turned out to be a complete and socially very marked success. So much so that on taking leave of him Prince Arisugawa made him promise that on the next visit of his ship to Yokohama he would come to spend some days with him and the princess quite privately at their palace at Tokio, a pointedly intimate kind of hospitality such as had never yet been extended to any royal visitor by any member of the imperial family.

On the part of the Japanese court and Government everything was done to emphasize their desire to cultivate the friendliest possible relations with Russia. This much could hardly have been said of our proceedings in Korea subsequent to the conclusion of the so-called Rosen-Nissi convention. Our military and financial advisers were indeed withdrawn from Seoul, and even this was done in a way which Count Hayashi in his secret memoirs characterizes as "clumsy," attributing, however, this clumsiness mainly to the behavior of our diplomatic representative at Seoul.

It appears—so the story goes as told by Count Hayashi, whose truthfulness can hardly be doubted—that this young diplomat, who, as I believe I have mentioned already, belonged to the forward school of diplomacy, had become exceedingly insistent in some demand he was pressing upon the Korean Government and had threatened, in case of any further reluctance to comply with his demand, to withdraw both the military and financial advisers. Whereupon the Korean Ministry, experts in the game of playing on the rivalries between Russian and Japanese diplomacies—the same game as their Balkan prototypes were in the habit of practicing in regard to Russia and Austria-Hungary—naturally applied to the Japanese representative for advice in the embarrassing plight in which they found themselves. The latter slyly asked them whether they were really very anxious to retain the services of these Russian advisers, and, upon their fervid protestations that such was by no means the case, advised them quietly to refuse compliance and let the Russian representative fulfill his threat.

Judging from the account of this transaction as given by Count Hayashi we lost in the eyes of the Japanese what little credit would have been due to us in case of a prompt and graceful compliance with the spirit of the recently concluded convention. On the other hand there was no cessation of the activities of our naval authorities on the coasts of Korea, which were the cause of constantly growing irritation until matters were finally brought to a crisis which came very near causing at least a rupture of diplomatic relations and resulted in my sudden recall and appointment to an insignificant post in Europe.

XVIII

IT SO happened, sometime in the late autumn of the year 1899, as far as I can remember, that a young naval officer belonging to one of our men-of-war, and, I believe, even to the flagship of Admiral Hildebrand—who became known in the Far East as Admiral Firebrand—had gone on shore at Fusan and got into some trouble in a tea house in the Japanese concession. The police having been called in by the proprietress of the establishment, he, being in civilian clothes and apparently unable to speak Japanese, was arrested and taken to the Japanese police station. After some detention, when his character as naval officer was duly established, he was taken back to his ship with some kind of apologies. These were the bare facts as I learned later.

In the meantime I was surprised by the receipt of a cipher telegram from Count Mouravieff, in which he in very peremptory terms ordered me to demand immediate reparation for the outrage committed on a Russian naval officer who had been arrested at Fusan by the Japanese police, and to insist on the immediate punishment of the guilty officials—or words to that effect. I went immediately to see the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Viscount Aoki, who had replaced Baron Nissi when the Ito ministry resigned and Viscount Katsura came in as Prime Minister. He was a level-headed, experienced diplomat of moderate views, and well disposed toward Russia.

He showed great concern when I read to him the text of Count Mouravieff's telegram, whose peremptory tone visibly shocked him. He said that my communication was the first he had ever had about this affair, that he would immediately order the necessary investigation to be proceeded with, but that until a report on the results of such investigation had reached him he could not enter into any engagements as to reparation and punishment of the guilty parties, if anybody's guilt could really be established in a case which might have been a mere misunderstanding. I reported at once by telegraph to Count Mouravieff the substance of Viscount Aoki's reply.

The next morning I received from Admiral Hildebrand a long telegram, half in the extremely simple cipher of the Navy Department, which anybody could easily decipher, half in plain Russian and couched in very violent and objectionable terms, which could not but be most offensive to the Japanese Government. I had this telegram, as addressed to me by the admiral, put into the Foreign Department's cipher, and had it forwarded to Count Mouravieff along with another telegram in which I called his attention to the desirability of our naval authorities' observing due reserve and discretion in their activities on the Korean coast.

A day later I received a telegram from Count Mouravieff in which he informed me that the emperor had been graciously pleased to appoint me his Minister to Munich, and that I was to request t usual agreement to the appointment of M Iswolsky, hitherto Minister at Munich, my successor. This unsolicited appoin ment to a post of very much less politic importance, without an opportunity havi been given me to decline, was, of cours meant in a punitive sense as a reproof f my supposed want of energy; and I cou easily guess the source from which it mu have originated. My personal discomfitur however, was capable of being interpret in quite another sense, and that is wh actually appeared to have been the case.

Having immediately replied to Cou Mouravieff expressing my gratitude for t appointment I had been honored with a announcing my impending departure f Europe by next week's steamer I addresse a brief note to the Minister of Foreig Affairs, Viscount Aoki, informing him my transfer to another post and reques ing the Japanese Government's agreeme to the appointment of my successor. T same evening I received from him a priva and very cordial letter of regret, evident written under the impression that my su den transfer, though coupled with the a pointment of a successor and therefore n having the character of a demonstrati withdrawal of a diplomatic representati of ministerial rank, might mean somethi more than a mere change of persons at t head of our legation.

The following day the news of what w supposed to be my recall leaked out financial circles, where it was probably i terpreted as an ominous symptom strained relations between the two gover ments, and caused a mild panic on t stock exchange. The result of it all w that a few days later Viscount Aoki i formed me that the Japanese Minister St. Petersburg had had a satisfactory i terview with Count Mouravieff on the su ject of the Fusan incident, and that it h been agreed to let the matter drop. In t meantime I had received a telegram fro the Minister of Foreign Affairs informi me that my successor would reach Tokio about six months and ordering me to awa there his arrival.

Later on, when I had arrived at S Petersburg, I learned at the Foreign Offi that the communication of the text of A miral Hildebrand's telegram to me ha opened their eyes as to the real cause of a the trouble and convinced them of t groundlessness of the naval authoritie complaints in regard to my failure to ha supported their claims with sufficient vigo and that this communication had been r ceived after the telegram announcing m transfer to Munich had already been di patched. This time the danger of a ruptu with Japan had luckily blown over, mainl I suppose, because the Japanese Gover ment were not yet sufficiently prepared f it as they were five years later.

I would not have dilated at such lengt on an apparently rather unimportant inc dent were it not that it illustrates the e treme delicacy of the situation which shoul have enjoined on us the necessity of ha dling our relations with Japan with t greatest care and circumspection, and not suffering our agents or other subord nate authorities to endanger these relatio by high-handed disregard of Japanese su ceptibilities.

We have seen how much discouragemer the Japanese Government had experience at our hands in their endeavors to come a friendly understanding with Russia. W have seen how, in spite of the deep woun inflicted on their national pride by our ha ing deprived Japan of the chief fruit of h victory over China, merely to end by appr priating it to ourselves, they did not hes tate a moment to approach us with formal offer of such an understanding. An we shall see later on how, in spite of i having been disdainfully declined by u the idea of the possibility of such an unde standing was never entirely abandoned b some of their leading statesmen up to t very last moment before the final ruptur It stands to reason, of course, that any pa ticular sympathy for Russia had nothin whatever to do with an attitude the e planation of which has to be looked for i the general situation created by the even of the recent past and in the chief ai which Japanese policy was steadily keepin in view.

This aim was the establishment of protectorate over, and ultimately th conquest and annexation of Korea. Bu leaving aside vanquished and helple hin, the realization of this aim was ur to encounter opposition from both ssi and Great Britain, and therefore uldnot be approached without a previous ienly understanding with either the one t: other of these two Powers. An dstanding with Russia must have ap-arl preferable, because even if a foot-d n the continent could be obtained it ul have remained a precarious one in ice of a hostile Russia, whose appar-thenormous potential power had not len put to the test. But then, an at-y at bringing about such an under-an ng had just failed, and the possible ces of a renewed one would have ap-arl doubtful in view of the aggressive lic in Korea which Russia seemed to be wing to abandon.

(Continued on Page 149)

(Continued from Page 146)

T other alternative—an understand-ith Great Britain—was favored by m of the statesmen of the younger nection, and was energetically and per-tedly advocated by Count Hayashi, o ad been transferred from the post of etersburg to that of London. The eson only was whether in order to us Great Britain to renounce her policy fsoring the independence of Korea for e ske of an understanding or an alliance thJapan the latter had to offer any in-cement that could begin to compare in ptance with the advantages Russia ul have been able and could have af-rd to grant as price of an alliance with re Britain which would have reduced pe to impotence in the Far East.

Dbts and even apprehensions in this gal seem to have suggested themselves Count Hayashi himself. They do as c honor to his sagacity and grasp of the litical situation as their groundlessness ties to the absence of these same quali-s i the functionaries who in succession oat the head of our Ministry of Foreign fas. They were, besides, the more tied as, since the outbreak of the Boer ar-when Great Britain found herself lad, confronted by a world of blind stity—it would have been of infinitely ear advantage to her to break the alax of her Continental enemies by an dstanding or an alliance with Russia arto seek the at best shadowy benefits aalliance with Japan; just as it would vceen the part of wisdom for Russia to zchis opportunity for seeking to termi-tonce for all her age-long rivalry with re Britain by a definite friendly under-ning, and for trying by this means to reall the formation of a political combi-tin than which none could have been rundesirable from the point of view of r terests in the Far East.

Nthing daunted by such doubts or ap-elnsions Count Hayashi held on to his eand was at last authorized to begin gdiations with the British Government ne conclusion of a formal treaty of iace. His overtures, tentatively pre-ntd at first as merely personal views re-rng the possible future development of ng-Japanese relations, met at once with reonsive reception at the hands of Lord nlowne, a proof of the astuteness and ainsight with which he had gauged the lical situation in Europe. After some-a prolonged negotiations, during which ist even a participation of Germany te future combination seems to have eifor a while contemplated and soon en-e eliminated, Count Hayashi signed, in vmber, 1901, the treaty of alliance with re Britain which was published in Feb-ar, 1902, and has ever since remained e ivot of Japan's foreign policy.

Tis result was, however, not reached thut a fruitless attempt having been at the same time to bring about an dstanding with Russia, the Marquis o aving been sent to this end, with a nential mission to St. Petersburg. vit could have come about that such a eshould have been taken at the very oent when the conclusion of the treaty aiance with Great Britain was already nrly accomplished fact is a question rounded with considerable obscurity. rtainly disclosed the existence of di-l counsels within the inner circle of the pnese Government, and laid that gov-nent open to the reproach of at least tapted double-dealing. However, the le of the Marquis Ito's mission un-utedly extricated the Japanese Govern-e from a situation which its success ld have rendered exceedingly awkward. he same time it exonerated our Min-eof Foreign Affairs, who was then Count Lamsdorff, from the blame that would have justly attached to him for having again, like his predecessor, Count Mouravieff, rejected the offer of an understanding on the perfectly acceptable basis of a free hand for Russia in Manchuria and a free hand for Japan in Korea.

I hope it will be distinctly understood that in discoursing at such length on the motives and considerations that might have guided the policy of the Japanese Government I lay no claim to having been at the time in the possession of any exclusive knowledge as to the intentions of that government, nor, much less, as to those of the British Government, in regard to the negotiations that were then on foot. To begin with, the deliberations of the Japanese Government, as well as these negotiations, were naturally carried on under the veil of profound secrecy, and they related, moreover, mainly to a time between my departure from Japan in July, 1900, and my return in April, 1903, on my reappointment as Minister at Tokio—that is to say, to a time when, occupying such posts as Munich and Athens, I was far removed from the sphere of Far Eastern interests and had no sufficient means and opportunities of keeping myself thoroughly posted as to the course of events and political conditions in that part of the world. All I knew and was entirely convinced of was that by our obstinacy in clinging to our aimlessly vacillating but substantially aggressive policy in Korea, and in disdainfully declining every offer of a friendly understanding, we were deliberately pushing Japan into the arms of Great Britain and in this way actively coöperating in the realization of a political combination obviously opposed to Russian interests; in other words, that we were with simple-minded purblindness playing the game of our future adversary, a policy—if it could be dignified by that name—to the dangers and unavoidable consequences of which I had not failed to call attention in the above-mentioned memorandum presented to Count Mouravieff in March, 1897, before my departure for Japan. All those who are more deeply interested in the genesis of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and the negotiations which led up to its consummation I can best refer to the English translation of the Secret Memoirs of Count Tadasu Hayashi, edited by A. M. Pooley, and published in 1915, where they will find much more detailed information than it was possible for me to reproduce from the same source on the preceding pages.

It might not come amiss at this point, in connection with the brilliant success achieved by Japanese diplomacy in having effected an alliance with Great Britain in spite of that Power's traditional policy of avoidance of similar entanglements, to attempt to analyze the conditions that have made it possible for a nation that barely half a century ago had been not only a totally negligible but even hardly known quantity to rise, in spite of racial equality even now being denied her, to the proud position of one of the five surviving Great Powers who have undertaken to rule the destinies of mankind. It stands to reason that superiority of statesmanship, however real and incontestable, could not alone account for such a phenomenon. Nor could it be attributed to a peculiarly lucky concourse of fortuitous circumstances. Granted the really exceptionally high quality of Japanese statesmanship there must have existed certain particularly favorable conditions which allowed that statesmanship the necessary scope for a full and effective development of its inherent potentialities.

The first of these favorable conditions, I think, was this—that the Japanese people, with their very ancient and highly refined culture, were the last comers to join the community of civilized Western nations. Their advent on the stage of terrestrial world politics was like the arrival of inhabitants of another planet gifted with acute powers of observation, unhampered by hereditary prejudices or preconceived ideas, unmoved by sentiments of traditional rivalry or inveterate hatred born of centuries of strife and struggle for supremacy, with no inherited friendships or enmities to indulge or cultivate; in short, with nothing to obscure the clearness of their vision or to affect the soundness of their judgment.

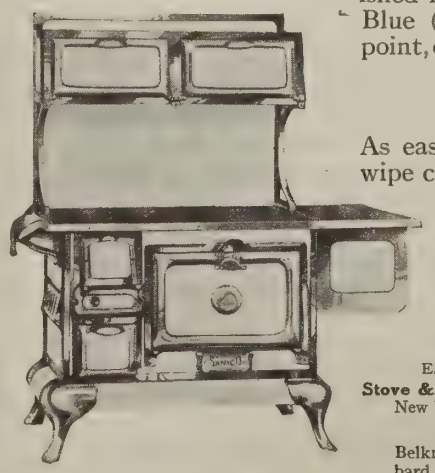
Another and no less important advantage resulted from the constitution of the state and the organization of the government, to which I have already had occasion to refer in one of the preceding chapters of these

Two Ranges in One

The SANICO Combination Range burns gas, coal or wood, two complete ranges in one, two full-size ovens, use either or both at once. The most convenient range, the most satisfactory, the only Rust-Proof range with a

25 YEAR GUARANTEE

Coated inside and out, ovens and flues included, with everlasting, unbreakable SANICO Six-Metal Porcelain fused to rust-resisting Armco Iron. Handsomely trimmed in brilliantly polished heavy nickel. Finished in Azure Blue, Snow White or Dark Blue (stippled). Best from every standpoint, convenience, durability, economy, etc.



SANICO Porcelain Ranges are also made with detachable reservoir or water coils, to burn coal or wood, in the same quality and colors as the SANICO Combination Range.

A Beauty

As easy to clean as a china dish—simply wipe clean with a damp cloth and it shines like new. The finish never loses its lustre.

Write for catalog and a sample of this wonderful Porcelain. Please give your dealer's name. If his stock has not yet arrived, we will see that you are supplied.

EASTERN AGENTS
Stove & Repair Corporation
New York and Newark

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS
Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
San Francisco and Los Angeles

DISTRIBUTORS

Belknap Hdwe. & Mfg. Co. Inc., Louisville, Ky.; Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co., Chicago, Ill.; J. A. Williams & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.; The Hartman-Spreng Co., Mansfield, Ohio; Strevell-Paterson Hdwe. Co., Salt Lake City, Utah; Huey & Philp Hdwe. Co., Dallas, Texas; The Tritch Hardware Co., Denver, Colorado; Seattle Hardware Co., Seattle, Washington.

AMERICAN RANGE & FOUNDRY COMPANY
509 Marquette Avenue, Minneapolis — 1319 S. Michigan Avenue, Chicago

Manning Speed-grits

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

ABRASIVES
ON PAPER AND CLOTH

for smoothing wood, paint, composition, leather & metals

Jim Crowe Boosts his Batting Average

BASEBALL fans of twenty years ago knew Jim Crowe. Jim was a diamond character. When he stepped up to the plate, the outfielders stepped back to the fences. Then when the ball came down in his groove—Zowie! what a clout!! Yes, Jim could hit.

And what a crank he was on bats. He'd spend hours hefting and testing, looking for a new stick. "Half the trick in lining 'em out is getting hold of the right bat," he'd say.

Jim is still in the game, but he's playing in the Industrial World Series this time. Today he's Foreman Crowe of the Chaplin-Fulton Manufacturing Company's plant at Pittsburgh, makers of Vigilant Feed Water Regulators.

Jim is coaching his men in the fine points of putting the finish on the 11-inch Regulator Valve Castings, just as you see him in the picture above. And he's still fussy about his tools.

"What do you know about my new bat?" he yelled above the roar of the factory. "They call it Speed-grits and it sure is a bird!"

"Used to take us five minutes to bunt out a finished casting on the lathe. Bush league stuff!" he went on.

"With Speed-grits Metalite Discs, our new bat, it's all clean-up hits for ours!" He pointed to the big 48-inch abrasive discs spinning at 800 R. P. M. and grinding down several castings at once to a smooth finish with amazing speed.

"We're leading the league now," concluded Jim with that winning grin of his. "With Speed-grits we're batting out a finished casting every thirty seconds; some boost for the team's average, I'll say."

Whether it's abrasives or baseball bats—good workmen know the difference.

Send for "The Difference Book" just off the press

MANNING ABRASIVE COMPANY, INC.
FACTORY AND LABORATORY, TROY, N. Y.

Sales offices in Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco and other leading cities. Look for Manning Abrasive Co. in your Telephone Directory.

reminiscences. Above the frequently changing personnel of the ostensible parliamentary government the real and permanent supreme power and the ultimate decision in all matters of serious importance rested with the so-called Genro, or Elder Statesmen; that is to say, with a very small group of exceedingly able statesmen who had been the original creators of modern Japan and the very few eminent personages they would choose themselves to fill vacancies from time to time occurring in the composition of their body. This small but all-powerful and closely united group of statesmen of wide and matured experience was entirely independent and free to shape the policies of the country, quite irrespectively of the changing currents of popular feelings or passions, in accordance solely with the dictates of reason and the permanent interests of the state.

It would be difficult to overrate the importance of the advantage these conditions gave the leading statesmen of Japan in their dealings with statesmen not so fortunately situated. It was these conditions that rendered it possible for Japan to pursue with unvarying consistency a line of policy laid down in strict conformity with aims always practically attainable and carefully adjusted to the real needs and available resources of the country, a policy which in the end has raised her to a proud eminence far beyond the most ambitious dreams of the bold reformers who broke down the barriers of her age-long isolation.

But after this long digression it is time to resume the course of my narrative. The end of the year 1899, which had seen the outbreak of the Boer War, witnessed also the beginning of very serious troubles in China in connection with the so-called Boxer movement, whose ominous growth during the first four months of the new year, 1900, seems to have been treated with some levity until, after the murder of the German minister, a Japanese official and some others, it culminated in the siege and investment of the legation quarter at Peking, which began, if I am not mistaken, on or about the twentieth of June, and lasted until Peking was taken by the allied troops some time about the middle of August. Of the events following upon the Boxer rising, our participation in the Peking campaign, the occupation of Manchuria, and so on, I shall have to treat in one of the following chapters of my narrative in connection with my preparations for my return to Tokio on my reappointment as Minister to Japan nine months before the outbreak of the war.

At about the time when the siege of the legation quarter at Peking began we left the legation at Tokio and moved into the Grand Hotel at Yokohama in expectation of the arrival of my successor, Mr. Iswolsky, who with his family was coming by way of Siberia. Twenty-five years before, on my first landing on the shores of Japan, which impressed me then as something like fairyland, I had taken up my quarters in this hotel until I was asked to move into my chief's bungalow on what they call The Bluff. The hotel had since then been greatly improved and enlarged, and I had always kept a tender spot in my heart for the inn that had first given me shelter in Japan.

Having got rid of the cares of office, and my wife of her social duties at the capital, we both enjoyed our restfully quiet life spending our days reclining on comfortable deck chairs on the broad veranda overlooking the beautiful bay animated by the coming and going of steamers and by the presence of some men-of-war of various nationalities. Many people used to come to take their meals at the hotel, which was reputed to have an excellent chef. One day I noticed in the dining room having their luncheon a group of Japanese gentlemen, and among them no less a personage than Prince Tokugawa, who had been the last of the shoguns and had voluntarily given up his throne to the mikado. There he was—he who had been surrounded with almost divine worship and had been considered by foreign sovereigns as an equal, as the all-powerful temporal emperor of Japan—the mikado being supposed to have been merely the spiritual emperor—there he was in a gray business suit, his bowler hat left in the cloakroom, eating his curry and rice with evident perfect contentment. Sic transit gloria mundi. It must be remembered, however, that from the very moment that Prince Tokugawa had succeeded, in 1866, to the deceased Shogun Iemochi as fifteenth and last shogun, he had revealed himself as an ardent advoc of progress. He it was who on receipt c memorial from one of the feudatories u ing him to restore the administration to emperor in order that the nation might united, called together the other feu tories and informed them of his resolve adopt the advice of the memorialist, and the following day, October 14, 1867, t dered to the emperor his resignation, wh was formally accepted on the fifteenth December of the same year. This lat date, therefore, should properly be cons ered as marking the birth of new Japan well as the beginning of the reign of Emperor Mutsuhito, who was then in fifteenth year and who was destined to s before he died, in 1912, his country rec nized as one of the Great Powers of world.

Prince Tokugawa's resignation deser certainly to rank among the most mer rable events in the history of the world a voluntary sacrifice of supreme power a ruler in the interests of his nation. So of his adherents, however, continued some time the struggle against the régime. Among them was Admiral E moto, the commander of the late shogu fleet, who is said to have attempted to tablish a republic in the island of Ye whither he had retired with the warsh under his command. Three or four ye later I met the same Admiral Enomoto Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Ple potentiary of the emperor at St. Petersbu He later became Minister of Education Minister of the Navy, and was raised the dignity of viscount and member of House of Peers.

The career of this prominent adher of the defunct régime exemplifies the sp in which the great reform was carried by the new government and was loya accepted by its former opponents. If stops to reflect that this reform mean social upheaval of unequaled magnitu and completeness, the total abolition feudalism, which had been for centuries armature of the social fabric and the sp of which had profoundly affected the m tality of the nation, one cannot help marv ing at the comparatively painless ease w which this great change was achieved. I sense it was a truly democratic revoluti Though the revolt against the shogun was patronized by two of the greatest most powerful feudatories, the princes Satsuma and Choshiu, the feudal ch themselves had very little to do with consummation of the great change wh was conceived and accomplished chiefly their vassals, samurai of inferior gra According to Brinkley's History of Japanese People, the men who conceiv and realized the great revolution "nu bered fifty-five in all, and of those o thirteen were aristocrats—namely, feudal barons and eight court nobles, the average age of these fifty-five did exceed thirty years." It was, then, a sm group of very young men who not only c ceived and achieved the revolution who undertook to build up an entirely n social fabric on new principles, which tailed a breaking loose from deep-roo traditions of a hallowed past.

Their success in the accomplishment the Herculean task so boldly undertak was complete, perhaps even complete yond their own expectations. Moreov their success was obtained without country ever having been brought ev near a state of temporary chaos, which easily might have marked the brusc transition from an old established to an tirely new order of things. Beyond th unswerving conviction of the necessity the assimilation of Western civilization their unshakable faith in the future of th country they had nothing to rely on the circumstance that the human mate they had to deal with was possessed o very ancient and very highly develop culture, and also of an ardent patrioti bred by centuries of seclusion from outer world in a self-sufficient comp nation of absolute racial homogenei These qualities rendered the minds of Japanese people not only open to the co prehension of the superiority of West material civilization but also eager for assimilation as soon as it was realized t such assimilation was needed in order hold their own against foreign natio contact with whom could no longer avoided.

Editor's Note—This is the eighth of a serie articles by Baron Rosen. The next will appea an early issue.

LIFE AMONG US LANDED PROPRIETORS

(Continued from Page 7)

t present, and put some other place or they won't be forever getting in his . Only there doesn't seem to be any equitable place to keep them in unless old a shed especially for that purpose. 't curious that sometimes on a hundred-arm there should be so little spare om I should hate to go to the added ole of building that shed, and so, as I saying just now, if you should happen on anyone who could use those baskets d hat box please don't forget to tell mabout my offer."

To the best of my ability I have here ot the lady verbatim; but if unintenzy I have permitted any erroneous ot ions to creep into her remarks they ll e corrected before these lines reach r ader's eye, because the next time she d Scott come over—they are neighbors ou out here in Westchester—I mean to k r to read copy on them. They drop orus quite frequently and we talk furhigs, and Scott sits by and smokes and ra onally utters low mocking sounds de his breath, for as yet he has not been ri y won over to antiques. There are newhen I fear that Scott, though a most ty person in all other regards, is hopel provincial. Well, I was a trifle proel myself before I took the cure.

Perhaps I should say that sometimes we k rnishings with Mistress Maude, but oroften we talk farming problems, with rtular reference to our own successes d he failures of our friends in the same ne of endeavor. Indeed, farming is the monest topic of conversation in our iry. Because, like us, nearly all our ens in this part of the country were rrly flat dwellers and because, like us, o hem have done a lot of experimenting th line of intensified impractical agrithe since they moved to the country.

The Troubles of a Beekeeper

We seek to profit by one another's mis-e and we do—that is, we profit by r to the extent of gloating over them. he we go and make a few glaring mis-e on our own account, and when the or of it spreads through the neighboro seemingly on the wings of the wind, is heir turn to gloat. We have a regular o Club with an open membership and des. If an amateur tiller of the soil and wife drop in on us on a fine spring evengto announce that yesterday they had ei first mess of green peas, whereas our a ines are still in the blossoming state; in midsummer they come for the exes purpose of informing us that they v been eating roasting ears for a week—e knowing full well that our early corn s suffered a backset—we compliment ei with honeyed words, and outwardly r anner may bespeak a spirit of friendly n atulation, but in our souls all is bitr ss.

After they have left one catches oneself y g to one's helpmeet: "Well, the nes are nice people in a good many sects. Jones would loan you the last n he had on earth if you were in trouble d needed it, and in most regards Mrs. Jones is about as fine a little woman as ou meet in a day's ride. But dog-gone I wish they didn't brag so much!" Then ne of us opportunely recalls that last year e potatoes developed a slow and mysrious wasting disease resembling maligr tetter, which carried off the entire o in its infancy, whereas we harvested clarful of wonderful praties free from blemishes of whatever sort; and warmed v nat delectable recollection we cheer up b. And if our strawberries turn out well r apple trees bear heavily or our cow as win calves, both of the gentler sex, we sno time in going about the countryside pread the tidings, leaving in our wake dened firesides and hearts all abrim with econcentrated essence of envy.

Practically all of our little group specialize We go in for some line that is absoty guaranteed to be profitable until the ense becomes too great for a person of ed means any longer to bear up under. h we drop that and specialize in anr line, also recommended as being gly lucrative, for so long as we can afit; and then we tackle something else again. It is a never-ending round of new experiences, because no matter how disastrously one's most recent experiment has turned out the agricultural weeklies are constantly holding forth the advantages of a field as yet new and untried and morally insured to be one that will yield large and nourishing dividends. It is my sober conviction that the most inspired fiction writers in America—the men with the most buoyant imaginations—are the regular contributors to our standard agricultural journals. And next to them the most gifted romancers are the fellows who sell bulbs and seeds. They are not fabulists exactly, because fables have morals and frequently these persons have none, but they are inspired fancifiers, I'll tell the world.

Each succeeding season finds each family among us embarking upon some new and fascinating venture. For instance, I have one friend who this year went in for bees—Italian bees, I think he said they were, though why he should have been prejudiced against the native-born variety I cannot understand. He used to drop in at our place to borrow a little cooking soda—he was constantly running out of cooking soda at his house owing to using so much of it on his face and hands and his neck for poulticing purposes—and tell us what charming creatures bees were and how much honey he expected to lay by this fall. From what he said we gathered that the half had never been told by Maeterlinck about the engaging personal habits and captivating tribal customs of bees; bees we gathered were, as a race, perhaps a trifle quick-tempered and hot-headed, or if not exactly hot-headed at least hot elsewhere, but ever ready to forgive and forget and, once the heat of passion had passed, to let bygones be bygones. A bee, it seemed from his accounts, was one creature that always stood ready to meet you halfway.

He finally gave up bee culture though, not because his enthusiasm had waned, for it did not, but for professional reasons solely. He is a distinguished actor and when he got the leading rôle in a new play it broke in on his study of the part to be dropping the manuscript every few minutes and grabbing up a tin dish and running out in an endeavor, by the power of music, to induce a flock of swarming bees to rehive themselves, or whatever it is bees are supposed to do when favored with a pie-pan solo. It seemed his bees had a perfect mania for swarming. The least little thing would set them off. There must have been too much artistic temperament about the premises for such emotional and flighty creatures as bees appear to be.

Going in for Chintzes

Then there was another reason: After the play went on he found it interfered with his giving the best that was in him to his art if he had to go on for a performance all bumpy in spots; also he discovered that grease paint had the effect of irritating a sting rather than soothing it. I understand that next year he figures on going in for silkworms, or possibly he contemplates buying a few mated chinch bugs and raising his own chintz curtains on the premises. I won't be certain which it is. The other afternoon he came over and offered to give me his last remaining hive of bees. Indeed, he almost pressed them on me.

I declined though. I told him to unload his little playmates on some stranger; that I valued his friendship and hoped to keep it; the more especially, as I now confessed to him, since I had lately thought that if literature ever petered out I might take up the drama as a congenial mode of livelihood, and in such case would naturally benefit through the good offices of a friend who was already in the business and doing well at it. Not, however, that I felt any doubt regarding my ultimate success. I do not mean by this that I have seriously considered playwriting as a regular profession. Once I did seriously consider it, but nobody else did, and especially the critics didn't. Remembering what happened to the only dramatic offering I ever wrote, I long ago made up my mind that if ever I wrote another play—which, please heaven, I shall not—I would call it Solomon Grundy, whether I had a character of that name in it

NAGEL AMMETER

YOUR battery would be a hidden secret without a good ammeter on the dash to show what the battery is doing.

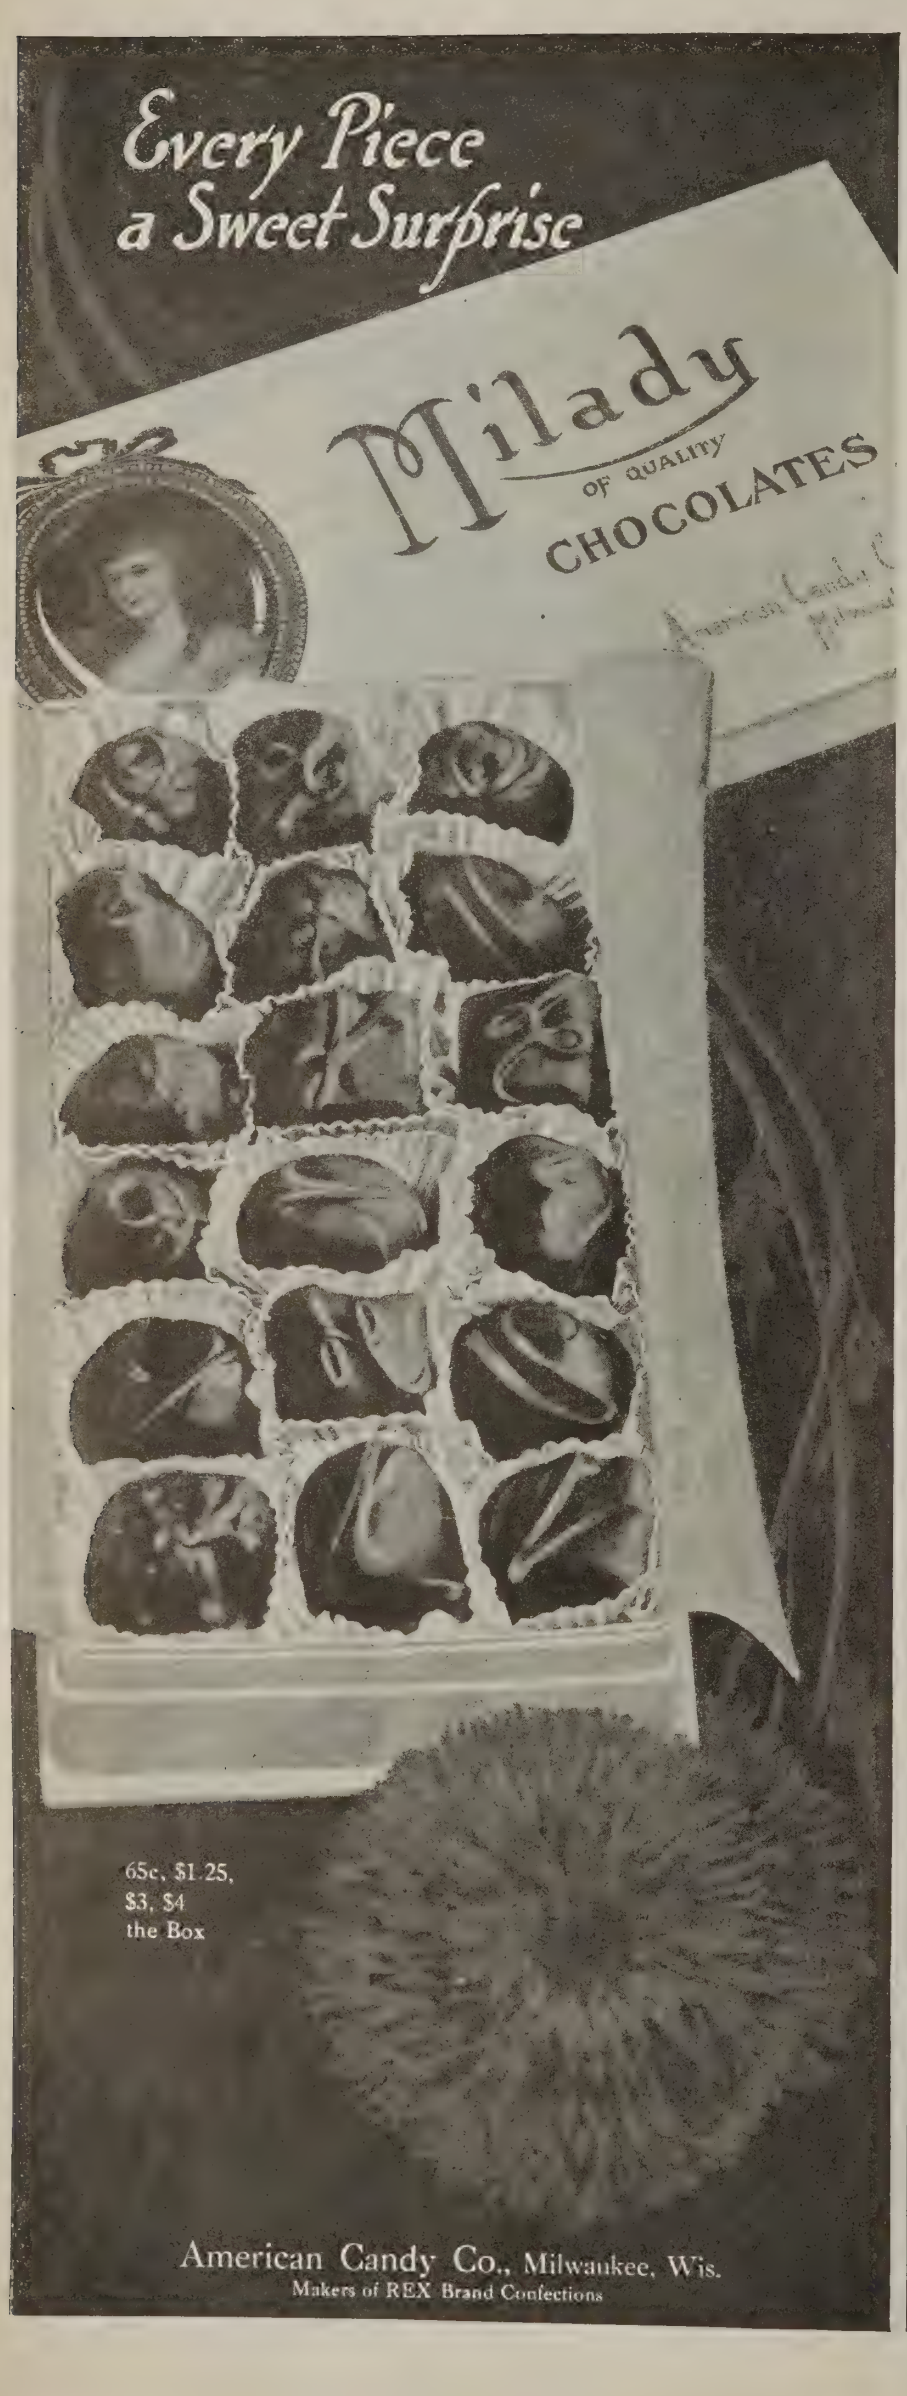
When you push a button for starter, lights, horn or ignition, you are using current which must be replaced. It all must be put back and a Nagel ammeter shows whether the generator is doing it.

What the Nagel arrow tells is important to know—watch it!

In use on over 1,250,000 cars.

The Nagel Ammeter is standard equipment on Allen, Auburn, Briscoe, Chevrolet, Collier, Economy, Empire, Maxwell, Mitchell, Moore, Moline-Knight, Oldsmobile, Oakland, Overland, Pan, Piedmont, Stephens, Scripps-Booth, Willys-Knight passenger cars and Collier and Gramm-Bernstein motor trucks. Also endorsed by use by the makers of the Auto-Lite and Remy Starting and Lighting systems.

THE W.G. NAGEL ELECTRIC CO.
TOLEDO, OHIO.



or not. You may recall what happened to the original Solomon Grundy—how he was born on a Monday, began to fail on Thursday, passed away on Saturday of the same week and was laid to eternal rest on Sunday. So even though I never do another play I have the name picked out and ready and waiting.

No, my next venture into the realm of Thespis, should necessity direct my steps thither, would land me directly upon the histrionic boards. Ever since I began to fill out noticeably I have nourished this ambition secretly. As I look at it, a pleasing plumpness of outline should be no handicap but on the contrary rather a help. My sex of course is against my undertaking to play The Two Orphans, otherwise I should feel no doubt of my ability to play both of them, and if they had a little sister I shouldn't be afraid to take her on too. But I do rather fancy myself in the title rôles of The Corsican Brothers. If I could show some enterprising manager how he might pay out one salary and save another, surely the idea would appeal to him; and some of these days should the editor of this magazine lose that fine discriminating ability to choose what is best in American letters I may give the idea a try. So having this contingency in mind I gently but firmly told my friend to take his bees elsewhere. I told him I had no intention of looking a gift bee in the mouth.

Why Buttercup Changed Her Name

We have another neighbor who has gone in rather extensively for blooded stock with the intention ultimately of producing butter and milk for the city market. During practically all his active life he has been a successful theatrical manager, which naturally qualifies him for the cow business. He is doing very well at it too. So long as he continues to enjoy successful theatrical seasons he feels that he will be able to go on with cows. Being a shrewd and far-seeing business man he has it all figured out that a minimum of three substantial enduring hits every autumn will justify him in maintaining his herd at its present proportions, whereas with four shows on Broadway all playing to capacity he might even increase it to the extent of investing in a few more head of registered thoroughbred stock.

From him I have gleaned much regarding cows. Before, the life of a cow fancier had been to me as a closed book. Generally speaking, cows, so far as my personal knowledge of them went, were divided roughly into regular cows running true to sex, and the other kind of cows, which were invariably referred to with a deep blush by old-fashioned maiden ladies. True enough, we owned cows during the earlier stages of our rural life; in fact we own one now, a mild-eyed creature originally christened Buttercup but called by us Sahara because of her prevalent habits. But gentle bone-dry Sahara is just a plain ordinary cow of undistinguished ancestry. In the preceding generations of her line scandal after scandal must have occurred; were she a bagpipe solo instead of a cow scarcely could she have in her more mixed strains than she has. We acquired her at a bargain in an auction sale; she is a bargain to anyone desiring a cow of settled and steady habits, regular at her meals, always with an unfailing appetite and having a deep far-reaching voice. There is also an expectation that some future day we may also derive from her milk. However, this contingency rests, as one might say, upon the laps of the gods.

The point I am getting at though is that Sahara, whatever else of merit she may possess in the matters of a kind disposition and a willingness to eat whatever is put before her, is after all but a mere common country-bred cow; whereas the cows whose society my wealthy neighbor cultivates are the pedigreed aristocrats of their breed, and for buying and selling purposes are valued accordingly. Why, from the way the proprietors of registered cows brag about their ancient lineage and their blue-blooded forbears you might think they were all from South Carolina or Massachusetts—the cows, I mean, not necessarily the proprietors.

So it is with the man of whom I have been speaking. Having become a breeder of fancy stock he now appraises a cow not for what she can do on her own intrinsic merits but for the size of her family tree, provided she brings with her the documents to prove it. So far as cows are concerned he has become a confirmed ancestor worshiper. I am sure he would rather o a quarter interest in a collateral descer ant of old Prince Bullcon the First of t royal family of the Island of Guernse even though the present bearer of the na were but an indifferent milker and of u settled habits, than to be the sole posses of some untitled but versatile cow givi malted milk and whipped cream. Su vagaries I cannot fathom. In a dem cratic country like this, or at least in country which used to be democratic, seems to me we should value a cow not what her grandparents may have bee not for the names emblazoned on her ge alogical record, but for what she herself

The other Sunday we drove over to place ostensibly to pay a neighborly c but really to plant distress in his firesi circle by incidentally mentioning that o young grapevines were bearing magn icently.

You see, a member of the Gloat Cl is expected to work at his trade Sunda as well as weekdays; and besides we h heard that his arbors, with the coming the autumn, had seemed a bit puny. the opportunity was too good to be l and we went over.

After I had driven the harpoon into soul and watched it sink into him up to t barbs he took me out to see the latest i provements he had made in his cow ba and to call upon the newest addition to herd. These times you can bed a hired ha down almost anywhere but if you go in blooded stock you must surround the with the luxuries to which they have be accustomed, else they are apt to go into decline. He invited my inspection of t porcelain-walled stalls and the patent fee ing devices and the sanitary fixtures whi abounded on every hand, and to his cently installed cream separator. In youth the only cream separator common in vogue was the type of drooping mu tache worn by the average deputy sheri and anyhow, with it, cream separating merely incidental, the real purposes of t mustache being to be ornamental and i pressive and subtly to convey a prop respect for the majesty of the law. Ofte town marshal wore one too. But the mo ern separator is a product of science a not a gift of Nature skillfully elaborated the art of the barber. It costs a heap money and it operates by machinery a no really stylish dairy farm is comple without it.

And She Couldn't Even Sew

When I had viewed these wonders he l me to a glorified pasture lot and present me to the occupant—a smallish cow of prevalent henna tone. Except that she h rather slender legs and a permanent wa between the horns she seemed to my u initiated eyes much the same as any oth cow of the Jersey persuasion. I realize however, that she must be very hig church. My friend, I knew, would harb no nonconformist cows on his place, a besides, she distinctly had the high-chur manner, a thing which is indefinable terms of speech but unmistakably to recognized wherever found. Otherwis though, I could observe nothing about h calculated to excite the casual passer-b But my friend was all enthusiasm.

"Now," he said proudly, "what do y think of that for a perfect specimen?"

"Well," I said, "anybody could tell th she's had a lot of refining influences comi into her life. She's no doubt cultured a ladylike to a degree; and she has t fashionable complexion of the hour a she's all marcelled up and everything, b excepting for these adornments has she a special accomplishments that are calc lated to give her class?"

"Class!" he repeated. "Class, did y say? Say, listen! That cow has all t class there is. She's less than two years o and she cost me a cool fifteen hundr cash—and cheap at the figure, at that."

"Fifteen hundred," I murmured dazedl "What does she give?"

"Why, she gives milk of course," he e plained. "What else would she be giving

"Well," I said, "I should think that that price she should at least give mus lessons. Perhaps she does plain sewing?"

"Say," he demanded, "what do you e pect for fifteen hundred dollars? Fifte hundred is a perfectly ridiculous price pay for a cow with a pedigree such as th cow has. She's registered back I don know how far. It's the regal breeding y

(Continued on Page 157)

(Continued from Page 154)

y f when you get an animal like this—t th animal herself."
Bu I refused to be swept off my feet.
for this I had associated with royalty.
nc met a lineal descendant of William (nquer or; he told me so himself.
nga descendant was apparently the r profession he had, and I judged this v vs in much the same line of business.
'Wll," I replied, "all I can say is that ou in't care if her ancestors came over
.h Mayflower—if she belonged to me
'd ave to show me something in the e o pecial endeavor. She'd have to have enior we'd part company pretty pronto, n t ling you."
"Iis evident you do not understand vthig about blooded stock," he said.
'he randmother of this cow was insured fi en thousand dollars, and her great-uncther, King Bulbul, was worth a tu. The owner was offered fifty usand for him—and refused it."
In y surprise I could only mutter over d cer again the name of William Tell's otr. A great many people do not know t illiam Tell ever had a brother. His t ime was Wat.
Af r that my friend gave me up as one pe sly sunken in ignorance, and by a tul yet unspoken consent we turned the nje to the actors' strike, which was en a full blast. But at intervals ever ce have been thinking of what he told o my way of thinking there is somengwrong with the economic system of ou try which saddles an income tax on unarried man with an income of more n two thousand dollars a year and if he rried sinks the ax into all he makes v three thousand, leaving him the in-ssdeduction on the extra one thousand, ou ting, I believe, to about twelve dols nd a half, for the support of his wife,
th theory that under the present scale liv ng any reasonably prudent man can tsily maintain a wife on twelve fifty a ar. I repeat, there is something radically on with a government which does this th wage earner and yet passes right on a ow that carries fifteen thousand in e isurance and a bull worth fifty thou-da his own right. It amounts to class vige, I maintain. It's almost enough mke a man vote the Republican ticket, d may yet do it, too, sometime when erearen't any Democrats running, just sh w how I feel about it.
Y others of our acquaintances in the na ur-farming group have taken up fruit owig or pigeons or even Belgian hares.
Blgn hares have been highly recomen ed to us as being very prolific. You arin with one pair of domestic-minded lgn hares and presently countless thou-nc of little Belgian heirs and heiresses are adening the landscape. From what I n ear the average Belgian hare has al-os as many aunts and uncles and cousins a microbe has. They pay well too. You n ell a Belgian hare to almost anybody no as never tried to eat one. But as we v only about sixty acres and part of that woodland, we have felt that there was arely room enough for us to go in for elan hares without sacrificing space nin we may require for ourselves.

The Cussedness of Hogs

Mainly our experiments have been conne to hogs and poultry. I will not claim a we have been entirely successful in es directions. The trouble seems to be a our pigs are so tremendously opposed ice suicide and that our hens are so my committed to it. Now offhand you igt think an adult animal of the swine my that completely gave herself over to ne lea of multiplying and replenishing the ar with her species would be an asset to ny arm, but in my own experience I have ou l that such is not always the case. Into ne world a brood of little pinky-white qualers are ushered. They grow apace, de-ou ing with avidity the most expensive rads of pig food that the grocer has in oc; and then, just when your mind is le with delectable visions of hams in the n tehouse and flitches of bacon in the ell and tierces of lard in the cold-storage po and spare ribs and cracklings and or made sausage and pork tenderloins on ne able—why, your prospects deliberately o nd catch the hog cholera and are shortly o ore. They have a perfect mania for it.
hy'll travel miles out of their way to ath it; they'll sit up until all hours of igt in the hope of catching it. Hogs will swim the Mississippi River—and it full of ice—to get where hog cholera is. Our hogs have been observed in the act of standing in the pen with their snouts in the air, sniffing in unison until they attracted the germs of it right out of the air. It is very disheartening to be counting on bacon worth eighty cents a pound only to find that all you have on your hands is a series of hurried hog interments.

In their own sphere of life turkeys are as suicidally minded as hogs are. I speak with authority here because we tried raising turkeys too. For a young turkey to get its feet good and wet spells doom for the turkey, and accordingly it practically devotes its life to getting its feet wet. If it cannot escape from the pen into the damp grass immediately following a rain it will in its desperation take other measures with a view to catching its death of cold. One of the most distressing spectacles to be witnessed in all Nature is a half-grown feeble-minded turkey obsessed with the maniacal idea that it was born a puddle duck, running round and round a coop trying to find a damp spot to stand on; it is a pitiful sight and yet exasperating. In order to be sure of getting its feet wet an infant turkey has been known to jump down an artesian well. This is not mere idle rumor; it is a scientific fact well authenticated. If somebody would only invent a style of overshoe that might be worn in comfort by an adolescent turkey without making the turkey feel distraught or self-conscious, that person would confer a boon upon the entire turkey race and at the same time be in a fair way to reap a fortune for himself. I know that a few months back if such an article had been in the market I would gladly have taken fifty pairs, assorted misses' and children's sizes.

Plymouth Rock Loafers

As for hens, I confess that at times I have felt like altogether abandoning my belief in the good faith and honest intentions of hens. Naturally one thinks of hens in connection with fresh-laid eggs, but my experience has been that the hen does not follow this line of reasoning. She prefers to go off on a different bent. She figures she was created to adorn society, not to gladden the breakfast platter of man. Or at any rate I would state that this has been the obsession customarily harbored by the hens which we have owned and which we persistently continue, in the face of disappointment oft-compounded, to go on owning.

We started out by buying, at a perfectly scandalous outlay, a collection of blooded hens of the white Plymouth Rock variety. We had been told that the sun never set on a setting white Plymouth Rock hen; that a white Plymouth Rock hen which had had the right sort of influences in her life and the right sort of hereditary instincts to guide her in her maturer career would inevitably dedicate her entire being to producing eggs. And we believed it until the hens we had purchased themselves offered proof to the absolute contrary.

It was enough almost to break one's heart to see a great broad-beamed, full-busted husky hen promenading round the chicken run, eating her head off, gadding with her sister idlers, wasting the precious golden hours of daylight in idle social pursuits and at intervals saying to herself: "Lay an egg? Well, I guess not! Why should I entail a strain on my nervous system and deny myself the pleasures of the gay life for the sake of these people? If they were able to pay four dollars for me, sight unseen, they are sufficiently affluent to buy their own eggs. Am I right? I'll say I am!"

You could look at her expression and tell what she was thinking. And then when you went and made the rounds of the empty and untenanted nests you knew that you had correctly fathomed the workings of her mind.

We tried every known argument on those hens in an effort to make them see the error of their ways and the advantages of eggs. We administered to them meat scraps and fresh carrots and rutabagas and sifted gravel and ground-up oyster shells; the only result was to make them finicky and particular regarding their diet. No longer were they satisfied with the things we ate ourselves; no, they must have special dishes; they wished to be pampered like invalids. We bought for them large quantities of costly chick feed—compounds guaranteed to start the most confirmed spinster hen to laying her head off.

So far as I might observe this, too, was of no avail. The more confirmed imbibers of

Can You Make the Same Soup Twice?

THAT'S hard to do, you know. Materials vary, recipes are not exact. But the Van Camp chefs will make the same soup a thousand times alike.

Most Van Camp Soups are based on famous French recipes. A chef from the Hotel Ritz in Paris brought them to our kitchens.

Here culinary experts, college trained, spend months in their perfection. They test blend after blend—sometimes hundreds of them—until they get the supreme quality and flavor.

Then every detail of the process is set down in a formula. It sometimes covers pages. Standards are fixed for every ingredient. Thus a Van Camp Soup is always like the model soup adopted.

Always Alike

A Van Camp Soup has forever the same delightful flavor.

The New-Day Way

This is the new way in soup making. Scientific cooks perfect them, then able chefs in model kitchens follow their directions.

There is no other way to make a perfect soup. The finest hotels can't serve soups like these unless they buy Van Camp's.

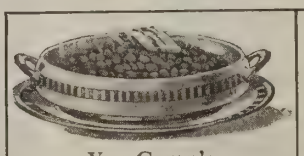
Learn what they mean to your table. They come to you ready-prepared. They cost no more than ordinary soups. And when you serve Van Camp's you are serving the utmost in a soup.

VAN CAMP'S Soups 18 Kinds

Other Van Camp Products Include

Pork and Beans — Evaporated Milk — Spaghetti — Peanut Butter
Chili Con Carne — Catsup — Chili Sauce, etc.

Prepared in the Van Camp Kitchens at Indianapolis

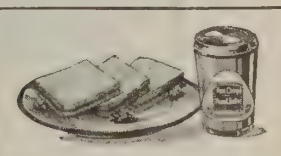


Van Camp's Pork and Beans

Baked so they easily digest, and with a sauce of matchless zest and tang.

Van Camp's Spaghetti

A famous Italian recipe prepared in this scientific way.



Van Camp's Peanut Butter

Made of nuts so blended as to give a new, delightful flavor.

TEMCO

Trade Mark

Portable Electric Tools

Garages, Repair Shops and Service Stations

TEMCO TOOLS are time and money savers for quick drilling in metal or wood tapping, sharpening tools and valve grinding. They can be carried to any part of your shop—are light weight, easy to handle, and ideal for working in hard-to-get-at-corners. They are low in first cost, inexpensive to operate, and multiply your efficiency.

Drills, Grinders, Buffers and Garage Outfits. Write for Catalogue.

The Temco Electric Motor Co., Leipsic, Ohio, U. S. A.

the special dishes merely developed lumpy dropsical figures and sat about in shady spots and brooded in a moody way as though they had heavy loads on their minds. We killed one of them as a sacrifice to scientific investigation and cut her open, and lo, she was burdened inside with half-developed yolks—a case, one might say, of mislaid eggs.

In desperation I even thought of invoking the power of mental suggestion on them. Possibly it might help to hang up a picture of a lady sturgeon in the henhouse? Or would it avail to shoo them into a group and read aloud to them the "begat" chapter in the Old Testament?

While I was considering these expedients someone suggested that probably the trouble lay in the fact that our fowls either were too highly bred or were too closely related and perhaps an infusion of new blood was what was needed. So now we went to the other extreme and added to our flock a collection of ordinary scrub hens, mixed as to breed and homely as to their outward appearance, but declared—by their former owner—to be passionately addicted to the pursuit of laying eggs. Conceding that this was true, the fact remained that immediately they passed into our possession they became slackers and nonproducers. I imagine the mistake we made was in permitting them to associate with the frivolous white débutantes we already owned; undoubtedly those confirmed bachelor maids put queer ideas into their heads, causing them to believe there was no nourishment in achieving eggs to be served up with a comparative stranger's fried ham.

On the theory that they might require exercise to stimulate their creative faculties we let them range through the meadows. Some among them promptly deserted the grassy leas to ravage our garden; others made hidden nests in the edges of the thickets, where the hawks and the weasels and the skunks and the crows might fatten on the fruits of their misdirected industry. So we cooped them up again in their run, whereupon they developed rheumatism and sore eyes and a perverted craving for eating one another's tail feathers. At present our chicken yard is nothing more nor less than a hen sanitarium. But we do not despair of ultimate success with our hens. We may have to cross them with the Potomac shad but we mean to persevere until victory has perched upon our roosts. As Rupert Hughes remarked when, after writing a long list plays which died a-borning, he eventu produced a riotous hit of hits: "Well, only human—I couldn't fail every tim

I should have said that there is one to which all our Westchester County col of amateur farmers are addicted. So may pursue one agricultural hobby some another, but almost without except the members of our little community confirmed hired-help fanciers. You mee neighbor and he tells you that after a astrous experience with Polled Polacks is now about to try the White Face Co neys; they have been highly recommen to him. And next month when you counter him again he is experimenting w Italian road builders or Scotch gardener Swedish stable hands or Afro-American trimmers or what not.

One member of our group after a p longed season of alternating hopes disappointments during which he first hi and then for good and sufficient reas fired representatives of nearly all the co monervarieties—plainandcolored,domes and imported, strays, culls and maverick decided to try his luck in the city at one the employment agencies specializing domestic servitors for country places. procured the address of such an establi ment and repaired thither—simply atti in his everyday clothes. As soon as he tered the place he realized that he was the wrong pew; here, plainly, was a sh to which repaired the proprietors of ost tatious estates rather than the mod owners of farms, among whom he numbe himself. He tried to back out, making hi self as inconspicuous as possible in so doi but at that before he succeeded in escap he had two good jobs offered to him— as assistant groom in a racing stable o on Long Island and one as general han man at a yacht club up in Connecticut. is convinced now that the rich are so h pressed for servants that they'll hire alm anybody without requiring references.

None of us will ever be rich; we're convinced of that, the cost of impracti farming being what it is, but by the sa token none of us would give up the pleasu of a landed proprietor's lot—the w "landed" being here used to imply baited, hooked and caught; i.e., a land sucker—for the life of a flat dweller aga It's a great life if a fellow doesn't weaken and we'll never weaken.

THE JUNIOR MEMBER

(Continued from Page 15)

Hungrily Cousens ran through pamphlet after pamphlet—particularly those on history and English and philosophy. These were not to him mere courses of study; they were invitations to join the group of thinking men who see life steady and see it whole. They were opportunities for a man to link himself up with the past, to interpret the present and reach forward toward the future. Without an intelligent conception of what had gone before, a man to-day was no more than a grubworm boring aimlessly in the unilluminated earth, feeding on mud, with all the glories of the real world lying concealed above him. That was all he had been doing—feeding on mud that the world called money. And four short years would have given him all this—would have taken him out of the earth and given him wings. Then he could have grubbed safely, because it would have been a mere incident.

"To think the boy has thrown away such a chance as this!" said Cousens.

Claire had been watching him.

"He was not ready for it, Jim," she answered. "You yourself were not ready for it at his age."

"No," he admitted. "And when you are ready then it's too late."

Her cheeks flushed with a new idea.

"Too late?" she repeated as though questioning herself.

Then she took his arm.

"Let's walk round the Yard again," she said.

Reluctantly he left. She led him back to Holworthy. Before the old brick building she stopped and faced him.

"Jim," she said, "do you remember I told you that we had begun so young—so very young that it wasn't too late to begin all over again?"

"Yes, Claire."

"I didn't know myself then just what I meant, but I see it now. I saw it in there when you were going over those pa phlets."

"What?" he interrupted.

"Please let me run on till I'm throu You've saved about eight thousand dolla for Harriet and Jim, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"And now they don't need it, so—so w don't you use it yourself?"

"For what?"

"For what you intended it—for colle Only instead of on them, on yourself."

"Good Lord, Claire!" he gasped.

"You're only forty, Jim. And four yea on this end of your life is no more than fo years on the other. Let's go and see if the is any reason why you can't enter."

She took hold of his arm as though start him at once, but he drew back.

"There's something queer about that he protested.

More herself now, she laughed.

"There's nothing queer about it. W have the money and the children do need us, so ——"

"What about you?"

"I," she faltered, "I—I might go with my music."

"Now there's an idea worth while," agreed enthusiastically. "Why can't yo You can start at the conservatory and——"

"You can start here. We'll get a litt flat somewhere."

"Just as we did before."

"The housework won't be anything all for just two."

"We can bring on some of our thin from New York."

"And—and, oh, Jim, will you?"

"What—what about the bank?"

"We don't need the bank any mo We've enough to take us through fo years, and after that—you've alwa wanted to teach, Jim. Anyhow, we'll ta a chance—after that."

(Continued on Page 161)

(Continued from Page 158)

"Et you're a good sport!" he exclaimed om he bottom of his heart.
"Ve won't be taking so much of a chance wi took the first time."
"D," he grinned. "And we pulled out ett well."
"S——"
-h took his arm and led him back al the university. Once only he fal-
-d Then he said, "I—I suppose the -ll think we're crazy."
Perhaps," she said, "perhaps this is the t ay of showing him we aren't."

III

AIES COUSENS entered college that fa as a member in good standing of the -h an class in the place of his son rm. When the latter first heard of the ne he thought it indicated a nervous allown and was for taking the next in o Boston to the rescue. But both rrt and Charles disagreed with him.
"Is what is called second youth," dere Harriet. "I've heard of it."
"I now, but dad is only forty. It's too ly or him to begin to slop soup on his sloat."
"Not second childhood—second youth," rrt corrected. "That's something quite ient."
"I t you can't tell how far it will go."
"I trust him, with ma there."
"Se says she is beginning her music in That's better than beginning cigate as a lot of women her age are doing."
"Vell, they ought to come home for rimas, anyway, and let us take a look hn. It sounds queer to me."
Jirny let the matter drop for the time ng because he was very busy. Charles s sowing a lot of life and bringing to the n any new clients and it was Jimmy's sirss to handle them, once they came
.e was good at that and wise enough 1 go any further. When it came to in them advice he turned them over to ttgill with his thirty years of experi-
e, However, Jimmy took the time to write ither a friendly letter of counsel.
ng other things he said:
"I don't know how far you are planning gout if I were you I'd cut out football.
ot saying you haven't got plenty of , ut you want to remember your bones nre brittle than they used to be. Stick Greek and Latin and if ever you get cld for money, let me know."
Cusens did not accept the invitation of f shman manager to every man of the sso come out and try for the team, but thr did he cut out football entirely.
bught two season tickets for the var-
-mes and with his wife never missed are. And he enjoyed them. Before the le ame he knew the name and weight l atecedent of every man on the team.
Ne did he neglect altogether active par-pion in athletics. He joined a gym ssnd took his setting-up exercises, folre by a cold shower, regularly, with the ilthat he found his muscles hardening, apetite improving and the color comtck to his cheeks. At the end of three n s he looked ten years younger.
Cusens found his academic tasks easy.
Ink work had called for concentration his stood him in good stead. Besides s, f course, he had both the eager desire en and the mental maturity to grasp, ht he mastered without effort his daily gments and had time enough left to a eat deal of correlative reading, which c him naturally far in advance of his irer classmates. This was nothing to sabout. He was not interested in comir his standing with that of his fellows, ne ease with which he mastered his j ts kept him free from all the petty rs that disturbed them. He accom-hd without effort better results than y eached after hard labor. It was all yor him—one long glorious holiday.
Cusens at first was rather shy about dg with the younger men, except as he t em at lectures. He was afraid they gl regard him as an intruder, or—what u be worse—look upon him as a sort of -out leader. Actually he felt younger nwhen in college before, but he labored d no delusion; as a matter of fact he s ore than twenty years older. He was f tly willing to admit this. He did not e t to pose as anything else. He had a r of being mistaken for a middle-aged nrying to act kittenish. And so though nt the boys it was man fashion, and uh he took an interest in the class affairs it was with appreciation of the fact that their active management belonged to the newer generation. He learned a lot about that generation that he had not known.

The boys appreciated this attitude of his. At first they had been frankly suspicious of him. He looked to them like a proctor in disguise. But as time went on and they saw that though he did not participate in their horseplay—in fact generally disappeared whenever it began—neither did he attempt to spoil it or inflict counsel upon them, they began to accept him. In celebration of a certain memorable victory over Yale, Cousens found himself dragged into a snake dance beneath the goal posts. He had young Staniford on one arm and Hammond on the other. He lost his hat properly enough and kept on bareheaded to the Yard. Here in the excitement of the moment he joined with the others in yelling himself hoarse. He was a bit ashamed of it afterward and apologized to Claire for having deserted her so abruptly, but she only smiled.

"I doubt if I should ever have respected you again if you hadn't," she said.

He and Claire finished the celebration that night by going to the theater, and in town afterward they ran across young Staniford much the worse for wear. As a matter of fact he was on the point of being arrested for his insistence upon trying to exchange headgear with a none-too-good-natured cop. Claire and Jim took the young man in tow between them and persuaded him into a taxi. At the Yard Claire waited while Cousens escorted the lad to his room and helped him into bed. The incident was never mentioned again between Staniford and Cousens, but Staniford remembered it and knew Cousens knew he did. The boy began calling at the apartment on Sunday afternoons after this and brought others, until Claire eventually found herself holding something in the nature of a salon there. They liked the things she gave them to eat for one thing, and they liked to hear her play.

She was getting on wonderfully at the conservatory. With nothing else to occupy her mind while Jim was either at lectures or in the library she was putting in some five hours a day practicing. She was willing to begin at the beginning and took up her old elementary technical exercises with honest enthusiasm. Not that it was not also a good deal of a chore to go over the ground a second time, but she had the intelligence to appreciate now the object of the work. Of course, too, she was mature enough this time to correct conscientiously her faults as she went along, so that the practice counted twice. Her compensation came in seeing a steady and rapid improvement. Her original intention had been to take the full course, but at the end of the first six months she had covered the first year and was well into the second. This she accomplished without fatigue and in spite of the fact that with her husband her life began to take on countless new and varied outside interests. In addition to the sports she attended with Jim, concerts and the theater occupied two or three nights a week. Later her Sunday afternoon receptions became a regular engagement. This was in addition to her social calls.

Neither Cousens nor his wife had anticipated anything of the kind. They had come to Cambridge unannounced and knew no people in the academic circle, but it was not long before they began to receive invitations into that circle supposed to be super-exclusive. The older professors took an interest in Cousens as representing a novel experiment. Then they liked both his work and the man himself. As a result they invited him and his wife to their homes to get a closer knowledge of them.

The reward was mutual. Cousens and his wife found these new associations with highly trained minds a new spur to their ambitions, while the academic circle in their turn were able to learn much from the new point of view the Cousenses brought them. They represented a fresh approach to education.

The period up to the Christmas vacation passed like a month and Cousens might have stayed right on in Cambridge had it not been for a peremptory letter from Jim Junior.

"Dear Dad," he wrote: "If you don't make arrangements to come home for the holidays I'll have to make arrangements to come on to Cambridge. That will make it hard for everyone, because business is humming just now. Besides, it's your duty to

When do you discard the Joker?

FOOLISH question? Not at all! There is a time in "500" when the best card in the deck is the least desirable. The new edition of the "Official Rules of Card Games" tells you when to discard the Joker, and gives you the latest rules and expert suggestions for playing any one of the world's 300 games you like best. We will send you this 250 page book, just off the press, for only 20 cents. Send for it today—NOW. Use the coupon below, if you wish.

BICYCLE PLAYING CARDS

Next to knowing how to play, there is nothing which adds to or detracts so much from the pleasure of playing as the cards you use. Bicycle Playing Cards are the standard everywhere. Their air cushion finish prevents sticking, making shuffling easy and dealing accurate. Their large, clear indexes are easy to read. The quality material used in their manufacture makes them durable and long-lasting, even though subjected to hard usage. Get a pack today from your dealer so you will have them next time you play.

Congress Playing Cards are playing cards de luxe. Full color art backs. Gold edges. Ideal for prizes, gifts and social play.

REVELATION—The Latest Thing in Fortune Telling Cards

There are many evenings of entertainment and good fun packed into every deck of Revelation Fortune Telling Cards. Designed by a man noted for his uncanny performances in card conjuring, these cards produce results as mystifying as they are fascinating. They answer any question on any subject—love, business, health, wealth—the past, present or future—and always in a weirdly accurate fashion. One color back in tuck case, 50 cents per deck; colored back design, gold edges, in telescope case, 70 cents. From your dealer or postpaid.

Don't forget to send for the "Official Rules of Card Games" today. And when writing, why not order a deck of REVELATION Fortune Telling Cards? You will be more than pleased with them!

THE U. S. PLAYING CARD COMPANY
Dept. A-2, Cincinnati, U.S.A., or Windsor, Canada

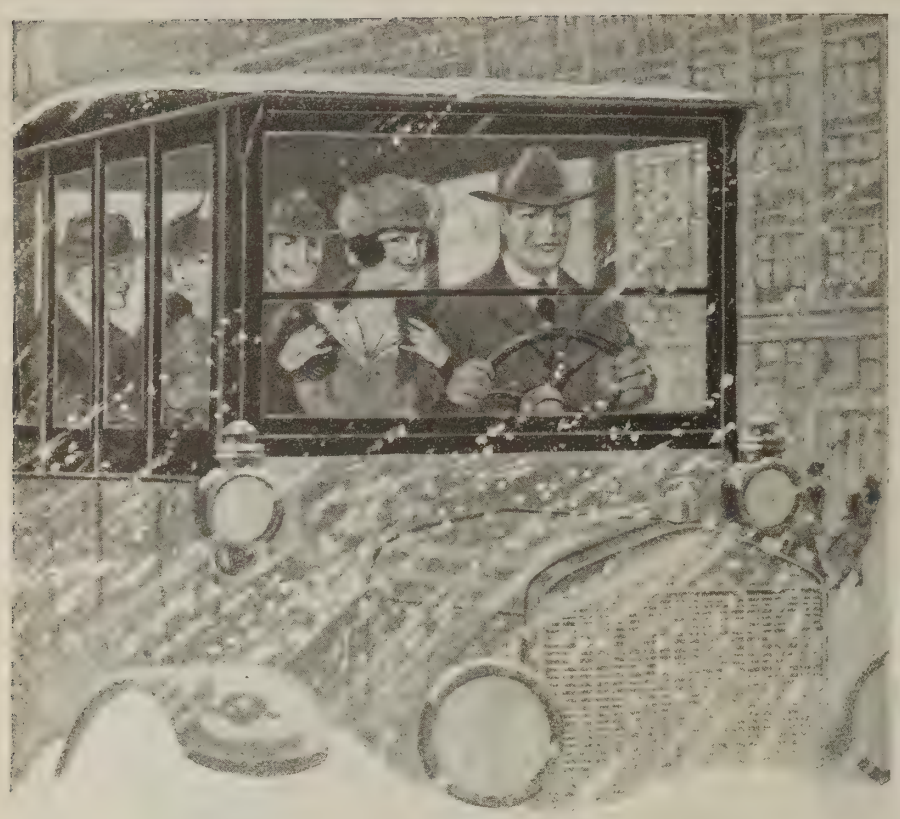
A-2

The U. S. Playing Card Co.
Cincinnati, O., or Windsor, Can.

Please send postpaid the new "Official Rules of Card Games". I enclose 20 cents.

Name _____

Address _____



Here's winter comfort in your Ford

Aren't you glad you own a Ford? It's such a friendly, willing, dependable car. Are you getting all the good pleasure and service your Ford can give you? You are—if you have

The Koupet Top
TRADE MARK

Then your Ford is an everyday comfort and all-weather utility car. The Koupet Top shuts out the wind, dust, rain, snow, sleet, cold—shuts them all out tight. And yet, when you are breezing along in the pure, fresh, clean air—floods of it pour in through the perfect ventilating arrangements of The Koupet Top.

Side Door Glass Panes Slide Open for Easy Signaling

Doors conveniently open with car doors, as one. Instead of "dropping" one-half of glass pane for ventilation, all glass in Koupet doors is split lengthwise, exposed edges ground; one piece sliding forward or rearward in a metal channel. Door panes open and shut easily, quickly. No bothersome catches.

The Koupet Top is built to wear—screwed, bolted and hinged together—sits firm, rides quietly.

Double-ventilating windshield—of plate glass, with exposed edge ground—is joined snug and close into front frame. Automatic stop lock hinges, hold upper and lower windshield panes at desired angle.

Ride through windy rain and driving sleet or snow—and see out in all directions—front, sides, and through full road vision glass in rear. Drip troughs keep the glass clear. Many other first-quality features—all quality throughout.

Like your Ford Itself, The Koupet Top is a very great value at a very moderate price.

We have been 62 years in the vehicle building business. This wide experience together with the fact that we produce tops in great volume enables us to build well and to sell our output at the lowest possible price.

Koupet Top for Ford Roadsters $55.00

Koupet Top for Touring Car $75.00

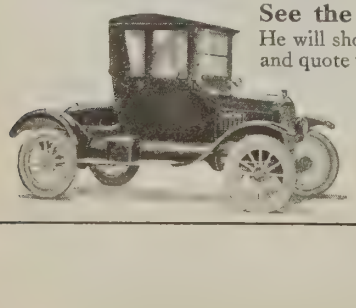
F. O. B., Belleville, Ill.

With complete, plain Chart Diagram—for setting up and mounting Koupet Top on your Ford.



See the Koupet Top Dealer in your town

He will show you the Koupet Top actually on the Ford—and quote you prices delivered and installed. Then you will realize that Koupet Top is a tops-them-all value at a rock-bottom price. See Koupet Top—today. Write us for Illustrated Free Booklet describing all the splendid features and advantages—in construction, convenience and usefulness—of the Koupet Top. It Tops Them All. Find out. Write us today. Mention your dealer's name.

Koupet Auto Top Co., Dept. 24, Belleville, Ill.

come on. Parents owe some obligations to their children, especially when the children are working hard to send their parents through college.

"Honest, dad, I want to see you, and so does Harriet. I've missed you a lot, and Harriet—well, she has a secret she wants to whisper to mother. I'm inclosing a check for fifty dollars in case you're busted. If you don't come now you'll be so young at the end of your freshman year that we won't know you.

"P. S. Charles has arranged parties for every night. He says he knows what the college boys like."

IV

COUSENS finished his course in three years, but remained a fourth year for an A. M. and was graduated with his class. If anyone wants to know how brief a period of a man's life four years is, let him ask Cousens. To him it seemed over before it was fairly begun. As an undertaking in prospect such a venture may look formidable, but it can be done almost while a man is considering the difficulties. He was forty-four when he was graduated, but he was able to look forward to the future with more zest and confidence than any of his classmates. He stood on firm ground now.

Both Jimmy and Harriet came on to Class Day, and Cousens did everything right up chuck. He even insisted that Claire buy for the occasion a regular class-day gown—a dainty thing of white lawn—and a new hat. Harriet had always gone some in dress, but when she joined her mother on that eventful day the honors were even. Cousens himself blossomed forth in a nobby light-gray suit, a jaunty Panama and a red hatband.

"You sure look like the real thing," Jimmy complimented him.

They all took in the Stadium exercises, Cousens joining his class in the Yard and marching past his family, cheering each of the old buildings. Then they came back to half a dozen spreads to which Cousens had received invitations, and in the evening shuttled back and forth between the illuminated Yard and the senior dance at Memorial. It was a great day for them all, and even Jimmy Junior renewed his youth. He lost some of his New York wrinkles that evening and seemed almost like a boy again.

The children went back the next day, but Claire and her husband remained for commencement. She had received her diploma from the conservatory earlier in the month and Cousens had wanted to make a fuss about that, but she would not allow it.

"You are the big thing, Jimmy," she insisted. "I've just done this to fill in my time."

She had even refused to allow her name to be put on the program for the graduating concert, though invited to that place of honor, because she felt that such things belonged to the younger girls.

"They have their place to make in the world," she said. "I have made mine."

Cousens received his sheepskin—with honors in certain subjects—almost regretfully. It marked the end of as interesting a four years as it is ever the good fortune of a man to live. Regretfully, too, he shook hands with his classmates, knowing they were to be dispersed to the four ends of the earth. Regretfully again he and Claire broke up their little apartment in Cambridge and started back to New York.

But that was only a passing emotion. Cousens had not returned a week before he began to sense that instead of leaving behind he was bringing with him the best of his university. And he found, too, that there was more of Harvard right here than back in Cambridge. This gave him a new point of view on the city. He saw it in a bigger, broader way. He linked it up with the universe.

He even got a new slant on the business world. He went downtown and renewed his old friendships in the bank where he had worked so long. There had been many changes, but many of the former staff were there to greet him. They saw a brisker, younger, firmer man, while too often he saw men grown old beyond their years. The manager hinted that a place could be found for him there, but he shook his head. He was not sure of his plans yet.

He spent a good deal of time, too, in Jimmy's office. He was curious to see how the young man worked, and Jimmy seemed to like to have him round. The latter appeared to take a good deal of pride in his father. He used to introduce him as "My father—just out of college."

It was always taken as a joke unt Jimmy explained that it was literally tru

The boy's business was growing, but a Cousens looked on it seemed to him that was not growing in so big and broad fashion as it should. The small tradin accounts had increased steadily, so tha from their commissions they were receivin a good income, but they had remained brokerage house in the narrowest sens They were not seeing big or interestin themselves in the slightest in the field finance. They did not even have a seat the Stock Exchange, but had remaine content to execute their orders through a other office. He thought he saw, too, dangerous tendency to deal more and mo with curb stocks.

However, Cousens kept quiet and merel looked on. He was amazed at his ow widened point of view. He would have sai offhand that his experience of the last fo years must if anything have weakened h interest in the business world. It had bee out of his consciousness altogether. It is far cry from ancient Greece and Rome Wall Street, and yet with that histor background to help he was for the first tim realizing that this game was not merely matter of petty bookkeeping or merely sharp clash of wits based on covetousnes but in a bigger sense was one with t orderly progress of the world. He no long saw it as one of the grubs. History w here in the making as much as it had on been in Rome and Greece.

As days went on Cousens found hims fascinated with it, but as days went on found himself less and less content mere to watch it. And so when he received second offer from Wentworth to return the bank he showed it to the boy.

"I think I'll accept that, son," he sa "I'm tired of sitting on the side lines."

Jimmy Junior read the letter. The of was for five thousand to act as head cle Jimmy read it twice and then glanced at his father.

"You're going to what?" he demand

"I think I'll accept," repeated Couse

"You mean to say you're going ba there and let yourself get pigeonho again—after going through college?"

"Only this time they won't be able pigeonhole me," smiled Cousens.

"I'll bet they won't!" snapped Jim rather ambiguously. "But look here! thought you wanted to teach."

Cousens shook his head.

"I'm afraid I haven't had experie enough for that," he answered. "Beside the old city looks pretty good to me n Jimmy."

"Then," said Jimmy Junior—"then y sit down and write Wentworth that y can't accept his offer because you've go better."

"What do you mean, son?"

"I mean that if you're worth that him you're worth twice that to me. L here, dad, I've been watching you si you've been hanging round here—watch you and listening to you."

"I've tried to keep my mouth shu broke in Cousens.

"And you've done pretty well, but w you have spoken it was to the point. know a lot about this business that don't know, but what gets me is that seem to know a lot about it that I d know. Darned if I understand where picked it up, but—well, you see the things. I've talked this over with Cha and he suggested we try to get you, bu said it couldn't be done. We need a r like you, dad. Pettingill is going to get before long, but even if he stays we'll n you. We need someone big—someone w stuffing in him. So if you're going into game at all this is right where you're goi

Cousens never considered himself emotional man, but as the boy lea toward him with his lean young face t and uttered those words he had to s hard once or twice before he could ans Then he said; "Jimmy, I hadn't thoug this. But if you need me and think I help ——"

"Help!" broke in Jimmy. "You'l the making of this firm. You're a men from to-day—at your own figure."

And all this is what lay back of an vertisement on the financial page of New York daily papers which reac follows:

"We take pleasure in announcing from to-day Mr. James Cousens, Sr., comes a member of this firm.

"PETTINGILL, GRANDSON & COUSENS

LOOKING BACKWARD

(Concluded from Page 26)

fo unate than John Throckmorton, who it or Old Hell's Delight would have countered little obstacle to the pursuit fil, liberty and happiness.

III

NTHER interesting Kentuckian of is period was John Thompson Gray. e us a Harvard man—a wit, a scholar d, ccording to old Southern standards, ch alier. Handsome and gifted, he had e astrous misfortune just after leaving lle to kill his friend in a duel—a mortal ai growing, as was usual in those days, t a trivial cause; and this not only dened his life but in its ambitious aims ac wed and defeated it. His university m des had fully counted on his making g t career. Being a man of fortune he s ble to live like a gentleman without b preferment, and this he did, except h familiars, aloof and sensitive to the t

Wliam Preston, the whilom Minister to ai and Confederate general, and David nell, the eminent surgeon, were his de- te friends, and a notable trio they made. oard Johnston, Boyd Winchester and -ry much younger men—sat at their t nd immensely enjoyed their brilliant n rsation.

Dctor Yandell was not only, as pro- nied by Doctor Gross and Doctor Sayre, e olest surgeon of his day, but he was o gentleman of varied experience and ea social distinction. He had studied ngin Paris and was the pal of John Howard Payne, the familiar friend of Lamartine, Dumas and Lemaître. He knew Béranger, Hugo and Balzac. It would be hard to find three Kentuckians less provincial, more unaffected, scintillant and worldy wise than he and William Preston and John Thompson Gray.

Indeed the list of my acquaintances—many of them intimates, some of them friends—would be, if recounted, a long one, not mentioning the foreigners, embracing a diverse company, all the way from Chunkey Towles to Grover Cleveland; from Wake Holman to Pierpont Morgan; from John Chamberlin to Thomas Edison.

I once served as an honorary pallbearer of a professional gambler who was given a public funeral; a man who had been a gallant Confederate soldier; whom Nature intended for an artist and circumstance diverted into a sport; but who retained to the last the poetic fancy and the spirit of the gallant, leaving behind him, when he died, like a veritable cavalier, chiefly debts and friends.

He was not a bad sort in business, as the English say, nor in conviviality. But in fighting he was a terror. The goody-goody philosophy of the namby-pamby takes an extreme and unreal view of life. It flies to extremes. There are middle men. Travers used to describe one of these whom he did not wish particularly to emphasize as "a fairly clever son of a gun."

Editor's Note—This is the twenty-eighth of a series of articles by Mr. Watterson. The next will appear in an early issue.

LORENA

(Continued from Page 19)

ntword that she was very ill I could feel m wisting all through the windy hours he he should have slept, and he crawled t ery early. I watched him scrubbing s es diligently from under a corner of y llow, but I was sufficiently courteous s nothing about that. He was my host yce's that afternoon and the little ngshman, blinking and perturbed, asked r liss Lorena.

"Jell," Ethan blurted, "she's awful ill'

"h, merciful heavens!" said Joyce, and oned a coffee cup. "I do 'ope you're k', Master Ethan."

"lo, he isn't," I put in. "She is."

"ear me," Joyce said, pulling his silly uache. "Dear me! It's dreadful to hear a"

Vhen Lorena was mending Joyce sent r quantities of jelly and cakes—which e ounger Rosses consumed. I thought ry kind of him. He was truly a very n y man, though he was a curio in our w and had no patience with the careless n cracy which set the children of lordly r ers such as Ross and the offspring of a smen on the same bench in school. No n nt of cordiality could induce him to s her than humble before Mr. Reid of e irst National Bank, Ross, Judge Lowe n my father. He saved the word "sir" r neir honor and scattered "master" and r s" among their descendants. He had s raded, I think, on some scale of his a e Surrey and held to it placidly in the e of our derisive awe.

n this scale the Rosses ranked very g and I was wise enough to notice that o na ranked the Rosses. She got from r a deference that even the imposing n Reid could not exact. My mother t spoke of it and it puzzled me as a m ry of grown-up conduct. Here was a s who was absolute master of a pastry c, a monarch over a mass of candy, h m lads of eighteen and nineteen delighted s atter for credit, flushing and stammer- p efore a mere child, younger than my- l His colorless eyes lit and his shapeless c th shook when he saw her.

What can I 'ave the pleasure of findin' o Miss Lorena?"

hy, I pondered, he had daughters as c as Lorena and one of them waited at s ies, the more gorgeous parties in Poplar S et where some men wore evening dress! other explained that in England cater- s who served food to other people did not c ider themselves gentlemen and that Joyce was doubtless pleased by Lorena's i dliness. Certainly he had no aspira- d beyond catering. I think there was some design of a final return to England. His one pleasure was purely English in his method of effecting it. In the fall he would go out in faded corduroys and gaiters to the stubble fields and shoot. He was a very bad shot indeed, but he brought to the pastime a grand manner, copied, I fancy, from some squire seen in his boyhood, and he always kept his shotgun over the rear counter. This amused Lorena immensely. Even after her reformation she called him Joyce, seeing—she said—that he liked it.

Lorena's reformation was complete and thorough. She blossomed into an intellectual young person. Judge Lowe lent her volumes of poetry and she learned sections of Childe Harold and Lalla Rookh. In fact she learned all of Paradise and the Peri by heart and used to recite it after supper in the farmhouse sitting room. She could make Mrs. Ross cry, and in all justice she recited very well. I remember the swaying of her yellow braid and the really rapturous clasping of her hands when the Peri reached redemption.

Joy, joy, forever! My task is done,
The gates are passed and heaven is won.

Even Ethan's drawled allegation that she looked like a sick calf did not deter Lorena in these feats, and Ethan always forbore to criticize until all was over. Judge Lowe began to advise that she be sent to some Eastern school. This did not seem to allure Lorena, but when Ethan had teased his father into promising him college she commenced a campaign on her own account, a thing of subtle devices and cross intrigues into which she dragged my father, Judge Lowe and all the forces of higher education. She wanted to go to a girls' school near Philadelphia. The reviewing spirit of middle age shows me that Philadelphia is very convenient to Princeton, New Jersey. Ethan and I were going to Princeton, where Eddie Lowe, the judge's heir, was installed. I did not think of this at the time. The campaign ended early in September, 1888. Mrs. Ross shed tears and took Lorena to Toledo for frocks. Judge Lowe issued invitations for a farewell party and ordered an orchestra from Columbus.

This party, though intended as a demonstration of good will to all three of us, was a triumph for Lorena. I do not suppose she thought of her drive down Poplar Street seven years before on the tinware cart, when she drove to the judge's door, and I am sure no one reminded her, for Zerbetta held Lorena in great esteem. But that night she displayed herself as a woman, and a number of men who saw her almost daily suddenly treated her as an honored

'Ever-Ready'
Safety Razor

TAKE one of those dwindling dollars which has lately been getting fifty-five cent value in everything else—restore its self-respect with an EVER-READY and pay a long-belated debt to your face.

Extra Radio Blades—6 for 40c

AMERICAN SAFETY RAZOR CO., Inc.

Factories
Brooklyn, N. Y. Toronto, Canada
London, England

TRADE MARK FACE

REES
DOUBLE WORM GEAR DRIVE
JACK

This illustrates the Rees Double-Worm Gear Drive principle wherein end thrust and side strain are entirely eliminated and friction reduced to a minimum.

IT takes more than a flat tire to dampen the spirits of your motoring party when you have a Rees Double-Worm Gear Drive Jack along to do the lifting.

THE REES JACK makes tire changing a short, easy, one-man job. Simply straighten out and attach the long folding handle, place the Jack under the axle without getting down in the dirt, give the handle a few easy turns and the car is lifted and held safely at any height.

PERHAPS the most-appreciated features of the Rees Jack are its convenience and ease of operation. Of equal value however are its power and dependability which are due to its unique principle, the double-worm gear drive, and the high standards of materials and workmanship used in its construction.

REES JACK No. 1 for passenger cars has a lifting capacity of 4000 lbs. With its convenient folding handle it fits readily into any tool box. If your dealer's stock has not arrived send us check, draft or money order for $9.00 and we will send you a Rees Jack prepaid by Parcel Post. Price west of Rockies, $9.50.

Iron City Products Company

Department 15

7501 Thomas Blvd., Pittsburgh, Penna.

Manufacturers also of Rees Double-Worm Gear Drive Jacks for trucks, railway and industrial purposes.

novelty. She wore a white gown, a provincial version of whatever was current in Paris, and she had no jewels, but I am prepared to swear that she emitted sparkles of light.

"Lorena," said Ethan, "ain't lookin' so bad."

Neither was Ethan, wearing his first high collar, but this was Lorena's party and the gaze of the town concentrated itself on her flashing head and courted her brown eyes. There were jars of goldenrod set everywhere against the walnut splendor of the Lowe interior, and this comparison having started went majestically the rounds, while Mrs. Joyce in maid's black handed lemonade about. I recall thinking how plain this mute little woman seemed passing near Lorena, but Joyce in a striped waistcoat was very dignified at the door and in the dining room. Lorena had promised to have supper with me. We sat on a couch in the library, and Ethan, who was having a shy dull time, came to sit at her feet. He said that Zerbetta was kind of slow. Seeing that his only standard was Toledo, where he had been taken twice, I thought this daring.

"Don't be silly, Eth," said Lorena with cool patronage. "Joe's been to Boston and New York and he's having a nice time. How nice your hair is, Joe!"

"What's that Marney fellow doin' here?" he snapped.

"Why shouldn't he be here?" asked Lorena, smiling on Mr. Joyce, who came up in his most solemn fashion with a tray full of chicken-salad dishes.

"Why, he ain't lived in town but six months," Ethan declared, "an' he's an awfully poor dancer."

Lorena selected a plate from the tray and glanced at Marney, a harmless new clerk at the bank, who was leaning on a bookcase across the room.

"He doesn't dance much worse than you do, Eth, and he's very nice and very handsome. Are those French rolls, Joyce?"

"Yes, miss," said Joyce, and coughed. The tray shook a little. I thought he was scarlet from bending over her so long. Her hair almost brushed his spectacles.

"Handsome!" Ethan grumbled. "I don't see he's handsome. I don't think he's handsome at all. I think he's pretty darn ugly."

"He's very handsome," said Lorena positively, "and I like him very much. Much more than anyone else in town."

Ethan got up and strode away, taking his salad plate with him. Joyce walked off with the tray and finished his circuit of the room. I looked at Lorena with all the stupid bewilderment of eighteen facing a situation it does not comprehend. Marney was a rosy lad of twenty, a minor clerk in the First National. He had not a single surprising or interesting feature.

"Why," I said, "I don't see anything about Marney, Lorena!"

"Neither do I," she answered genially. "Mercy, Joe! One of your garters is coming down."

I slipped into the hall and was there astounded. Joyce had put his empty tray on a small table and was standing with his grayish head against the wall in a corner below the stairs. His hands were twisted inside his collar and his contorted face was hideous. He shook as if someone were lashing him.

"Golly," I gasped, "are you sick?"

It took him a moment to straighten and smile and I saw that he panted.

"I've a very tight collar, Master Joseph. No, I'm not ill, I thank you."

However, I found Ethan upstairs making himself sick with a black cigar and he stated that this was the slowest dullest town in the world, which did not at all prevent his weeping publicly when he said good-by to his family the next week.

All the way to Philadelphia Lorena behaved with a weary composure that amazed even Eddie Lowe, and she bade us farewell without a tear. I believe she was very homesick for a time, but her notes to me did not show it. Her written declaration was that her school was a nest of fascinations. I read these notes to Ethan, who said she was a stuck-up liar. They did not correspond, nor did we have the pleasure of escorting Lorena home at Christmas. She went west with a party of school friends headed the same way and was in full possession when we arrived. Our holidays had all the restful quality of a tornado. Lorena and her swains upset the Ross farmhouse to such an extent that Ethan came to stay with me.

"I wish to heaven," he told my mot "that Lorena'd go deaf and dumb. I'm blame tired of hearing about her old scho

My father worried about Ethan. thought the boy was jealous of Lore supremacy in her adoptive family. mother merely laughed.

"The boy's simply fallen in love her—that's all—and she knows it and s teasing him. Don't bother. It will all very nicely."

After which I was not surprised to that the Rosses took the same view of case and were much gratified. Et sulkily refused to go to dances, but b utterly tactless I strove to further his terest by taking her walking one aftern I told her how well he did at college— she yawned. With enormous craft I before her that the daughters of var Princeton professors took notice of hir

"It must be very slow at Princet said Lorena. "Take me to Joyce's, Jo think I want some caramels."

Ethan was in the little shop eating cream, though there was deep snow in square gutters. He scowled at me and nored Lorena. All the young people at tables chuckled, and only Ethan's p kept him seated. Lorena began to ch all sorts of candy, discussing its vir with me in a loud and gay voice and smi at Joyce. I leaned on the show case thought what a stupid way of making o bread it must be to keep a confectio and what a dull man Joyce was, stumb about and blinking over his chocolates stammering whenever he tried to spea Lorena almost as though he were a yo ster in her train. I had decided to noted lawyer and this shopkeeper fallen far in my esteem—possibly an al ance from a bachelor uncle in Boston something to do with this disdain— since Lorena was annoying me I felt his servile stoop before her was quite c ish. Just then Marney, who had been k ing Christmas with his mother in Buf came in from the dusk.

"Joe," Lorena whispered, "what's first name?"

"Edwin," I remembered.

Thereupon she swung, glanced at over her muff, gave a joyful low laugh exclaimed: "Why, Edwin! Where earth have you been? I haven't seen for ages. And you promised to write and you haven't once."

Marney went red, came up to s hands, and Lorena exhausted five mi of babble before Ethan rose and fled. me it was a very cruel exhibition. I s the package of candy and hustled Lo into the street.

"You oughtn't to treat Eth that wa scolded. "It isn't fair."

"Why," said Lorena flatly, "I'm doing anything to him."

"You oughtn't to carry on over fellows in front of him," I insisted. "It all over town you were flirting with ney. Old Mrs. Joyce was looking p forks at you from the back counter."

"I don't think Mrs. Joyce likes lot," Lorena observed, halting under lamp to crush a cream and throwi away as the wrong tint of filling sh "I think she thinks I'm an upstart. J always sends me Christmas pre though. Funny little man! He looks turtle. Isn't his wife ugly?"

Lorena pursued Marney, who plainly alarmed by the kindness, thr the rest of the holidays, and I su Ethan was the only person in Zerbetta was not amused, though I have some wondered if he knew what troubled He was not an ideal comrade that w term, and Lorena's letters to me gave convulsions of disgust. She prattled a parties in Philadelphia and the da brothers of her friends. The word "di had been lately imported as the best of female admiration and she used it f Merely as a grace note she tossed on in a scrawl dated sometime in M "Only think, Joe, I find that Mrs. Ba who lives next door, is a second cou Edwin Marney's and I have written h tell him. Her husband has a bank in C nut Street and it would be so nice if E could come here to work."

I thought this was a lie, but whe came home for Easter I found it wa truth. Young Marney had begun to spond with his cousin, who really wa wife of a fairly prominent private ba As Marney was a well-bred yout thanked Ethan after Easter Sunday s

(Continued on Page 169)

(Continued from Page 166)

Irena's goodness to him. Lorena had me home. She had been asked to the week with some friends in Gerwn. The Rosses grieved, but Ethan oied aloud. However, when we were tlund again he observed that it wasn't his family. His father and mother ssl her, he said, and the kids.

W had hardly settled down to the seriork of baseball when Lorena wrote t Iarney's cousin's husband had offered place in the Philadelphia bank. hich," she scribbled, "is very nice ."

Ts jab drew a grunt from Ethan. If looded over it he was straightway e by odd news from Zerbetta. My r was the informant:

"our father and I are worried about oyces. It seems they are quarreling, h I cannot imagine why. Mrs. Joyce unhappy for some reason and wants the business and go back to England. oor girls seem all upset. It is such a when people who have been married enty years behave in this way. I am d about Edwin Marney. I am sure he ave a much better chance of getting Philadelphia. He came to dinner last and told us he is engaged to a girl in llo, though they have not announced she is very young."

"o!" said Ethan. "Engaged! Then s he makin' love to Lorena for?"

"h, get out!" I sniffed. "Don't be a l She was only making a fuss over him ke your mad. She doesn't care any about him than she does—well, about yce. And he doesn't about her either. because you're cracked about her you everybody else is too."

"m not!" he cried.

He spent a whole day denying his love, en lectures, but the next morning's irove it out of our heads for the time. ather wrote a hand of superb clarity:

'POPLAR STREET, Zerbetta, Ohio.
April 6, 1889.

"Iy dear Son: You will be sorry to hear ve have had a murder here, the first in years, and that it was my misfortune a witness of it. I was buying your er some candy in Joyce's last evening Edwin Marney came in on his way to rain. He was going to get a sandwich stood by me at the counter talking r hopefully about his new position in delphia and how pleasant it was that na Broome is there as he has no acntance in that city.

'oyce stood listening to us, then walked ily back to the end of the shop. Sud- Mrs. Joyce shrieked in the kitchen. ned round and there was Joyce coming ith his shotgun in his hands. He fired arney with both barrels. The poor boy n his face and died before Doctor Case d get over from his office.

'oyce then walked over to the jail and himself up. I have seen him and so judge Lowe, but he will only say that ated Marney and had meant to kill for a long time. You can imagine the we are all in."

ther my parents or Mrs. Ross gave us a bulletin and we became for the mot very important freshmen, as the York papers took the matter as a gift. s was scarce that April, and Marney e of a good family and was engaged to daughter of a politician. Judge Lowe retired from the bench in 1888, so a nge circuit judge held the trial. Mrs. e retained the best available lawyer, in the face of Joyce's silence his oratory t for nothing. The confectioner was handsome, young or wealthy. Judge e wrote his son Eddie a fair summing

He sat there looking as calm as a rch pew. We tried to show that he t be insane, but there was no proof he had ever done or said anything n erratic. Mrs. Joyce testified that he been moody and unhappy recently and complained of her appearance, which made matters worse, poor woman, as the lunkheads on the jury sniveled and ught how brutal he must be. And poor rney's mother came to court and cried, urally. As Mrs. Henry says, they are lly going to hang Joyce in honor of rney's mother. I suppose they might as l. Mrs. Joyce and the girls are living in Cypress. Tell Joe that his father made the poorest witness I ever saw."

Indeed my father suffered bitterly on the witness stand. The trial dragged itself on into May. Everyone in Zerbetta who had ever had the most trifling disagreement with Joyce wanted to be heard. Eddie Lowe, Ethan and I spent hours reading the reports in the Courier, our weekly paper. Eddie, who had a gruesome imagination, surmised a secret society for the slaughter of bank clerks. I contended that Joyce was insane, recalling his queer fit the night of Judge Lowe's party. Ethan one day offered a fantastic suggestion that sent us into roars.

"See here, I've got it! Joyce used to go up to Buffalo to buy candies and things, didn't he?" This was true. Eddie and I nodded. Ethan went on: "Well, he saw this girl Marney was stuck on and fell in love with her—sort of like Dante and what's her name—so he killed Marney, huh?"

This was so absurd that he finally laughed himself. Our minds could not pose the timid little man, immensely aged to us, as a lover after the Italian sort. I wrote Ethan's theory to Lorena, who responded that he must be going insane too.

"But I hate talking about it, as the poor old thing was always so nice to me. I see in the Courier that he is only forty-five. I thought he must be sixty, anyhow. I wish Ethan would write me. He is very silly about it."

"Huh!" said Ethan. "Why don't she write me? I've a heap better things to do than write her. Well, I guess old Joyce was crazy. I expect he had a mania, or whatever they call it, for killing folks, like the cook in that Wilkie Collins yarn. I guess he just picked Marney out like you would a stone to throw. Funny, that night Lorena was carryin' on with Marney in his store he stood an' looked at him like he wanted to bust his neck. Where's the Cicero, Joe?"

I think he wrote Lorena that day, but I know she did not answer him before we went home in early June, preceding her by a week.

The store on the square was closed, pending sale. Mrs. Joyce and the daughters were boarding in Cypress, ten miles away, until the day set for the execution. Ethan and I strolled past the little blue-brick jail behind the courthouse and peered into the walled yard. A tragic air seemed to weight the chestnut leaves, and old Martin O'Shea, the jailer, had acquired a horrid pomp. Small boys no longer made rude remarks behind his back. It was whispered that a professional hangman was coming from the state capital the night of the fourteenth—the hanging was to take place the minute of noon the fifteenth. My mother, worn out by ministrations to Mrs. Joyce, went to her relatives in Boston before the date and I was left with father in the gloom of our house on Poplar Street. Ethan had become quite openly lovesick and was no use to me as company. Father was little better. The whole wretched business oppresses him. I began to see gray in his hair and he refused to talk of Joyce.

"I've advised everyone to keep away from the square to-morrow. All the roughs from the entire county will come in. It will be horrible. It's an abomination, judge."

Judge Lowe was dining with us. He stroked his white waistcoat.

"It all seems very useless, Henry. Still, what's the law to do? But I wish they'd do it in the morning. When the courthouse bell strikes twelve the whole county'll stop to listen. Not good for the children, that. No, it's all very painful. When's Lorena getting here, Joe?"

"To-morrow on the eleven o'clock, sir."

"Heavens!" father said. "Just in time! And the poor man was so fond of her!"

Next morning Poplar Street and West Avenue, our haughtiest thoroughfares, were very still. The children huddled inside the gates and watched the infiltration of men and lads from the outer farms. I could just see a corner of the square from our library window and knew that the saloons were doing a fine trade. Father wandered to and fro behind me and sometimes stared over my head. He was on a spiritual rack. I heard him mutter, once:

God, that the worm which thou hast made,
Should thus his brother worm invade!

It was almost ten when one of the O'Shea lads ran down the street and jumped our fence. Joyce had asked for father, though

Whenever you see this name on a washroom towel you know it's

The "Sign" of A Good Hotel

Next time you visit a hotel's public washroom notice the towels.

If they bear the "Scottissue" mark, they are towels that dry—pure, white, softer and more absorbent—suggestive of good service throughout the hotel.

By increased goodwill (more names on the register) Scottissue Towels prove their economy. And remember, Scottissue Towels go farther—one is sufficient for the hands; one for the face.

Towel Users—insist on the Scottissue mark wherever washroom towels are used—you are entitled to towels that dry.

Write us about a test installation

Scott Paper Company

Chester, Pennsylvania

New York Chicago San Francisco

Scottissue Products for Personal Hygiene

Scottissue Towels

for use once by one user

They Dry

For Office, Factory, Hotel and Institution

DO away with haphazard buying of pails, spittoons, keelers, tubs, umbrella jars, waste baskets, etc. Reduce your equipment expense and at the same time secure more attractive and sanitary equipment by using rich, mahogany colored "Fibrotta" ware.

"Fibrotta" articles are made in one piece, under tremendous hydraulic pressure, from a base of wood pulp. They have a hard, glass-like surface—impervious to moisture, no cracks or seams to catch or hold dirt, and are exceptionally durable and sightly. They will not dent out of shape, leak or fall apart, and are very easy to clean.

"Fibrotta" WARE

The "Fibrotta" line of money-saving equipment includes water pails for all purposes, fire pails approved by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, factory pails, pails for use around electrical wires, packers' and canners' pails that prevent deterioration of food products, waste baskets that will last a lifetime and whose contents will not sift out and litter the floor, liquid measures for vinegar, etc., that are not affected by fruit acids, slop jar mats to go under slop jars to save carpets and floors, tea trays, etc.

We also make "Fibrotta" safety powder flasks for mines—non-conductors of electricity, florists' vases and flower-pot saucers; and the famous "XXth Century" Water Cooler with "Fibrotta" body—the most attractive, sanitary and ice-saving cooler on the market. Write for our "Fibrotta" catalog and prices.

CORDLEY & HAYES
COOLER HEADQUARTERS

13 Leonard Street, Dept. J New York City
Established 1889

an Episcopal clergyman had come from another town. I sat drearily getting horrible pictures of the jail yard and waiting for Ethan. I was to drive to the station with Bill and himself to meet Lorena at eleven and I wished they would hurry. The courthouse clock and the Lutheran church bells struck half past ten as father came stalking back down the line of maple trees, and his face drew me to meet him in the hall. But he did not speak at once. He fell into one of the hall chairs and lit a cigar, then threw it on the rug and stared at me.

"Joe—I—you're old enough to have some judgment. What shall I do? She's—she's too young to know such a thing. What shall I do?"

"Who?" I gulped.

"I can't do it!" he said, speaking to something beyond me. "I can't tell her! Merciful God, I can't tell her!"

Here and by an instinct only I knew he was thinking of Lorena. I dropped back against the stairs.

"But he didn't shoot Marney because he thought she was in love with ——"

"He asked me to tell her he was sorry—that he'd killed the man she loved, Joe. I can't tell her that—I can't hurt the child. It's all—it's all ——"

This good and kind man laid his head on his arms and wept, and I stood in helpless stupidity, not believing such a thing could be other than a daydream of a new and awful sort.

"He says," my father muttered, "that he loved her from the day she first came into the store and that ever since she's been in Philadelphia he's been going mad. He was sure she loved Marney."

"Of course," I said, "of course, but she was only showin' off front of Eth—I won't say anything."

There were wheels outside and Ethan whistled. I jumped and it was like awaking. I hurried out to the surrey, where Bill and Ethan sat.

"Golly," Bill drawled, "you look funny!"

I said I had a headache, and Ethan was too remote to perceive the lie. We drove down to the station by an alley, avoiding the square. The platform was empty of its usual loungers, and their dogs had gone with them to prowl in the courthouse yard.

"It's too bad she's comin' to-day," Bill pondered. "Funny, it's such a nice day too! Seems a shame!"

The express rushed in on time, drowning the strokes of eleven, and Lorena descended without any ceremony in a pale-blue dress. It had buttons from the lower hem to the throat. She kissed Bill and me, nodded to Ethan, and the vapor on my brain lifted suddenly.

"My trunk won't get here till to-morrow, so let's get straight home. Oh, how is mother? And has Sumner got over the mumps yet? Why, Eth, you're all dressed up! White trousers and ——"

Ethan jerked the reins and the surr whirled away. He set two of his wh teeth in his lip and his lashes flickered w From the rear seat Lorena went on moc ing him:

"He's had his hair cut and a collar and ——"

Here, I think, she felt his anger. H voice grew timid all at once.

"Why don't you go up Clarke Stre Eth? It would be shorter by the squar "Couldn't go through the square, si said Bill. "There's an awful crowd. S they're hangin' Joyce when the clock stri twelve an' ——"

"Oh, shut up, Billy!" I wailed.

"Oh!" said Lorena. "Oh, Billy, why you tell me? Please drive faster, Eth de Let's get home."

The surrey swayed and rocked on t ruts down the long slope to the red fa house and Ethan drove very fast, but my shivering fancy all faces we passed w turned toward the still trees hiding dark heart of town. The Rosses were ga ered on the porch that pointed that w too, and even through the hubbub of t homecoming I heard the little lads ask what the square had looked like. Pr ently after Lorena had been borne upst to look at the new wall paper of her roo sat on the steps and fell to thinking—s in a daze—about my father and wonder if I had misunderstood somehow. But watch said that twelve must strike v soon.

I saw Sumner and Sheridan steal off the highest roof of the barn. Now, th was almost no shadow on the young c and the thin river winding off became arc of hot silver on the fields. Men stood far off on other farms, motionless, Lorena came out to the edge of the po and leaned on a column of honeysuck twisting a spray in her hands.

"I can't keep from thinking of it, It's so dreadful. Doesn't anyone kn why he did it?"

"Nobody," I said, getting up. I sta at the gold vane of the Lutheran sp Ethan walked out of the sitting room. feet sounded on the planks and brought eyes back for an instant.

"Why wouldn't you kiss me?" he manded, coming close to her. "Why did you kiss me at the station? You kis Billy an' Joe. I think you might h kissed me."

The bells began striking twelve as spoke, and tolled, a wind bringing the h so clearly that its vibrations echoed i his speech with a pained music. Ethan not hear.

"You might have kissed me!"

He took Lorena in his arms and for her face to his. She sighed and was q there.

The bells tolled on against their he less young felicity.

CAVE STUFF

(Concluded from Page 54)

"Who?" I was the victim of a thrill.

"The police."

"What for?"

"Breaking jail out East. She'd been in for manslaughter. It seems some other feller once was fresh with her and she's got a terrible temper. She let loose and nailed him—fatal. Gosh, she was known out home for her tantrums—a regular virago, she was!" He pronounced it with a soft G, which made it sound even more depraved. "When she come out here she tried to change her nature, same as she changed her name. Her name ain't Minnie Beltz at all. That's why she got me to name the baby Beltz—so's it would look real. That's brain work. You don't dare get funny with a woman as smart as that. You better meet her. She might think it queer, me being down here so long with you and all that. She always wants to know just what's going on. I'll call her."

"Wait! One thing more. Are you happy?"

"We're all right. We get along fine. Beltz is a wonderful kid. And do you know, it's sort of steadying now and again to get a taste of the old days. She reminds me of Addie, only she throws underhand. She keeps me up and kinder gives me ambition. I'll call her."

She was much what I had expected, only younger—a bashful, inoffensive, thin, undersized woman with pale-gray eyes. Once we were left alone together for a few minutes while Orville went upstairs to investig a remonstrance from the crib of the inf Beltz.

"Don't believe all Orville told you ab me," said Mrs. Ard suddenly, leaning ward me and speaking guardedly.

"Orville? He never said ——"

"I heard him. I was listening over balusters. But it ain't true. I made up that stuff about jail and manslaughter of my head. Oh, yes, I have a sort of qu way with me, but I never really killed a body. I just made him think so."

"But—why?" I gasped.

She grew a rich crimson.

"He told you how the girls were a him. Well, I wanted him too. Even a I knew he was such a big coward. Nob else knows it. And I got him under thumb."

"But suppose some day he should the notion to put the police on your trai

"I ain't afraid he'll ever get that tion."

She set her lips and I was startled the hard look of her mouth and chin.

Then she flashed out an attempt a smile. "You can look me up if you d believe me," she added. "The Beltzes Grant's Mills, Pennsylvania. Ask Minnie."

But I never did. It would be a appointment to find out for certain t she was a liar, and a far greater one to out for certain that she wasn't.

BONDS OF PATRIMONY

(Continued from Page 11)

I ever need to I certainly will," she med, and then her mind reverted to eat coincidence. "I can't get over hw your mother could have lived here
h time and I never saw you here."
I isn't strange. She's been here two r but I was traveling. I haven't been in New York more than two months.
I didn't come to live with mother
p because this place isn't large enough.
hen her lease expires, in a couple of rs, we'll be together."
h could claim no especial merit for deir that he was unmarried. But she ered that the women of the l had suffered him to remain

all you get another apart-here?"
), I rather think we'll go to the ps—Westchester County."
M. Hewetson was gene alarmed.
ad take Mrs. Marlin from me when we've discovered ther?" e'll hope it be quite so all that. It s me a lot to you like her."
ad it pleases she said, "to you think t her that

"Hello, Charlie! This is Sam. Listen, Charlie—I've Got a Client With a Pile of Money"

Hfound himself
o very much telling Mrs.
etson more himself than he had ind. He had been drawn o his present position to sullize a new theory. He the title of fourth vice sident, but he wasn't yet ecutive. His duty was to develop good l or the bank. He was the ironer-out a complaints of customers; he was the ile man; the counselor of the timid; alesman, not of the bank's services
f the personality of the bank.
's a mighty delicate job, because it's bad and indefinite," he said.
ut what is there ahead, Mr. Marlin?"
verything! You see, I started in a -town bank. I've been through the Then I was on the road for a big note-rage firm. Now they've put me in for a stop-gap and if I do well I'll go on up."
ou're sure to do that," she said, and Marlin reddened with appreciation.
she took leave of her hostess Mrs.
etson mentioned an errand a few blocks on Broadway, and the fourth vice dent was prompt to offer his escort.
m going to the Subway, anyhow," he ied.
. Derrick, therefore, from his hard n in the lobby, saw them emerge from levator together, and before he recogl the banker or had guessed from the boy's violent pantomime that Mrs.
etson was Mrs. Hewetson, he had n to admire her immensely. Then the omime and the identity of Marlin ied his perceptions at the same mo-
. It was disconcerting to him to find rey in retreat, for he had counted on ng an interview by half past five at the t, and it was especially annoying to ze that he had placed himself directly r the guns, so to speak. But Mr. Marcordiality calmed him and gave a t balance to his hope.
"Hello, Charlie Derrick!"
"Why, Harry, I didn't expect to see you n so soon!"
"Mrs. Hewetson, may I present a very acquaintance of mine, Mr. Derrick?
ven't seen him since day before yester-but we worked side by side in Trenton wo solid years. What are you up in this n for, Charlie?"
r. Derrick inclined his head toward the
w. "I was hoping to see Mrs. Hewetson w minutes about some bonds."
r. Marlin, not noticing that the girl by ide looked rather blank, put his hand
Mr. Derrick's sleeve.
Well, I can say this much, Mrs. Hewet-
If you don't buy your securities ugh my bank there's no one else I'd t any further than I do Mr. Derrick.
Anything he's willing to recommend I wouldn't be afraid to buy."

"Thank you, Harry." Mr. Derrick had perspective, and he knew better than to remain in the neighborhood any longer. The introduction was invaluable, but he could reap the full benefit of it only by proving that he had tact as well as judgment. "I'll try to call at a more convenient time," he said, and though he was also bound for the Subway station he started off in the opposite direction, and walked round the block.

"I think I could do business with that man," said Mrs. Hewetson thoughtfully.

"I don't believe he'd nag me."

"I don't pretend to answer for his social qualities," said Mr. Marlin with equal thoughtfulness, "but as far as common—or uncommon—honesty goes, he's a prince."

Now after an evening with Mr. Crankshaw, an evening of which Mr. Crankshaw's lecture on the terminology of Wall Street took up the greater part, Mrs. Hewetson began gradually to comprehend some of the lighter reading matter on the financial pages. When Mr. Derrick came to seek her patronage he professed to be quite numbed by her sagacity, but he had of course divined at once that she was youthfully proud of her vernacular. He praised the investments she had already made, and especially the Southwestern Electric, but he pointed out a five per cent municipal which she could get for 97½.

The deference of Mr. Crankshaw and Mr. Derrick and that of some of George's former brokers, who also approached her, was effective. Even before George had died the Suffrage Amendment had made her a person legally, but while she had had a husband as well as a vote they neutralized each other. She was feeling a keen new individuality in this purchase of commodities so refreshingly different from all the purchases she had made in her capacity of wife. To buy the necessaries of existence—clothes excepted—was no fun at all; this was fascinating. She began to understand how men are hypnotized by Wall Street. She herself, though a staid investor and not a speculator, was becoming hypnotized.

She disliked to ask Mr. Crankshaw what he thought of Mr. Derrick's pet municipal, because she thought that Mr. Crankshaw might be offended. To be sure, she had said to him that she wanted all her advice to spring from a single source, but he had spoken favorably of municipals in general. And Mr. Crankshaw, though he had offered to act as her agent in the matter of buying $15,000 Southwestern Electric, was a lawyer and not a broker. Mr. Derrick was a broker and lived on commissions. And he was so enthusiastic that eventually she bought $10,000 of his city bonds, though to make up the full amount she added the proceeds of the sale of the touring car and also of a few Eastern Pacific 6's, which she had acquired at 113 and sold at 113¼.

Similarly and with a certain vague impression of disloyalty both to Mr. Crankshaw and Mr. Derrick she sold the rest of the Eastern Pacific bonds to buy United Kingdom 6's at par from one of the brokers who had enjoyed her husband's favor. She observed that if she were careful and watchful she could augment her income considerably by selling now and then and buying at lower figures. And it seemed to her a matter of pure courtesy to refrain from telling Broker Number Two, for instance, that she had sold Eastern Pacifics, which he had persuaded her to buy, in order to get into United Kingdom, sponsored by Broker Number One. So that she adopted the habit—logical enough to Mrs. Hewetson—of using Mr. Marlin's bank as a selling agent to keep peace in the family. She bought

Quaker Flour

Made by The Quaker Oats Company

Compare Them

Compare Quaker Flour—the new-grade Flour—with ordinary flour. Note its whiteness and its fineness. Then see what bread it makes.

You can see that Quaker mills make extraordinary Flour. And when you see that you will want it.

A Million Now Enjoy It

Quaker Flour has already won a million users. Four great mills, with a daily capacity of 10,000 barrels, are running to supply them.

But remember this:

Millions of people, for decades, have been learning Quaker quality. Lovers of good things everywhere call for Quaker Cereals.

We made Quaker Flour for them. We employed flour experts, built a model mill, equipped it in the ideal way.

We installed a laboratory to analyze it and a bakery to test it—all the time.

Then we adopted a standard which called for using only one-half of the wheat kernel—just the choicest 50 per cent.

Women bought it at the start because it was Quaker Flour. The first sack surprised them—taught them how good Flour could be.

Then they told neighbors. A million people thus came to enjoy it before it was advertised.

It is time your grocer had it—time you knew about it. Tell him to send a sack. Or, if he lacks it, ask him to get it for you.

If you love Quaker Cereals, you'll appreciate this Flour.

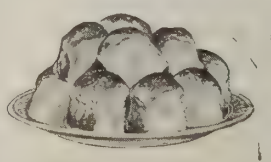
The Quaker Oats Company

Mills in Akron, O.; Cedar Rapids, Ia.; Peterborough, Ont.; and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan

In our Canadian mills, to conform to Government requirements, we use over one-half the wheat kernel.

(3236)

Quaker Biscuit Flour



This is a special flour made from special wheat for fine foods. Use it instead of bread flour for biscuits, pancakes, doughnuts, cakes, cookies, etc.

It is self-raising. The leavening ingredients form a perfect mixture. The sealed round packages with tops keep it ever-fresh.

Quaker Farina

Granulated inner wheat, using but half of the kernel. A fancy farina without a fancy price—the finest grade that's possible.

For a breakfast dainty or for fritters, for griddle cakes, waffles, etc. The granulations add delight to such foods, as you know.

"That is a shave"

"Smoother Faces"

Refreshing as the bath; smooth as the shirt front; satisfying as the last pat to the bow tie. A Smoother Face adds the final touch of distinction.

Gem Damaskeene Blades—keen as Damascus steel—actually give a new satisfaction to shaving. They remove the fine stubble your present razor leaves. That is why the Gem gives Smoother Faces.

"The Blade is the Razor"

The steel in these blades, so tough yet resilient; so highly tempered and accurately ground; so delicately yet durably edged—this steel is unique in Razordom. Because it is the result of 30 long years of study, experiment and patented improvement.

GEM DAMASKEENE RAZOR

This razor is scientific simplicity itself. Scientific because the Universal Angle holds the blade against your face at the correct angle for shaving; simple because there are no risky adjustments to make.

Learn today the comfort of a refreshed and silken skin, the pride of a Smoother Face.

Are you sure you shave correctly? There is a way to get a better shave with any razor. It is told in "Smoother Faces and how to Get One." Shall we send you a copy?

$1.00 The Standard Gem Set includes frame and handle, stropping device and seven Damaskeene Blades in compact, velvet-lined case. Other Gem Sets up to $10.

GEM SAFETY RAZOR CORP., New York

Canadian Branch: 591 St. Catherine Street, W., Montreal

where she would, but she always sold through the bank. And, furthermore, she made her transactions through the head of the ladies' department and not through Mr. Marlin, because she was improving in friendship with his mother and thought it inadvisable for him to learn too much about her private affairs. There were enough spectators already.

She was often in the company of the two Marlins now, but the son never talked shop to her, and she always was glad to see him—partly for that reason. And only once did Mrs. Marlin venture into comment, and that, as Mrs. Hewetson—though momentarily resentful—had to admit, was out of sheer motherliness. She said that Harry said that the cost of living was going up, not down, and she hated to see Mrs. Hewetson spending money so unguardedly. But Mrs. Hewetson protested that if there were any one thing she did more execrably than anything else it was to keep accounts, and besides her income had increased a third since May, and this was only September. Her advisers, seemingly by unanimous opinion, were steadily driving ahead the increase.

"Now, so far," said Mr. Crankshaw, "I've put you into three or four good solid issues, and with the others you had already you've got a rock-bottom foundation. If I were you I'd take a very little—a v-e-r-y little risk. Here's a seven per cent preferred stock of a first-class industrial corporation you can get at 98. Not that I'd plunge exactly, but a few thousand of it wouldn't be too much, and I honestly think it's all right. It's cotton duck, and you know what that is."

"Of course," said Mr. Derrick in the same era, "I know you're not buying everything from me, but I can guess how much you've done with other people and my guess is that in these six months you've invested upward of fifty thousand dollars, to say nothing of what you had before I met you. Now anybody with an income as big as yours, Mrs. Hewetson, can afford to take a small gamble once in a while. I said a small one—and once in a while. And I don't mean gambling on margins either. That's for men. But Tube common, at 84, looks mighty good to me. They're paying four per cent now and we expect an increase to six at the next meeting. It'll go to par if that happens. Mind you, I don't say it's a certainty, but if you feel you've got enough of a wall behind you to take a flyer, why this is the best suggestion I've got, either as an income proposition or for a quick profit on the rise."

Time had its way with her and she was steadily growing beautiful. It was beauty lost for the most part on both Mr. Derrick and Mr. Crankshaw, for both of them were intensely practical. But the two older brokers and a battalion of college-bred bond salesmen, who had discovered that she could listen well, began to stammer when they interviewed her.

The Marlins had moved out to Westchester County and she sometimes spent a happy week-end with them. Harry Marlin still kept his agreement and never offered gratuitous advice, though frequently she caught him looking sidewise at her with an odd reminiscence in his eyes. Mrs. Hewetson wasn't yet ready to concede even to herself that half a year of independent financiering had vaguely confused her and that she wished she could intrust her future to a single counsellor, as once she had resolved to intrust it to Mr. Crankshaw. The more she learned about the market the more she feared it. It was getting too good to be true—this slow methodical process of enlarging upon her gains. She liked Mr. Marlin; she had confidence in him and he was kind and ingenuous. But Mrs. Hewetson had intuitions of her own and she felt that it wouldn't do to become a protégée of anyone so good-looking and susceptible. And Mrs. Marlin had ever so tactfully referred again to Mrs. Hewetson's apartment—twice too commodious for Mrs. Hewetson. Distinctly her one ideal adviser should be disinterested and officially he should have no family at all. She was afraid sometimes that Mr. Marlin's avoidance of business talk was in order that he might concentrate on the personal pronouns unhampered.

But it was Mr. Crankshaw who gave her the first definite basis for introspection. It was merely a small cluster of violets from a mediocre florist's, but she knew without thinking very hard that Mr. Crankshaw didn't spend much money on pleasure flowers. These meant precision of purpose.

"Bhrummp!" coughed Mr. Cranksha when she thanked him. "I thought—ah I thought they matched—ah—well, an how, I'm glad you liked 'em."

He continued to treat her with mark respect, but a subtle warning crept in the atmosphere. He called twice at t apartment and talked of art, literature a the nature of the soul without ever on touching upon the stock market. He w an old college crony of her husband's, a when he chose he could be really int esting. And she liked him better becau he had ambitions and because he want to go to Albany, he said, to do his sim duty as a state senator and to carry out lifelong plans for the benefit of the co monwealth. He sent her a spray of carn tions and invited her to lunch with him the Ritz. It was a diversion foreign to h since January and her pleasure was obvio enough to give Mr. Crankshaw a go deal of encouragement. Lest she put h down as too great a materialist, howev he gave her a book by Walter Pater t following week, and she never suspect that it had bored him as much as it did h to read it.

When he bestowed upon her next dozen Killarney roses, followed it with the fortnight by an invitation to hear Ga Curci at the Metropolitan, and upon h regretful refusal, due to a previous acce ance of a Marlin week-end, sent her a she of American Beauties, she realized that was bent upon a whirlwind conquest a was building on cumulative values, meth ically widening the scope as well as the c of his attentions.

The prospect of a second marriage s shocked her a little and frightened her good deal, but she was lonely enough to stimulated by almost anyone who co talk intelligently. She couldn't hones say that she cared for Mr. Crankshaw, b neither could she say that after the cal dar had ripened a little more she mightr

It was while she was thinking seric thoughts about Mr. Crankshaw, but bef those thoughts had begun to agitate h that he arrived one evening for an adm tedly professional session. He had work out for her, he said, on his own initiative sort of project which included all the secu ties she ought to own. He conceded t it was a well-balanced and logical sche and he offered in evidence a score of she of yellow scratch paper covered with e mates and notes. He had begun to dou he said, whether she had really establis any very consistent theory of buying a he thought it his duty to recommend compact and carefully studied plan and volunteer to take charge of the situat and consolidate her resources.

After he had gone, leaving the evide behind him, she spent a few uneasy m utes in contemplation. She knew at outset that his statement was justifi But unless she denied it she couldn't how she could discuss it with him or t any positive action without either infor ing him that she hadn't relied entirely his advice in the past, or else terminat her business dealings with Mr. Derrick a the two older brokers and the young bo salesmen. And all of these had manag to procure a footing of moderate frie ship—at the minimum.

Reflectively she shuffled the yell sheets once more and her eyes caught page which was quite unfamiliar to her. contained most prominently a neat table figures, but the major part of it was voted to the idle scribblings of a man w by habit kept his hands busy while he w thinking deep thoughts. The tabulat was of all the securities Mrs. Hewetson h bought on Mr. Crankshaw's advice; th there was a total and an added ite "Bought Elsewhere, Approx.," and a gra total. The grand total was $125,000.

Bewildered, Mrs. Hewetson turned her tention to the scribblings. There w many repetitions of "Alice," which was own Christian name. There was a r of "Mrs. Alice Hewetson-Crankshaw" There were two or three scattered sig tures, "The Honorable Samuel Ellingt Crankshaw." There was "Senator a Mrs. Crankshaw." Then there was a st tling entry:

A. H. $125,000 x .06	$7
S. E. C. Profit, 1920, estimate	3
	$10

Budget: Living exp., $5000. Car, $2000. Tra $1000. Speculation, $1000.

Contrib. fund—senatorship, $1500.

(Continued on Page 177)

(Continued from Page 174)

Ms. Hewetson put down the incrimi-atig sheet and stared long and hard at acucy. An impulse to cry and an im-uls to laugh came upon her simultane-us and made the correct combination or ysteria, but she fought it down. All rough her life she had heard of men aving for money and she had regarded it it the tolerance of all normal young oe who marry for love and are de-ghted with money if they happen to get a too. But to be herself the object of a rtune hunter's crusade wasn't at all a bject for toleration.

She took up again the belittling document, na an impetuous motion as though to ea t across—and stayed her hand in time. Her cheeks went scarlet at the gross affront o ir pride. She had thought him so cour-eo and so considerate. And if Mr. Crkshaw—the conception of this took er breath away—if Mr. Crankshaw had ee swayed by her money how much faith out she put in the friendliness of Mr. Dwick and all the others. Were they gen-iny interested in advancing her welfare, r ere they also—all but one married rcer—looking for potential endowments?

Nothing else could so thoroughly have hken her credence in the goodness of uman nature. And the worst of it was hs Mr. Crankshaw had left no room for ioubt. She would gladly have doubted—oo much in regard for Mr. Crankshaw s support of her own poise—but in set-in down his dreams on paper he had been oexplicit to permit of any suspended udgment. The appropriation of a thou-ar dollars for speculation was the last trv. Under other auspices she might ha stood for the state senatorship, but hi gambling allowance—especially in view f his own estimated earnings, which ored his past duplicity—was a bomb-sh.

The first shock of the discovery had dis-ipted and she could remember now that h had never cared for him. She had only vondered if such a thing were possible. Th answer was monosyllabic. And hugh Mrs. Hewetson slept fitfully that nit her grief was for a lost ideal and not on lost suitor. And she was too old to mrn about generalities.

He waited until half past twelve the ne day, and telephoned then to Mr. Crkshaw's office, knowing that he would beut to lunch.

"Take the message?" asked Miss Pimm, ang some breath.

"If you will, please," said Mrs. Hewet-o sweetly. "I want him to draw me up a ver important paper just as soon as he ca Tell him I've read over what he left wh me last night and I think he's right. Bt I've decided to do something else. Wat is it I'd have to do to put all my property in shape so that somebody could manage it for me, and then if a certain thg happened pay it all over to my hus-band's college?"

"Trust deed," said Miss Pimm.

"That sounds like it. Well, anyway, tht's what I want him to do."

"What trust company, please?"

"Why, leave that part blank."

"Any conditions to the reversion?"

"What?"

"Any strings on the gift to the college?"

"Oh, no!"

"What's the 'certain thing'? Your death?"

"No," said Mrs. Hewetson, "my mar-riage—to anybody."

There was a most extraordinary flicker in th sound waves.

"Clever!" said Miss Pimm.

"I beg your pardon?"

"Clever of you," said Miss Pimm. "orted those papers for him myself. I kow what you mean. Saw it myself. Let it sty there." Again that clicking laughter. "erves him right," said Miss Pimm. "on't worry. I'll tell him what you sid verbatim. I was scared for a while. Finest."

Mrs. Hewetson thrilled to the sympathy in Miss Pimm's austere voice. She had chosen to send her message indirectly in the belief that it would arrive with more telling effect, but the sisterhood of Miss Pimm was an unexpected reënforcement. Still it was a very private matter to discuss with a stenographer, and Mrs. Hewetson, though conscious of immense gratitude, was shy.

"I'll be at Mrs. Marlin's this afternoon, if Mr. Crankshaw has any questions to ask about it."

"I quit to-night," said Miss Pimm. "He's a bum lawyer. Selfish. Too rich for my blood. Thought it might do you a good turn though."

"Th-thank you, my dear," said Mrs. Hewetson with difficulty.

"Guess you ought to," said Miss Pimm with another chuckle. "'T's all right. We understand each other. You're clever. I'll enjoy telling him. Goo'-by."

She had hardly reached the Marlins' house when Mr. Crankshaw called her.

"What's all this Miss Pimm tells me?"

"Didn't she give you my message?"

"Yes, but—but, my dear Mrs. Hewetson, are you sure it's wise?"

"It's a safeguard," she said. "It's so I can be positive in case I ever should—if I should ever marry again that the only attraction would be—be me. Probably you can't realize how a woman feels about that. And I can't ever let myself think of George's money being a bulwark to somebody else. I'm going to adopt your plan, Mr. Crankshaw, except one part of it. I'm not going to have an individual look after me—I want a trust company. And if I marry again the money's to go to the college in George's name."

There was a long silence. Mr. Crankshaw had plenty of ideas, but none that would bear expression.

"Is this final?"

"Oh, quite! It's practically your own plan too."

She said this in the nicest voice she could summon.

Again a long hiatus.

"Hadn't you better send me a list of what you're going to turn over to the trust company?"

"No, leave that blank too. All I want is the form."

Here ensued the longest silence of all.

"I'll mail it to you as soon as it's drawn up," said Mr. Crankshaw, with the intonation of a mother bidding farewell to her soldier son.

The atmosphere of the Marlin household was particularly soothing to her on this occasion. She had told herself that she could never face a bachelor again and keep in countenance, but Harry Marlin, single-handed, not only won his own place in her hierarchy but also reëstablished a small fraction of her general faith. She wondered as he talked to her if this were due to his noninterference with her business arrangements. Certainly theirs was a relationship in which there had never been the slightest stricture. Perhaps his ignorance of her affairs was a special blessing. She resolved to keep him in ignorance as long as she could.

"But I don't like to see you so tired," he said to her at parting. "When there's anything I can spare you—remember your promise?"

"I will," she reiterated, and she hoped that he remembered it—all of it—as well as she did.

She had believed that Mr. Crankshaw was enough of a diplomat, regardless of any hypocrisy he might have in him, to slack off his attentions by degrees, but she was mistaken. Within a quarter hour on the same afternoon, a day or two later, she received from him three communications. One was an armful of American Beauties, which intuition told her he was substituting for a swan song; one was the deed of trust; and one was his bill to cover professional services rendered during the last six months.

At first, because each of these items made her more indignant than the last, she put all three of them in the wastebasket. On second thought, she fished out the roses. They were the gift of an unworthy man, but in themselves they were innocent and worthy of a happier fate. She was too sensible to return them to Mr. Crankshaw, for in that case their ephemeral beauty would be lost to everyone, so she readdressed the box to the Woman's Hospital round the corner and let Mr. Crankshaw's card stay in it.

As to the bill she was more uncertain. She had gasped at its outrageous inexcusable size, and with true feminine stubbornness she had determined that Mr. Crankshaw could wait until she got good and ready to pay it. But she presently retrieved the bill, too, and wrote a brave check for the full amount and inclosed in the same envelope that sheet of yellow paper which bore his mortification in his own handwriting.

Finally she recovered the deed of trust. She had never intended, of course, to make

—and It's the Woman's Pencil, Too

Another distinctive thing about Eversharp is that it has jumped into immediate favor as the woman's pencil, just as it has won its way into the good graces of a million men writers.

Women admire Eversharp for its wondrous beauty, the result of jeweler artisanship. They appreciate the new writing comfort afforded by the always-sharp writing point. They like the handy sizes so easily carried in bag or on chain.

The economy also appeals. Eversharp carries enough lead for a quarter million words—ten thousand words one cent—and a point for every word.

No other pencil combines so generously such beauty, convenience, writing comfort, and lasting economy.

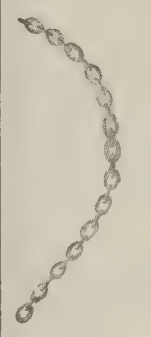
For men, Eversharp comes in regular size, as well as in small-pocket size, with or without ring for chain. There's an Eversharp style for all who write, and prices start as low as $1.

Don't forget Eversharp when next you plan to please someone's heart and hand. Eversharp will be a lifelong reminder of a writing gift well chosen. If you do not already own Eversharp, buy one now. You'll experience a totally new writing comfort.

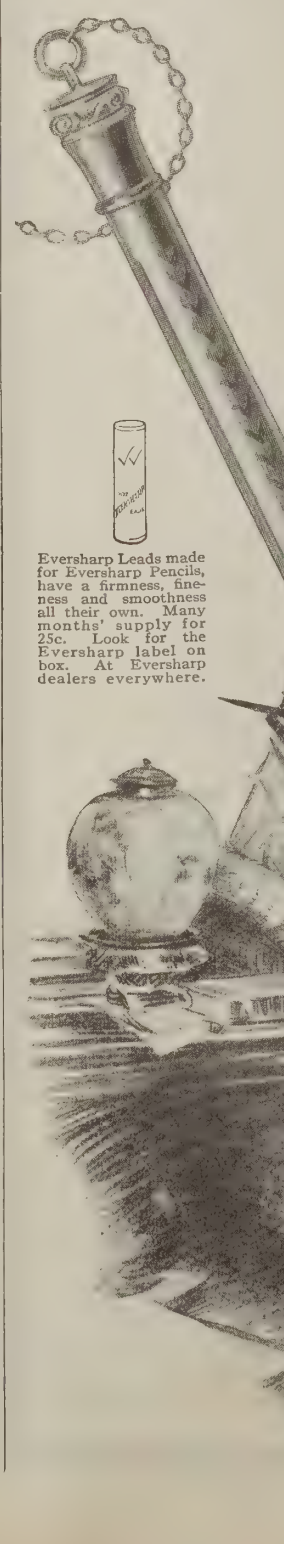
If your dealer is not supplied, write for descriptive literature to aid in selection direct.

THE WAHL CO., 1800 Roscoe St., Chicago, Ill., U.S.A.
EASTERN OFFICE: Astor Trust Bldg., 501 5th Ave., New York
BERT M. MORRIS COMPANY, 444 Market St., San Francisco, Cal.
Western Representatives for Eversharp Pencils and Tempoint Fountain Pens.
CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES: Rowland & Campbell, Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba.

DEALERS: Write today for catalog and interesting proposition on Eversharp and Tempoint



Eversharp Leads made for Eversharp Pencils, have a firmness, fineness and smoothness all their own. Many months' supply for 25c. Look for the Eversharp label on box. At Eversharp dealers everywhere.

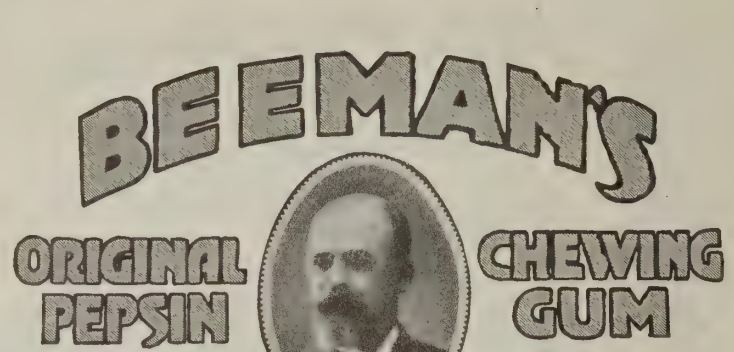


EVERSHARP

ALWAYS SHARP—NEVER SHARPENED

Right-Hand Mate to the famous Tempoint Pen

The symbol of perfect writing—the mark of Eversharp Pencil and Tempoint Pen.



Pure Chewing Gum

MY Original Pepsin Chewing Gum is an absolutely pure product.

I use in its making pure chicle—the latex of the sapodilla tree,—combined with pure sugar to which I add pure pepsin.

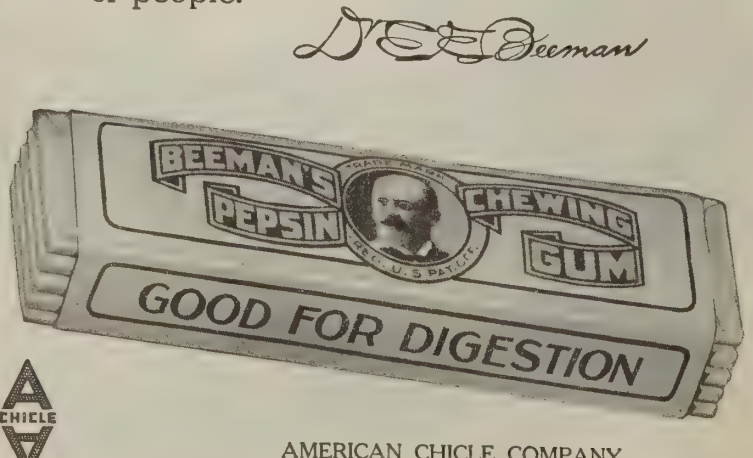
But, before these ingredients reach you in the form of Beeman's Original Pepsin Chewing Gum, they are cooked in kettles, such as are used in candy kitchens, where they are thoroughly sterilized.

My gum is wrapped on automatic wrapping machines and is never touched by human hands until it reaches you.

I make these statements, for I know that you should know that everything that goes into your mouth should be pure and wholesome.

As an aid to digestion, particularly to people who improperly masticate their food at their meals, my Original Pepsin Chewing Gum is used throughout the country by thousands of people.

D. E. Beeman



CHICLE

AMERICAN CHICLE COMPANY

New York Cleveland Chicago Kansas City San Francisco

use of it. It had been designed solely for the purpose of assaying Mr. Crankshaw's motives. But it occurred to her that by showing it to Mr. Derrick and others she might continue to learn something about the world. She deprecated the lesson in advance, but the opportunity was not to be forgone.

More adventurous than Mr. Crankshaw and more circumspect and polished was Mr. Derrick. He was generous with flattery, but parsimonious with roses—and he specialized in tones of the voice. If there had been fifty chairs in the room he could still have managed without effort to get both Mrs. Hewetson and himself seated on the one divan, and he could make optically more personal remarks in an evening than his tongue would authorize in a month of Sundays.

"You're bothered about something," he said almost immediately.

"Yes, I am," said Mrs. Hewetson.

"Is there anything I can do?"

"Well, I don't know. It depends."

"Depends on what?"

"It depends," she said, "on how good a friend of mine you are."

Mr. Derrick, who had been calling on her at least a half dozen times a month, managed to convey without speech a fair approximation of his sentiments.

"I don't think you need to question that."

"I want to make sure," said Mrs. Hewetson.

Mr. Derrick, who had pursued Fabian tactics until now, rested his hand lightly upon hers for a tenth of a second.

"I'm sure—now," he said.

She looked at him in a way which sent his pulses jumping.

"Would it make any difference in our friendship if I had to tell you something that might seem like—well, like a sort of confession of helplessness? Would you have to think any less of me?"

"On the contrary," said Mr. Derrick with abandon.

"It's just the bother and torment of keeping things straight," she said. "I thought it was a lot of fun at first, but it's getting to be like a millstone round my neck. I'm sick of business—business and money. I hate it."

"What you really ought to have," said Mr. Derrick, battling down his quick delight, "is someone to take complete charge of all your affairs. You ought not to have to look the way you're looking these days."

She didn't let him see the reaction she felt.

"And how's that?"

"Almost as though you didn't have a friend left in the world. And that isn't true either. You ought to have somebody to look after you." He leaned a little toward her. "Had you ever thought of that?"

She nodded without speaking, and Mr. Derrick's courage multiplied.

"I've often thought of it for you, Mrs. Hewetson."

"Had you?"

Her voice was very low.

"Often."

He put his hand tentatively over hers. Mrs. Hewetson rose without apparently noticing his overture.

"Perhaps you can help me fill in the name then," she said. "I knew you'd be glad to help me."

Mr. Derrick watched her with great curiosity.

"The name? The name of what?"

She was bringing him the deed, and a spontaneous thrill of exultation crept over him. He didn't know what she had in her hands, but he was thrilled just the same, because her manner appealed to him as significant of her dependence.

"The name of the one who'll take charge of me."

Mr. Derrick stood upright.

"I can do that, yes. I've known it all along—shall I tell you?"

She delivered ten pages of legal cap into his keeping.

"I'd thought of the River Trust Company," she said.

Mr. Derrick gazed at her, saw that she had missed his painstakingly constructed trap and hesitated. And that instant of hesitation was long enough to permit his eye to fall on the heading of the document. He gazed no more at Mrs. Hewetson; he had something else to occupy his fancy.

"Well!" said Mr. Derrick lamely. "What's this?"

He sat down soberly and read it through paragraph by paragraph. And then he proved that he was far more diplomati and far more sportsmanlike than Mr Crankshaw.

"Don't make it the River Trust—mak it Marlin's bank," said Mr. Derrick heroic ally. "They've got a trust department an it's a better organization anyway."

In fifteen minutes he was out on the side walk, and though he continued to call o her occasionally after that he always sa ten feet distant and never attempted t hold her hand; and as soon as he suggeste it she bought fifty shares of Steel commo from him so as not to hurt his feeling For the rest of his life, whenever he though of her he became soulful and told himsel that she was the finest woman he had eve met and that the only reason he had neve proposed to her was because he couldn support her.

By spring she had heard flat declara tions from the older unmarried broker an from two of the college-bred bond sales men; and there were many days when sh wondered wretchedly if they also had bee dazzled by her fortune. She hadn't pos sessed the stamina to flaunt the deed o trust again; it had served its purpose we and she had destroyed it. She had twic been bruised by the realization that me would be glad to marry her for her money and she didn't care to add to the roster o privateers. If anyone else were similarl minded she preferred not to know it. S she refused these later suitors as kindly a she could and tried to believe them honor able, but even then she had to concede tha every proposal and every proffer of assist ance had come from those who made com missions out of her market trading. It wa a sorrowful condition for a woman to con template and it filled her with resentmen and chagrin.

Moreover, she was acquiring a weight burden of other troubles. She wasn't im mune to the high cost of living and ever month she had to make a little deeper in cursion into her capital. She was fightin down a conviction that she ought to mov to less fashionable quarters and begin t economize. And it wasn't due to any in herent ostentation. It was due solely t her sentiments that she hadn't done th long ago. The apartment she lived in ha been her home and George's. Once sh had gone to Mr. Crankshaw to spea about subletting it, but that was the da of Miss Pimm's confidence, and afterwar Mrs. Hewetson was more attached to ho home than ever. But the lease expire in May and try as she would she couldn justify the extravagance of a renewal.

To her rescue before she had begun t search for a new apartment came Mr Marlin.

"It's utterly foolish," said Mrs. Marlin "for a girl like you to stay in New Yor when she doesn't need to. There's a lovel old-fashioned house right next to ours an you can have three rooms and bath unfu nished for a hundred dollars a month."

"Not with board!" said Mrs. Hewetson

"Oh, no! But doesn't that beat a apartment in town? You come and see it doesn't."

She came and saw and signed a lease for year and the first of May found her hap pier than she had recently hoped to b She still had troubles, but they were le grave, for she had found some tractio bonds at 86 and some promising industria at 82. But she was growing impatient inactivity.

"I'm thinking of finding something t do," she confided to Mrs. Marlin. "Th sort of life isn't doing me any good, or an body else either. And it's no fun to fe useless. I wonder what I could do?"

"We'll ask Harry," said Mrs. Marlin.

Accordingly they asked him, and Harr shook his head and frowned and said tha the opportunities were unlimited.

"But it all depends on how you go abou it," he finished. "No employer ever wan to hire anybody who doesn't have to wor and doesn't positively want to fill that pa ticular job. No employer wants to hi anybody who's simply trying to keep fro being bored. It doesn't pay and it's su to bring about friction. If you're real anxious to be busy you'll have to act though you didn't have a penny in th world."

"Well, what could I do?"

Mr. Marlin regarded her narrowly.

"How'd you like to take charge of th women employees in our bank? There a little welfare work about it and a goo

(Concluded on Page 181)

(Concluded from Page 178)

o mothering. Most of the girls are in r ens yet—clerks and messengers.
, lvarn you, you'd have to keep reguho's, and be as punctual and diligent nyne else. Are you positive you want iv up that much time? It probably t e worth your while from a money t view, either."
-Iv much would I be paid?" she ine flushed with excitement.
Jeen hundred," said Mr. Marlin.
d here's another 'out' about it too."
\ ! what's that?"
I be your boss," said Mr. Marlin.
e se all that sort of work's in my ie. The vacancy won't exist until fit of June. But it would keep you r-f that's all you're hunting for."
C I have a few days to think it
-nd talk it over?"
A long as you like. I'll give you what o-fashioned people call the 'refusal' augned. "Does that mean that I'm d to refuse it?"

N it means that nobody else has a c to refuse it until you've decided."
T n I'll try not to take too long," she
ed. "But would it bore you awfully a to me now and then about other g[might do?"
It wouldn't bore me to talk to you anything," said Mr. Marlin.
e ertainly should have known whether d r not, because she was asked to dine h Marlins' at least twice a week, and h other evenings she usually dropped o the minimum of an hour with his h . Sometimes they all sat on the tiny l lawn and idled, and at other times to women worked on feminine fabilioors while Mr. Marlin read to them n ne evening paper.
Had been reading for them one eve-g hen suddenly his slow masculine per-ns were caught and held by a new n attaching to Mrs. Hewetson. It e first time he had seen her in any-g but black or white. And she was rg a gown of silver-gray georgette,
, s she sat in profile toward him, she e almost a full decade younger and nly more lovely—and deserted.
u moned by the invisible telegraph, ised her eyes, and instantaneously dopped them. But Mr. Marlin was in sition to note that the color deepened e cheeks, and he was astonished that nt home early. He was still more ished and baffled that she didn't drop in until she was specifically asked.
spoke to his mother about it, and his dr added to his perplexity by smooth-h hair as if he had been a small boy, nswering too vaguely to satisfy him.
r when she was specifically asked to e he came. Mr. Marlin had counted t usual enjoyment that evening, and d never enjoyed a dinner less. It was sible to keep the general discourse n it was impossible to kindle a spark of t ulity.
the conclusion of the ordeal, Mrs.
n excused herself to hold a parley
h e cook and the two younger people
r ered out to the lawn.
ell," said Mr. Marlin, breaking the n silence; "have you decided yet e er you'll come into the bank or not?"
Mrs. Hewetson gave a little start.
h! Why, I've thought about it a deal. I can't say that I've quite made sion yet, but ——"
left the sentence unfinished, but her had made the rest of it unnecessary.
ut you've practically decided to re-" tried to laugh. "Well, you said I had fusal, didn't you?"
. Marlin was very grave.
an't I know what's influenced you?"
hardly know myself."
ou haven't found something else that hink would be more interesting?"
o. Oh, no! But—I'm still looking."
is that you don't want to come there se I'm there?"
artly. That was why I wanted to and—that's why I can't."
Why not?"
e shook her head. There was no way lightening him without making a of confessions she couldn't bring hero make, and they weren't only of the nt, they were of the past and future.
. Marlin took a turn around the lawn rought up sharply before her, resolute.
his has gone far enough!" said Mr.
in, and although his words were peremptory, his tone was vibrant. "It's gone far enough! Somebody's got to look after you, and if you won't admit it, I will. I'm going to do it myself. I'm going to marry you! There!"

She had known that this moment would come and she had dimly fancied that she knew how to live through it. Even so, and even with half a dozen proposals to her credit, she was as unpoised as an ingénue. It was the first time that she had been told, and not asked, her preference. In spite of herself, she liked it. Unfortunately, as she had gathered wisdom, she had attained to a gentle height of skepticism. She no longer dared to trust to her heart for inspiration. Experience had treated her, during her trials with Mr. Crankshaw and Mr. Derrick, as lightly as it could, but the lesson was unforgetable. Against her best instincts, yet she was afraid.

She struggled for an expression, for a question which would convey her exact meaning to him and show him that she didn't actually doubt his motives, but that she needed to be reassured, persuaded, convinced. And she struggled for so long a time that presently she grew demoralized, and her thoughts lost coherence, and she heard herself faltering, not the well-chosen interrogation, but the bare gist of it: "Is it—is it me, or is it my—my money ——"

She got no farther. Mr. Marlin had swooped down upon her and caught her hands. "Why, you poor little girl," he said tenderly, "you haven't any money! It's you I want!"

Mrs. Hewetson suddenly went limp.

"What makes you say that?" she asked.

"Why, I'm a banker!" said Mr. Marlin. "You wouldn't let me help you; you didn't ever come to me; but I knew, dear. How could I help it? I watched your account as soon as I suspected. All you ever deposited with us was your insurance money, wasn't it? That was all you had, wasn't it?" He didn't touch upon the well-known fact that George had carefully lived up to the last penny of his income. "And I've been crazy about you ever since—oh, always! Only you always shut me out, somehow. And I watched for your sake, hoping you'd come to me. Watched you buy bonds from one house and sell them through us to buy something else from a different house at a lower price. I'd have given the world if you'd come to me, but you wouldn't. You didn't want me to help, now, did you? But it's time now, so I'm coming to you. And not just to be your banker, either." His arm went deliberately around her. "So that's settled!" said Mr. Marlin, with extreme emphasis. "Isn't it?"

She had intended to explain her methods carefully to him, if necessary, and she was stunned to discover that he knew them already. She couldn't fathom the philosophy by which he had arrived at it. Her one great consolation had been his ignorance of her affairs. And his present arbitrariness was taking all the independence out of her, and making her feel wonderfully little, and loved, and protected.

"I—I hated to hurt their f-feelings!"

"I know. I heard people say you were rich. And from your own checks and the ones you deposited I guessed you were all the time getting out of one thing and into something else that cost less—and using the difference to live on. You haven't very much left, dear, have you? That's why you thought you wanted to work, wasn't it? You haven't anywhere near as much as I have. Not a tenth as much. You haven't five thousand dollars left out of the twenty you started with—and that's mostly in bad bonds. I've got to take care of you now, haven't I? You know I have. And I'm going to. Beginning now."

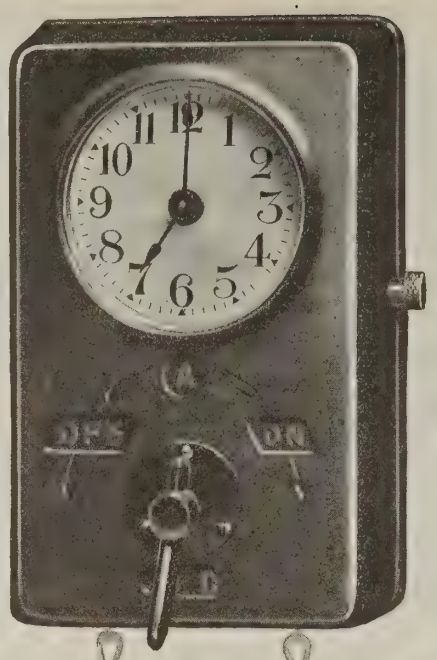
Regardless of the emotions which shook her, as his first badly aimed kiss fell upon her forehead, she had still a plea to make, for the sake of her own conscience and his regard:

"You—you know I wasn't trying to f-fool anybody. I didn't l-like to buy something from a man and sell it right back to him. I—I didn't think it nice!"

Mr. Marlin held her hands more firmly and brought her a little closer to him. Unwillingly, yet inevitably, she raised her eyes.

"Well," said Mr. Marlin with infinite tenderness. "You haven't answered me, Alice. Why, you poor little girl! Of course you're going to marry me. Aren't you?" He shook her quietly. "Say 'yes'!"

"Y—yes!" She whispered obediently and closed her eyes.



Opens the Furnace while you sleep—

Getting up mornings when the mercury is low to open the furnace is no longer necessary. The "Little Draft-Man" Furnace Regulator will start your furnace in the morning while you sleep.

Set the regulator at night—and the whole family can dress in cozy warmth.

The "Little Draft-Man" is a simple mechanical device that works without fail. It has no electrical connections and cannot get out of order. It opens the furnace damper and closes the check at the time you set the clock. During the day heat is regulated by merely turning the "on" or "off" handle.

The "Little Draft-Man" costs only

$15.00

East of the Rocky Mountains

It can easily be installed in a few minutes and works with old or new furnaces of any make or type. It saves trouble, protects health and earns its price in fuel economy in a single season.

Most Furnace and Hardware Dealers sell the "Little Draft-Man". If yours does not we will send you one, post-paid on receipt of price.

Sahlin Manufacturing Company

41 Ottawa Ave., N.W.
GRAND RAPIDS
MICHIGAN

Canadian Distributors
McCLARY'S LONDON, ONT.

1869-1919
50TH ANNIVERSARY—FIFTY YEARS OF PROGRESS

HEINZ Vinegars

Every drop awakens flavor

It goes without saying that the best materials, painstaking effort and cleanly methods ought to produce good vinegar.

But with Heinz there is something more—much more.

It is experience, skill, and the willingness to wait until long aging in wood has allowed nature to develop the delicate aroma and fine flavor—a flavor you will remember and will want again.

The Heinz label is the guarantee.

Pints, Quarts, Half-Gallons

Malt, Cider and White

In bottles filled and sealed in the Heinz establishment

HEINZ Imported
Olive Oil

Pure first pressing oil of selected ripe Spanish olives direct from the Heinz establishment in Seville, Spain.

The same rigorous methods of cleanliness and purity prevail there that characterize the Home of the 57.

57

All Heinz goods sold in Canada are packed in Canada

BLACK SHEEP

(Continued from Page 40)

went on like any other night's work until he took a lonely night trolley car to his hotel on the North Side.

Next morning, as usual, he got down to the Leader office about eleven o'clock and the first thing he did was to glance over the early editions of the evening papers—dated several hours ahead. These early editions were starveling creatures, appearing in the barren interval after the last editions of the morning papers had cleaned up the night's news and before the day's news had begun to develop much. A comparatively trivial happening could get a big headline in them.

So when Purcell, picking up the first of those on his desk, saw "Murder!" in big black letters he presumed it referred to an event which would be dismissed with a couple of stickfuls on an inside page in later editions. From a professional point of view his surmise was correct enough, but there was a personal interest which brought him up with a shock as though he had touched a heavily charged live wire.

The dozen lines of triple-leaded text beneath the headings said that an aged negro named William Pomeroy had been murdered with a knife, in the area behind his lodging on South State Street some time in the night.

The managing editor reached for the telephone and got McMurtry's office. When the lawyer's voice answered, he said, "Have you seen the news, Mac?"

"What news?" McMurtry replied.

"I'll read it to you," said Purcell, and thereupon read the dozen lines of text. "I think I'd best come right over there," he added. But before leaving his desk he unlocked a drawer and took out the folded sheaf of shorthand notes which he had made when Pomeroy's story was fresh in his mind.

When he was shown into McMurtry's private office the lawyer had already sent down to the lobby of the building for copies of the evening papers. The account in each of them was substantially the same, evidently a manifolded police report. The lawyer was in a disturbed state, as his contracted brows and perplexed manner showed.

"I telephoned Jake," he said at once. "He hadn't heard of it. He's going round to the place and to the police to pick up what he can on the fly. Then he'll come over here and report."

"The police won't pay much attention to it unless something else develops," Purcell commented. "Nor will the newspapers either."

The murder of an obscure old negro in an obscure lodging house or hotel patronized by single men of his race in a locality of the extremest social obscurity would naturally make only the smallest of splashes in the flow of the day's news from all quarters of the globe. Newspaper treatment of such an incident is as sure an index of population as the Federal census. In a village it would amount to a great sensation. In a metropolis it would pass almost unnoticed.

"I hope they won't," McMurtry replied, frowning. "The less attention the police and the newspapers pay to it the better."

The two men were silent for a long moment, but their thoughts were very busy. Then Purcell asked, "When did you leave him?"

There was no need of explaining to whom the pronoun referred.

"I noticed the time when I got out of my car to go to the house," McMurtry replied. "It wasn't quite a quarter to nine. I didn't look when I left the house, but I'm sure it was about half past nine. It's just about an hour's run up there and I got downtown here about half past ten."

He was absorbed with the problem in hand, but Purcell reflected that as Morden had telephoned him at ten minutes of eleven they would have had ten or fifteen minutes together before he joined them at the Four Aces.

"About half past nine," the managing editor repeated. "There's no indication of time there," he nodded toward the newspapers on the table, "but apparently it wasn't discovered until well into the morning."

"Plenty of time," McMurtry observed with a grating laugh—meaning, as Purcell understood, that from half past nine to morning was plenty of time to commit a simple murder.

"It was done with a knife," said Pu
"Here's what Pomeroy said about th brought it along. I told you, you k that I wrote it down."

As he spoke he took the sheaf of from his pocket and began leafing over. The notes in fact were made in of degenerate shorthand that no on himself could understand.

"Here it is," he said, and began t lating the notes: "'Dinsmore a bad Pomeroy afraid of him. Says he John Colby; poisoned him; Colby suddenly after visit to Dinsmore.
more carries a big knife—four or inches—touch a spring in the handl the blade flops out!'" He looked fro notebook to McMurtry. "He hel hands four or five inches apart to in how long the knife was. I remember a knife like that—the blade folded in handle, you know, so it can be carri the pocket. The blade comes open you touch a spring."

McMurtry mused over it.

"Curious," he commented absentl

"I should say so!" Purcell excla
"Great Scott! To say Alfred Dins went down there and killed that old with a spring knife sounds the cr thing ever said. But somebody him."

"Somebody did," the lawyer repe musing.

So amazing was it that a new ide curred to Purcell.

"I believe I'll go over and have a lo him—to make sure it's the same mar said.

"Well, that would be a good idea,' Murtry replied thoughtfully. "We be too sure of anything—in this queer
It would be a good idea."

Aside from its being a good idea, h very willing to get rid of his friend ar complice just then, for he was expe Morden any minute.

The lawyer was almost more deeply zled than Purcell. But for one cir stance he would have immediately ad a theory that Dinsmore had killed W Pomeroy—adopted it provisionall course and depending on what evi as to the killing might turn up; y mind would have turned promptly in direction. The arresting circumstanc one that he had no notion of impa to Purcell—namely, at a quarter t that morning a messenger had brough a sealed envelope which containe Dinsmore Company's check for sev five thousand dollars and the check then in his inner coat pocket. Natu he wouldn't tell Purcell that, havin him the night before that Dinsmor to pay nothing then. That circums didn't really forbid the theory to whi would have turned without it; but th motive in killing Pomeroy would have to remove a witness, and why should a remove a witness by such hazardous r and at the same time pay seventy thousand dollars of good money fo witness' silence? It was puzzling.

He had time to puzzle over it, for n an hour elapsed before Morden appea also puzzled. He had been to the sce the murder and he had found wha police knew about it. He had found that the police were not particularly ing themselves to learn more about i it was a shabby, run-of-mill, back affair anyhow.

Elbridge's Hotel on South State S he found, occupied the three upper flo a dingy old brick building whose gr floor was occupied by a pawnshop.
hotel sign over the stair door conveye information that rooms were to be ha thirty-five and fifty cents a day. Th tablishment just missed being a lo house for impecunious guests. There no elevator, and except for a small office and forlorn little parlor on second floor the premises were devot sleeping rooms. William Pomeroy pied one of the best rooms at fifty ce day at the front of the third story, and occupied it for two years or more.

The benevolent theory of the estal ment was that the guests knew enou take care of themselves. Beyond co ing the room rent, the management precious little attention to them and paid precious little attention to one ano

(Continued on Page 185)

(Continued from Page 182)

stl, in fact, they were transients. So, ig Pomeroy had been a guest of long id g, nobody about the place knew thig in particular of him or his habits asociations. The management's knowl- ardly went beyond the bare facts hwas prompt pay, quiet and no booze ering the stair door from South State et one found himself in a dim hall it even feet wide that ran through to r door and from which the stairs . The rear door opened to a back lot as twenty feet deep by thirty wide chwas dismally littered with cinders, e roken boards, some rusty tin cans ner unsightly refuse. Beyond this back lot ran an alley. Only the very le illumination from an electric light e istance farther north reached this little back lot at night. Its condition as one of dimmest twilight with shadows.

vas in this back lot that William Pom- body had been found. He had been hi in the neck—twice, the police sur- ought—with a big knife and must ed almost immediately. Beside the y a cheap, worn suitcase, packed as for a journey. Evidently he had p to his room, packed his suitcase it by the back door. The colored and man of all work round the hotel e police that he had locked the back t eleven o'clock in conformity to l rule of the management. But the doubted it. Their cursory inquiry m to believe that, in fact, both back nt doors commonly stood unlocked it and the porter said he had locked ely to save himself from reproach. it took him some time to find the ar as the police—and Morden—had ble to learn, nobody had seen Pom- nter the hotel or leave it, and of no one had seen any other person in npany. But a guest who occupied om adjoining Pomeroy's gave testi- of importance. He said that some- the night he had been waked up by und of voices in Pomeroy's room—or by a voice. He was very sure it was oy's voice. He had passed the time with Pomeroy—engaged in inciden- versation with him—on several oc- s and so knew his voice. He didn't a with a negro accent or a Southern , but with a kind of mellow drawl. uest was very sure it was Pomeroy's he had heard in the night—raised, ing loudly. In fact, he woke up with ea that a quarrel was going forward next room, on account of the pitch voice. But as he listened it seemed that Pomeroy was speaking to a man—and raising his voice on that nt rather than in anger.

her that idea had contented him or the g had ceased—the guest wasn't sure . At any rate he had fallen asleep and heard nothing further. And un- ately he could recall nothing what- of the talk he had overheard, nor he give any idea of the time. This —the police concluded—could not Pomeroy's merit of sobriety. They ht he had gone to sleep early in the ng the worse for liquor and that his , while sufficiently acute to note the voice in the next room, had been still r foggy. But if the conversation had of a menacing or alarming kind the guest would probably have remem- it.

ite certainly somebody had gone up to eroy's room with him. Pomeroy had packed his suitcase and left by the door, presumably accompanied by somebody. At the back door or not om it he had been killed.

"That's all the police know," Morden luded; "and probably all they will v. They're not exciting themselves t it."

he lawyer mused over it and com- ted, "Of course, Dinsmore's not deaf."

"No," the detective growled, "but that w was stewed. You can't bank very h on his impressions." He glowered it a moment and observed, "It's a r case." Then he looked at his watch said, "It's noon now. Has he come ss?"

or in telling the detective that Dins- e had promised to send a check that ning McMurtry had fixed the hour its delivery at noon instead of ten ck. One motive for that falsehood had been that he prudently preferred to keep the details to himself. Just what form the check was in would be one of the minor points of the game. McMurtry preferred that Morden should not be present when the check was delivered—a prudent man, he meant to overlook none of the minor points. And having lied to his friend from that motive, he might as well say that the check was to be for only fifty thousand dollars instead of seventy-five—which he had done.

Now he answered his friend and partner smoothly, "Not a peep yet. But he'll come across."

That was a minor point now, with this astonishing new development of the murder on their hands. So Morden merely glowered and said abruptly, "I'm going back to my office. I want to look over Jenny Dupee's reports. When Pomeroy went up to the house there to get his money she said Dinsmore mentioned some other man to him—asked him how somebody was getting along or something like that. My recollection is she gave this other man's name. I want to look that up. Maybe there's something in it for us."

He went back to his office therefore and was presently looking over the reports written by Jenny Dupee on Miss Dinsmore's fine notepaper, with eccentric spelling. The collection had grown quite bulky by that time, fairly filling the big brown envelope, for Jenny worked at her job with exemplary diligence. Nearly every day she had something or other to report. Most of the sheets, in fact, contained matter amusingly irrelevant, even to mentioning what the family had for luncheon when there was nothing else to report. They gave the impression of an employee anxious to prove that she was earning her pay.

Running through them, Morden came to the one which described Pomeroy's visit to the house as Jenny gathered the facts from her position under the lounge. The detective read:

"Mr. D. said how is Collins. The collared man said he is fine, going every evening to the Cristofer Columbus sochal club."

Morden read it with a dark grin of approval and thought appreciatively, "Great little sleuth is that same Jenny Dupee!"

He seemed vaguely to remember having heard of a Christopher Columbus Social Club. The city contained scores of modest little gatherings which found it advisable to organize as clubs, or at least to call themselves clubs—as that would be some defense if the police should ever happen to call them gambling joints or boozing joints. He set out therefore to get information regarding this particular organization. Most likely it would be downtown in the First Ward, so he directed his inquiries to that field.

Sometimes he was at odds with the official police, yet there was a sort of freemasonry and he had some good old friends in the official organization. It was to the police therefore that he went—or specifically to his old friend Sergeant Laverty, from whom he learned that the Christopher Columbus Social Club occupied three rooms in the rear over the Oasis Saloon on Harrison Street and one Conny Conley presided over it. If it hadn't been a club Conny Conley would have been the keeper of a gambling house, but the club was a quiet sort of place that had never brought itself into disfavor with the authorities. Every such place is of a retiring disposition, however, cool and reticent to strangers, so Morden invited his old friend Sergeant Laverty to accompany him there and vouch for his friendly intentions. The sergeant good-naturedly complied.

It was about half past one when—having climbed the stairs at the side of the Oasis Saloon—Sergeant Laverty knocked at a plain solid door in the dim second-story hall. Soon the door opened about two inches—the length of a stout chain that fastened it on the inside—and a shiny eye set in an almost coal-black face peered out. Seeing Officer Laverty, the eye lighted in friendly fashion and some white teeth disclosed themselves. The guardian promptly undid the chain and admitted them, saying in reply to the sergeant's question:

"Yassir, Mr. Conley's here; next room."

At that hour the clubrooms were quite deserted save for the manager and the negro guardian. They showed none of the luxury traditionally associated with city gaming establishments, but were meagerly furnished, with matting on the floor, plain wooden chairs that showed much use,

Enhance the Appearance of Your Car

Next to reliability doubtless the quality you most admire and want in a motor car is appearance.

It is an established fact that the

USTUS Limousette FOR FORDS

Pat. Appd. For

does convert a Ford car into a Limousine of striking looks.

Its parts blend beautifully with the body and top of your car.

From the windshield to the rear of the tonneau the USTUS Limousette fits snugly.

Just a light touch operates the roller windows.

It weighs only 40 pounds—provides clear vision, front and sides, and is used in connection with your standard top and body without making any alterations.

To assure an early delivery better see the USTUS Dealer promptly or write the nearest USTUS Distributor. Seventy-five thousand Limousettes were sold during the first 120 days.

Price for Touring Car $46.00; for Roadster $30.00
F. O. B. Detroit

DAFOE-EUSTICE COMPANY, Inc., Manufacturers
1193 W. Jefferson Ave. Detroit, Mich.

Chicago Offices:
35 S. Dearborn
Peter N. Jans, Mgr.

New York Offices:
253 Broadway
Arthur Sadow, Mgr.

Distributors

ATLANTA, GEORGIA Hammond-Elliott Co.
23 Peachtree Arcade

BALTIMORE, MD.
Backus Motor Co.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.
Dayton Keith

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
Spg'd Com. Body Co.
80 Charles River Rd.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
Rue Motor Co.
2443 S. Michigan Ave.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
Ohio Auto Equip. Co.
Marion Bldg.

DALLAS, TEXAS
Morriss Brothers

DALLAS, TEXAS
Smith & Yancey
324 Wilson Bldg.

DES MOINES, IOWA
Herring Motor Co.

DETROIT, MICH.
J. G. Hays Sales Co.
1162 Penobscot Bldg.

EL PASO, TEXAS
Tri-State Acc's Corp.

FARGO, N. DAKOTA
Harrison Dist'g Co.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Hubb Diggs Company

HOUSTON, TEXAS
Robertson & Pearson
Cor. N. Main & Wood

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
Indiana Tractor Co.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
Crow-Burlingame

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
Shuger Mfg. Co.
1002 S. Los Angeles St.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
Wis. Body and Sales Co.
418 Cedar St.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
McAfee Specialty Co.
914 Mary Place

MONTREAL, QUE.
Northern Electric Co.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Oster Brothers,
1418 Frenchman St.

N. Y. CITY, N. Y.
Geo. W. Copp Co.
236 W. 54th Street

PITTSBURGH, PA.
Coon-McGraw Sales Co., Inc., Bessemer Bldg.

RICHMOND, VA.
Universal Motor Co.
1012 W. Broad St.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
Waller Imp't Co.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
H. V. Carter Motor Co.
724 Varness Ave.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
Jennings Auto Sales Co.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Spg'd Com. Body Co.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
Walsh Motor Car Co.
4919 Delmar Ave.

SALT LAKE CITY
Western Rubber Sales Co., 134 E. Broadway

Features of USTUS Limousette

Provides closed car comfort in bad weather.

Is combined with standard Ford body and top without alterations.

Eliminates inconveniences of awkward side curtains.

Instantly converted into open or closed car. Gives clear vision from front or sides.

The Dafoe-Eustice Co. is also the manufacturer of the USTUS standardized guaranteed line of protective canvas covers. They also make USTUS automotive specialties of canvas and imitation leather. Send for catalog today

"Shall we buy a Roadster or a Touring Car?"

Why Not An Anderson?—Both In One

Two- and Five-Passenger Convertible Roadster, $1775 F. O. B. Rock Hill, South Carolina

ANDERSON

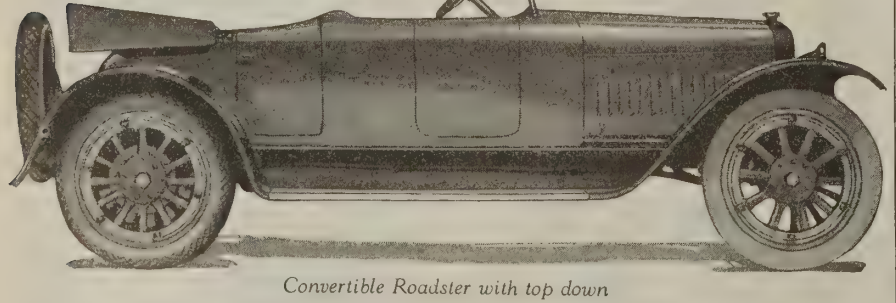
ROADSTER LINES WITH TOURING CAR CAPACITY 6

THERE is an absence of that cramped position in the Anderson convertible feature you have experienced in emergency seats and the ordinary 2- and 4-passenger roadster. The Anderson is a two-passenger roadster with comfortable seating capacity for three more people. When closed, this convertible section gives you the usual storage space of a fine roadster.

The Anderson Six is not extreme, but the spirit of the out of doors is expressed in its graceful, wind-swept length. There is a fineness, a personality, about it all—traceable to a former experience of over thirty years in high-grade body and coach work. Its chassis is of unquestioned quality—a 7W Red Seal Continental engine and other units of equal worth and reputation assure its dependability, power and ease of operation.

Anderson body finish is unsurpassed. Deep, lasting and of exquisite texture, it is the result of twenty-one different processes, hand applied and hand rubbed. A cloth will wipe it clean when other cars need washing. The upholstery of genuine leather is French pleated over finest cushion springs and curled hair.

Specifications of the full line of Sports, Touring and Sedan models given in the Anderson catalog. Sent upon request.



Convertible Roadster with top down

The convertible feature in the Anderson Six Roadster is patented in United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Canada, Japan, Argentina and New Zealand

Some desirable territory open for responsible dealers

ANDERSON MOTOR COMPANY
Rock Hill, South Carolina

some tables covered with soiled green baize and a battered sideboard. Mr. Conley also had a soiled, better-days appearance—being a fat and flabby man well along in middle life, with a grave air and a droopy, sad-looking, yellowish mustache. A diamond pin glittered in his tie, but the tie itself had a second-hand look. He accepted Morden on Sergeant Laverty's introduction and recommendation without the least reserve, and answered his questions with the greatest frankness.

There was no habitué of the establishment by the name of Collins. He was positive about that. Nobody of that name had ever been a habitué of the place. It was true that some habitués of the place might be known in some quarters by names different from those by which they were known there; but Collins struck no responsive echo in his memory.

"Any name anything like that?" Morden persisted.

Mr. Conley cast over the names in his memory, thoughtfully poking a finger into his double chin.

"Collingwood," he suggested; "old Jim Collingwood. That's the nearest I can come to it."

"Well, what about Collingwood?" Morden asked.

"He's an old scout that lives at Luke's Hotel—round the corner, you know. He comes here pretty near every evening—been coming quite a while. But that's about all I know. They say he's well heeled—made it out West mining. He never said anything to me about it. I never talked to him much. The old man's deaf. You have to shout to him."

Whatever exultation Morden felt at that statement was duly concealed. He merely said, "Plenty of money, eh?"

"Seems to have," Conley replied. "He drops it here all right—no big wad, you know, but he generally sloughs off some."

"Here last night?" Morden asked.

Sergeant Laverty put in, "We want to get this straight, you know, Conny. There's nothing on you, but Jake and I have got a hen on."

The policeman's interest in the affair was not altogether altruistic. His old friend Morden had told him that if the affair in hand came out satisfactorily he should be suitably remembered in the distribution of material rewards. So long as there was nothing on him, the affair was nothing at all to Mr. Conley. Long experience had hardened him to other people's complications with the police. As between Collingwood and the police, for instance, he was finely neutral except as his own self-interest strongly inclined him to oblige Sergeant Laverty. After an instant's search of his memory he replied:

"Yes, he was here last night. He went out." And lifting his voice a little he called, "Rose!"

The big and very black negro stepped in from the next room, answering the call.

"Didn't somebody come here for Mr. Collingwood last night?" Conley asked.

"Yassir," the guardian replied without hesitation. "Man come up to the door and asked me was Mr. Collingwood here and I said 'I dunno.' He felt round in his pockets and then he said, 'I want to send him a note and I ain't got nothing to write on. Get me pencil and piece of paper.'" The guardian might have added that a two-dollar bill accompanied the request, but he omitted that. "I got him piece of paper and a pencil and he put the paper up against the wall and wrote on it. Then he folded it over and give it to me and says, 'Hand that to Mr. Collingwood.' So I handed it to him. He was playin' at that table right over there." He pointed to it. "I noticed he seemed kind of uncertain, like he hadn't made up his mind, when he read it. Then he said, 'Wait a minute, boys,' and laid down his cards right in the middle of a hand. He went out in the hall and him and the man walked down the hall and talked a few minutes. I left the door open so he could come back, you see, and I stood there waitin' for him. Him and the man talked a spell. Then Mr. Collingwood come back in, scowling like, and went back to the table and they had kind of a little row about his quittin' the game that way."

"I noticed that," Mr. Conley commented.

"Yassir; they had kind of a little row among themselves, but he said he'd gotta go and he got his coat and vest off the hook there and went out. The man was walkin' up and down in the hall waitin' for him and they went off together."

"What time was that?" Morden aske

"I dunno purcisely," the guardian r plied after reflecting. "I reckon must be 'long about eleven o'clock—pretty ear in the evening for Mr. Collingwood leave."

"This man that inquired for him—wh did he look like?" Morden asked.

"He ain't quite as tall as you; go square shoulders on him; probably fift years old—got some gray in his beard."

"Was it a long beard?"

"No, sir; cut off pretty short all roun 'bout down to there." He held his ha three inches below his chin. "Got migh sharp eyes—look right at you."

"How was he dressed?"

"Only thing I noticed much was his ha the guardian replied. "That was sort gray-and-white checked hat with sort ribs down it—brim curled up. He had pulled down pretty near to his eyebrow

"Would you call him well dressed Morden persisted.

The guardian puzzled over that a m ment, trying to remember, and answere "No, sir—kind of old clothes, the way recollect it; just kind of plain old clothe

"What kind of a shirt did he have on

But the negro could not recall th Evidently—except the hat—the calle dress had not impressed him in any wa either for elegance or shabbiness.

"That was the last you saw of either them last night?" Morden asked finally

"Yassir, Mr. Collingwood didn't co back," said the guardian.

Morden then left the Christopher C lumbus Social Club with a lively and ple ant commotion in his mind. The na Collingwood was sufficiently like the na Collins to found a hope upon. The bu and beard of the man who had called Collingwood corresponded to Dinsmo Apparently the caller had been roug or indifferently dressed. "Kind of clothes" was the impression left on guardian's mind. Alfred Dinsmore dres very well, in a strictly conservative w Probably the garb wouldn't have left t impression on the guardian unless he l changed his clothes purposely. Mor thought that Alfred Dinsmore's custom clothes would probably contain a lead p cil and some bit of paper—say the back an envelope or a leaf from a memorand book—on which a brief note could be w ten. Usually the clothes of a business m did contain such articles. If Dinsmore changed his clothes for the purpose of visit that might explain his having to b row pencil and paper. And the man C lingwood was deaf. The detective seem to feel—tentatively—the pull of a g fish on his line.

On the stairs leading down to the st he transferred a twenty-dollar bill from vest pocket to the well-padded palm of friend the detective sergeant, remarl genially, "It goes in the expense accou And he gossiped with his friend on inci tal topics as they walked to the corner

Luke's Hotel stood diagonally ac from them—with a canopy of colored g over its door supported by pondero ornamented cast-iron pillars. Mor was aware of it. He thought Serge Laverty was aware of it also and q willing to pursue their joint inquiry furt

But Morden was not minded to let friend any further into the affair at time. As though he'd never had a thou of Luke's Hotel, he kept on up the st gossiping on incidental matters, and p ently parted from his friend with a chee adieu and a handshake. He caught a then and went back to his office.

Entering this office, one saw a sha room divided in halves by a wooden ra with a gate in it. There was a benc front of the railing and two desks bel it, at one of which sat a sharp-nosed yo man with hair that looked moth-eaten cause of a thin patch on one side. At other side of the room a door with a grou glass panel gave to a short and narrow from which two small dens opened. S was the establishment whose furnish all told might possibly have brought a h dred dollars at auction. Morden often marked with satisfaction that his busi was conducted under his own hat. He nothing to the sharp-nosed young ma the desk and on stepping through into tiny hall he found that this young man the only occupant of the office, for Tam little den on the right—opposite to his on the left—was empty. Three letters on his own desk, but not the one he wan

(Continued on Page 189)

(Continued from Page 186)

Jeny Dupee's diligent reports were eed to Martha Woods, Room 641, ss Building, Adams Street—which s ne address of the detective agency—d vere there laid on his desk. Jenny ped them into the village post office at glands or into a street letter box as she n opportunity, so a good many hours gl elapse before the record of an event ic she judged worthy of reporting ed Morden's desk. If she had noticed ything worth reporting the night before n ht be next morning before the report n in. At any rate, there was no report
d Morden was impatient.
P ring as nearly as possible a lone hand n imes involved inconveniences. This s ne of the times. There was a person nd Martha Woods—so named by her-f ng after she had reached years of dis-in. It was she who had engaged Jenny ne and given her the address to which cs were mailed. And Jenny in spite ir shortcomings would have been ced if she had known that her reports, i occasionally mentioned boudoir dels of a feminine nature, were really ed by a very coarse male person.
Morden was impatient and he decided to a motion, through Martha Woods, e ires that would bring him face to face
th Jenny Dupee as promptly as possible.
tok time—his getting in touch with a ha Woods and her getting in touch th Jenny via the telephone. So it was n inutes past five that afternoon when s cky man indifferently dressed and ang a slouch hat, who stood on the n west corner of Elm and Locust cts in Highlands, apparently contemng the architecture of the new stucco dge across the street, saw a slender on in a dark dress come rapidly n the direction of Sheridan Road. The ner woman's heart beat fast. She d t at all like this business of meeting a ge man on a street corner and making v bal report to him.
A professional might have told her that rd statements are much safer than ien ones, for if it comes to a pinch one nieny what one has merely said, but t what one has written in one's own
d. Yet that matter of writing a report clipping it into a mail box had appeared er quite snug and safe, whereas this e of meeting an unknown man and lng secrets with him face to face seemed l of peril. Besides, Jenny was by no eis in the habit of meeting strange men reet corners or elsewhere. That was s ieting to her sense of propriety.
lssibly even the extra compensation h Martha Woods hinted at in the ded talk over the telephone would have il to tempt her into it; but in the last ty-four hours the enterprise in which e was engaged had assumed gigantic pro-ions. Lying under the sofa in the ry, she had heard the gentleman who ld on Mr. Dinsmore talk to him of strous things; and finally of two hund and fifty thousand dollars! All that ny had imagined before was petty in parison with the amazing prospects now unfolded. She was in the mood ake a bold play for a great stake. So, heart beating fast, she sped to meet the nger. It did not help the flutter of her es as on coming nearer she noticed he looked a good deal like a very large,
gy fighting dog.
The meeting was not without some slight rest of a purely personal nature for den. Professionally he approved of unknown correspondent; and he was t disappointed to notice that she was ty-five, at least, of an angular type of ness, sallow and with a long, thin nose.
nance was not entirely dead in him.
vever, he smiled good-naturedly as she e fluttering up, but without bothering ft his hat, and said:
Just walk along beside me. We can as we move along." At the same time ell in beside her and started at a lei-ly gait up the street.
nd his immediately taking the matter
his own hands in this perfectly cool, ired way composed Jenny much more n as though he had been a pattern of teness. In his handling of it the thing ned to become matter-of-course.
Mr. Dinsmore left the house sometime r half past nine last evening and went ntown," said Morden as though he e repeating a circumstance well known oth of them, for he had judged that the t method of attack.

That statement not only surprised Jenny but further eased her mind. Evidently this remarkable man knew so much that one needn't hesitate to tell him more.

"Yes," she replied. "He was gone all night. I didn't know it till this forenoon. I heard it from the servants. He was gone all night. This morning he had things sent down to his office—a suit of clothes and shirt and collar. One of the men took them down. I heard them talking about it this forenoon. Mr. Dinsmore telephoned about half past seven this morning—gave orders to have the things sent down to his office."

"Did he telephone last night—to say he wasn't coming home?" Morden asked.

"I don't know," she replied. "I didn't hear anything said about it."

"Hear anything about when he left the house or what clothes he was wearing?"

"No, sir," said Jenny.

She could have told him that it was after half past nine, because she knew Mr. Dinsmore was in the library with a strange caller until that hour, but she proposed to keep all that to herself.

"Could you find out what sort of hat he was wearing when he went downtown?"

"I don't think so," Jenny answered doubtfully. "I might be able to. One of the men might know."

"Well, see if you can find out," Morden suggested. "Did you ever see a cloth hat with black-and-gray checks in it and sort of ribbed, with a brim that curls up?"

"Yes," she replied. "He has a hat like that. I've seen him wear it in the grounds when it was rainy. I think it's a hat he's had to go fishing."

"Well, see if you can find out whether he wore it last night," said Morden, speaking with unusual good nature, for the affair was developing exactly to his taste. He turned his head, looking down into her face with his aggressive eyes, and demanded:

"Anything in particular happen at the house last night?"

Jenny's nerves gave a jump. She almost thought he was going to say "You crawled under the lounge in the library and listened."

But she answered with rather panicky promptness, "No, sir."

"He had a caller," Morden persisted—for it was just as well to impress Jenny with his omniscience. "A man came to see him about a quarter to nine."

With a gone feeling in her stomach, Jenny answered uncertainly, "Perhaps. I didn't know it. I'm not downstairs in the evening."

Morden didn't doubt that she was telling the truth and did not blame her for missing the caller. In a big house she couldn't see everything. Besides, she had done very well—exceedingly well. He had no fault to find, and with another good-natured smile he parted from her.

Jenny sped homeward, immensely relieved that the meeting was so quickly and safely over with. Morden turned in the opposite direction—toward the inconsiderable business section of Highlands—reflecting. Dinsmore had gone downtown and spent the night there. He had worn clothes that he wanted to change before business hours. He had a hat such as the guardian at the Christopher Columbus Social Club had described. All that was bully!

Why had he spent the night downtown? The business he was engaged in must have kept him very late or he would have come home and changed his clothes there. If he had been driven down in an automobile probably the car would have waited. At any rate, the servants would very likely have known it and mentioned it in their gossip to Jenny. It seemed more probable to Morden that he had gone down on the train.

The detective himself had come up there by train and he walked back to the neat suburban railroad station, pondering. He believed a great deal in luck and hunches, and when luck was coming his way he believed in playing it strong. Decidedly luck was coming his way that day. Entering the railroad station, he studied the timetable on the wall. After half past eight o'clock, he found, trains to the city ran at intervals of an hour. There was one at nine-eighteen and another at ten-eighteen. McMurtry had left Dinsmore's house about half past nine. Ten minutes' brisk walking would take one from the house to the station. A man in a hurry could change his clothes in five minutes. Probably it would have been the ten-eighteen train. Probably that train would have the same conductor to-night.

Make this a CALIFORNIA
Winter

Run away from the snow, the cold and the coal bills, to where you may play golf and polo—where you may ride horseback, or motor over perfect highways.

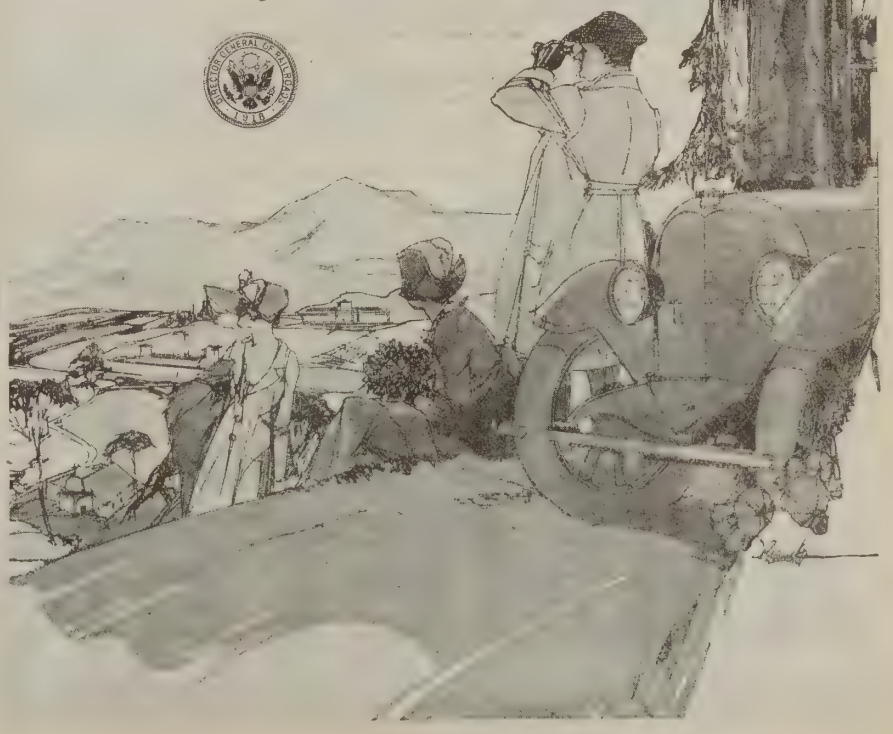
The sunshine, the bracing air, will help repair the wear of work and worry.

You may live at resort hotels, inland or beside a summer sea. Or occupy your own bungalow.

En route visit the national parks, national monuments, and other winter resorts. See Hawaii, too.

Ask for booklets "California for the Tourist" and "Hawaii." Let the local ticket agent help plan your trip—or apply to the nearest Consolidated Ticket Office—or address nearest Travel Bureau, United States Railroad Administration, 646 Transportation Bldg., Chicago; 143 Liberty St., New York City; 602 Healey Bldg., Atlanta, Ga. Please indicate the places you wish to see en route.

·UNITED·STATES·RAILROAD·ADMINISTRATION·



Equip with a Weston, NOW—in Overhauling Your Car.

Twenty-eight of America's highest grade motor cars come Weston-equipped. Because this instrument is a marvel of accuracy and dependability. Because it stands severest car-vibration year after year and never has to be replaced.

Your Ammeter is your only means of knowing whether your battery is properly charging—whether your generator and entire electrical system is properly operating. If your battery undercharges the plates sulphate—if it overcharges they buckle, the battery short circuits and is ruined. Dependable Ammeter information is absolutely necessary.

The Weston "Watch Dog" costs only $4.25—and pays for itself many times over in batteries saved—in recharging expense where recharging would have been unnecessary.

It is your indispensable guide—your one best guarantee of continuously effective ignition, lighting and starting—your constant source of warning, often forestalling repairs, when your electrical functioning becomes deranged.

Ask any electrical expert and he will tell you that the name "Weston" on electrical indicating instruments means they are the world's standard.

This Ammeter with a pedigree may be obtained at any Garage or Battery Service Station—or if they cannot supply you will be sent upon receipt of price. Send for descriptive leaflet showing special types and finishes, giving model of your car. In buying a new car be sure it is Weston-equipped.

WESTON ELECTRICAL INSTRUMENT CO.
NEWARK Branches in all Principal Cities NEW JERSEY

Garages, Service Stations and Repair Men

Locate "grounds", "shorts" and other electrical troubles in quickest time by using standard Weston Service Instruments built especially for that purpose. Weston No. 280 Garage Testing Instrument and Weston No. 441 Fault Finder are both typically "Weston"—the final products of the world's greatest organization of experts in this highly specialized electrical field. Your service to car owners cannot be complete or efficient without one or both of these instruments. Write today for prices and full particulars.

Correctly Indicates Electrical Performance

WESTON AMMETER

For Dependable Service Outlasting Your Car

Morden decided to wait and see, and after strolling about found a little restaurant where he got a light early dinner and afterward strolled back to the station. He had decided there was no use asking anybody there, for the ticket agent and telegraph operator were shut up in their office and could see little of the passengers. There was a baggage room in the south end of the station and just by way of passing the time Morden sauntered down there. The broad door was open and a small gray man in a baggy brown coat and an official blue cap a couple of sizes too large for him sat on a trunk inside contemplating the landscape. He looked like a friendly little man. Morden liked that look and engaged him in conversation which presently turned on his length of service and hours of duty. The man said he had been there twenty years and was on duty until the ten-eighteen train pulled out for the city. His talk was as friendly as his appearance, so Morden took a small chance.

That is, he displayed a police badge—contraband, yet effective on occasion—and said he was looking for a man who, he thought, took the ten-eighteen train to the city last night. Had the baggage man noticed a stranger round the station at that time—a middle-aged man with a short brown beard partly gray?

No, the baggage man hadn't. He recalled that half a dozen passengers had taken the train, but the only strangers were two ladies. The others, so far as he could remember, were known to him as residents of the village. There had been Mr. Gray—and Mr. Dinsmore had taken the train; just caught it by the skin of his teeth; had to run for it and the baggage man had run along to give him a boost up on the car step. That recollection amused the baggage man.

"You don't mean Alfred Dinsmore?"

"Yes, sir, Alfred Dinsmore. He's a middle-aged man with a brown beard, but I guess he'd hardly be the man you're looking for."

The baggage man's small face puckered humorously at that suggestion.

"How did Alfred Dinsmore come to go by train? I supposed he'd be going in an automobile."

"Usually does nowadays," the baggage man said. "He used to take the train every morning. Sometimes he uses the train now in winter when the weather's bad."

"A middle-aged man with a brown beard, eh? You're sure now it was Alfred Dinsmore?"

"Sure as shootin'!" The aged and baggy baggage man visibly swelled a bit with importance. "I know him well's I know my own mug—seen him hundreds of times. I saw him last night plain as I see you. He come right round the corner of the station here. The train was pulling out then and he started for it. I called to him. I says, 'You'll have to run for it,' and I run along with him to give him a boost up on the step. No doubt about it."

"Was he carrying any baggage?" the skeptical officer asked.

"No, sir. I noticed he was dressed kind of old. I thought he might be going hunting or fishing or something; had on kind of a fishing hat."

The baggage man described it—black-and-gray check with a curled-up brim and ribbed.

"Didn't notice any stranger at all except the two women?" Morden asked amiably.

"No, sir." The baggage man cast back in his mind. "I was out on the station platform here when the train pulled in and when it pulled out. I'm pretty sure there wasn't any strange man."

"I see," said the detective. "Fine little station you've got here. Pretty good place to work, eh!"

For a few moments more they conversed amiably on incidental topics. Then Morden gave the friendly little baggage man a cigar and strolled away. He took the seven-thirty-two train to the city mightily pleased. Luck was coming his way.

There was no doubt whatever that after McMurtry left his house Alfred Dinsmore had gone downtown more or less disguised, visited the Christopher Columbus Social Club, had a conversation there with James Collingwood and the two had gone away together about eleven o'clock. Also Dinsmore had spent the night downtown and sent to his house for a change of clothing in the morning.

That was getting close. But who was James Collingwood, described as an old scout that lived at Luke's Hotel and spe many of his evenings playing poker? was evidently somebody whom both Dir more and William Pomeroy knew, Jenny Dupee had heard Dinsmore menti him to Pomeroy.

Odd that Alfred Dinsmore would knowing a man of that sort.

Morden's wits, sharpened by the smell a warm trail, worked at that problem as rode downtown. It was his lucky day a he proposed to press the luck. But it w only a quarter past eight when he g downtown and he decided to wait un ten. Then he returned to The Oasis Salo and climbed the stairs to the Christoph Columbus Social Club.

At his knock the door opened the leng of its chain and the guardian's shiny e looked out—with recognition, for t teeth also appeared as Morden said, want to see Mr. Conley a minute."

The guardian readily admitted hi The club was then in operation with good representation of the membersh present. Three of the four round pok tables were in use, several men sat at t rectangular faro table and a number others stood near watching the play. T air was already somewhat hazy with tobac smoke and the genial guardian was fai busy. In addition to attending the do he operated a little dumb-waiter that r down to the back room of the saloon l low—and up again with such refreshmen as the members ordered.

The three rooms in the suite—origina designed for lodgings perhaps, or offices had been thrown together by broad arch so by simply stepping out into the first Morden had a view of the whole sce Scenes of that general description w perfectly familiar to him, but his first s vey of this one brought a decided dis pointment.

The rectangular table devoted to f was in the farther room and behind it flabby, tawny-mustached Mr. Conley, de ing, which is an absorbing occupation. T dealer's eyes and mind must be direc steadily to the paraphernalia in front him and the little box at his side from wh he gravely slips one card at a time. He small time for conversation of any sc none at all for conversation not connec with his occupation. By the canons of persons in the clubrooms, to interrupt game by distracting the dealer's attent would be a good deal like stepping up to minister in the midst of a marriage ce mony and requesting a few minutes' c versation. Only some errand of the grav importance could justify it, and Mor didn't wish to give the impression that was engaged on an errand of the grav importance. As long as the game went and Mr. Conley dealt, getting speech w him was going to be awkward—and t presumably would be for the next two hou Disappointed, the detective stood un the arch watching the play. Once flabby dealer looked up, saw him, gav slight nod and immediately resumed absorbing occupation.

Considering, Morden sauntered back the first room. With gamesters' indif ence to anything except their game, nob paid attention to him. The genial guardi however, had attention to bestow u anyone and everyone.

"Mr. Conley usually deal faro?" Mor inquired casually.

"No, sir," the guardian replied promp "Dealer didn't show up to-night." He hibited the white teeth. "Stewed ag'in reckon."

Morden grinned amiably and the guard added good-naturedly, "Mr. Collingw didn't show up either."

"Didn't, eh?" Morden said as thoug had no special interest for him. "W time does he usually come?"

"Usually comes before this if he's com at all," the colored man replied.

"Well, I may drop in later," Morden served in his casual manner. "If I d see Mr. Conley to-night I'll catch him morrow or next day. It's no great matte Though it was no great matter, he han the guardian two half dollars.

Leaving the social club, the detec felt disappointed. He had hoped for an portunity to observe Mr. Collingwood even to form his acquaintance. If Colli wood had been present and he could h got a minute's private talk with wise Co Conley, that would have been easily ranged. Morden felt that he had los trick and his luck had temporarily fa him.

(Continued on Page 193)

(Continued from Page 190)

He was irritated also by the guardian's ort reference to Collingwood. It meant, b negro knew, that his visit that after-on somehow concerned James Colling-oc- knew it of course from the question nl· had asked him. The negro also w that his companion that afternoon
; Detective Sergeant Laverty of the ic Department. Probably the negro ; loquacious. About the last thing
r n wanted just then was an intiman · James Collingwood that the police e nteresting themselves in him. It w l again—what experience had often w him before—that one can hardly stir oc without leaving some sort of trail.
l of which irritated him and made him
r mpatient than ever. One who leaves r ought to travel fast, so he went c y to Luke's Hotel.

Entering beneath the canopy of colored s supported by ponderously ornamented illars, one finds himself in a lobby ith cast-iron pillars, but painted a llow. The black-and-white tile floor s somewhat uneven in spots and here ere a loose tile gives under one's foot.
are a couple of lounges and a couple en chairs corpulently stuffed and up-st ed in red leather. In more tolerant s ne could pass directly from the lobby pool room at the left, where bets be placed on horse races and other ng events with no more trouble or c lment than in buying a loaf of bread.
days had passed but the hotel
le was mostly flavored with them.
ar at the rear was almost as large as lobby itself and much more popular.

Thither Morden went—impatient, with eling that he was leaving a trail any-nd bound to press his luck. Walking sl down the long room—with yellow illars and worn black-and-white tiles
e lobby—he noticed that the bar, ning the length of the room at his was doing a flourishing business that ng. A screen of stamped leather stood t farther end of the bar. Morden d round it and looked into the open of a small, neat business office—and mediately felt better, for luck was with nce more.

At the desk in this small office sat a n elderly gentleman who—if he had ed the big solitaire diamond ring t glittered on his white left hand—might been taken for a bank president or rail-d director, for he looked the very picture d nified prosperity. The close-cropped r hat covered his head, except for a d trip on top, was white, and so was his t trimmed mustache. His cheeks were y however, and the eyes that he lifted Morden's footfall on the threshold were g.. He was in his shirt sleeves—sleeves t finest, whitest linen—and evidently ed in business affairs, as the papers on esk showed. This was Mr. George n, once an aspiring young bartender, now proprietor of the flourishing a ishment through which the detective d ist walked and of various other com-t g possessions.

"ow are you, George?" said Morden, ng.

"hy, how are you, Jake?" the proprie-turned genially, extending a plump i hand. "Sit down. Been a coon's age cI saw you."

For a minute they visited amiably, and all the while the bright brown eyes of the man at the desk rested on his caller's face with a waiting and questioning in their limpid depths. Of course this visit meant something. Mr. Allison was even wiser than Conny Conley. After the little preliminaries Morden brought forward his business: "George, there's an old guy named Collingwood stays at the hotel. I want to frisk his room."

Mr. Allison seemed to find nothing shocking or even surprising in that statement. Studying the other he merely asked soberly, "What is it, Jake?"

"I just want to find out who he is and where he comes from," Morden replied. "I won't start anything here. There'll be no comeback. I believe he can lay me next to a man I want—if I'm in a position to make him. See? Just a quiet little frisk."

Mr. Allison considered that, twisting his neatly trimmed mustache between a neatly manicured thumb and forefinger.

"I know the old boy," he remarked incidentally. "Pretty good old tanker."

"There's a fat roll in this for me if I can get it right, George," Morden urged. "There'll be no comeback here. I can promise you that."

It was in a manner a rather small favor that the detective asked. Allison was willing to oblige on general principles. Besides, Jake Morden might be very useful sometime; one never could tell. Still the proprietor was conservative.

"Where is he to-night?" he asked.

"Out playing poker," Morden replied promptly; but added, also conservatively, "unless he's come in in the last few minutes."

"I'll fix it for you," said Mr. Allison, and pressed a call button on his desk. After a moment the call was answered by a young negro in a white apron who served the tables in the barroom.

"See if Tony is in the lobby or downstairs and tell him I want to see him," the proprietor directed; and after a longer wait a stocky and red-faced young man in a blue-flannel shirt appeared at the threshold. On the back of his head he wore a stiff blue cap with a silver badge in front on which was stamped "Porter." He looked like an impudent young man.

"Anybody there?" Mr. Allison asked as the young man stood on the threshold.

Tony glanced over his shoulder and replied "Nope."

"This gentleman is a friend of mine and all right," said Mr. Allison gravely. "He wants to frisk Collingwood's room. It's all right. There'll be a ten-spot in it for you."

Tony stood at attention without the slightest mark of surprise or disquietude; and Morden, rising, said, "Much obliged, George. See you again."

Out in the barroom he instructed his new recruit, "See if he's in his room first, and get your trunk keys."

Tony answered with ready impudence, "I'll go knock on his door. If he's in I'll ask him if he sent for a porter." And that cool resourcefulness greatly commended the new ally to Morden. "Wait here a minute and I'll get the keys," the porter added.

Morden waited and very shortly Tony reappeared with a cigar box under his arm. Then, cap on the back of his head, he led the way to the elevator. They alighted at the top floor and Morden followed the INFLARE—where more of the surface across the ball (A-B) is inside instead of outside the line (C-D).

STRAIGHT—where the surface across the ball (A-B) is equal on either side of the line (C-D).

OUTFLARE—where more of the surface across the ball (A-B) is outside the line instead of inside the line (C-D).

A Real Anatomical Shoe without the Freak-Shoe Look Smashed!

THE TRUPEDIC revolutionizes the old-time idea of shoe-fitting and shoe-making. It is a shoe, scientifically correct, that makes the comfort, fit and good-looks of your shoe an actual certainty always.

Man's feet are three different shapes—inflare, outflare, and straight. Science proves this. It remained for Churchill & Alden to make the Trupedic Shoe to fit this 3-form foot. The American Posture League endorses the Trupedic as being scientifically correct.

Exclusive Trupedic features and a 40-year shoemaking experience make the comfort, fit and durability of your Trupedic shoe sure. In shoe-fitting and shoe-making the Trupedic is the most noteworthy innovation of the century. And in shoes, what you get for what you pay is more important today than ever.

Send for name of the Trupedic dealer and for the Trupedic booklet.

CHURCHILL & ALDEN CO.
985 Main Street
Brockton (Campello), Mass.

Tru-pe-dic SHOE APPROVED BY AMERICAN POSTURE LEAGUE, INC. REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

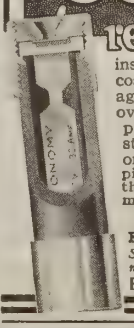
The Tru-pe-dic SHOE

A universal shoe for universal service

DO YOU INTEND TO BUILD?

1919 ART PLAN BOOKS—"Modern Bungalows" containing plans and photos, interior and exterior of 75 new, artistic large and small bungalows. "Modern Homes"; 50 larger residences of distinction and beauty; many 2-story; all proved practical; suited to any climate. Either book postpaid $1; both $1.50. Send today; newest and best home ideas in America.
AURELIUS SWANSON CO., Building Department
1004 State National Bk. Bldg., Oklahoma City, Okla.

ECONOMY renewable FUSES



insure maximum safety and minimum cost in safeguarding electrical circuits against the fire and accident hazards of overloads and short circuits. An inexpensive "Drop Out" Renewal Link restores a blown Economy Fuse to its original efficiency. The Economy is a pioneer renewable fuse. As compared with the use of one-time fuses, it cuts annual fuse maintenance costs approximately 80%.

ECONOMY FUSE & MFG. CO.
Kinzie and Orleans Sts. CHICAGO, U. S. A.
Sole manufacturers of "ARK LESS"—the Non-Renewable Fuse with the 100% Guaranteed Indicator.
Economy Fuses are also made in Canada at Montreal

USN DECK PAINT

For Porches, Floors and Walls
There's no paint quite so durable, attractive, economical and easy to use for the above purposes as U. S. N. Deck Paint. It dries hard in twelve hours and gives years of service. If you don't know who sells it in your town, write us.
THE BILLINGS-CHAPIN CO.
Boston Cleveland New York
DRIES HARD OVERNIGHT

Your boy develops by reading

Let your boy occupy his winter evenings with

THE AMERICAN BOY

"The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World"

When home work is finished he needs the mental tonic in its refreshing stories, well-balanced with timely articles. Buy him a copy of the November issue, out October 25th, 20c at your news-stand.

By mail, every month, $2 per year.

The Sprague Pub. Co. 1 American Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

BOSTWICK WEAR

Come On, Cold Weather!

THE man who knows Bostwick Wear knows cold weather comfort—freedom of action, warmth without weight, rugged, lasting, yet good-looking garments. Every man who works or plays out of doors should investigate Bostwick leather garments.

The coat illustrated is No. 6700—36 inches long, dark drab moleskin lined to the edge with soft, fleecy, lamb skin. It has leather-lined sleeves.

Wombat collar, knit wrists and two roomy leather-trimmed pockets. You'll find it ideal for any outdoor activity.

BOSTWICK
Flannel Shirts

Are neat enough to wear to business, they fit. The collars set trim and snug. The bodies and sleeves are roomy, comfortable. All good colors, the best fabrics. Insist on getting BOSTWICK Flannel Shirts.

If your dealer's stock has not arrived, send his name and we will see that you are supplied.

Write for Style Book

Johnson, Bostwick & Co.

106 Bostwick Bldg. Minneapolis, Minn.

"You said I could earn $1.00 an hour"

"I have earned $2.00 an hour"

That is what George C. Dawson, of Missouri, wrote us after he answered one of our advertisements and had become our representative. He found the work so easy, and was so successful, that in his first three months he averaged over $2.00 an hour and on one day earned

$4.00 in 50 Minutes

We have just as big an opportunity for you with The Saturday Evening Post, The Ladies' Home Journal and The Country Gentleman. You may work near your own home or wherever you choose to go. And don't feel that you are too busy! If you want and are sincere; if you have even a little spare time; if you like to work independently and out of doors, you have all the equipment you need to succeed.

MORE MONEY

Scores of our other workers are earning $1.00, $2.00 an hour; $10.00, $20.00 a week, in spare time only. Can't you be just as successful?

MAIL THIS COUPON NOW!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
388 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Gentlemen: A dollar or two of profit for each odd hour will please me very much. Please tell me how to earn them.

Name_____

Address _____

City_____ State_____

porter down the hall, keeping a little distance behind him. Glancing at the door numbers as he went along, the porter halted, listened an instant and knocked. After a moment he knocked again; then took a pass-key from his pocket, opened the door and stepped in. When Morden reached the door the lights were on.

The detective surveyed a very plainly furnished bedroom about eight feet by twelve. It contained a single bed, a tall wardrobe, a bureau, two chairs. Against one wall stood a cheap trunk. Tony was already on his knees examining the lock of the trunk—an ordinary lock such as commonly goes on cheap trunks. The cigar box stood on the floor beside him. When Tony opened it Morden saw that it was two-thirds full of trunk keys—thriftily picked up one at a time and treasured against the needs of guests who had lost their keys. The fifth one that Tony tried opened the lock and as soon as it was open the porter stood up, callously expectant, with his cigar box under his arm. Morden gave a little laugh and handed him a ten-dollar bill. With no more emotion than he had displayed before, Tony stuffed the bill in his pocket and went out—with nothing whatever on his conscience and enriched by an easily acquired ten-dollar bill.

The door fastened with a spring lock, so if anyone opened it while Morden was inside there would be the warning sound of the key in the lock; and he must then trust to his wits and nerve. He threw up the lid of the trunk. In the upper tray he found a couple of soiled and frayed neckties, a laundered white shirt undisturbed for so long that it had taken on a slight yellowish tinge, a laundered standing collar in the same state, half a dozen old racing forms and some other like rubbish; but nothing whatever to his purpose—no letters or any other articles that would give a clew to the owner's antecedents.

He lifted that tray out. The one beneath it was quite empty and he lifted that out. In the bottom of the trunk lay a suit of well-worn clothes, not folded, but tossed carelessly in there, a gray sombrero hat, a pair of low tan-colored shoes, also well worn and unpolished, with the socks scuffed in them. Morden swiftly examined the pockets of the clothes, but they were empty. Nothing else was there. A moment's investigation showed there was no false bottom or secret drawer in the trunk.

Morden stood up, much disappointed. Apparently the trunk was used only as a sort of lumber room into which a few discarded articles had been tossed. He turned to the tall, narrow wardrobe of stained pine. A brown ulster, a lighter overcoat and a suit of heavy clothes hung on its hooks, fur cap lay on the shelf at the top and the bottom there was a pair of oversho also a small battered brown traveling b unlocked and empty. The pockets of garments yielded nothing.

He stepped to the bureau. It contair a meager stock of cheap shirts, underwe socks, collars. From them one mi readily deduce that their owner was untidy man—but nothing else. There no scrap that gave a clew to Collingwoo past—or his present for that matter. In his experience the detective had never s a human habitation so completely bar of clews. He glowered down at the tru then stooped and picked up the rump coat again, feeling once more through pockets.

In weight the garment was suitable that season. Though it showed wear was not really shabby—certainly shabby enough to be objectionable t man whose ideas of dress corresponded the garments in that room. Why Collingwood put it in the bottom of locked trunk instead of hanging it m conveniently in the wardrobe? An o came from it—the odor of gasoline. Mor looked more closely. Several spots on front and sleeve had been scrubbed wit cleansing fluid not a great many hours fore. Morden's sense of disappointm gave place to expectancy and he exami the clothes more closely so as to be to describe them. He picked up the examining that; then the shoes. Sc might count too. He pulled the sock ou the shoe in his hand and at once saw so thing long and white beneath it. As took that object out of the shoe his m leaped triumphantly.

It was a horn-handled knife about inches long, the blade folded down into handle. When he pressed the little ni button at the end of the handle the br murderous blade sprang out. As Mor looked it over the gleam in his eyes swered the gleam of the blade. He pus the blade back in place, considered an stant and put the contrivance in his pocket; then swiftly rearranged the tr as he had found it, looked round the r to see that he had left no trace of search, turned out the light and peered the hall. The hall was empty and stepped out—the knife with which Will Pomeroy had been killed in his coat po and the key to Collingwood's trunk in vest pocket. And when he left Lu Hotel his mind was crowing victoriou

"What luck!"

(TO BE CONTINUED)

TOO MUCH IS ENOUGH

(Concluded from Page 50)

to ignore the ghastly effort Henry's eyes fixed upon the last straw still clinging to the wall, though fly specked and otherwise materially changed:

BEGINNING MONDAY
March 17, 1919
Price List

Haircut	~~.50~~	~~.35~~	.25
Shave	~~.25~~	~~.20~~	.15
Shampoo	~~.40~~	.25
Massage	~~.40~~	.25
Neck Shave	~~.10~~

"Ah," Henry smiled, "going down, I see."

"Yes," Joe agreed, "back where they used to be."

He was much relieved by Henry's attitude.

"I s'pose I coulda kept 'em at twenty and thirty-five—nobody seemed to mind—but it didn't seem quite fair. I've got more business now than I ever had and my expenses at home ain't half what they used to be. I'm making more money now, taking everything into account, than I was last winter when I raised 'em."

"Joe," said Henry in a whimsical tone that carried a touch of seriousness, "if we all had your ideal of fairness our living problem would pretty near solve itself."

"Why," returned Joe, considerably flustered, "I guess you solved it all right, Henry. I guess everybody's pretty grateful to you for what you done for us."

"Like it, do they?" Henry queried.

"I should say so!" Joe assured him fervently. "Everybody 'most has got their old jobs back, everything is cheap and we're all making money. It sure is going Henry!"

"Hum," said Henry. "This sho going fine too, isn't it, Joe?"

"You bet it is!" was the gleeful reto

"Supposing you said to yourself, 'Well, the old shop is going fine. I'll let run herself now and spend the rest of life lying in the old hammock.' W would become of the shop?"

"Why, you know what would becon it, Henry."

The question was too absurd to be swered.

"Exactly," Henry averred. "The hu race had worked for centuries, Joe, a had made the world into a good g shop. Then along comes the war li circus in town and the human race ge excited over the acrobats and the lions the blood-sweating behemoth of Holy and the steam piano that it hates to go to work. It says, 'We're all making m and the old shop is sure going fine; let home and lie in the hammock.'

"The point is, Joe, that the world hard old place. It was getting to be softer because we were making things made it softer. We can't have these forts unless we make them. We can't have the food to keep us alive unles make that—unless we work for it. W we kept a natural balance between time and play time we produced enou our work time to make things pleasan us in our play time. Now we're cu down our work time and it's gettin short we can barely make the thing need to keep us alive, let alone the th we want to play with."

THE EAGLE IN THE COCKPIT

(Continued from Page 9)

e onsensus of French opinion favored rsing and maintenance of an interallied ny which would constitute the police force th world, each nation's apportionment oroportionate to its resources and the ries it made during the war. Once ithe bulk of the load for Uncle Sam! t all the nations concerned we would ne least from either a league or any ttive alliance.

Tl Paris newspapers sounded that note nths last spring and summer. Le t, L'Avenir, Oui, La Victoire, Journal bats, Excelsior—nearly all of them pl on it day in and day out, with the ted action European governments ible to obtain from a large section of ress in any form of propaganda they ho put out.

Lieutenant Colonel Fabry, a noted writer litary and international affairs, fur- Oui with a table of figures purport- show at a glance what each of the ie had done and suffered in defeating ches. The colonel's chart contained timate of killed and wounded and pty losses, and assigned a rather me place to the United States, from ic method of figuring he was able to fi at the deduction that Uncle Sam's rtn of the interallied military load ou completely overshadow that of any ne ation. Three days later, in L'Avenir, e me authority elaborated on the plan, vg it to his readers to fill in the blanks hi ables for each country's contribution. "'ius," argued the colonel in three of ticles, "France has nothing to lose d erything to gain in the creation of an e llied army."

Al right there he stated the nub of the at r.

Fnce sank billions of francs in Russia. e ade huge loans to the Czar's govern- n and Russian enterprises were a favor- f d of investment for her thrifty people any years. With Russia plunged in lsevism those investments began to okike many of our oil gambles, and so e rench bestirred themselves to restore réme in Russia that would make good ei obligations. Both President Wilson d remier Lloyd George opposed the prop- iti when it came before the conference, t hat did not dampen French hopes.

Some Official Figures

Immediately the plan was projected the zeion rose as to what forces could be ployed. The French advocates of mili- ry intervention were ready with an swer. American, of course! Prominent nalists like Gustave Hervé insisted a the fresh unweakened armies of the ni d States were just the troops for the blind their information was that Amer- a public sentiment would support such ployment! The United States would be p ted to finance the undertaking also, ecise the other Powers were broke. As r rance's share, she would supply the gl command and the staff.

Said M. Hervé in La Victoire of December twenty-third: "This army, we already have it. It is the young American Army. . . . The American Army, of all the great allied armies, is the freshest, the least worn, for the good reason that it entered the line only after the German Army had been broken." [Author's Note—Official figures show that at intervals during the heavy decisive fighting between October first and November eleventh, we had as many troops in the front line as the British and French together.] "Moreover it seems that public opinion in America would readily accept the task and honor of Pershing's young Army saving democratic Russia from the Bolshevist terror."

Ridiculous Rumors

Practically every officer and man of the A. E. F. was opposed to a military alliance with any European power. Their argument was that the other parties to such an alliance would be the beneficiaries and the burdens would be the United States'. Moreover, they formed an abiding distrust of European politics. The sooner we got out of Europe and stayed out, the better, they said.

The protective alliance between France, Great Britain and the United States, correlated to the peace treaty, was roundly denounced. It would place Uncle Sam, they contended, in the rôle of bailiff for his Allies. And they are about right. A painful aspect of the situation is that the demands of several of our Allies, forced through against American protest and opposition, could never be realized without America's aid. They have exacted peace settlements that they cannot make stick ten years hence without the power of the United States behind them; and they know that as well as we do.

The oft-discussed complaints of the men of the A. E. F. against the French were due to other causes than those I have enumerated here—such as overcharging. Also, social characteristics clashed.

Overcharge us they did, for all the traffic would bear. Yet no American should wonder at that, for what our own people have frequently done to our soldiers in that respect is ample, and what they would do to an army of rich visitors, if they had the chance, quickens the imagination. Yet I am persuaded that we are novices in many directions, such as damage claims. Every time an outfit moved from a French town or village—no matter in what perfect shape they might leave streets and billets—damage claims poured in which staggered us.

Many ridiculous rumors gained credence in regard to French treatment of our Army. It is not true that we rented our trenches. The French custom is to reimburse the owners of the land through which the trenches run, with a small sum; and we paid these amounts to the French Government. Naturally we paid for billets and transportation; every army does that.

It is true that some of the transportation charges were pretty steep and that in

Salisbury Axles are Standard

The New Salisbury Pressed Steel Rear Axle Standard Type

SALISBURY AXLES incorporate many improvements and betterments tried and proven by exhaustive engineering tests and practical use. Each Axle is submitted to careful factory test for strength and mechanical perfection before shipping.

The various axle members are designed for accessibility, strength, simplicity of construction and are "fool proof" as far as possible. Pinion shaft bearings cannot be jammed by improper adjustment.

The mounting in the spiral ring gear "the Salisbury way" insures greater rigidity and perfect alignment.

The rear wheels fixed rigidly to the driving shaft by a steel flange bolted to the hubs hold steady against side strains through a wide spread of bearings and permit of easy accessibility to driving shafts.

This gives all the desirable features of the full floating type and the added advantages of the three-quarter floating type.

Manufactured for Automobiles weighing 2600 to 3200 lbs.

Established 1902

Salisbury Axle Company

Jamestown, N.Y. · U.S.A.

$300 FOR CHRISTMAS! Sell us your spare time. You can easily make each hour bring you an extra dollar. Scores of spare-time representatives of The Saturday Evening Post, The Ladies' Home Journal and The Country Gentleman will earn more than $300.00 this month. Why not you too? You need not invest a single penny to learn all about our plan. Experience is unnecessary. Profits begin at once. Just clip off the coupon and mail it today.

The Curtis Publishing Company
458 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.
Gentlemen:—Tell me all about your spare-time money-making plan. I'm interested.
Name_____
Address_____
City _____ State_____

ORDER BY MAIL.

The South's Most Famous Confection ©

ORIGINAL CREOLE PRALINES
(GRUNEWALD)

Scrupulous care is maintained throughout in producing this famous candy. That's why Original Creole Pralines (Grunewald) made only of Louisiana cane sugar and Louisiana (whole half) pecan meats are regarded everywhere as the highest quality Creole Pralines made.

Let the kiddies eat all they want. Absolutely pure and the oil from the nut meats is good for the digestive system.

Also a delightful dessert or after dinner dainty.

As pure as any confection can be made.
Produced in a model, new and absolutely sanitary factory.
Mail orders filled anywhere.
Sent in a protected carton–each "Praline" wrapped in glazed paper. Carefully packed.
P. O. or Express Money Orders, or Personal checks received.

BOX OF 7 (Sample)	$1.00
BOX OF 12 - - - -	1.50
BOX OF 24 - - - -	3.00

Sent Parcel Post, prepaid, insured.
DEALERS WRITE FOR PARTICULARS

The HOTEL GRUNEWALD CATERERS
Dept. P NEW ORLEANS, LA.

14

DOLLARS APLENTY

There is money enough to go around: are you getting your share of it? Subscription representatives of The Saturday Evening Post, The Ladies' Home Journal and The Country Gentleman have discovered that there is one sure way to do it.

BUILD A BUSINESS

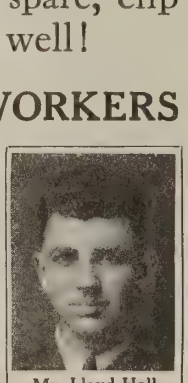
These representatives build up a permanent prosperous business, with handsome returns that grow richer every year. There is no limit to their opportunity—they have a hundred million prospects; they are selling publications with universal appeal. And their opportunity is yours. If you have only an hour a day to spare, clip the coupon below. It will pay you well!

HERE ARE FOUR TYPICAL WORKERS

Raymond Starr
$100 a week

Mr. Raymond Starr established a permanent business that was waiting for him, with $100 a week profits, on his discharge from the Navy.

Mr. Hall established a Curtis business that paid for his college education. He is now employed by us as a Supervisor of other workers.



Mr. Lloyd Hall
$350 a month

Charles R. Morris
$270 a Month

Mr. C. R. Morris has used two spare hours every evening to establish a permanent source of profit that pays him as high as $270 in 1 month.

Miss Helen Barnes
$150 a month

"Could I support myself if necessary?" is the question that prompted Miss Helen Barnes to write us. She found Curtis work an affirmative answer.

The Curtis Publishing Company
457 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Gentlemen:—Will you please tell me how I can build up a permanent, paying business as your representative?

Name_____ Street or R. F. D._____

Town_____ State_____

Guaranteed GENUINE LEATHER Pocketbook

The "American Bankroll"—1920 Model. Combination Billfold, Coin purse, Card and Photo case, 3x4¼ inches closed, of Fine Black Seal Grain Genuine Leather for only 79c postpaid ($8.50 per doz.) Any name engraved in 23-Karat Gold free (city 20c, street number 20c, Fraternal Emblems 25c extra.) Places for currency, coins, cards, photos and check book, 48-page Memo-Diary, brimful of necessary and interesting information. Also sold in a Soft Morocco Grain at $1.25 ($13.50 per doz.)—your Sunday Pocketbook. Send stamps or money order. We insist on returning your money if not satisfied. Fourteenth annual catalog free with orders or sent alone for 10c postage.

U. S. LEATHER GOODS COMPANY Established 1906
Dept. I-W 106-8-10 W. Lake St., Chicago Incorporated 1910

79c Postpaid
Satisfaction Guaranteed
Fits any Pocket
For Ladies and Gentlemen
USLG CO1919

80 Years Experience is built into MOORE LOOSE LEAF BOOKS

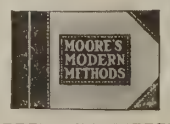
Mail this coupon
John C. Moore Corporation, Established 1839
Mfrs. of Loose Leaf & Bound Record Keeping Devices
1076 Stone St., Rochester, N. Y.

Send us your 160-Page Book illustrating your many styles and sizes of loose leaf binders and record sheets—telling just why Moore's 80 years experience makes these compact, simple, convenient books cost less than others. How they save time and trouble in handling records of every sort. Why for 80 years they have kept constantly improving until today they are the standard in over 200,000 offices and factories.



Send Free Book to
Name_____
Address_____

designating sites for munitions dumps and supply depots, and rights of way for railroads which had to be built in a rush, the French showed a disposition to make them with an eye to permanent improvements rather than to the urgency of our needs. But these are lesser matters, to which any people would probably be prone, and our concern should be only with the broad general tendency of France's policy toward us.

She is not alone in her attitude. They all want something.

It is more unfortunate for them than for us. Perhaps if they could be disabused of that notion and the promise of easy money it appears to hold out they would be more inclined to go to work. And work is Europe's most pressing need.

Now you cannot make a contract enduring when it is wholly one-sided; courts of law hold such contracts to be invalid. They are bound to end disastrously. Yet one-sided arrangements threaten between us and Europe unless we approach every problem with the sanity and regard to values that would belong in any agreement between business partners working in harmony.

Sometimes it has been extremely difficult to render aid that would be of any real benefit. Take, for instance, the work America did toward returning prisoners of war to their homelands. Our missions spent money without stint to provide suitable trains and clothing and food for the prisoners about to go back; they sent the trains in charge of capable medical officers, and furnished a few days' rations to the unfortunate soldiers when they were turned loose in their own countries.

And what happened? In the Balkan countries thousands of returned prisoners were left to shift for themselves the instant we turned them over to their compatriots. The sick received no care and died miserably. No real sustained provision to feed or care for the soldiers who had fought their battles; they were abandoned and thrown on their own resources; indifference and lethargy on the part of most officialdom and a part of the civil population.

I have dwelt on these matters in order to correct a very false impression which a large section of America entertains of the European attitude toward war problems. Perhaps it will be of service in showing that the European nations are inclined to be thrifty in their dealings with us, and may suggest the advisability of bringing into our future dealings with them some of that canny caution for which the New Englanders are so justly famous.

They were telling a story in Paris at th time of the conference which touches o Europe's attitude very aptly. It concerne a Swiss official who arrived in the Frenc capital just after the conference began i sittings.

"Hello!" exclaimed a friend, meetin him on the street. "You here? Came fo the conference, I suppose?"

The diplomat from Switzerland an swered in the negative. "No," he sa slowly, "I am not going to it. What's th use? The United States hasn't anythin we can get just now."

Since my return from Europe in Augu many friends and acquaintances ha asked me if I think there will be anoth war. Some of them knew that I was a d vout believer in the feasibility of a Leag of Nations, provided one were establish with a genuine desire and purpose of a war participants to make it effective.

Most assuredly I think there will another war. Just give Europe time to g breath and reorganize, and they will be at again, hammer and tongs. How long t process of recuperation will take I have the least notion; one guess is as good another.

A league is utterly powerless to stave conflicts so long as national prejudices a rancors and hates rule Europe as they to-day. Education must go hand in ha with all efforts to found a workable leag or they will inevitably fail. For gene tions there has been steady persistent pro aganda pumped into the inhabitants every European country calculated breed in them distrust and fear of th neighbors. All such propaganda is w propaganda. There must now be prop ganda—sleepless and persistent—to co vince the masses of every country that t interests of all are identical; that the vicious idea that the masses of anoth country covet their lands and possessio is a lie designed to promote the intere of a few; that there is plenty of room in t world for everybody, and plenty of opp tunity, if all will show a disposition coöperate in a friendly spirit. Can such pr aganda be waged successfully against t other propaganda, which through centur of reiteration has formed convictions in t minds of the average Frenchman, Germa Italian and Slav as firm as their belief the existence of water and air?

It may require a century, but it can done. Meanwhile there may be other wa and every war is a setback, for one w breeds another. It leaves stings and wro that cry out for settlement.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
More Than Two Million a Week

Table of Contents

October 25, 1919

SHORT STORIES	PAGE
Steel Preferred—Herschel S. Hall	3
Bonds of Patrimony—Holworthy Hall	10
Two Beaus and Bomazeen—Holman Day	12
The Junior Member—Frederick Orin Bartlett	14
Lorena—Thomas Beer	18
In the Big Timber—Victor Shawe	21
Danger—Run Slow (In two parts)—Sinclair Lewis	22
The Wrong Hat on the Right Man—Henry Irving Dodge	28
Too Much is Enough—Carl Mattison Chapin	46
Cave Stuff—Josephine A. Meyer	53
Over and Back with Scuds—Torrey Ford	57
SERIALS
The Great Accident—Ben Ames Williams	24
The Autobiography of a Race Horse—L. B. Yates	27
Black Sheep—Will Payne	32
ARTICLES
Life Among Us Landed Proprietors—Irvin S. Cobb	6
The Eagle in the Cockpit—George Pattullo	8
Forty Years of a Diplomat's Life—Baron Rosen	16
Chinese Coolies and the War—Laurence Salisbury	20
Looking Backward—Henry Watterson	26
DEPARTMENTS
Editorial—The Editor	30
Everybody's Business—Floyd W. Parsons	42
The Poets' Corner	64

A DISTINGUISHED SERVICE LABEL

PERFECT FITTING

MUNSING WEAR

UNION SUITS

Munsingwear for Men, Women and Children

The ideal fall and winter underclothing. Millions of discriminating people, prefer and wear it. Munsingwear fits and covers the form perfectly. It is non-irritating. It has a habit of outwashing, outwearing, outlasting expectations. The fine quality in each garment insures unusual service. Because of this serviceability Munsingwear is most economical. Made in every desired size and style, and in a large variety of fabrics, Munsingwear fits your person and your purse. There's an up-to-date dealer in nearly every city or town in the United States who can Union Suit you in garments made the satisfactory Munsingwear way.

ALWAYS ASK FOR

MUNSINGWEAR

NEVER SAY
UNDERWEAR

Anyway

Be sure your bread is made with GOLD MEDAL FLOUR

Published Weekly

The Curtis Publishing Company

Cyrus H. K. Curtis, President

Hudington, Vice-President and Treasurer
F. Collins, General Business Manager
Walter D. Fuller, Secretary
William Boyd, Advertising Director

dependence Square, Philadelphia

London: 6, Henrietta Street
Covent Garden, W. C.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A.D. 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1919, by the Curtis Publishing Company in the United States and Great Britain

George Horace Lorimer
EDITOR

Churchill Williams, F. S. Bigelow,
A. W. Neall, Arthur McKeogh,
H. D. Walker, E. Dinsmore,
Associate Editors

Walter H. Dower, Art Editor

Entered as Second-Class Matter, November 18, 1879, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Under the Act of March 3, 1879

Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post-Office Department, Ottawa, Canada

ue 192 | 5c. THE COPY 10c. in Canada | PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 1, 1919 | $2.00 THE YEAR by Subscription | Number 18

THE DOOR TO FREEDOM

"Dod Blast it All!" Groaned Mr. Blurt to Himself. "Rivers of Soul Floating by, and Here I am Dying of Thirst!"

By George Agnew Chamberlain

ILLUSTRATED BY CHARLES D. MITCHELL

The contractor transferred a disfiguring bulge in the interior of his mouth ruminatingly from cheek to cheek. Like all successful men he had a secret motto upon which was built the whole sturdy fabric of life; his, could he have put it into words, would have read as follows: "Shift your cud thrice before you speak." During the operation his small eyes passed over and through Mr. Blurt like busy gimlets. He found the lad good to look upon, five-feet-ten of irreducible brawn, a shock of reddish-brown hair, sensitive lips perpetually flirting with a smile, a broad brow, and widely spaced gray eyes that would never deliberately look for trouble, but carried a promise of glad welcome should it appear as an uninvited guest. The contractor drenched a dreaming distant sunflower with an unexpected bolt of brown tobacco juice and spoke a laconic figure, unadorned by comment. "Thanks," grunted Mr. Blurt, and returned to sawing his way through a gravel bed with the ardor of one who knows that gifts and gratitude, even when monosyllabic, are sometimes beyond vocal measure. He had broken all the rules of the game in asking Mike that fundamental question. He knew it, Mike knew it and knew that Blurt knew it, and yet had answered. The world was suddenly brightened to the eager eyes of comparative youth by that single act of pondered generosity on the part of the taciturn boss.

A week later Blurt took a day off and was gone for three. Upon his return he blew five hard-earned shillings on a lantern and spent a night with a pad of stolen paper and the stub of a pencil; then, in the morning, he went formally to Mike's weather-bitten little tent, standing aloof but not quite separate from the general encampment, and found the contractor sitting before it, already sweating though only in undershirt and pyjama trousers stuffed into soft mosquito boots.

"Mike," asked Blurt without prefix or preamble, "you got a time limit on this job?"

After due consideration the contractor nodded his head slowly in assent, his gimlet eyes never leaving the young man's abnormally flushed face, in which they seemed to be taking soundings for traces of madness, but with a faint hope of striking true gold.

"Mike," continued Blurt, his lips trembling with eagerness so that he spoke a little hoarsely, "let me do the 'Mlidini spur. I'll—I'll pay you a thousand pounds flat out of the settlement."

"An' how much are you thinkin' ye'd have left for yerself, me lad?" asked Mike without his usual hesitation.

"Two hundred," replied Blurt promptly.

The contractor's eyes narrowed to mere pin points of light and then slowly opened to a vacant and disillusioned stare.

"It couldn't be done," he said listlessly. "Ye'd have your ballast running counter to supplies comin' up to railhead from the coast. Ye'd be only hinderin'." He held up a

HAROLD TRING BLURT stood on te bridge of the big freighter Walkover as she nosed her way up the Narrows, ached intently to see Liberty loom out ple mists of morning with the symbolic eu which lends to the home-coming of ecan a synthesized significance far beh broad, ghostly welcome of the cliffs of tan Englishman or the masking frown sirre to a Frenchman. One in the know hre said that Mr. Blurt was ne luckiest and freest of nortals, yet on this wraithed ngwhile his eyes sought Lib- is nsides swelled with an ac- nng yearning for freedom.

vs just thirty-seven years old and the possessor of a million dollars' worth of al bonds dotted all over the world on spots that were beginning to shine as raled high lights of income begetters. No one had handed Mr. Blurt this eh a platter; he had gone after it barehanded and piled up the mountain, not h penny, but in modest blocks of a thousand here, five thousand there, and an il killing of six digits, once he had really struck into his stride.

tenty-seven Mr. Blurt, not having five dollars to his name, had been obliged ion a chit in exchange for first right to a brand-new pick-and-shovel equipment a eap of company-owned utensils; ten years later he was eligible for member- at nebulous but very real fraternity familiarized by the metropolitan press th euphemistic appellation of the Millionaires' Club. How had he done it? Easily. nese things can be; they happen every day. Mr. Blurt had wandered away ne at the untender age of ten, filled with a desire "for to admire and for to h naturally tough little body had never failed to find enough tough food to t ing without brains until the day when his mind was born, at the exact mo- wich brought him the surprising realization that ignorance has a low market rom that time on he took no holiday from his coarser labors that was not de- ta flyer in education.

ths happened that in addition to being expert at wielding pick and shovel at y-ven he was also possessed of the invaluable faculty of adding two and two etng the correct answer.

a Mr. Mike," he had remarked on a far-away day to his burly, florid, apparently lkg overlord, "what do they pay you a mile on this job?"

ham of a hand to stave off Blurt's attempt at interruption and said in a more kindly tone, "Besides, ye've missed out on the figgers, lad. There wouldn't be no thousand; nor no two hundred."

He dropped his hand in a gesture of dismissal.

"You old stiff," cried Mr. Blurt belligerently, "you give me a chance to talk—give me a chance to show you!"

"I'm waitin'," said Mike in a cold thin voice, his fists doubling up out of force of habit.

"If I can show you, it's a deal, ain't it?" demanded Mr. Blurt, unabashed.

"If you c'n show me," agreed Mike in an ominously quiet tone which seemed to carry an undercurrent of inference to the effect that if Mr. Blurt failed the owner of the voice would be disposed to give an exhibition of a totally different nature. "You think you know it all, don't ye?"

"No," said Mr. Blurt shortly; "not all, but just one little thing. I guess that's what counts in this business—knowing one little thing." He stepped to a near-by table, on which were piled various blue prints, quickly sorted out the survey for the 'Mlidini spur and studied it eagerly. His face broke into a satisfied smile. "Mike," he said, "stop wondering if you can lick me and come here."

"Wonderin'!" growled Mike. "Wonderin'! Kid! Sucklin'!"

Mr. Blurt paid no heed. He took from his trousers pocket the stub of a pencil and very carefully mapped an irregular oval patch on the blue print. Mike's curiosity was immediately roused; he rose and moved to a position of easy observation.

"An' what do ye call that?" he asked.

"That's the one little thing," replied Blurt. "Only two hundred paces off the line, and they missed it."

"All right," agreed Mike impatiently. "We'll say they missed it. Now, in the name of me, what is it? A lake of floatin' gold?"

"Not quite," said Mr. Blurt. "It's just an outcrop of gravel."

The contractor's eyes narrowed, he transferred his cud thrice and then murmured the single word, "Ballast." After a longer and still more deliberate pause than usual he turned and held out his horny hand to seal the deal for the laying of the 'Mlidini spur roadbed.

"Luck to ye, lad," he said with a gleam of near-affection in his glance. "I'll give ye the order to draw out supplies at the junction. It's a fairer chance nor I had at half again your age."

Thus did Mr. Blurt start on his ten-year career as contractor. The intelligent will have perceived that its initiation was simultaneous with the birth of a life motto. "Just one little thing" became the backbone of Mr. Blurt's philosophy of success. Trifling incidents of his long years of vagabondage, held against days of ready reckoning in a retentive memory, became the solid capital upon which, by closer figuring than could give a margin of profit to those who knew less of Chinese graveyards, Indian castes and South American deserts, he built up his bank account of pure velvet.

And now he was through; but standing mentally on the summit of his pile and meeting the high gaze of Liberty fairly and squarely he was yet conscious of a sense of depression, imprisonment, impotence, as though he were an eagle with full-grown claws and a beak but no wings. During all his young life of labor and self-teaching he had looked forward to this moment as to a goal; never once had it occurred to him that in reaching it he would not find the pearly gates to freedom revealed, a vast and visible portal.

Peering through the pale mists of an early morning in New York Harbor he strove to pierce the future, and found only a serrated but unbroken wall of negation. The years of wandering had left him no home, no friends, not even an abandoned wall of ancient habits upon which to fasten the itching tendrils of his new life. He wanted something badly, but just what, where and how, he could not say; he only knew that the failure of the golden gate of his dreams to burst upon his vision was rapidly assuming the proportions of a base betrayal. Could he himself be to blame? Heretofore when such questionings had assailed him he had fallen back on his ever-potent motto. He did so now. Was it possible that a mere wicket guarded the entrance to the road to freedom, and that the name on the door was "Just one little thing"?

He reached for this slim chance as a drowning man for a straw, held by desperation in the looming shadow of a force that he had long jeered at as the empty bugaboo of the self-made. How often had he seen friends and rivals go up against its soft nothingness and yet fall back bruised and broken? Feeling its actuality for the first time he put the thing to himself in plain terms. It was one-line men like himself who took the straightest road to success, and when they reached it hung poised, even as he was now doing, staring wistfully for some, for any unknown road and finding only the solid wall of their past, moved by the witch wand of Tantalus from behind them to three paces front, center stage.

"A man's past," confessed Blurt to himself at the end of this meditation, "is no dream bog; it's a real barrier. All these chaps that I've laughed at for going back to the same old round when they've made their pile and tried to break away haven't turned back in their hearts at all. It seems that a man can step forward and still bump his nose on his past. However," he added, his square jaw setting, "there always has been and there must be 'Just one little thing!'"

A tug steamed busily out to meet the Walkover, hailed her bridge and told her to anchor and wait for a berth; the captain cursed, drew his ship out of the channel into the thin lee of Bedloe's Island, let go the hook and dismissed the third mate, who had been sharing the watch. He himself continued to pace the full length of the bridge deck, his head bowed in the deliberate absorption which was his antidote for impatience.

Mr. Blurt turned his back on the New York sky line and stared at the captain for a change. The skipper was Scotch, of the only race that produces men whose bodies and minds can be massive and lean at one and the same time. He stood six feet one, had a large bony head, a gritty pepper-and-mustard beard and walked like a flail in full swing.

Mr. Blurt's lips twisted to a mischievous smile. "Say, cap!" he hailed.

The captain stopped suddenly, planted his feet wide and fixed his unsmiling eyes on Mr. Blurt's face. "Wull?"

"I just wanted to ask you a question," said Mr. Blurt calmly. "Did you ever find the door to freedom?"

Instantly a flash of mysticism gleamed in the Scotchman's cavernous eyes.

The Giant Fixed His Pale Eyes on Mr. Blurt's Glowing Face and Asked Cryptically, "Have You Ever Been in Jail?"

"No," he answered without hesitation, "but I where it is."

"What!" gasped Mr. Blurt. He had expected a stare, a grunt of disgust, a pitying ejaculation or throated oath—anything but this prompt accepta battle on the plane of his own deeply hidden thoug

"It's easy, that one," continued the captain with jeer for Mr. Blurt's mental discomfiture. "'Woman name on the door, but few there be that read it. turned unceremoniously to continue his striding.

Mr. Blurt stared at him with fallen jaw while hi automatically repeated over and over again the tic words. Every man of Mr. Blurt's virility, de appearance and wide wanderings has a private v women, standing and fallen, bordering life's back tr the poplars along a French highway after a hurrican Blurt now examined his individual gallery of the fa shrewdly narrowed eyes. He concluded that the was one of those rare individuals who walk the tigl between confinement and the verge of insanity. an impulse to put out his foot and trip the sk nervously pendulating legs, but having recently burly stevedore knocked from the deck into an op and a drop of forty feet without inducing even a p curiosity as to his ultimate fate, he decided that combat must suffice.

"Cap," he shouted into a passing ear, "you're Somebody has dropped a magnet into your ment pass."

The skipper wheeled, came back and stood ov lowering like a crag, for a moment silent, as though minds as to whether he should fall on the worm w the temerity to tell a Scotchman he was wrong an him by material weight or speak mighty words an him away and down and out on a flood of arg Natural appetite carried the day for the latter cou

"Mr. Blur-r-t," he exploded, rolling the name cascade of rumbling r's, "you and me, we've round the wur-r-rld and back again. We've barg weemin—travelin' weemin, loose weemin, una weemin. We've seen them kiltin' their nighties a hot crossroads where there's no abidin' habitation, in their eyes and a word on the lip.

"Eh, mon, ye blush for them, but what of y Shame to your blindness! Shame to the eye that only in shallow vessels thinks to see the mirror deep sea! Mr. Blurt, the speerit of man is like th tain dew of the Highlands of Scotland. Blended overdose of water, tainted with brine or drownde gaseous inundations that tickle with their flat bubb palate of an effeeminate generation, it's no Scotch the milk of grown men, but hogwash and a vanity."

Mr. Blurt's jaw hung open, his eyes were wide, pulse throbbed as though he were watching b from ambush. He did not speak, he scarcely brea he disturb the gushing miraculous flow unpara history since dumfounded Moses touched a rock staff to water a multitude, and foun worked.

"But," continued the captain, n oughly roused, "the speerits of ma alcohol in its only noble form, wh filed by the dilutions of a vapid a oop a team that pulls ever together— and the emblem of strength. 'Tis field, mon, for exposeetion if not fo versy that would show ye the conju their beauties of virility, of youth i mellowin' by endurance, of increasin in the face of time, and of kindly an power against the last cold of years; no my intention to lead ye so far. only tell ye the one thing: Moun comes to the wideness of freedom t long prison in oak, the speerit of man the heart of a true woman."

He broke away abruptly, and legs head hung low, returned to his hab sorption. Mr. Blurt faced once mor line of Manhattan, but his eyes r sought a break in its serrated barr were turned inward and back along the a course of his own life. Could it be true th ing many women he had known none? Wa woman the name on the little door to freed passed in review a long sequence of amato tures. The captain was no fool. "Travelin loose women, unanchored women." He h the nail of Blurt's intimate experience a bl head that had driven it deep into a quick sciousness which now sought in vain th the years of maturity for one single ex woman, constant, tender, faithful, crowned double glory of love shared to eterni single mate. He had vague recolle having read of such beings, women

(Continued on Page 141)

ABOUT PLAY WRITING

By DAVID BELASCO

Th fashion me this tale into a play; . . .
Tlugh thou canst not cobble thy shoon,
Nr yet hew like Phidias, yet canst thou
Me a play like this. —WALKER.

V.S recently my privilege to publish in this place an tne of my views concerning the beginner on the g—views which have been formed by a long life-of xperience and which I have been often importexpress. I am greatly gratified to believe, because rc of personal letters which I have received relao:, that my article has proved instructive and ol to many stage aspirants of to-day—among jay be some of the stage leaders of to-morrow.
o intend, in response to urgent and repeated
:t—and also a little for my own satisfaction—own here, as well as may be within necessary tns, a companion abstract of the lessons I have d nd the opinions I have formed about play g hs the most difficult of all artistic achieve-
. seems to me, is to write a really good play;
ely a piece that gets produced and makes y—such fortuitous freaks of fortune occur al-ry season—but a genuine substantial play.
ity to do so cannot be acquired from books ped out of the possession of faculty to write her forms. A man may have the most ex-ntellects; if he be a writer he may write s novel or the best poem of his day—and yet le to write a play at all. It is only a marvel lsmith that can write not only the best novel
y but also the best play into the bargain!
—When comes there such another?"
nowledge of the subject of play writing, such as n not been easily acquired. On the contrary "'tis ought"—and if it is at times feelingly expressed t remembered in my behalf that I have suffered ore inexpressibly bad plays than has any other ng living—or, as I believe, that ever lived! It is le of the old manager and actor, Samuel Phelps, nthing extraordinary that in the whole course of his e read and considered more than two thousand plys—"very few worth much." Well—I can see n. go him several better; I believe I am safe in g at I have read and considered nearer to twenty al; and, altogether, I have found fewer worth any-tan Phelps did.

nt as many persons apply to me each season for end instruction in regard to the writing of plays as d to becoming actors, and literally hundreds of e sent to me every year upon which I am not only t give opinions but of which I am likewise expected mmediate productions. My views and opinions, dgly, as herein expressed—though indicating why r plays are annually rejected by me—may perhaps gstive and useful to many persons to whom indi-l I can send no more than a formal rejection.

Would You Write a Play? Don't

TE first place, then, I would say: As it is in play ig, even so is it in play writing. If you do not posnerent ability to act you will never be truly an actor glyou pass your whole life in the theater; and if you possess inherently the peculiar distinctive faculty e amatist you will never be truly a play writer—not glyou should indite so-called plays by the score and e iserable the lives of managers with importunity to u them. But there is apparently—and long has — popular, almost a universal delusion to the con-
y. Few if any readers of these words but have heard al inquiry—generally addressed to some person ner wrote anything!—"Why don't you write a play that?"

e this popular delusion is an incessant source of ment. Take the average young person to an art r exhibit to him the variant beauties of Titian or i or Burne-Jones or Inness or Sargent; of Michellor Cellini or Saint-Gaudens or MacMonnies or r-he, not possessing the innate peculiar faculty of nter or of the sculptor, seldom indeed feels inspired
i. pictures or to chisel statues. But take the average person to see a play—or, at most, a few plays—and credibly large number of cases he is fired with high v to go and do likewise; and, moreover, is pretty ct that he can write better plays than most of those l has seen! The result of his presumptuous vanity, tally and practically, is as a rule a mess as unsightly ntile as though he had fooled with canvas and paint ble and chisel. But when you tell him so—no mat-hy earnestly he begs for your opinion—take my cand tell him so by letter.

PHOTO. BY SARONY, NEW YORK CITY

Dion Boucicault

To the vast majority of those who yearn to write plays I respectfully venture to commend with heartfelt earnestness the celebrated advice of Punch to young persons about to marry: "Don't." But I would not be misunderstood; I do not seek to discourage beginners nor to prevent the writing of plays. On the contrary I appreciate—none more keenly—the need of developing new writers. The significant words of Robert Buchanan are often in my mind: "There are mean souls who bend down only to the sun in its meridian. I turn to the splendor of the dawn." I remember vividly my own early struggles—when there was no splendor but plenty of squalor and heartache—and I wish to be of assistance. That which I desire to discourage is the making of tons of utterly useless interlocutory trash by persons, young or old, who have not a spark of play-writing ability in them. And as to the possessor of genuine dramatic faculty—no adversity of advice by anybody will prevent his writing plays any more than it would prevent his breathing. That at least is a conviction established by my experience—though not all observers agree with it.

In a notable paper on Actors and the Stage, for example, published not long ago, the capital English player, Mr. Louis Calvert, declared: "Common sense tells us that he—Shakspere—"would never have written those great plays if he had not known that he had capable actors to enact them." Mr. Calvert's opinions on things theatrical always command respectful attention; he is the son of one of the best of the old-time players and managers—Charles Calvert, 1828–79, of Manchester, England—and he is one of the few actors now on our stage who are thoroughly conversant with theatrical history and the best traditions of the theater. Nevertheless, with the somewhat dogmatic opinion which I have quoted, relative to the writing of plays, I take liberty to disagree. William Shakspere was, first of all, an inspired artist; there is no way that I can see to understand him except to view him in that light. And he wrote plays, some of which are superlatively great, not because he was himself a player; not because he was a manager; not because there was a market or a demand for his plays; not because he knew that he had capable actors to enact them—but just because he was a natural, born dramatist, because play writing was his preordained inevitable medium. It seems to me that common sense and study of his plays show us that he would have written them, must have written them, whether he knew they would be acted well or ill. As it was said of James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, that he "lisped in numbers, for the numbers came," so it might, I think, be said with entire truth of Shakspere that he wrote plays by the very compulsion of Nature.

It is worth passing note that there is plenty of internal evidence in Shakspere's writing that he keenly appreciated the mutable character of the actor's art—at once the most beautiful and the most evanescent of all arts—and that he felt and believed, as most other dramatists do, that "the play's the thing" and not the actor; not the "poor player that struts and frets his hour upon the stage and then is heard no more." I am sure the problem of finding players suitable to enact a Shakspere trilogy which I design for production is troubling me far more than ever it troubled W. Shakspere when he was writing the plays which I would now revive!

And in the writing of plays, as it was with Shakspere so is it also with all other authentic play makers; from the greatest of us to the least the difference in us is one of degree, not of kind; like steel to the magnet, like rain to the sea, intuitively we all find our way to the dramatic form and work therein.

Of course there is a mechanism, a technic of play writing, and that can be taught—and should be. It will save the capable beginner's time and energy to learn the road from the gained knowledge of others rather than to grope and experiment until experience shall force him into it and so impart practical knowledge of "those rules of old discovered, not devised." There are to-day schools of play writing just as there are schools of acting and of other arts, and they are useful institutions when properly and intelligently directed. But admittance to such schools should be sought on the basis of native capacity and not on that of ability to pay the tuition fees, for, let me say again, mere instruction in technic will never make a dramatist any more than lack of it will long suffice to suppress one.

Likewise let it be remembered in taking up this subject that though all arts are long the art of play writing is the longest. And after years given to the study and practice of it you will find—precisely as in acting, writing, painting, sculpture, music, only more so—that it is never to be fully mastered. Every time you attempt a drama you learn something more about how to do it; and something more—wholesome lesson for vanity!—about your own ignorance and limitation. "I have played Hamlet now for fifty years," exclaimed the famous old actor Betterton, when somebody told him his performance of that part was perfect, "and I believe I have not got to the depths of all its philosophy yet!" I began play writing when I was a child; I have been at it now for not less than fifty-five years, and I know I have nowhere near got to the depths of all the philosophy of it yet—and, what is more, that I never shall do so.

Knowledge of Stage Mechanics

BUT to return to the teachable technic of play writing. What method of studying the dramatic art do I recommend? Well, in the first place—differing from most if not all my colleagues of dramatic pedagogics—I believe that actual intimate familiarity with the practical mechanics of the stage is the best of all foundations for technical education in the writing of plays. Admirers of the literary drama often sneer at actors' plays—oblivious, apparently, that most of the best plays in existence were written by actors. I do not mean, of course, that all actors are capable of writing plays; they are not; but most of the men most capable of writing plays have been either actors or men early, practically and thoroughly instructed in technical matters of stage requirements.

A few of the many names that start to mind almost haphazard as illustrating this significant fact are: Shakspere, Molière, Farquhar, Sheridan, John Howard Payne, Sheridan Knowles, Charles Reade, Lester Wallack, Augustin Daly, Dion Boucicault, John Brougham, Arthur Pinero and H. V. Esmond. An author can write a book of first-rate quality without knowing anything at all of the mysteries of the typesetting machine and of the composing room, the press room and the bindery—the mediums through which his work is presented to the public. It is not the same with drama. Nobody can write a good play without possessing sound and comprehensive knowledge of the scope and limitations of the stage—the medium through which dramatic work is presented to the public.

As to the best way of acquiring such knowledge to-day, it is, in my opinion, to obtain from the manager of any good resident repertoire theater, where the bill is changed every week, the privilege of witnessing day after day and night after night the rehearsals of many plays. Pay for that privilege if you must; live in the theater; learn the

(Continued on Page 153)

MRS. FIFTY-FIFTY

By Maximilian Foster

ILLUSTRATED BY ARTHUR WILLIAM BROWN

"You Mean, Don't You," He Interjected, "You Don't Like His Wife?"

IT IS safe to assume that a woman's bedroom in its privacy reflects the character of the woman who occupies it; and admitting this there are few exceptions to the rule. It is the same as to say that a capable woman is naturally a capable housekeeper—a statement that Nelly Dunbar's husband felt admitted of little argument. Now, however, as he stood at his wife's door staring into her room his face darkened with the resentment he had felt so frequently of late.

The shades were raised, the bright sunshine of a summer's day poured in through the opened windows; and though it was already half past seven and his train for the city left a few minutes after eight his wife still reposed among the pillows, oblivious not only of the hour but of everything it involved. The dress she had worn the night before was flung in a huddle on a chair, while under the same chair, lying where their owner had stripped them off, were a pair of silk stockings and a single scarlet satin slipper. What had become of the slipper's mate was a question. Either it had been kicked under the wardrobe or the bed or, if not that, it lay buried beneath the other articles of apparel that festooned the furniture or carpeted the floor.

But all this was only a part of her shortcomings. Why was his wife still asleep, still drowsing luxuriously, when he was up and doing? Other women saw to it that their husbands had their breakfasts properly, and why wasn't she downstairs ready to pour his coffee when he wanted it? True, the night before he and his wife had been out till after midnight; but in Dunbar's opinion that made little difference. If he could get up and dress, ready to go to the city as usual, why shouldn't she get up too? Take Mrs. Fawcett, for example—the Fawcetts with whom they'd dined the night before; it was Mrs. Fawcett's boast that not once in her twelve years of married life had she let her husband breakfast alone. Another thing—there was never anything slipshod about the Fawcett household. You had to hand it to Mrs. Fawcett. She certainly was capable.

That was the trouble. For eleven years the Dunbars had been married; and though during these years Nelly Dunbar had managed somehow in some way to keep her household going there is little doubt she was not in the least like Mrs. Fawcett. Housekeeping she hated, and she made no bones of saying so. What was more, she had said as much to Mrs. Fawcett.

"Why not be honest?" Nelly had laughed. "Housekeeping after all is drudgery, a deadly bore!"

What had possessed his wife to make such a speech Dunbar couldn't understand.

Nelly in spite of her faults usually was tactful; and as he recalled the remark and Mrs. Fawcett's shocked amazement Dunbar's reflections grew still more resentful. He and Fawcett had a deal on at the moment, a business matter of importance; and the remark in its offhand carelessness might easily have affronted his hosts. It was this same business matter, in fact, that Dunbar had come to his wife's room to talk about.

He had always talked things over with her. It was not of course that she knew anything about business—as he would have told you, she didn't—but then by talking things over one grew familiar with the details. That was how, he prided himself, he had done so well. Outside his regular business—he was head salesman in a white-goods house—investments were Dunbar's specialty; and as he was one of the most prosperous men in Riverdale, the suburb where they lived, his success seemed to have proved the merit of his method. The only investments he had ever had go wrong were two or three he had neglected to talk over at home.

This too added to his resentment. Annoyed and irritated, how could he discuss anything intelligently? Much less how could he settle a matter so important as this? She knew as well as he, too, that the Fawcett deal needed a lot of talking over; yet here she was, with the same irresponsible indifference she had shown more than usually of late, still asleep, and her house, her own room especially, looking as if a whirlwind had hit it. One thing anyway—the time had come, after he talked with her of the Fawcett matter, to let her know just what her indifference, her shiftlessness, was costing. On top of that he might, besides, appeal to Mrs. Fawcett. She would be willing, he knew, to give his wife the benefit of her advice and experience; and with that Nelly might be led to mend her ways.

The suggestion brightened Dunbar. Picking his way through the disorder he crossed the room toward his still sleeping wife. "Nelly; I say, Nell!" he called.

Mrs. Dunbar stirred drowsily.

She was still young—a slim, good-looking woman of thirty-odd with girlish features and gray eyes that had in them a queer d liveliness. It was as though their owr perennially amused at everything—t her surroundings, herself and perha husband. It was a little annoying to

"Hello!" she exclaimed. "Haven't you gone y

Dunbar by an effort concealed his annoyance.

"I'm waiting for my breakfast," he returned.

An exclamation escaped her. She threw back the and was already groping under the bed for her d slippers before he could restrain her.

"You don't need to get up," he remarked quie just want a moment's talk with you. It's abo Fawcett business."

She shot a quick glance at him, and clamberir into bed drew the covers about her. Then delibera gave the lace cap adorning her mop of brown glint a vigorous dig. Her expression too had changed.

"I've talked all I'm going to talk about that," deliberately.

Dunbar started at her tone. Its note voiced revo he was not accustomed to that. He could hardly she would refuse to talk over his business with hir

"Do you mean you won't?" he inquired, his li pressing painfully as he stared at her.

"I mean exactly what I say, Walter!" Her t not changed. It was still as deliberate, as detern before. "I don't like that man, and I've told y dozen times," she added.

Dunbar for a moment gazed at her fixedly.

"You mean, don't you," he interjected, "you d his wife?"

At the remark his wife's eyes widened with su tonishment.

"Mrs. Fawcett?" she repeated.

Dunbar nodded deliberately. Before this he ha his wife's opposition to the Fawcett deal; but it until now, by a chance thought, an inspiration, h had guessed the true reason for it.

To his astonishment his wife abruptly laughed.

"That doll!" Giving her cap another vigorous shrugged her shoulders amusedly. "Good gracio ter, you don't suppose for an instant I'd pay any a to her!"

But Dunbar now was too irritated to let her hinder what he had to say.

"It might be better for you if you did!" he significantly.

His wife started abruptly.

"Better?"

"That's what I said," he repeated.

Mrs. Dunbar sat back among the pillows. T easy little twinkle had gone out of her eyes; and s at him curiously, her brows puckered with evident "You don't really mean, do you," she said slow you'd like me to be like her?" Then as if in dis gave another light rippling laugh. "Sorry, Walter. I might

"You've Told Me a Good Many Times Lately What the Trouble With Women is, So I'll Take the Same Libe and Tell You What's the Trouble With Men" mevain—perhaps I'm that already; and maybe ghbecome stupid—that is, more stupid than I am;

if ou wish me to become showy, overdressed, pre-ou—well, I'm afraid I never can. It just isn't in me,
s !" instupid, showy? Dunbar's irritation was reflected e ok of indignation he gave her. Admiring Mrs.

et as he did, his wife's cool offhand slurs not only el to his impatience, in his resentment he was ind that to talk to her now would be only a waste , of effort. Curiously it was the attack on Mrs.
ets dress that galled him most. As Mrs. Fawcett a, she dressed the way her husband liked her to nd could his wife, the one who made that light eattack, show any such devotion?
ot at this room!" he said abruptly.
s sture as he indicated the surroundings was come.
'hroom? Why—why, what's wrong with it?" she with it? Dunbar laughed, the laugh harsh,

Of a sudden, then, the resentment, the annoy-had nursed for days in silence burst into a flood

It was of course elet his t on any it ould; if ant to erly into ily slip-of run-ls home hat was out; he lo nothhaps, to n it. Just r it was a y serious er when she sess go to
as well!
h 'swhat's
g, he said e'd fin-and his ga d at him

a she was nined was en. Stag-ould put et r. She ecomehow leo underdwhy he ld xpend so h eat, so nergy just s her beddn't hapbe in
r. lowever, ade no t o inter-

nstead she listened with curious intentness to all ne o say.
he Dunbar stopped, halting for sheer lack of breath,
'if gave him another quick queer glance.
W t's the row, Walter?" she asked quietly—aimlessly, lt
W t! You ask that?" he cried.
nevords were emphatic in their resentment, their e injury. He would have been off again, but this s didn't let him.
N wait, Walter! Is it the house—the way I've run
r re you irritated because I'm trying to keep you f his deal with Fawcett? Don't speak; I'll finish in nt! If it's the house I'll admit it's not what it ide. I've been pretty tired; I've worried much more ou know about this business; and the house, be-, really too large for our two servants. I know vcold me to get another maid, but I don't like to d he money—not in times like these, at any rate.
ea of putting away a quarter of what we make we t, put away much more. That's why I'm doing the an extra maid, though never mind about that.
t m trying to find out is whether it is the house or dl with Fawcett that's made you so touchy, so ng of late. Won't you tell me frankly, dear?"
nnow she had put it so clearly—so cleverly, rather—Inbar in spite of his certainty, his conviction of her ffence, felt himself just a bit less certain. But, as he lle, she had a trick of doing that.
What's wrong with Fawcett?" he demanded.
he miled lightly. "I don't like the man; he's trying se ou. I've told you so, Walter, a dozen times."

"I know you have!" he retorted. As he, too, a dozen times had told her, Fawcett was one of the squarest men he knew. Added to that he was one of the cleverest.

Nelly nodded sagely. "Clever, yes! That's why he talked you into this. You know yourself what you think—or used to think," she added, "of men that dabble in Wall Street, speculate in stocks; and that's what Fawcett now is trying to make you do!" She bobbed her head, as she said this, in emphasis. Then her face hardened suddenly and there came upon it—her gray eyes, her mouth, her rounded chin—a look Dunbar remembered having seen once or twice before. It was a look of stubborn mulish obstinacy—the look Nelly wore when firmly and finally she put her foot down on anything. "Gamble in stocks? If I have anything to say about it Fawcett won't get you into that!" she said.

Wouldn't he? Again Dunbar was struck with the absurdity of wasting words on her. The trouble with women, his wife among them, was that they made everything personal; that was why they all failed so consistently in business. He pictured Fawcett's letting Mrs. Fawcett, capable as she was, dictate to him. As if Mrs. Fawcett, anyway, would attempt it. "Woman's place is in the home," as she so graphically expressed it. Now that he looked at it clearly it was ridiculous that a man as successful as he should let a woman's whims interfere with his business judgment.

"If you have anything to say?" he repeated, accenting the "you."

"Yes, Walter," she replied.

Dunbar smiled lightly. "You haven't," he observed—"you haven't a word to say! It's a chance to make a killing, and I'm not going to let it slide. I'm going in with Fawcett, and I'm going in to-day!"

She stared at him agape.

"Walter!"

"That's all right," he rejoined. "Win or lose, that's my lookout. It's my money. I made it, didn't I?"

"Walter!" she cried again.

"You go to sleep," he replied; and then, as he reached the door, he turned, smiling quietly. "I'm capable, Nelly, of running my own affairs. When you run yours as well it will be time enough to tell me what I shall do or not do!"

The shot struck home. Sitting upright among the pillows Nelly gasped as if she had been struck. The gasp did not escape her husband. He was still smiling to himself as he sat down at his belated breakfast.

Half an hour later seated in the train beside Fawcett he opened the newspaper at the financial page. The agreement between them had been made. He and Fawcett were to trade on joint account at a brokerage shop in New Street.

Running his finger down the column Dunbar inquired casually: "Say, old man, what shall we pick for a starter?"

Fawcett rolled his cigar over to the other side of his mouth.

"What's the matter with Rocket?" he inquired. He had strong inside information on Rocket; but as Fawcett named the stock Dunbar felt a little twinge, a shock almost, cool his conscious ardor.

Rocket seven years before had almost cleaned out Dunbar. It was one of the investments that at the time he had neglected to talk over with his wife.

The arrangement effected between Dunbar and Fawcett was one of those copartnership agreements not infrequently encountered in brokerage circles. Dunbar was to supply the cash, the capital on which the two were to purchase stocks; Fawcett supplying, in lieu of money, certain inside information of which he was possessed. Of the value of this knowledge Dunbar had no doubt; but it was this very point in the deal to which Nelly had taken exception. Aside from the fact that they were buying the stocks on margin—from her point of view gambling—she had protested, in her woman's way, at what she considered the inequality of the arrangement. Fawcett had everything to win and nothing to lose; and Fawcett she didn't trust. But then, as Dunbar had said, that was the woman of it. They always made everything personal. However, as wildly as she had fought against it, now that Dunbar had asserted himself she seemed to have surrendered as weakly, as consistently as any woman would.

An hour after Dunbar's departure she still lay abed. She was not asleep, neither did she give herself over to a woman's ready solace of tears. The maid bringing up her breakfast found her lying among the pillows staring at the ceiling.

"Wait a moment, Hannah," she directed; and rising hastily she darted into her dressing room adjoining.

There for a few moments she delved into the depths of a wardrobe, appearing presently decked in a dressing sack fabricated of pink silk and filmy lace. It had been part of her trousseau; and as she clambered back into bed Hannah gave a gasp of genuine admiration—amazement too.

"Glory be, but you do look wonderful, ma'am! Youngish, too!"

Her mistress propped herself up among the pillows so that she could get a glimpse of herself in the glass. Yes, the sack really was wonderful; and it did make her look a little younger. Then a giggle, a self-conscious titter escaped her.

"You'll make me vain, Hannah, if you don't watch out!" she remarked.

"Oh, no, ma'am!" protested Hannah.

The maid had set down the tray on the bed and was departing when Nelly halted her.

"Is your sister still looking for another place?" she asked.

Hannah said yes. The place where her sister worked was too hard for her, besides which she preferred the country; and there was a young man too that had a place in Riverdale as a chauffeur and they were writing regular, so that if her mistress knew anyone her sister could give references, the best, and all the sister asked out was Thursdays, the afternoons only, and a day extra, maybe, once every month. She was about to add more when she realized her mistress had again taken to staring at the ceiling.

"Is that all, ma'am?" inquired Hannah.

"Tell your sister I'll give her a place," was Nelly's reply; then she fell to at her breakfast. The morning's encounter,

(Continued on Page 116)

"You Know My Husband, I Think. You are Both Friends of Mr. Fawcett"

PROFITS AND RISKS

By Albert W. Atwood

DO YOU believe it is unwise and unjust that business should be conducted for profit? Men have engaged in business for centuries with the idea of making profits. Is that motive about to be thrown into the scrap heap? If you think so perhaps you have a better one to suggest.

Oh, very well then, you don't think that profits are so bad as all that. Perhaps you don't, but there seem to be millions who do, or at least they talk like millions of people.

Karl Marx, the apostle of socialism, said that profits were filched from labor, a defalcation from the workingman. The apostle of the very latest movement to nationalize one of our great basic industries says that profits should go to all the people but are monopolized by nonproducers, by a special class, the investors. Labor is exploited, though it bears the burden of production. Profits go to the wrong man. There is no reason why they should be monopolized by the employers and capitalists.

It is said that seamstresses in England were paid a shilling a day at one time for making shirts though the company for which they worked paid dividends of seventeen per cent on its ordinary stock. The directors of a chain of stores in this country are reported to have urged stockholders to buy into a new issue of shares, one of the arguments being that girls could be got to work for very, very low wages.

All or most of our industrial ills, it is suggested, are due to the simple fact that the men in control of our industries are interested solely in profits and not in service. Nor can the present mutual suspicion of employer and employee be removed, it is added, so long as the two fight each other in the dark for an indeterminate share of the profits.

"The world has been distorted, pulled out of shape, as it were, by this motive. Profits have proved too costly a luxury. Under this system there are no incentives for the workers. Production is not increased fast enough. The world is nothing but a treadmill for muzzled oxen which grind out profits for shareholders. Men are wage slaves and large sections of the population are beginning to refuse to work any longer for private enterprise."

Thus we see that to lay the high cost of living at the door of the profits system, as so many are doing, is merely to mention but one small item in a whole broadside of charges.

"In America profit is a religious idea," said a radical who recently returned from England. "To challenge it is to pass under such scornful censure as met the atheist in days of state religion."

Nonsense. If there is any better system by which mankind can supply its wants let us have it by all means. There is nothing sacred or unchangeable about the business system and its profit-making feature. Like other features of our civilization it may disappear in course of time in accordance with the law of the survival of the fittest.

If profits serve no useful purpose, then overboard with them at once! First let us pass a law forbidding profits above four per cent and then a little later we might as well prohibit them altogether. But before we take this step let us see just who will bear the losses and risks involved in producing and distributing goods. Losses cannot be prevented by law any more than King Canute could change the tides by commanding the waves to go back.

No Business Without Its Risks

THE very word "business," which means the work of the world, brings to mind a balance sheet, and that means profit and loss. Business always implies two sides—surplus and deficit. Whenever men have sought a profit, from the beginning of time, they have known they were taking a risk and that there might be a loss.

A traveler recently returned from Russia tells the story of a native merchant who contracted to sell a cargo of goods in Moscow. But the goods did not arrive though he tried frantically to get them through. The buyers became more and more irritated and threatened all sorts of action. The merchant had agreed, had given his word, had made himself responsible to deliver those goods. He was liable for heavy loss. Finally the buyers repudiated their bargain and the merchant was more worried than ever. Then unexpectedly the goods arrived.

"What did you do?" asked the traveler.

"Oh, I didn't care what happened then," was the satisfied reply. "It didn't matter what the buyers did because by the time the goods had arrived they were worth four times what I had agreed to sell them for."

A crude extreme case, typical of a disorganized state of society, but it exaggerates by only a little the normal chances of loss as well as profit which the business organization of the world is always taking. How about the cases where the goods did not come through, of the Russian business men who were stuck? Why is it that when profits are charged with every evil that man is heir to we hear only of Rockefeller and Carnegie, and never of those who sank below the surface, who risked and lost, who failed?

It is a commonplace of business life that one per cent of all men engaged in business fail every year, which means that if a man remains in business thirty-three years his chances of failure are one in three. But these figures include only those who fail in a sort of formal sense, with loss to creditors. It does not include those who merely fail to succeed.

Many unsuccessful concerns do not actually become insolvent, or bankrupt, but pass from hand to hand, each owner or manager losing a little. Often concerns go on for years without ever making profits. Many lines of business struggle on indefinitely without the owner or manager really knowing whether he is making a profit. He may get a living, which is no more than wages, and as long as he gets his living he sticks to it.

Innumerable men fail several times before they ultimately make good. Young men often fail in various lines and then finally succeed in something entirely different. Even among big concerns, the most conspicuous in their trades, there is often no real profit, only a false front. Just because a concern is big it affords no reason to assume that it is prosperous. We have examples in almost every industry. I asked a man of long experience in selling goods to other concerns how many of them had been profitable.

"I cannot say exactly," he replied, "but as I look back over our business I do not see so many conspicuous successes. Not many actual bankruptcies, but innumerable changes. New men and new capital constantly coming in. Most of them, it is true, paid up their debts eventually."

Many Losers and Few Winners

AGAIN I say it is a commonplace of experience that the conspicuously successful enterprises in any given line are relatively few. We know there are losses because we see them every day. They range from peddlers on the smallest scale way up to the biggest corporations. How many farmers, small retailers and dealers in general have made great profits in the last generation?

We are so familiar with crop failures, with blight, drought, rust and the like that the inability of farmers in a particular section of the country to come out ahead in this or that season hardly excites passing comment. And what an everyday experience it is to see a retail store change hands or shut up shop because the proprietor has failed to make a go of it.

But as a rule except in periods of exceptionally high prices it is not the profits of the farmer or retailer that come in for general ire. There seems to be an especial wickedness about profits in larger-scale industries. But are the losses so much smaller?

Canals were the big business of their day, a hundred years ago, but scores of millions were lost in them. Nor have the railroads, biggest business of all, been one unalloyed orgy of profits. Railroad owners may at one time have received large profits. Indeed the railroads may have been exploited and plundered. But for ten years past railroad profits have been meager. The shrinkage in the market value of railroad securities in the last few years has been more than three billions of dollars. Several billions of securities have been in default. Interest and dividends have been paid out of the government treasury. There has been no real profit.

Lay the blame where you will, the fact remains that railroad proprietors have lost as well as gained. If there were any way to analyze the complete ownership of every railroad stock and bond from the beginning of railroads to the present time it would be found that quite a number made more than a conscionable profit, that many received merely a moderate return on their investment, and that many actually lost.

It needs no statistical proof to show that those who invested in recent years have lost.

When the writer first began working as a financial newspaper reporter fifteen years ago bonds of the ferry companies plying between New York and Brooklyn were considered prime investments. The subway came and the bonds disappeared. Bonds and even stocks of the railroads in Mexico were considered by many as splendid investments, and they too have gone.

When the Suez Canal was opened two million tons of sailing vessels ceased to be a profitable investment because they could not use the canal, and the Cape of Good Hope route was too long. The invention of new machinery put out of business the whole woolen industry important section of England. We all rem the losses in the bicycle industry after the mobile came. But why multiply instances? Every of this article can name many of which in all prob the writer never heard.

> And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
> And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind.

It was not many years ago that the wisest minds i Street recommended the purchase of 3½% bonds b it was thought that the rate of interest would rem for many years. Who can count the losses tha flowed from that delusion? How many days pass in the newspapers do not report the appraisal of a rich estate containing a long list of cats and dogs? Has discovered a perfectly safe investment or any way changing a present enjoyment for a future income v risk?

And as for the profits that are made in Wall Perhaps I had better not pursue this phase of the because most of my readers would be forced to having lost money there. The subject is a delica

Take three great new industries—automobiles, pictures and aviation. We know there were grea in the early stages of the first two and that grea are actually being sustained to-day in the third.

The tremendously elaborate precautions which banks and trust funds throw about their investme steadily spreading field of insurance and the princi bodied in the Federal income-tax law that losses deducted from one's return—all these constitute e from three independent sources of the element of r loss which still confronts the effort of society to its wants.

As long as men cannot foresee, predict and con future there seems to be no way of avoiding chan and loss. If conditions were unchangeable, or stati would be no risk and therefore no need of profit. equilibrium is always being disturbed. We have dep and bursts of prosperity, panics, sweeping price tions, new inventions and other improvements in r and organization; and worst of all, wholesale ch the wants of mankind, which are often immeasura involve enormous shifts of industry.

The Best Laid Plans Upset by Chan

A MILD open winter may bring untold losses to trades. A strike in the steel trade may dep musical instrument business, though employers latter may be in no way responsible for condi the former trade and totally unable to foresee then upset all calculations.

Internally as well as externally business is choc risk. Policy must be incessantly readjusted. must be steered just right between caution and ness. Eternal vigilance is the price of survival. the monopoly and the old established business w will and a trade name may be pushed aside. N are an almost daily necessity, but they must pro practical.

Absolutely essential is just the right operating a dot, and the right amount of working capital, t cash resources and ratio of capital to labor. A cent one way or the other means ruin.

The proper proportion of machinery—capital—varies at different prices or costs. If wages rise it add machinery; if wages fall it pays to let som machinery deteriorate and do more by hand labo wise there is constant substitution of the various r or machines one for the other. The right pro change constantly. A model factory is so arran the buildings hold the right number of machines, right amount of space for the workmen and t amount of power.

Arthur S. Dewing, an expert in corporate fina of the case of a man who had had a long trainin shoe business. He had accumulated enough m operate a small factory with rather antiquated efficient equipment. In this he was highly su Spurred on by his success he built a modern fa make the same grade of shoes. Indeed, so comp perfect of its kind was the new plant that it was a show establishment among those making that p grade of shoe.

The output was very much greater than in th factory, and labor costs were no higher. Yet t ding in a short space of time all he had previously .e exercised as much managerial ability in one y another. Labor costs remained the same. But ecbecause in the second case the fixed-capital costs proportionately too great for his particular line of ct

ny concerns which rushed into the munition business in the war lost heavily because the proper balance er apital and labor costs was not determined. These e vary not only in every industry but in different ne of the same industry. A small shop can do about l aking high-grade cigars as a great factory. But tely different with cigarettes. Large-scale produc-pt suited to one, and exactly suited to the other.
t hat scale of production will bring the highest n? At what point is the balance or equilibrium etween increasing and decreasing returns? Here it question upon whose answer success or failure ny rests. Those who decide must be responsible sn case of error, as well as the gainers when they rit.

ll treet recognizes regular periods of wreckage and cy for attempted mergers which evidently fail to t sufficiently the laws that govern success. At ne in a generation there is a new crop of industrial irtion failures.

siss being permeated with risk and loss it is but a that profits should not be permanent. A lucky enterpriser meets a great want and makes fabulous s But then the wants of the people shift or new thas change the whole process or competitors atby the high rate of profit proceed to drive it down.
e Standard Oil Company is meeting with ever competition and is gathering its utmost strength yo fight its great European rival.

ts rise because society is ever changing and shifting.
rvement spends itself profits in that particular line honly to reappear in something new.

Men Who Take Chances and Win

OITS may be described as the reward for supplying nv want or putting into effect an improvement, like petroleum for light and fuel. But they tend to nen once the improvement is fully applied. For no ply or patent laws can for very long prevent new ms, methods and processes from being used by the body of business men.

profits of business men, of the capitalist employer em very large, but that is often because they ine wages of management or superintendence as well urrent rate of interest on savings. Of course such took large to the masses of the people because only iew among the masses are capable of superintend-naging, enterprising and risking. Profits fill the dition because they go to so few. But are there who are capable of undertaking business ventures?
a commonplace of experience that relatively few e fitted to work for themselves, to manage enter-Few have the determination, ambition, type of er and ability that are required in assuming resility. Those who have these qualities enjoy a mol and thus far in history they have been able to make ld pay them tribute on that monopoly.

are inclined at times to get red in the face because ). Rockefeller has so much more of this world's han seems just, let us not forget that when he and ly associates went into the oil business they were friends and acquaintances that they were fools to e risk. Yet Rockefeller borrowed and plunged. one has ever made any money in oil," was the warning that he received.

ted a man of famous lineage, very great wealth and r great initiative, whether he believed in large profits rtunes.

u see that electric light up there on the ceiling," he
il. "We take it for granted now, but not when you were children. It exists only because some darned as willing to risk money and time.

ey told me I was a fool when I went into ——" He l a well-known chemical. "They said it was a fine to play with in the laboratory and if I had nse I would leave it there. But I invested oney, a lot of it, in what most men cond a risk, and now we have e of plants and cannot keep th our orders."

fits are not so much the l for mere willingness to risks and to overlook the s who are always taking y out of life by predicting e, as they are for the skill dability in making risks ille and disappear. It is the ly to minimize risk, the ss watchfulness and intuinticipation that count. It is the correctness of the unseen decision, the "secret sagacity of the determining mind."

"Business risk is not that of the throwing of dice, in which skill has no part," is the way one keen thinker has put it. "Business risk is rather that of the rope walker in crossing Niagara; the task is easily undertaken by the skillful Blondin; it is fatally dangerous to the man of unsteady nerve and limb."

Again and again a particular concern flourishes because a particular man is at the head of it; or falls upon evil days because a less able man is in charge.

Many a thriving industrial community owes its prosperity solely to the accident of birth of a single capable man of business.

There must be managers and leaders in nearly every undertaking. What use is a single laborer, a piece of land, a machine, or even a thousand dollars, without a manager to organize, energize and combine these factors in proper proportion?

Of what value was a distillery after prohibition came? There were buildings, lands, workers, machinery. But who could turn them into a profitable candy or food enterprise? Only the enterpriser, the business man, he who was willing to take upon himself the risk and responsibility of the new undertaking, who would and could supply new capital as needed or represent those who were willing to do so.

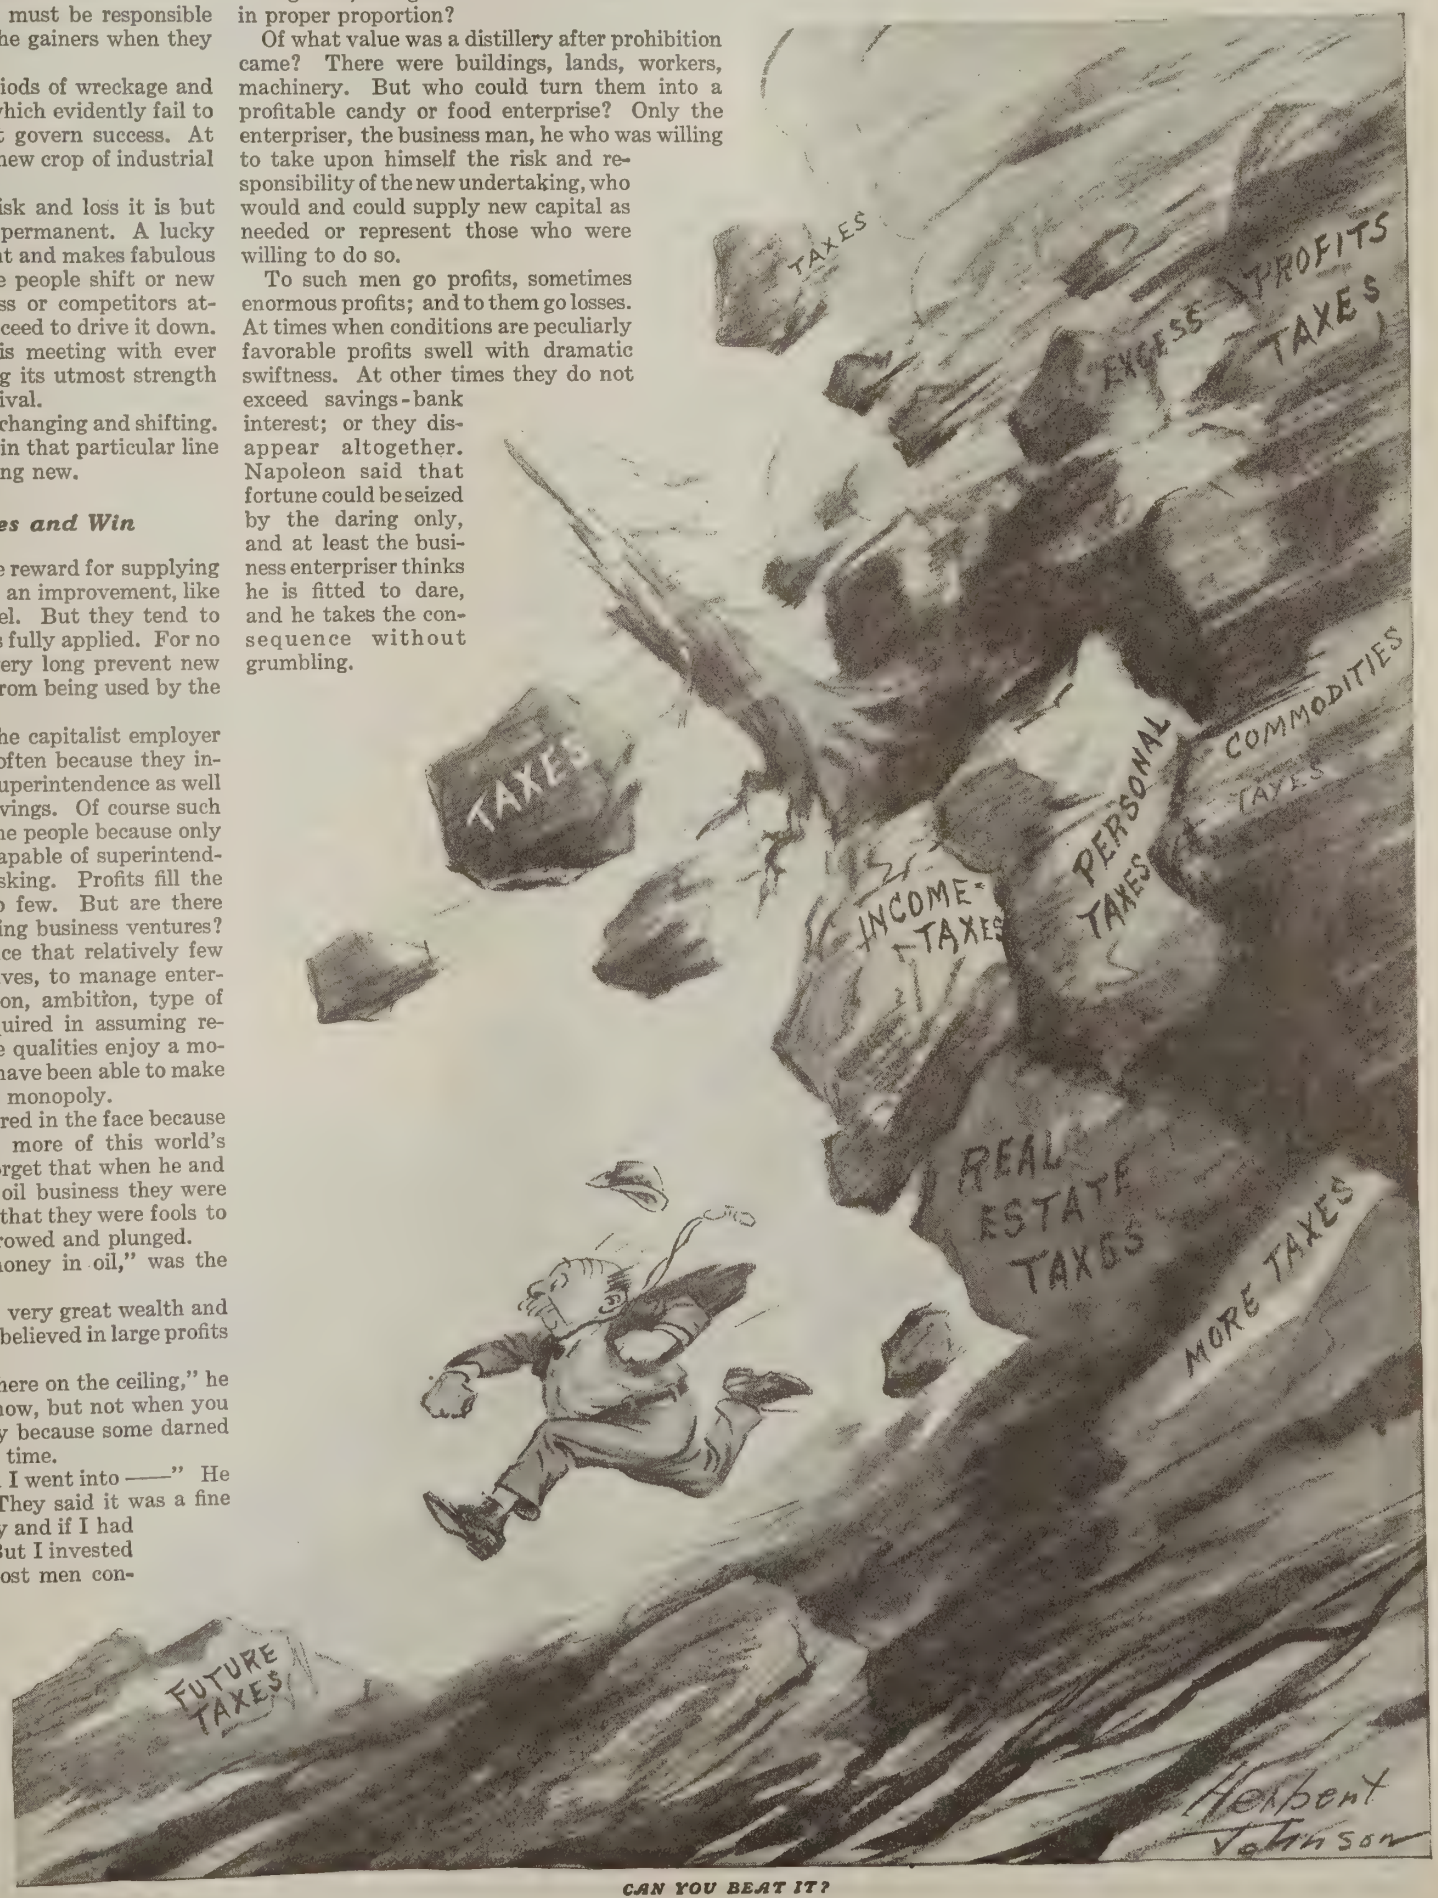
To such men go profits, sometimes enormous profits; and to them go losses. At times when conditions are peculiarly favorable profits swell with dramatic swiftness. At other times they do not exceed savings-bank interest; or they disappear altogether. Napoleon said that fortune could be seized by the daring only, and at least the business enterpriser thinks he is fitted to dare, and he takes the consequence without grumbling.

Profits in the long run are greater, it is true, than the risks. The gains on the whole exceed the losses. Men wouldn't take risks if this were not so. An insurance company suffers many losses, but it expects on the average to come out ahead.

The profit taker also gets more as a rule than the wage earner. This is because risks are regarded as an evil and few will take them. Fear of loss not only reduces the competition and improves the chances of gain in the long run but means that qualities of foresight, courage and ability, which few possess, are required.

Business repays men not only for their exceptional labors but for their fears. If one man in a hundred fails it is probable that the ninety-nine others get more than the one loses. Otherwise they would not embark upon a sea of troubles.

(Continued on Page 169)



CAN YOU BEAT IT?

When August the Second Wa April the First

By IRVIN S. COB

ILLUSTRATED BY ANTON OTTO FIS

HOW Ethan A. Pratt, formerly of South New Medford, in the State of Vermont, came to be resident manager and storekeeper for the British Great Eastern Company, Limited, on Good Friday Island in the South Seas, is not our present concern. Besides, the way of it makes too long a tale. It is sufficient to say he was.

Never having visited that wide, long, deep and mainly liquid backside of the planet known broadly as the South Seas but always intending to do so, I must largely depend for my local color upon what Ethan Pratt wrote back home to South New Medford; on that, plus what returned travelers to those parts have from time to time told me. So if in this small chronicle those paragraphs which purport to be of a descriptive nature appear incomplete to readers personally acquainted with the spots dealt with or with spots like them the fault, in some degree at least, must rest upon the fact that I have had my main dependence in the preserved letters of one who was by no means a sprightly correspondent, but on the contrary was by way of being somewhat prosy, not to say commonplace, on his literary side.

From the evidence extant one gathers that for the four years of his life he spent on Good Friday Island Ethan Pratt lived in the rear room of a two-room house of frame standing on a beach with a little village about it, a jungle behind it, a river half-mooning it and a lagoon before it. In the rear room he bedded and baited himself. The more spacious front room into which his housekeeping quarters opened was a store of sorts where he retailed print goods staple, tinned foods assorted and gimcracks various to his customers, these mostly being natives. The building was crowned with a tin roof and on top of the roof there perched a round water tank, like a high hat on a head much too large for it. The use of this tank was to catch and store up rain water, which ran into it from the sloping top of a larger and taller structure standing partly alongside and partly back of the lesser structure. The larger building—a shed it properly was; a sprawling wide-eaved barracks of a shed—was for the storing of copra, the chief article for export produced on Good Friday Island.

Copra, as all know—or as all should know, since it has come to be one of the most essential vegetable products of the world, a thing needful in the manufacture of nearly every commercial output in which fatty essences are required—is the dried meat of the nut of the coconut palm. So rich is it in oils that soap makers—to cite one of the industries employing it—scarce could do without it; but like many of this earth's most profitable and desirable yieldings it has its unpretty aspects. For one thing it stinks most abominably while it is being cured, and after it has been cured it continues to stink, with a lessened intensity. For another thing, the all-pervading reek of the stuff gets into food that is being prepared anywhere in its bulked vicinity.

Out in front of the establishment over which Ethan Pratt presided, where the sandy beach met the waters, was a rickety little wharf like a hyphen to link the grit with the salt. Down to the outer tip of the wharf ran a narrow-gauge track of rusted iron rails, and over the track on occasion plied little straddle-bug handcars. Because the water offshore was shoal ships could not come in very close but must lie well out in the lagoon and their unloadings and their reloadings were carried on by means of whaleboats ferrying back and forth between ship side and dock side with the push cars to facilitate the freight movement at the land end of the connection. This was a laborious and a vexatious proceeding, necessitating the handling and rehandling of every bit of incoming or outbound cargo several times. But then, steamers did not come very often to Good Friday Island; one came every two months, about.

The expanse upon which Ethan Pratt looked when he turned his eyes outward was of an incredible whiteness. You would have thought it to be the whitest, most blinding thing in the world until you considered the road that skirted it and some of the buildings that bordered it. For the road was built of crushed coral, so dazzlingly white that to look fixedly at it for thirty seconds in bright weather was to make the eyeballs ache; and the buildings referred to were built of blocks of white coral like exaggerated cubes of refined sugar. These buildings were the chapels and churches—Methodist, Catholic, Seventh Day Adventist, English Wesleyan and American Mormon. When the sun shone clear the water on beyond became a shimmering blazing shield of white-hot metal; and an hour of uninterrupted gazing upon it would have turned an argus into a blinkard. But other times—early morning or evening or when stormy weather impended—the lagoon became all a wonderful deep clear blue, the color of molten stained glass. One peering then into its depths saw, far down below, marvelous sea gardens all fronded and ferny and waving; and through the foliage of this fairyland went darting schools and shoals of fish queerly shaped and as brilliantly colored as tropical birds.

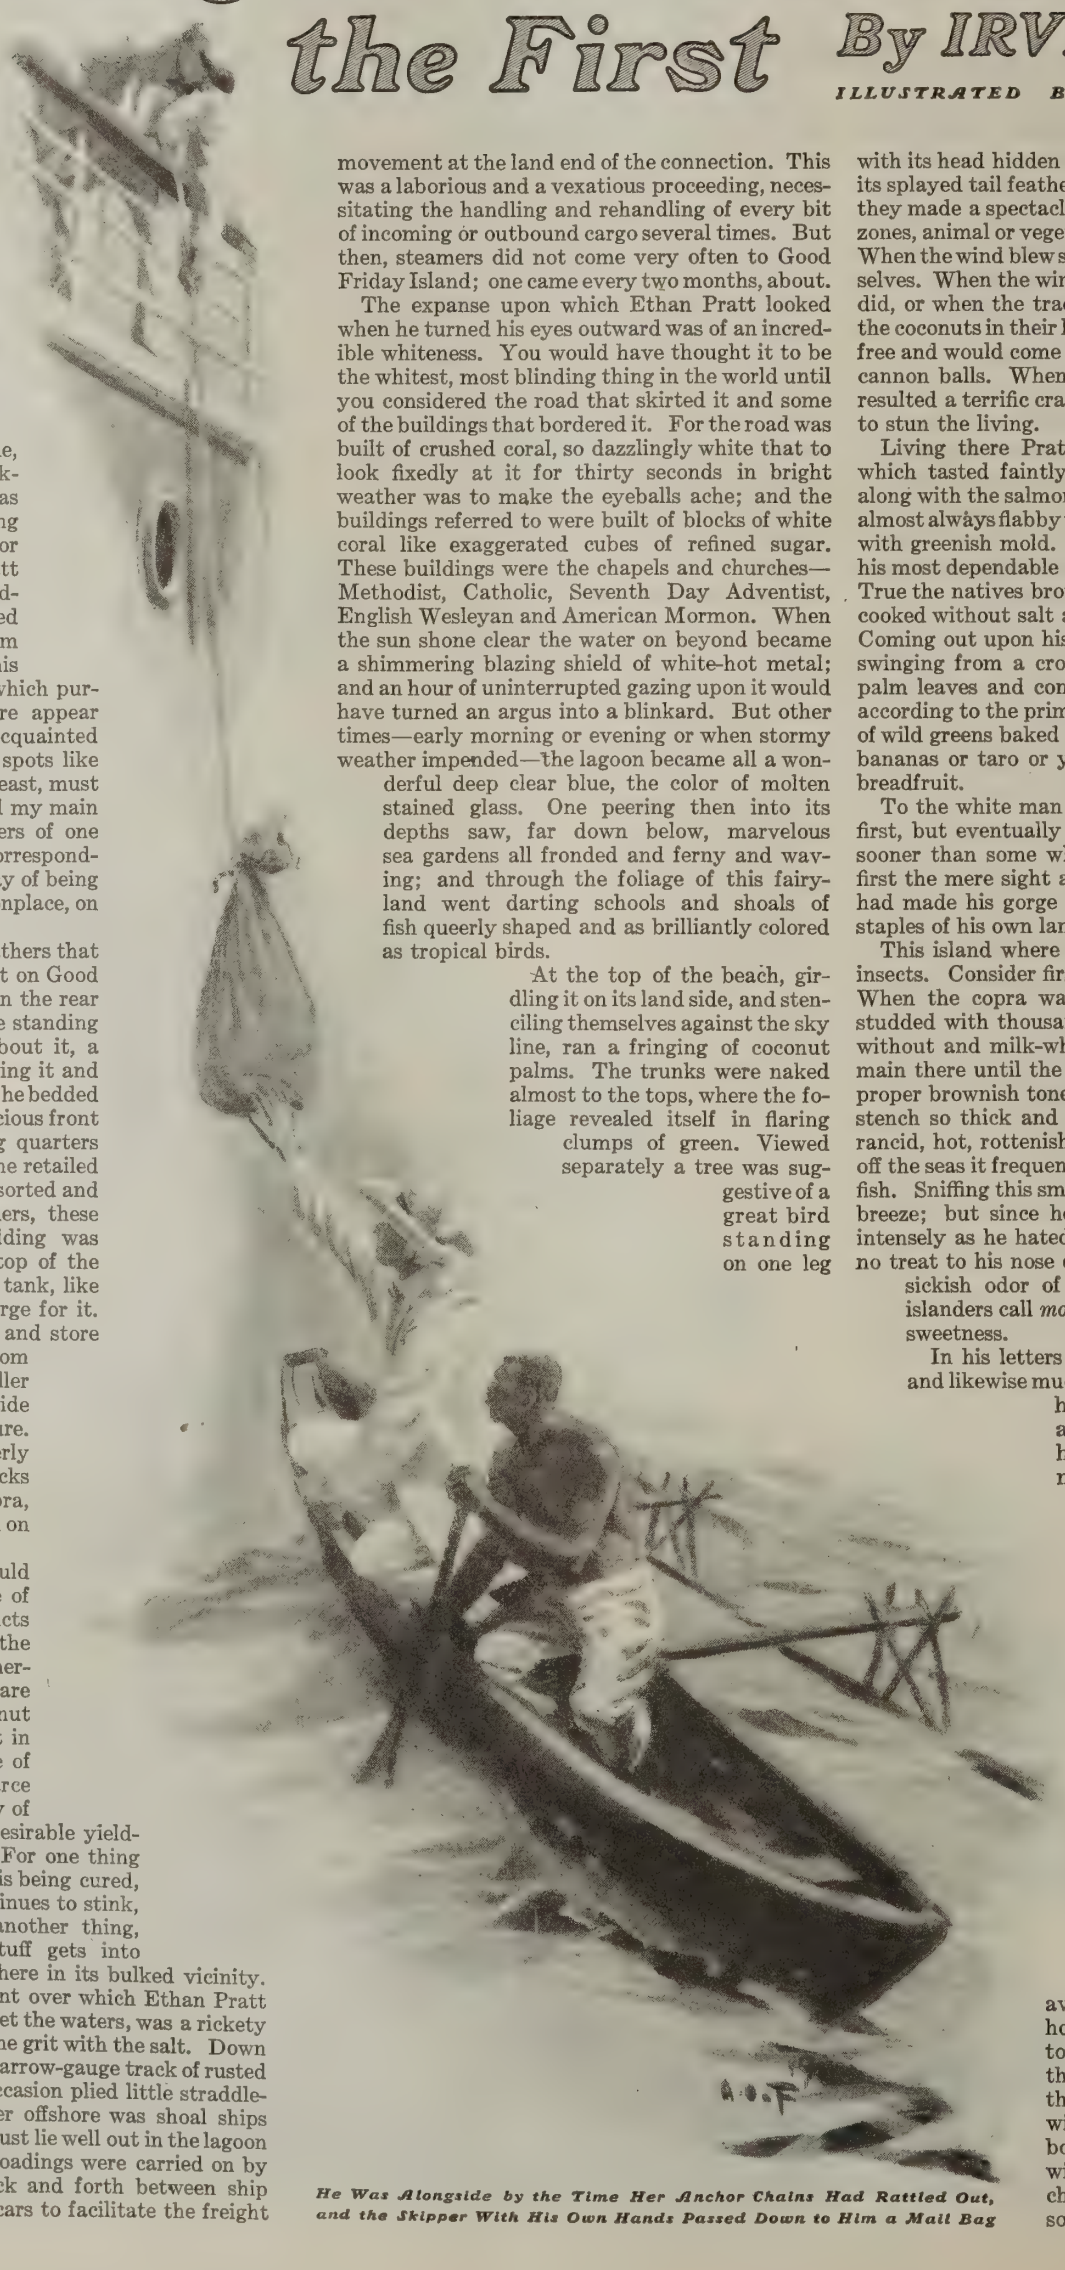
At the top of the beach, girdling it on its land side, and stenciling themselves against the sky line, ran a fringing of coconut palms. The trunks were naked almost to the tops, where the foliage revealed itself in flaring clumps of green. Viewed separately a tree was suggestive of a great bird standing on one leg with its head hidden under its wing, its rump upreared, its splayed tail feathers saluting the skies. Viewed t they made a spectacle for which nothing in the ten zones, animal or vegetable, offers a measurable comp When the wind blew softly the trees whispered among selves. When the wind blew hard and furiously, as i did, or when the trade breeze swelled to hurricane the coconuts in their long bearded husks would be wr free and would come hurtling through the air like f cannon balls. When one of them struck a tin roo resulted a terrific crashing sound fit to wake the de to stun the living.

Living there Pratt's diet was mainly tinned s which tasted faintly of tin and strongly of copra along with the salmon, crackers, which in this clima almost always flabby with dampness and often were s with greenish mold. Salmon and crackers had com his most dependable stand-bys in the matter of pro True the natives brought him gifts of food dishes; cooked without salt and pleasing to the Polynesian Coming out upon his balcony of a morning he wou swinging from a crossbeam a basket made of the palm leaves and containing a chicken or a fish p according to the primitive native recipe, or perhaps of wild greens baked on hot stones; or maybe bake bananas or taro or yams or hard crusty halves of breadfruit.

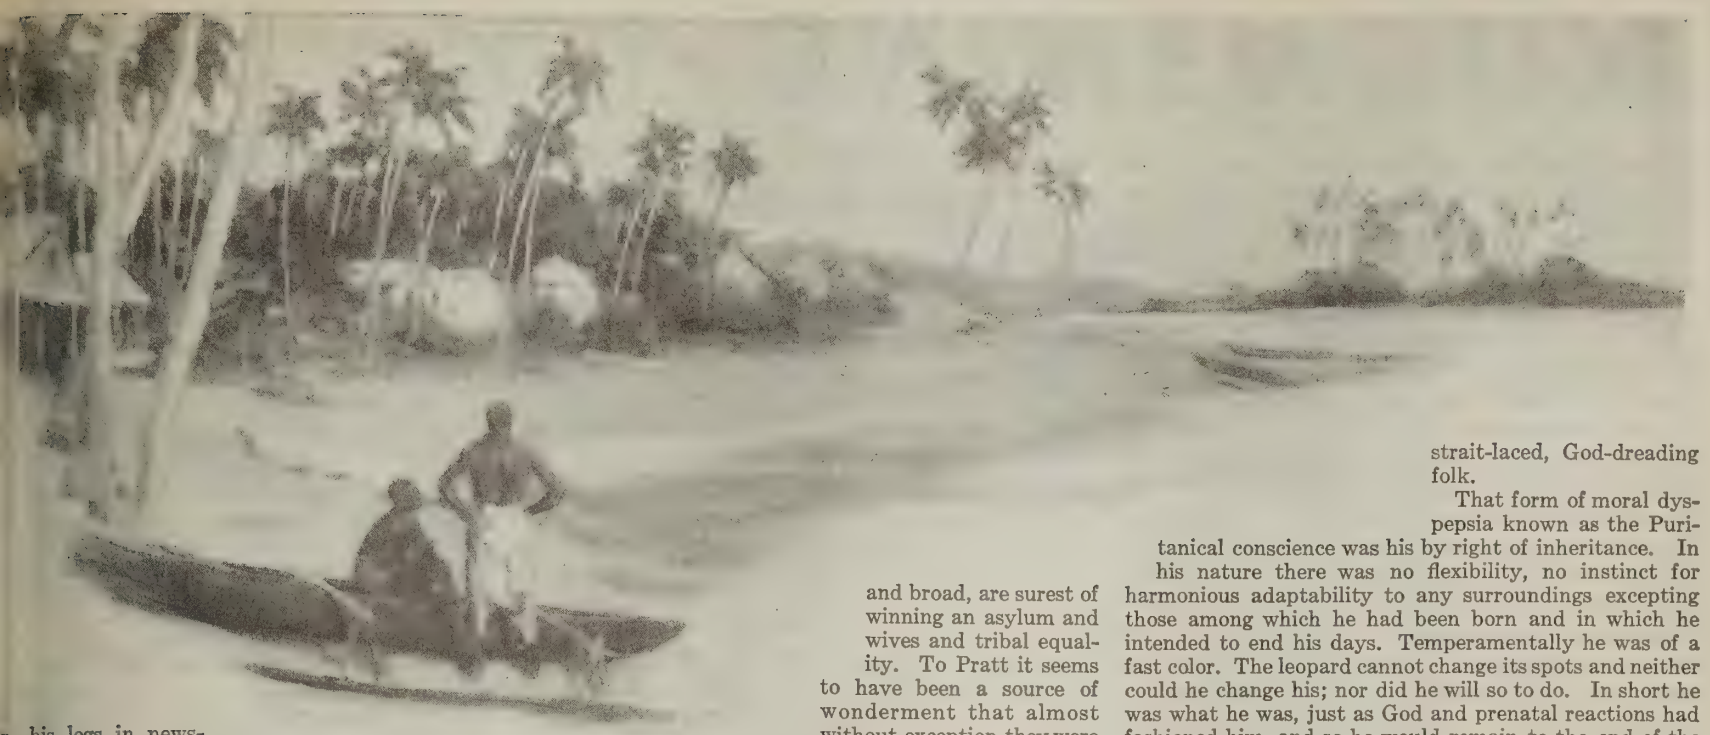
To the white man yams and taro taste mighty first, but eventually he sickens of them. Pratt s sooner than some white men had; and almost fr first the mere sight and savor of a soft-fleshed bal had made his gorge rise in revolt. So he fell bac staples of his own land and ate salmon and cracker

This island where he lived was an island of sm insects. Consider first the matter of the prevalent When the copra was curing and the village gre studded with thousands of little cusps, each being without and milk-white within, and each destine main there until the heat had dried the nut meat proper brownish tone, there rose and spread upon t stench so thick and so heavy as to be almost vis rancid, hot, rottenish stench. Then, when the wi off the seas it frequently brought with it the taint o fish. Sniffing this smell Ethan Pratt would pray fo breeze; but since he hated perfumery smells al intensely as he hated putrescent ones, a land bre no treat to his nose either, for it came freighted w sickish odor of the frangipane and of a pl islanders call mosooi, overpowering in their co sweetness.

In his letters he complained much of thes and likewise much of the heat, but more than c he complained of the insects. I appear that the mosquitoes wo him in shifts. By day there ca mosquitoes, creatures of the s and matching it in seeing that they w gray-striped fellow keen and strident voi night there were smal mosquitoes, in color propriate black and more bloodthirsty th lans. After dark th of his kerosene lamp them as the traditior in the traditional ca is to returning wande brought them in millio with them tiny persiste and many small coffin beetles and hosts of unwholesome-looking m many sizes and as many Screens and double scr the window openings avail to keep these visitors out. how they found a way in. The m toes and the gnats preyed up the beetles and the moths were l the flame to a violent end. To s wick from being clogged by the bodies he hooded the top of th with netting. This caused th chimney to smoke and foul its soot. To save his shins from at



He Was Alongside by the Time Her Anchor Chains Had Rattled Out, and the Skipper With His Own Hands Passed Down to Him a Mail Bag



At the Top of the Beach, Stenciling Themselves Against the Sky Line, Ran a Fringing of Coconut Palms

p his legs in newsr ouskins. For his
s. s face and his ears he vise no protection.
l encountered just outside the door were huge flying o hes that clung in his hair or buffeted him in the ı hey blundered along on purposeless flights. Still iects, unseen but none the less busy, added to the r of his jeremiad. Borers riddled the pages of his s; and the white ant, as greedy for wood pulp as p baron, was constantly sapping and mining the r nings of his house.

u ing on the climate his tone was most rebellious. By c nts the weather was rarely what one born in Verould regard as seasonable weather. According to it outstanding characteristics were heat, moistness
t ciness. If he took a nap in the afternoon he rose ı s from a Turkish bath. His hair was plastered to e all day with dampness; his forehead and his face
w t; his wrists were as though they had been pard nd freshly withdrawn from the water. Perspira-g ed his garments to his frame. His shoes behind o turned a leprous white from mildew and rotted to s hile yet they were new.

e orest, into which he sometimes ventured, was a dampness, deepness and smells; a place of great t fungoids, sprawling creepers, preposterous looka sites, orchids, lianas; a place of things that crawled c bed and twined and clung. It was filled with sounds—the booming of wild pigeons; a nagging, ir sound as though woodchoppers were at work far depths; and a constant insane chattering sound, o h mad children, hidden all about him, were laugh-t im. Dusk brought from their coverts the flying o utter curious notes as they sailed through the n g, and occasionally sharp squeaks as of mortal y r intense gratification—he couldn't make up his hich. After nightfall if he flung a lighted cigar p ut upon the sand he could see it moving off in the n s apparently under its own motive power. But the as that a land crab, with an unsolvable mania for ir the rôle of torchbearer, would be scuttling away
t stub in one of its claws.

e orest sheltered no dangerous beasts and no venomr tiles, but in it were stinging nettles the touch of h was like fire to a sensitive white skin. Also, the r of the lagoon were free from man-eaters, but wad-l e to shore one was almost sure to bark one's shanks p oisoned coral, making sores that refused to heal.
n the river, which flowed down out of the interior N ea, Pratt likewise bore a grudge, because it was in r r that a brown woman washed his clothes on the e returning them with the buttons pounded off; but v y missing button there was sure to be a bright yels i-indelible stain, where the laundress had spread g ments to dry upon a wild berry bush.

v y two months the steamer came. Then the white p ion of the station doubled and trebled itself. Traders s rekeepers came by canoe from outlying islands or r mote stations on the farther side of his own island, G d Friday Island had but one port of entry and this it Beachcombers who had been adopted into villages h interior sauntered in over jungle trails. Many of n ere deserters from whalers or from naval vessels;
t ll were handsome chaps in an animal sort of way.

o his common sharing of a common comeliness among n ere was a reason. In a land where physical perf literally is worshiped, good-looking men, brawny and broad, are surest of winning an asylum and wives and tribal equality. To Pratt it seems to have been a source of wonderment that almost without exception they were blue-eyed and light-haired; he could understand of course why their skins, once fair and white, had changed to the color of well-tanned calfskin. The sun beating upon their naked bodies had done that.

There also would be present a party of overseers and managers from a big German plantation on an adjacent island. The traders and the Germans would appear in white ducks with white shoes smartly pipe-clayed, and white straw hats. The beachcombers would be in clean pyjama suits with bright-colored neckties. Ordinarily these latter went about bare-headed, bare-legged and bare-bodied except for the lava-lava made of fiber from the paper mulberry tree and worn like a kilt about the hips; but now, in white men's garments, they sought to prove that they still were white men and civilized white men too. If the steamer were late, as very often happened, some of the visitors would take advantage of the wait to make themselves roaring drunk on gin.

So much briefly for the stage setting of Ethan Pratt's environment; now for the personality of the man: Of all the breeds and the mixed breeds that have gravitated out of white lands into these sea islands of darker-skinned peoples, there surely was never a more incongruous, more alien figure than this man presented. For you should know that in all things he was most typical of what is most typical in a certain cross section of New England life—not the coastwise New England of a seafaring, far-ranging, adventurous race, but the New England of long-settled remote interior districts. He came of a farming stock and a storekeeping stock, bred out of the loins of forbears made hard by the task of chiseling a livelihood off flinty hillsides, made narrow by the pent-up communal system of isolated life, made honest and truthful by the influences behind them and the examples before them of generations of straight-walking, strait-laced, God-dreading folk.

That form of moral dyspepsia known as the Puritanical conscience was his by right of inheritance. In his nature there was no flexibility, no instinct for harmonious adaptability to any surroundings excepting those among which he had been born and in which he intended to end his days. Temperamentally he was of a fast color. The leopard cannot change its spots and neither could he change his; nor did he will so to do. In short he was what he was, just as God and prenatal reactions had fashioned him, and so he would remain to the end of the chapter.

For all the four years he had spent out there the lure of the South Seas—about which so much has been written that it must be a verity and not a popular myth—had never laid hold upon him. Its gorgeous physical beauty, its languor, its voluptuous color and abandon, its prodigally glorious dawns and its velvety nights—held for him no value to be reckoned as an offset against climatic discomforts; it left him untouched. In it he never saw the wonderland that Stevenson made so vivid to stay-at-homes, nor felt for one instant the thrill that inspired Jack London to fine rhapsodizing. In it he saw and he felt only the sense of an everlasting struggle against foreign elements and hostile forces.

Among the missionaries he had acquaintances but no friends. He despised the swaggering beachcombers who had flung off the decencies of civilization along with the habiliments of civilization and who found a marrowy sweetness in the husks of the prodigal. Even more he despised the hectoring Germans with their flaming red and yellow beards, their thick-lensed spectacles, their gross manners when among their own kind and their brutishness in all their dealings with the natives—a brutishness so universal among them that no Polynesian would work at any price for a German, and every German had to depend for his plantation labor upon imported black boys from the Solomons and from New Guinea, who, having once been trapped or, to use the trade word, indented, were thereafter held in an enforced servitude and paid with the bondman's wage of bitter bread and bloody stripes.

Temperamentally He Was of a Fast Color. The Leopard Cannot Change its Spots and Neither Could He Change His

He had never been able to get under the skin of a native; indeed he had never tried. In all the things that go to make up an understanding of a fellow mortal's real nature they still were to him as completely strangers as they had been on the day he landed in this place. Set down in the midst of a teeming fecundity he nevertheless remained as truly a castaway as though he had floated ashore on a bit of wreckage. He could have been no more and no less a maroon had the island which received him been a desert island instead of a populous one.

When a chief paid him a formal visit, bringing a gift of taro root and sitting

(Continued on Page 101)

MOONSHINE

By WALLACE IRWI

ILLUSTRATED BY TONY SA

ROBERT BURNS PIPLING was an author. He admitted it. You or I, being earth-born, might have classified him as a manufacturer whose business it was to take raw life, pour it into a busy grinding machine—to wit, a typewriter—and turn it out in the form of a finished product suitable to the appetite of American consumers between the ages of eighteen and eighty. But he stuck to it that he was an author, held the thought and did his best to make the illusion universal; Who's Who gives him a solid paragraph, mentioning poems, plays, pamphlets, novels and novelettes, the names of which I withhold for fear of giving offense to his publishers.

Every artist is an inventor in the embryo. Leonardo invented the wheelbarrow and Morse abandoned painting in order to give the world a more or less useful telegraphic apparatus. I cite these historic examples merely to prepare the public mind for several things, otherwise unaccountable, which Robert Burns Pipling did during his wife's brief absence from Spouting Springs, West Virginia, where the Piplings had interned themselves for the summer.

Possibly you have a picture in your mind of the moderately eminent Mr. Pipling. You visualize him as an elemental soul, a sufferer slightly at odds with his generation, a sort of house-broken Jean Christophe with hair a little long, necktie a little loose, and eyes—eyes a size too large for his head, deepened by the sadness of dreams at odds with his generation.

In one particular you are right—the matter of dreams at odds with his generation. Let us view him in actuality as he stood on the platform of a small West Virginia station on a cold September morn and removed his cloth cap in the presence of his wife, who had an inherited prejudice against being kissed by a gentleman with his hat on. It was inhumanly early in the day; the train had a cruel habit of departing before sunrise and the Piplings had swallowed coffee out of a patent bottle and called it breakfast.

Bareheaded in the rosy dawn Mr. Pipling presented an appearance of almost startling nudity. An enthusiastic biographer might have referred to his brow as high—indeed it was that, for it blushed nakedly from his thoughtful forehead to that anatomical hinge where the upper vertebra joins itself to the base of the skull. His figure was solid, not to say fat. He wore a knickerbocker suit of an obtrusive gray and a pair of those zebra-striped shoes which always suggest twin cruisers beautified by a camoufleur's attempt at protective coloration.

His wife, who managed to remain lovely as the dawn, regarded his woeful face and looked a little worried. Only pressing business could have called her away thus suddenly from her husband and the two other babies in her care.

Bobby," she said, making a step toward the toy train of mustard-colored cars, which were beginning to jerk restlessly, "are you sure you are quite well?"

"Yes, honey," was Robert's depressed reply.

"Don't smoke too much."

"No, darling."

"And I've left a dozen wool socks, all nicely mended, in the top drawer of your bureau. Don't think of wearing cotton socks in this weather. There's a lot of grippe going round."

"I think I'm getting it," he suggested hopefully, a shudder passing through his well-padded form.

"Bobby! I know something's going to happen while I'm away. Please try to take care of yourself."

"I think a walk will fix me up." He said this with a martyr's smile.

"If you don't get warm take a hot bath with some mustard in it."

"I will. And, darling ——"

"Yes, Bobby?"

"Suppose I should need it—I don't think I shall, but you can't tell—didn't we bring a bottle of Bourbon down from New York?"

"Oh, yes." Angy's tone was casual. "Of course we're keeping it for medicinal purposes."

"Well, when you're cold and need a drink isn't that a medicinal purpose?"

"Yes. But something awful might happen. And if you once open it it's gone."

"Of course."

Stretch his imagination as he might he couldn't think of any emergency that would require either of his children—the elder of whom was less than three years old—to drink a full quart of high-proof Kentucky Bourbon. And Maggie Dempsey, the nurse, hated the sight of alcohol; that he knew full well.

Finally he resumed with a suppressed sigh, "Where's it gone?"

"I gave it to Maggie to keep," she admitted, and kissed him again, rapidly this time because the brakeman was howling, and looking at her as he howled.

He helped her to the steps of a mustard-colored coach.

"Don't let Willie play near the pond," she called from the moving platform. "I'll telegraph when I'm coming. And tell Maggie to look in the wardrobe trunk for the baby's ——"

Mechanical roarings annihilated the notes of human affection. Robert Burns Pipling, who was one of your geniuses who look better with their heads covered, put on his cap and assumed a thoughtful pose which would have been valuable to him had his publisher's representative been there with a camera. He might have been planning the climactic scene in his impending novel The Marriage of Jezebel. As a matter of simple truth he was thinking about that bottle of Bourbon. Where had Maggie put it?

He strolled moodily over to an early breakfast at Bubbling Springs Hotel, a resort more pretentious, hence more fashionable than Spouting Springs, which lay a good six miles up the road. Pipling ate alone, and the ham and eggs were as ashes in his mouth. He wanted that bottle of Bourbon and he thought it grossly unfair that his Angeline should have departed without giving him a written order upon Maggie Dempsey, who would, he suspected, require coercion.

Perhaps I have given a false impression of Robert Burns Pipling. He was not one of those grubby specimens whom sociologists tag as drinking men. Far from it. He could take it or leave it alone; he had left it alone with a dreadful loneliness during his three months' s the driest state of the driest nation upon our tr earth.

But there had come to him of late that morbid bred of a conscientious objection to Amendment Ei He had been satisfied with mountain air and me spring water up to the close of August, when spirited men of the world had appeared at his ho changed the psychological aspect of everything.

They liked to play poker, they liked to sit round and reminisce—and where is fancy bred of gin even at the prevalent price of forty cents a pint Pipling they were dignified men, these three, me fairs, science, social distinction.

There was a full-blooded Norfolk real-estate o named Tweed, there was an eminent Boston s named Biskoff, and there was a Percival Lamin studious young gentleman of the diplomatic servi was awaiting an appointment to a new post; he it would be Italy, where he could pursue his st Etruscan marbles.

Now there is interned in every manly breast a s bad-boyishness which when kept in solitary confi satisfies itself with dormant dreams of early crim but once expose this impish spirit to others of its l it whistles rowdishly upon its psychic fingers, stru break its chicken wire and be free.

Almost upon his first handshake with Pipling t Tweed of Norfolk had asked, "You don't happen t where I can get a little ——"

He had supplied the important noun with a two-f gesture perfectly understandable to the initiated furtive question, that sig roused the sleeping demon. again had that questio broached between the auth the three worldly gentleme thirst, like an invisible g floated forever over them.

"Isn't there such a thing sonal liberty in this free co sneered Mr. Pipling this mo he sat on the Bubbling Spr randa digesting his breakf thinking about a world whic bleak and drear despite its tumnal coloring. about time for him t ing back to Spouting he thought, and he s calling a jitney.

On a red porch chai him someone had lef of yesterday's Virgin A headline, black-fa important, caught his picked up the sheet that which seemed stage in his spirit cline perfectly innoce harmless:

BIG HAUL OF MOONSH

SHERIFF EGGLE AND DEPUTIES CLEAN U NEAR PINE POI

The article below thoug in local color was rich in the fearless champion of order who by superhum ning had surrounded a litt cave near a mountain str caught three bandits re with twenty gallons whisky, warm from t Many deputies were h mentioned, and among t Hig Botts, whose name recognized as that of an e ing jitney driver who ope tween Spouting Springs railway station. The n account, poverty-stricke it was in picturesque de parted to the author's brain a thrill of uncanny Hig Botts of the suave a manners, who jitneyed t raised a few sheep and s in real estate, was, ber commonplace exterior,

A Blond Clerk Who Attended Them at the Hardware Store Looked Mildly Interested When the Amateur Moonshiners Asked for Copper Kettles

re a man, a se-rember of the e ment's law-reg body! What erl for a motion-ur performance
e ou-All School!
tl shame of it—
t gallons of une whisky poured ally into the ain stream hnce had cooled

pig breathed a -osen literary al strolled down station to find epensive vehicle
y his lazy legs alking. There several jitneys rig about; Pipose the nearest nd signaled nmindedly. Its e clambered altl sterically down s seat, applied ank with one hy swing, and it nimbly to the el his haste im-n that the pas-
e might change nd and choose v—inquired in yd tone, "Back epoutin', Misteh ir?"

S'aight back," nnded the au-
, ontrolling his e for as he came his trancelike
e plations he was r of the driver's cality. It was lg Botts, assistlro of the Pine id.

n Botts, as our u studied him ne tonneau, was icure of pastoral ace proper to his snal occupation s ep raiser and o country squire. He had been kg wool, he informed Mr. Pipling sirt of confidence as he twisted himself halfway round rmitted the jitney to run itself. Wool grease thickly il his raw red hands went far toward verifying his e ent. Mr. Botts had a puckered prickly face with a ot much larger than his Adam's apple, and glassy hich seemed to be always surprised by what they . His head, which was perfectly flat in the back, was precariously on a long neck and sloping shoulders pincushion on a claret bottle. He wore a shirt of t riking Highland plaid so often affected by the rough raineers of our motion-picture studios.

u are—er—kept quite busy, aren't you?" hinted pling, hoping that this would serve as a lead toward lg revelations of moonshiner activities among the l and crannies of the Blue Ridge.

's, seh. We put away right smaht o' wool this yeah," sed Mr. Botts, slightly shifting the eternal amaze-of his eyes.

u raise something besides sheep—eh, what?" sug-te the seeker after facts. He said this with a naughty l which was wasted on the jitney driver.

's, seh. Chickens."

M Botts turned abruptly to his wheel and deflected urse just in time to scrape the paint of a fat limousine ring round the curve.

rest of the trip was taken in a silence which per-tl Mr. Pipling to indulge his moody mood. He had that Mr. Botts would prove venal, would drop some ts to where, when and how white whisky could be ed. What had become of that twenty precious gal-rested so heartlessly from the condemned mountain Pipling had tried more than once to purchase a bottle liquor, either moonshine or bootleg, but a spirit of an honor seemed to have swept over the natives, both and white. He thought of his three engaging friends, al-estate man, the surgeon and the diplomat, and how had hinted that since they were all equally wifeless eek a wee dram now and then would hurt nobody's

Pipling Beheld His Dear Companions and Waved as He Passed, But They Gave Him No Heed

feelings. He had met and talked to men at the Springs who had got the stuff, according to bandit vernacular. He had heard romantic tales of bootleggers passing through the state with mysterious offers of inferior rye at fifteen dollars a quart; tales too of plain men from the hills who would accept currency by the light o' the moon, fill your jug and be gone. What couldn't Mr. Botts tell him, would he but loosen the tongue inside that prickly face?

As their flying chariot was approaching the colonial façade of Spouting Springs Hotel the unhappy genius turned his mind toward Maggie and the one full quart of Bourbon which Angy had confessed was in the keeping of their confidential nurse. Wasn't the liquor his, bought and paid for? What right had Maggie Dempsey to be concealing the property which her employer had brought into a dry state at his own risk and expense?

"It's an outrage!" he growled, and the little car had no sooner come to an asthmatic stop at the hotel veranda than he leaped savagely to earth, fully determined to meet Maggie face to face and assert his rights.

At a shady corner beyond the white pillars three serious-minded men sat, heads together, grappling in learned debate. Pipling beheld his dear companions and waved as he passed, but they gave him no heed. A short broad red-faced gentleman set his bulldog jaw and brought a square fist down on the arm of his chair; a slender well-groomed individual sat cross-kneed, caressing a military mustache as trim and glossy as his reddish pompadour; a little scientific man, his brow corrugated by years of minute analysis, peered through horn-rimmed spectacles, his eyes squinted flat in the intensity of his analysis. Apart from the group a tall gentleman whose black clothes and reversed collar proclaimed his profession was pacing the porch and smiling a benevolent smile.

"What's the argument now?" asked Mr. Pipling, pausing.

"Shantung, I reckon," announced the Reverend Mr. Beagle.

Pipling was rather glad to be out of the debate, because in common with some seventy-five millions of his fellow Americans he was beginning to think that a certain strip of the Orient whose location was vague in his mind should be put up at auction, and have done with all palaver.

Down in a hollow of the lawn he found Maggie Dempsey and his two children leading their normally restless life. Willie, it turned out, had already been playing in the pond and had brought back samples of its alluvial deposit on his hands, face and bare legs. He greeted his father with effusive cordiality and made splendid finger marks up and down Mr. Pipling's light knickerbockers. The baby was crying with that patient whole-hearted scream which only a teething baby knows how to maintain.

"Daddy!" cried the child, whom Pipling finally identified as his own. "Wanna fish!"

"Sure, ye want to fish," declared Maggie, acting as interpreter. "The minut yer mother's back's turned—and small reason she should be gaddin' off to Noo Yark—ye're afther drowndin' yerself in mud and slime. And now ye'll be needin' another bath for the day. Who but the good saints could keep ye alive to grow into a grand man like yer father?"

Pipling gleaned no compliment from the last remark, whose intended sarcasm was apparent. He made little of Maggie's bitter mood, for experience had demonstrated her almost fanatical love for his children. He had a romantic idea that in a pinch Maggie would do almost anything for the Pipling family—outside of keeping her temper. However, he had sought her out for a slyly unworthy purpose. "Maggie," he began, "there seems to be a great deal of influenza going round."

"There'd be none av ut," she informed him dourly, "did people but take dacent care of thimselves."

"I think I've been exposed to a draft," he pursued. "I seem to have a headache and a slight temperature."

"Ye don't look ut," she decided after a cool inspection.

"I suppose not."

He turned sadly away. Certainly the auspices were unfriendly. At first inclined to smile, his indignation grew against the dry conspiracy as he took his way toward the cottage on the brow of the hill. Maggie Dempsey had concealed a bottle—his bottle—somewhere in the depths of Pipling's temporary home. Though the idea of visit and search was against his every principle of conduct his mind was now set upon that loathsome expedient.

It was a large cottage which the Piplings occupied, an eight-room establishment with a second floor devoted to Maggie and her restless young. He set himself methodically to the search, avoiding only his workroom, whose contents he knew by heart. With all the patience of a conscientious burglar he rummaged every bureau drawer, every closet, spied upon shelves, peered under articles of furniture. His secret mission had carried him to the second floor, where he had made a thorough job of the nursery and had even got so far as a locked trunk just outside Maggie's door when a domestic clamor below announced plainly that Willie was being hauled back for his second bath.

Pipling tiptoed down just in time to face Maggie and his first-born on the stairs. He was humming a merry tune and his face had taken on the look of detachment and purity peculiar to a criminal almost caught in an act of crime. Maggie obliged him with a keenly suspicious look, but it was little Willie who, as the vernacular hath it, spilled the beans.

"Daddy, what you doon in my upstairs?"

"My, how dirty you are!" chirped the author by way of a counterirritant. "Now run and take your bath and do what Maggie tells you."

During the subsequent splashings and screamings, which came to Pipling's ears like the noise of many water fowl in violent disagreement, he rocked nervously in a hard red

(Continued on Page 124)

LYDIA LEADS THE WAY

By Oscar Graeve

ILLUSTRATED BY WILL GREFÉ

IT IS nearly always a mistake to begin a story at the beginning, but in this case it is so very necessary to show the environment which produced Lester Henry and his wife, Lydia. In fact in the beginning, it must be explained, Lydia was not Lydia. She was Lizzie. It was only after Lester was well started on his career as one of the popular writers of the day that Lizzie became Lydia. Lydia, she felt, sounded more imposing. It may even be assumed that she used the word "tonier"—Lydia, she said in those remote days, sounded tonier than Lizzie. Afterward, of course, when the Henrys were transplanted to New York and Lester had begun to syndicate his work through newspapers, afterward when his name—or so Lydia thought—was on everybody's lips, she had learned that tony was not one of the words that a prominent author's wife should use.

Lydia, you see, learned fast. She had determined early in Lester's career that he was not going to leave her behind, no matter how rapid his progress. In books, in newspapers and periodicals she had made a thorough study of the strange and vacillating ways of genius. She had heard too of certain financiers who—springing from nothing into the dazzling radiance of great wealth—had outgrown their first wives. Well, Lydia had decided that she was not one of the wives who was going to be outgrown. Wherever a most indulgent Fate led Lester, there she also was going to be led. She was going to keep up with him—in culture, in the subtleties of society, in the knowledge of men, women and events, in dress—especially in dress.

And then Lydia came to one of those decisions which marked her too as a creature of genius. She was not only going to keep up with Lester; she was going to keep ahead of him. It was Lydia, not Lester, she decided who was going to lead the way.

"What's the Matter?" He Asked. "Oh, I Know. I'm So Sorry. I Never Met You, Did I?"

The courtship of Lizzie Robinson and Lester Henry was carried on chiefly over the counters of the general store in Peltonville owned by Lester's uncle. Peltonville is a village in New York State near the Canadian border. It was—and still is—six miles from the railroad. Peltonville is the type of village which is just able to support comfortably one of everything—one hotel, where the drummers stayed overnight—never more than that—and the sporting element of the community took their suppers every Sunday evening; one drug store, which made as much from its soda fountain in summer as from its drugs all the year round; the one general store owned by Lester Henry's uncle, one hardware shop, one undertaking establishment and one—no, maybe there were two grocery shops.

It rather seems now as if the courtship were carried on by Lizzie. Eligible males were rare in Peltonville. The brightest boys left and journeyed afar to seek their fortunes. Lester Henry was not bright—at least no one considered him bright at that time. But he was a pleasant young fellow, a little rotund, slow in his movements but eager to serve, listening with a peculiar intensity to the gossip of the countryside that came to him every day over the counters the while his pale-blue eyes twinkled behind his glistening glasses. Lester himself never said very much. He gave some fidgety people the impression that he was always studying them and—as it developed later—he probably was. He was also very shy. He was never one of the young men who walked down the dark side of Maple Avenue on summer evenings with their best girls. He was the poorest patron of Jenks' Livery Stable. He didn't even own a boat on Trout Lake, where the swains of Peltonville every Sunday afternoon during the brief spell of hot weather showed their skill at the oars with some fair representative of the other sex sitting opposite where she could watch with admiring eyes the swelling muscles of her young man.

Lester Henry needed to be courted rather than do the courting himself. And Lizzie Robinson, who in those days was a bit too stout and who hadn't the remotest idea as to what to do with her very lovely red hair and whose freckles marred what otherwise might have been the pinkest and whitest of complexions, wanted someone to walk with her on Maple Avenue and take her buggy riding and rowing. Owing to the dearth of eligible young men, a girl was not at all sure of these delights unless she happened to be one of the half dozen village belles—which Lizzie was not.

So one day Lizzie decided that Lester Henry, despite his shyness and quiet—perhaps because of these—was worth cultivating. After that decision she manufactured the most amazing number of reasons for calling at the general store. Once there, whether it was a spool of cotton, a paper of pins or a cake of soap that brought her, she stayed chatting with Lester. It was a primitive plan but an effective one.

"I don't know as you'd like me for a husband, Lizzie," Lester said one evening—and he said it stammeringly while his face was suffused with a dark brick-red color, but fortunately that didn't matter as it was said on the darkest corner of Maple Avenue.

"Yes, I'd like you," said Lizzie, and she slipped her arm through his, drawing him close.

"I'm sort of a queer one," said Lester.

"Why?"

"I've got a bee in my bonnet."

"What do you mean, Lester?"

Lizzie wasn't finding him a very satisfactory lover, but she did not relinquish her hold.

"I've got to have a couple of hours to myself every night and Sunday—a lot of time on Sunday."

"What in the world for?" asked Lizzie. She was genuinely surprised.

Lester became almost inarticulate with choking embarrassment.

"I—I'm writing some sketches of the folks round here. I've been writing a lot ever since I was a kid. I never told anyone before you. You didn't know either that I'm the Peltonville correspondent of the Canton Courier, did you?"

"No, I didn't. Do you get paid for it?" asked Lizzie sharply.

"Only a couple of dollars a week. I do it mo the fun of it."

"Maybe you could make a lot of money w sometime, Lester."

"Oh, I don't think so."

"Yes, maybe you could," insisted Lizzie. "You' to make more money now—now that we're going married."

"Oh, then you will marry me, Lizzie? I'm awfully He managed somehow for the first time to give he shy dab with his own. "I didn't know you'd mar I—I don't know what you see in me."

"Well, I don't know as I know myself," said Lizz in the darkness she gave him a look containing muc of maternal feeling than any other kind of feeling. an expression that was to become characteristic when she looked at Lester.

So they were married, and after two weeks' hone spent along the St. Lawrence River on an excursio which meant reduced railroad fares, reduced hote and all sorts of reductions, they settled down in yellow house at the farthest end of the East Road. an insignificant little house, but it gained a certain a of prestige because it was the house nearest the S place, where old Elihu Sprague, a widower and t really wealthy man in Peltonville, lived. The S place was Peltonville's one mansion—a great, rambling house set most pleasantly on the a small lake with rich rolling meadows all a and an orchard of fancy apple trees forming a at its back.

In the tiny yellow house Lizzie, singing, housework and puttered a little in the gard cooked the best pies and biscuits in the wo Lester. It was an art she had learned great-aunt, the fame of whose cooking had throughout the country and had won her prize at the annual Canton fair. while Lester continued to clerk uncle's store, but managed to fin day two hours in which to shut up in a room at the rear of the house.

Both Lester and Lizzie were Indeed Lizzie was far happier th had expected to be. She had ca Lester, not from any great feeling but rather as a matter of precauti pride. She wanted to be marrie wanted to show Peltonville tha though men were scarce she was of the Peltonville maidens who w ing to be left on the shelf. But a marriage a genuine affection for flowered within her. She liked after him. She liked to humor hi good heavens—she said to hersel he did need looking after! Ne there such another booby. W didn't know his right shoe from his left! But she say these things in contempt. She said them with a loving tenderness. And often in the afternoon wh sat on the front porch in the rocker with some n in her hands she found to her surprise there were her eyes, and the tears were there because she was t how helpless Lester was and how ill he would fa were not for her.

It seemed then for a time as if destiny had settle and Lester there in the tiny yellow house on the Eas There they were put, there they would stay. Th their ultimate fate and they were satisfied with it. time it seemed incredible that they would be floate on a wave of prosperity and fame—away from Pel to the metropolis of the western world, to enter i life of the metropolis, snatching their full share glitter, its glory and its folly. It seems stranger st the germ of this adventure should be contained in hours that Lester gave himself daily in the rear roo the shed where the wood was piled and the kerosene

It was the editor of the Canton Courier who su to Lester that he have his sketches of Peltonville typ submit them to a publisher. He was a curious ma editor of a small-town weekly. Jackson West ha degrees at Harvard and at Cambridge. He had k all about the world and he had indeed a knocke look. He was a little frayed in spirit. His eyes were as if they had seen too much. His smile was slow a charming. Above everything it was tolerant, as if h the weaknesses of all the world and was anxious done them. It was a strange wave of destiny, t tossed him up in a small town of Northern New Y left him stranded there.

ey he drove over to Peltonville and called upon his nyle correspondent. He happened to come at lunch ar Lizzie, who had just brought a pie from the nisted that he have lunch with Lester and herself df going to the American House—the only alternalis the way you report Peltonville affairs," said onWest to Lester. "You seem to be able to get a u an being into a line or two. It's a rare gift."

scrutinized Lester speculatively, but Lester blushed e his eyes on his plate.
zi however, quickened with interest. husband's writing a book about the people round
e said.
hLizzie!" said Lester reprovingly. He didn't like v his secret betrayed thus casually. But Jackson rected Lizzie's quickened interest.
want to read some of it," he said.
ed eyes were alight with enthusiasm after he had w pages of Lester's neatly written manuscript. lake this over to Canton and have it typed," he 'hen you can go over it, finish it up and we'll send Courtney."
i's Courtney?" asked Lizzie.
blisher."
h;'s lovely of you."
dizzie found herself liking Jackson West. She had kl him at first, because his accent sounded foreign tk-up to her. She had invited him to lunch bee thought he might be useful to Lester, but now had proved useful she liked the man himself. She do Lester.
ways knew you could make money out of your g' she said, "if you had gumption enough to show a body."
lon West also suggested calling the book of sketches e folks, and when it was finished it was sent to t y under that title. But Courtney did not accept atson West, however, who it seems was interested g to take the entire matter in charge, smiled and t manuscript to the great publishing house of Con-ee & Co.
Vaimed too low," he explained to the bitterly disapte Lester.
rant, Lee & Co. accepted the book and published e llowing autumn.
ro simple a thing—a tale of the village barber, a aerization of Miss Spence, the dressmaker, the actf the funeral of Lars Hansen, the village drunkard si ilar sketches—it had a surprising reception. Eager sell upon it, seized it and held it aloft as an example true spirit of America at last portrayed. They iseemed sprung from the very soil, that it had a mespun quality and marked a new genre in Amerlerature. They said other things that left Lester eand groping as to their meaning. Fortunately a suf-ny large number of the public also liked it well enough oe five editions in as many months.
In at the end of six months Lester id his first royalty check he was as finded as Lizzie was exuberant. Meanene editor of a woman's magazine wrote ked for some similar sketches.
Bt I've already got all the poeple I know
nbook," said Lester.
In't be a fool, Lester. You can't let pportunity go by. There's Aunt da Sweet down at r orners. Do her," suge Lizzie.
tfirst Lester said he lc't, but he retired to ar room and emerged
e days later with the Miranda sketch. The gine editor sent a surly large check for it ked for more.
Lie and Lester had more n than they knew what d with—at least Lester
l. Lizzie began to enter-isions of a larger life.
ad read assiduously of every copy of the n n's magazine which dasked for Lester's
tes. She was flooded
t new ideas—about tls, about dinner parties
e, delectable things were vl in chafing dishes,
the possibilities of life tl city. She was so excited that she could hardly eat night and when she did sleep she dreamed lrself radiantly attired, sweeping through hotel ls, entering theaters with a cloak of silk and fur on negligently over one shoulder, presiding at dinner parties in restaurants where people turned to stare at her because she was the wife of the great author. She could not understand Lester's indifference to his good fortune. He had no plans, he saw no future. His complacency amazed and maddened her. She realized at last that it was she who must lead the way.

One summer evening Lester returned from the general store to find Lizzie waiting for him on the porch. She had on her best lavender-lawn dress and she was fanning herself triumphantly with a new spangled white fan.

"'Lo, Lizzie," said Lester. "What are you all dressed up for? Isn't supper ready?"

"I can get you a cold pick-up supper in a jiffy, Lester," Lizzie answered. "But first I want you to sit down here on the step by me and listen. I've got a lot to tell you."

Lester obediently sat down on the step, and removing his yellowed soft straw hat swung it gently to and fro. He drew out a handkerchief and mopped his brow, on which already the hair was getting thin. He looked small, rounded, a little pathetic and very much like one of the characters in his own book as he sat there crouching at Lizzie's feet.

"I've been over to Canton to see Jackson West," said Lizzie.

"Yeh?"

Lester's interest was entirely perfunctory. Lizzie tapped her foot impatiently.

"He says he'll give you a job on his paper, Lester," she said briskly. "It'll be awful good training for you, he says, and it'll be more broadening living in Canton. It's a bigger place. There's more going on there."

"Why should we move away from here, Lizzie?"

Lester gravely and regretfully eyed his small demesne—the little garden in which marigolds made merry in the evening sunshine and golden glow tossed their arrogant heads and gladioli lifted their flaming torches, the village street tranquil beneath the trees and in the distance the little lake of the Sprague place set like an opal in the rolling green meadows.

"Well, you can't go on clerking here, Lester. You've got to get a bigger job and a better one than that. Look at all the money you're making! You've got to do something more—more dignified than clerking. You've got to give your genius a chance to develop."

Lizzie now was quoting very largely from what Jackson West had said.

"You've got to see more of life. It's your duty to the world, Lester."

"Do you think you'll like living in Canton, Lizzie?"

"Well, I'll like it better than this little place. I'll like it all right for a year or two."

"For a year or two? Will you want to come back here then?"

Lester lifted a face to her that had distinctly brightened.

"For lands' sake, no, Lester! After a year or two in Canton we'll go on to New York. We'll be ready then to go on to New York."

"New York!"

He said it in a tone that expressed both awe and fright.

"Certainly, New York, Lester! That's where you've got to go if you're going to make a real success of your writing."

"Do you want to go, Lizzie?"

"I certainly don't want to stick in this part of the backwoods all my life, Lester."

"All right, dear, we'll go then," he said, and rising he gave his wife's lips one of those shy dabs of his.

But after she had gone into the house to get him his cold pick-up supper he still remained out upon the front porch, his eyes upon the flowers, the quiet street and the rolling meadows. Once in a while he sighed.

It Was Lydia Who Held Preston at Bay and Made Him Promise He'd Seriously Consider Lester's New Novel

The Tintoretto is the last word in New York's studio-apartment buildings and it might be said that Mrs. Lydia Henry as she alighted from a taxicab and sailed into the marble hallway of the Tintoretto, bowing with just the right degree of friendly condescension to the door man, the second door man, the hall boy, the telephone girl in her gilded cage and the elevator attendant—it might well be said that Mrs. Lydia Henry was the last word in studio-apartment occupants. Even that harsh critic, the telephone girl, gave her a begrudging glance of admiration.

Lydia's suit was a warm brown of exactly the right shade to emphasize the brilliant bronze of her elaborately dressed hair and over the hair itself was drawn a small velvet hat, brown too, but with a fierce stab of color in the shape of a flaring scarlet wing. Over the gleaming brown boots she wore were drawn white spats, and a bit of white fur was clasped round her neck, challenging without success the perfect pink and white of her complexion. But the most noteworthy thing about Lydia now was the slim grace of her figure. She was as lithe and supple and resilient as youth itself.

At the doorway of her own apartment on the sixth floor she fished a key from a glittering bag of gold mesh and let herself in. She moved down the hallway of the apartment through a living room decorated in black and gold, through a bedroom done in gray and rose and stopped before the closed door of a tiny room at the very rear of the apartment designed by the architects as a storeroom. She knocked at the door and said sibilantly, "Lester!"

There was no answer.

Again the knock, again the sibilant "Lester!"

As there was still no answer she pushed open the door and entered. The room was so small that it contained but three pieces of furniture and these three were huddled together. There was a rather weather-beaten oak desk, such as you find in some offices, a stiff-backed chair before the desk and at one side a crumbling old couch. So furnished, the room was a glaring incongruity compared with the rest of the apartment. But aside from these three pieces of furniture the room was empty. Tears of vexation sprang to Lydia's eyes. She hesitated a moment, her finger on her lip, and then made her way through various doorways and pushed open the swinging door of the butler's pantry.

"Estelle!" she called.

A very trim and cocksure colored maid appeared and presented an unsmiling and inquiring face. "Estelle, do you know where Mr. Henry is?

"No'm."

"Did you hear him go out?"

"It seems like I heard him moving round 'bout two hours ago, Mis' Henry."

"That means he's practically done no work all afternoon," said Lydia more to herself than the maid, and again the tears of vexation were in her eyes.

She turned to go away, but the maid halted her with: "Mis' Henry, I'd like to have my last week's pay."

"You're not going to leave us, are you, Estelle?" Lydia asked in alarm.

"No'm, but I'd like to have my pay more prompt."

Lydia still carried her gold mesh bag and she opened it and gave some bills to the maid.

(Continued on Page 182)

THE SKY'S THE LIMIT

By Mary Roberts Rinehart

PHOTO. BY BLACK-D PHOTO. SERVICE, LOS ANGELES

"I Give You My Word I'm in It!"

OH, YES; I fly." I intend to say it nonchalantly. The gentleman at my right or left—for I shall spring it at a dinner—will, I hope, stare at me in amazement, while I toy with my food. "Toy" is of course a figure of speech; I haven't really toyed with it for twenty years.

"Do you mean that you have been up?" he is to say.

"Of course."

"Really! How—er—how high?"

"Various elevations," I shall observe, again nonchalantly. I shall then remark that there is a curious thrill about the Immerman turn that is perhaps equaled only by the tail spin, but that for real rest without excitement, a sort of aërial vacation, I prefer long-distance flying. One comes down so rested and refreshed. One feels akin to the birds. One has communed alone with the clouds and been a little sister of the sun. One has wiped off the earth dust for a few hours and breathed the ether of the high places. One—but you have heard all that before. Everyone who doesn't fly and takes on a life-insurance policy before going on a scenic railway at an amusement park raves about the upper air.

But long before this is published I shall have shot my dinner-party bolt, and I intend here to record the actual facts about my flying. I am going to be the one unprofessional ex-passenger in an aëroplane to tell the truth about how I felt about it. But remember, I am not going to knock it. It is a great thing. It has come to stay. The time is almost here when we are going to stand out on the front lawn and scan the sky for our returning husbands at the evening hour, and have our monograms in electric lights on the roof so that the children can find their way home from the dances or the movies. And we women will have little vanity cases in our smart little ships—that is a professional touch, that "ships"; aviators always say it—and buy air clothes instead of airy ones.

Do you think this is a dream of the future? All right. Watch the next two years. I can remember when a young man in my neighborhood took the family buggy and odd parts of an old express wagon—and probably the household teakettle, for he ran his engine by steam—and made a vehicle which scared the neighborhood doctor's horse over a fence and stalled on all the car tracks. When that young man stopped inventing and went to the Spanish War everyone went in and congratulated his mother on his improved chances of life.

The aëroplane is past that stage of course. It is now, relatively, where the automobile was when one climbed three steps in the rear and got in between the two back seats. But it is with us to-night, and we may as well acknowledge it.

Why, when I had done a bit of flying and telephoned to a department store for a woman's aëroplane coat they sent me one in a half hour, by a boy on a motor cycle.

There is an odd thing about that dinner-table conversation. The moment I make my announcement all the men within hearing are going to explain why they haven't been up. It is a lucky one who thinks first of saying that his heart isn't very good. That lets him out for the rest of his life, though he may have to square himself with his wife later. The rest have always meant to, but have simply neglected it. They probably will that week sometime. One or two of them are thinking of buying a plane and commuting with it, but their wives object. And a quick thinker among them remembers the new flying clause in life-insurance policies, and lays it to that. The other men glare at him.

But the greatest efforts of all in the genteel-mendacity line are made by the people who have been up, the ones who shut their eyes the moment they hop off and never open them again until they get back, and never draw a full breath until the pilot stops the engine and says: "Well, how was it?"

They then release their stiffened fingers from the sides of the body, which they have been clutching with frenzy, breathe, swallow, look round at the glorious solid earth, only five feet beneath them, and say: "Glorious! I felt like a bird. It is simply indescribable. The most exquisite calm! And that sense of freedom!"

They then crawl out and look down to see if the shaking of their knees is noticeable.

"I'll be round to-morrow for another little jaunt," they say. "How much are the blooming things anyhow? If I can persuade the famil you don't want a n dollars for it, I may little bus."

The pilot then unf the buckle of the er ast's helmet, becaus latter's fingers are trer too much; and he g and crawls into his au bile and rehearses a way home how he is to spring his heroic ture on his friends. does not go back to t ing field. He takes a road so as not to pass be hailed and taken another joy-ride.

It is perfectly under able. We have not, by heredity or traini natural inclination f ing. It is an acquire Man takes to the ai as normally as a fis only he can be train and the fish cannot, of course, perfectly tr some people have from the beginning, b are, generally speak lymphatics, the unir tive folk who have perament and little ir tion. They do not m best flyers, however, are not quick think flying takes head w course in time it b more or less automa driving a car, a m the spinal cord rath the brain.

I have been up fou On my fourth tim made a long-distan of 150 miles. Befo published I shall p have been up a nu times. At this mon leather coat, helmet gles are lying on And if to-morrow i day —— I like it am in the plane; re it. But it still take moral courage I've get me in. I'm cur imagination. My e out the aëroplane c in the morning pa a sort of fatal facilit in a motor, but I calmly and courage automobile mishap read of drownings a swim in deep water with a stroke of my own, w swimming instructors crazy, and show no violen I can read of a family laid by the heels with cold turkey, and go out fearlessly and order a cold turkey and digest it without a qualm.

But flying is different.

In the first place this thing of feeling like a bir an aviator of my acquaintance calls "bunk." It sport. It is as good sport—better in some ways motoring on perfect roads. It lacks some of th motoring. The untrained eye finds the earth bel esting rather than beautiful. It is too much flatt for beauty. Its perspectives are altered, and its tions. The surf lines of the ocean from above ar The clouds from above are things of marvelous and also give a comforting sense of something so upon if anything happens. It is not quiet and The noise of the engine is an incessant roar, not through the helmet, rather comforting indeed, b it stops where are you? But a noise, nevertheles

But it is incredibly swift, easy and stimulatin

I intend to be the one honest person who has flying. I told a woman that to-day at luncheo that most people didn't tell the truth about th

(Continued on Page 107)

A Post-Mortem on Cock Robin

By EDWARD G. LOWRY

LBRATE the ultimate consumer. He ing his time. I like him, and publicly g is praises whenever I can. He is the ttacks the load. He does not whine under punisheek sympathy by showing his sore thumb when u. He is not organized. He has no voice. But decides he has had enough of a thing, that thing, y it is, stops, ceases to be, is not any more.
e old managers of the Republican Party. They hast lot he jolted in the midriff. They haven't got
t. He did not like the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Bill.
ised the cost of living. It took money out of his d put it in the pockets of tariff beneficiaries who deserve it. The ultimate consumer was not present ented at the tariff hearings. He didn't make much while the unjust imposts were being made ready his back, but when the job was done he threw off ren, and with it Mr. Taft and the Republican you don't know the ultimate consumer. He is an flivver. He takes you there and brings you he hack driver at Niagara Falls sensed him clearly told Mr. Bryan one rainy autumn afternoon, sses of the people form the bulk of the popula-hat is a great economic, social and political truth.

rget it you are sure to be bumped. And if the consumer bumps you you are sure to be hurt, an unwieldy mass, slow to move, but when he does r way he acquires considerable momentum. Do ember the poem in the elocution book that we recite from on Friday afternoons in school? I e one about Mr. Brown, who was on the top of a er hanging pictures when he lost his balance and nds this way:

Brown had fallen on the cat.
She was too thick for a bookmark
And too thin for a mat.

elling you now, so you won't be surprised by what pen to the high-cost-of-living profiteers.
ltimate consumer is the plain average human being s and has his being in this country of ours. He is conscious, because he doesn't know the meaning rm. He is not labor and he is not capital. He is nized. He has no class interests; or if he has he know about it. He is not an articulate emotion-ou never hear him yawping about his rights, but nd, after infinite patience and tolerance of unjust
, he always gets them. He settles things in this , because he outnumbers all the special interests, of capital or of id labor, five to homas Carlyle,

s a good hand
sort of thing, d the ultimate er when he out the famous n of the Midi arched from les to Paris and ook so large a precipitating nch Revolution.

U. C's Case

BATAILLON
U 10 AOÛT," to be called.
were hot pa-
"Forçats they ot, neither was plunder nor of it," wrote
. "These Mar-
," he concluded,
n inarticulate,
nguishable in
, a black-browed
ull of grim fire, end there in the ultry weather:
ingular to con-
te. They wend;
he infinitude of
, and dim of they are not ul: Fate and Europe, having
d, come girdling in from without; they, having also decided, do march within. Dusty of face, with frugal refreshment, they plod onwards; unweariable, not to be turned aside. Such march shall become famous. They must . . . strike and be struck; and on the whole prosper, and know how to die."

As the ultimate consumer puts it, compactly, in his own vernacular: "We are on our way. And where do we go from here?"

That is what I have been trying to find out this summer by going out among his abiding places in the hope that he would be vocal and state his case. The labor case is stated; the radical case is stated; less ably and less completely, the case of capital is presented. But this clamorous outcry is going on over the consumer's head. He is the buyer. It is for him that all the advertisements in this and the other magazines and journals and newspapers are printed. The consumer's function is to consume, and unless he buys and consumes, production is waste effort.

The good Lord knows there is no more willing consumer and buyer on the face of the earth than the average American. He is notorious for it. It is a law of his nature, as it is that of the Turk to make nougat or perish. But the architects of production are cramping his action. The fellow I am talking about, and the fellow I have been sitting with on various front porches this summer watching it rain—did you ever know such a rainy summer?—is not a waster or a spendthrift or a crook. He wants as much as anybody and he wants it of the best and he doesn't haggle over pennies, but he is not going to buy what he can't pay for and he is not going to spend right up to the limit of his earnings. He wants to put by something. It is a deeply implanted instinct, and a sound one too. My friend the ultimate consumer knows it.

He doesn't take much stock in these newfangled political notions and nostrums that seem to be finding favor in many minds. He doesn't hanker after direct action or any of the strong-arm methods now having a temporary vogue among violent extremists. The U. C. is an orderly person with a full share of common sense. He knows that injustice exists in this world, and, for that matter, always has. He wants to right wrongs almost more than anybody else, but never at the expense of others. He knows that the mere business of living and the daily routine of arranging for food, shelter, clothing and a bit to spare against the time of old age and physical disability imply mutual easements, accommodations and adjustments. He believes there are enough laws and sufficient open channels of political action in this country to remedy his present situation. He has been up against it before so hard that he bounced back. He knows how to rid a barn of rats without burning the barn.

Some years ago the neighbors were hanging a man up in the Bitter Root country for stealing horses. Before they swung him off they asked him if he had anything to say. He said this: "I am as interested in these proceedings as any of you gents, but I ain't as excited as some." That, I think, fairly represents the present state of mind of the ultimate consumer. Even if the political and social machine isn't working properly he doesn't think it will help to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. He doesn't see how a general strike and the entire stoppage of production will help him or anybody else. He believes that a lack of production is one of the root causes of his troubles. I am backing the common-sense fellow to win and find a way out because he is so very much in earnest and because he hasn't lost his head. But let him speak for himself.

He tells me that he is paying more for his clothing, for his shoes, for his food and his housing than he ever dreamed of paying, and getting infinitely poorer stuff. It is costing him at least twice as much to live now as it did in 1913 and 1914. His earnings are not more than one-quarter larger than they were then. The margin between what he takes in and what he absolutely has to pay out to keep going has been clean wiped out. His patience is wearing pretty thin. He is sure there is something mighty wrong somewhere—as of course there is.

A Typical Conversation

ONE typical conversation, for the sake of illustration: "You see this town. It is an average American city. There are more like it than any other kind in this country. It has no specific character. It is not a mill town, with half a dozen very rich men in it and a great many poor mill hands. It is just a plain civilized community of human beings adjacent to a fairly good farming country. I am a salaried man. I always have been and probably always will be. I have never been able to earn enough to go into business for myself. I do not know that there is any opening here for a new business, and I don't want to leave here. All my interests are here. All my friends are here. I like the place and the people. Why should I go away? Why should I be driven away? But look at the fix I am in.

"Take anything you like. Take collars. I used to buy them at two for a quarter. Now I have to pay 25 or 35 cents apiece, a dollar for three or four. I wear ready-made clothing. I always have. I was never able to afford to have a tailor make me a suit. I didn't see any sense in it anyway, as long as I could get as good a suit as I wanted ready-made for less than a tailor would charge me to make it. Everybody else here did the same thing. There is a tailor shop here. You might have seen the sign as you came up from the depot, 'The Bon Ton Tailor.' Well, you go down there and ask Isadore and I'll bet he will tell you he did not make three suits a year. He made his living pressing and cleaning and repairing.

"I used to pay $15 for a suit of clothes. Then I paid $18. Then I paid $25. I would get two seasons of wear out of them, on an average. The first season I would keep them for Sunday clothes and the next season for everyday wear.

"But what about it now? I have to pay $50 for a suit as good as those old $25 suits.

(Continued on Page 137)

COPYRIGHTED BY INTERNATIONAL, NEW YORK CITY

Massachusetts Militiamen Rounding Up Hoodlums on the Boston Common After a Raid on the Gambling Games Run Openly There in Defiance of the Authorities

THE BEAN SPILLE

He Saw Reddall Stamping With Stolid Efficiency on Something in the Path—Something That Killian in One More Stride Must Have Stepped On

By Albert Payson Terhune

ILLUSTRATED BY ERNEST FUHR

THE city of Scorpion is indicated on the state map by a small and round and reddish spot that suggests a miniature mosquito bite. This through no fault of H. Abiff Reddall. If Reddall had had his way the site of Scorpion would have been marked on the map by some such emblem as a resurgent Phœnix or by an eagle triumphantly soaring heavenward between symbolic figures of Progress and Plenty.

Reddall was the greatest man in Scorpion and Scorpion was Reddall's life. Mighty was Reddall—mighty in spite of his meager flesh and his five-feet-two of slumping stature and his hairless little dome. His very baldness had a rare distinction of its own—a distinction best summarized by a glove salesman who broke a two-hundred-mile jump at Scorpion and who spent the bulk of his three-hour stay there in a fascinated survey of H. Abiff Reddall. After which the glove man wrote home to his wife or to someone else's:

"All bald heads are glacé—all except this little chap's. His is suède."

The suède quality was imparted by a Brûlé-Sioux scalping knife back in the early seventies, when Reddall—a mere whippet in his teens—was making his westward trek from Hampden, Massachusetts. A year later the scalpless young pioneer had been one of the eighteen men to found the frontier town of Scorpion. Others of the party strayed on toward the coast or sought gold in the mountains to northward or punched cattle among the dreary flat plains to the south. But Reddall remained at Scorpion. And at last he was the only member of the original colony to continue living there.

Hundreds of newcomers meantime arrived and turned the original camp into a cluttered cattle and mining center. But at the age of twenty-four H. Abiff Reddall had been Scorpion's oldest inhabitant and first settler. This dual dignity meant infinitely much to the youthful oldster. From the outset some queer strain in his imagination had been stirred by the thrill of founding a town where recently the desert had ruled. It was this that had kept him at Scorpion when his colleagues drifted on. It was this that gave Scorpion the supreme pedestal in his tiny temple of idols.

He felt, somehow, responsible for the ugly little settlement. He rejoiced mightily over every new addition to its roll of citizenry. He would plead with much eloquence against the wanderlust decision that sent folk away after brief sojourns. Any outbreak of lawlessness, any wholesale fire or epidemic in the fast-growing huddle of houses filled him with a personal shame and grief.

Because he was willing to devote his every spare minute to Scorpion's uplift and growth his more selfish townsmen allowed him to. Wherefore, Reddall presently found himself the place's business manager and advertising agent and factotum. And he was able to turn his two former titles of oldest inhabitant and first settler into a trinity by adding the undisputed term of Foremost Citizen.

There were people in those early days who grinned widely when this soft-voiced and suède-peaked runt sought to turn them from pests into assets, or when he protested against outrages or sought funds for waterworks and sidewalks. But oddly enough the same man never grinned twice at Reddall.

The simple little chap was not a fire eater. He was gentle and punctilious—almost deprecatory. But he valued his life not at all and he valued still less the lives of those who stood in the way of Scorpion's advancement. And there was the same hint of passive deadliness about him that marks the gila monster.

Had he been a few inches higher or a fraction less unobtrusive the title of judge or of colonel must have been cinched about him. But somehow it never occurred to anybody to call him anything more resounding than plain mister. Nor did public office seek him. As sole owner and editor of the Scorpion Sentinel he continued to rule the bulging young city from the side lines.

Year by year Scorpion grew, whereat Reddall was jubilant. But in time the growth slackened and Reddall's joy merged into worry. Scorpion was not a dead city, but neither was it a live city. Reddall, who knew and fostered its several advantages, yearned for the money or the occasion to show the indifferent Eastern bourn of capital and of tourists the wonders of his community. He felt certain that all Scorpion needed was a fair chance. Once let the world know about it—and the world would wear a broad path to its door. Meanwhile the city drowsed between few and sporadic spurts of wakefulness, and Reddall wrought vainly to interest the rest of the universe in it.

Then all unexpectedly—an uncovenanted mercy, a stroke of dazzling luck—something happened which put Scorpion not only upon the map and sent thousands of tourists crowding thither but which gave it repeated daily mention in every newspaper printed in the English language. It happened in this way:

Young Cronin—whose parents had lived and died in the firm belief that their rugged son's name was Rothapfel—had traveled upward through the heavyweight division with the speed of an express train plowing a path through a bunch of sheep—and with almost as many casualties.

Starting as a mixed-ale warri
the intervals of truck driving Cronin had battered his way in two preliminary bouts at Easte ing clubs and thence into regul on off nights. After this he had been signed up famed patron of fistic art, Spider Andy Sludge.

Under Sludge's shrewd management the upwa had begun. In less than two years Young Croni unbroken string of victories which cleared aw obstacle between himself and the heavyweight c of the world, and which left the champion himself native but to accept the contender's oft-repeated c

Cronin's page in the pocket-edition Ring Rec tained not one fateful L. Not even a nonc No Dec. Scarce a single W. or Dec. adorned the his triumphs. After the name of practically ev was the glorious hieroglyph: K. O.

Of such stuff is the born champion made—the is born to win and who never loses a battle unt with the honors of his long-held championshi beaten by some younger man, a man who has lacked the cash and prestige for such dissipation undermined his waning rival.

Such a born champion was John L. Sulliva champions were Corbett and Jeffries and—with o ful exception—Bob Fitzsimmons. This being b degenerate days when two men with records abrist and No Dec. were allowed to fight each other for t heavyweight championship of the world. The bo pions' record of wins began with their first figl continued until they had held the championship

Joe Killian, heavyweight champion of the w no great desire to defend his title against Youn No champion wants to fight if he can avoid the he has everything at stake. Any bit of ill luck d bout will put him forever in the has-been ranks.
everything to lose and—except for the financial he has nothing to gain. Wherefore, he holds off he can and then stands out for something lil quarters of the proceeds—win or lose. Which is a right almost always conceded to him.

Killian had won his title by a four-year cour varied victories. He had held it for three years four times since the belt had become his and w four battles with comparative ease.

Now that the sporting world's clamor roused his comfortable rest and bade him meet Youn he grunted in huge disgust and prepared to go int again.

Even before the articles were signed Killian and ager were breast-deep in letters and telegrams fr lus bidding for the fight. Flattering offers were d ide by more flattering offers. Cronin was tremen-y ppular. The fight promised to be a record money-

r. Sporting men, promoters and motion-picture s epared to flock to the feast.
name the traditional clash between sport and law.
i those days this clash was old. As fast as one t made a bid for the contest the local authorities or blic sentiment cried "Shoo!" And another place xt on with the same results.
til at least six of these desired sites had perforce al ndoned did the promoters of the Killian-Cronin d over that the laws of one state were monstrous
t oward such contests—in other words, that no l laws existed there. And Scorpion—thanks to al and his henchmen—proved to everyone's satist hat it was the sole city in the state which could e prize-fight crowd in proper fashion and could m date the mass of transient business and lodgment.
n the Giant Corral—one of the show places of it—was chosen for the erecting of the stadium, and n able shelllike houses rose by magic from every d vacant lot. These flimsy abodes made ready to a aring board-and-lodging signs the moment their sl uld be in place. A horde of strangers settled upon t o supply welcome of various sorts to the inevitable l Scorpion woke from its doze to find the eyes of the n Hemisphere upon it.
dall was gorgeously happy. He was working twenty day. His paper was athrob with projects for make anent some of the city's impending popularity.
w spending his own none-too-plentiful money in ls andfuls and his own brain power and energy with-t t. Scorpion's one grand chance had come and n was preparing to make his worshiped community
e ry advantage thereof.
t "this way," he explained haltingly to Mr. Dennis a han, proprietor of Scorpion's Eagle Hotel. "S'pose a house for sale.
e train wreck was i fifty rich folks to o e for shelter. Well, w t to make that e o hell-roarin' at-i to those rich folks me of 'em would a ancy to it an' want a n there, even if they c uy it. Wouldn't I?
's like that with p n. We gotta ——"
I t was me," interd Mr. Dennis Brana-
, is imagination fired h picture, "if it was r fifty rich folks was e randed in my hotel
o place else to go—
I wouldn't bother me
th any of 'em wanted
u it or not. I'd trim
s good an' plenty for t ngs they'd have to f m me at my own e hat I'd collect the e f the house twice
, n' I'd still have the s e That's my idee of
n. An' I reckon it's T n's idee, too, judgin'
h——" dall sighed and away without wait-near more. This was irit he met every-the spirit he was
o hard and so vainly o bat.
rin's training camp
a little ranch three out of town on the t Gloriosa trail. Kild rented the aban-
e old rest house and b uildings on the edge
S rpion at the other
. The two men met
e r twice during their y ogs—always by the manner of accident lways when a full
p of correspondents
e n hand.
these momentary
t gs they would glower
o usly at each other,
d behind backs as u in dread of being asked to shake. And their trainers would whisper hoarsely to the correspondents the details of a purely hypothetical feud between the two which made each yearn for the heart's blood of the other. Reddall was present at one of those well-rehearsed chance meetings on the road and he thrilled at the deathless hate which blazed from the fighters' eyes.

Reddall knew much about Indians. His knowledge of hold-up men and border ruffians was by no means academic. But this was his first close-up of professional pugilists. It stirred him as the sight of a circus' muffled wagons rolling into town by night stirs a group of goggling small boys.

Busy as he was, he spent many a spare half hour in one or the other of the two training camps. Mouth ajar, he noted the superb muscles of the naked giants as their handlers wrought over them after the morning run. With fists clenched he watched the fighters hammer away at their husky sparring partners. He saw them give and take blows that would have killed a man of Reddall's advanced age and retarded stature. He saw them rip the punching bags to tatters and skip the rope a hundred times and wrestle on the mat and shadow box and play handball—one exercise following another without actual breathing space between. And he saw them emerge from an hour of this as unwearied and buoyant as though they had just risen from sleep. He wondered, and in his shy little soul a hero worship was born. For a year's income he would not have missed his chance of seeing these herculean supermen meet in the stadium arena.

Carefully Reddall studied the two gladiators. He studied them at work. He studied them at rest. He listened with grave eagerness to the large talk of their handlers. He read every word he could find as to their past performances. He was pathetically anxious to form a definite opinion as to the respective merits of the pair, thereby to change his own general admiration to a sharply definite partisanship and to back his belief to the limit of his resources—which was Reddall's way.

It was a petty thing that brought his wavering judgment to a focus and woke in him the blind partisanship he sought. One morning he had gone over to Killian's camp to watch the champion's first hour of daily grind. He found Killian about to set out on a ten-mile jog and walk with his trainer and one of the sparring partners. On his own invitation Reddall joined the hike for a mile or two. He had seen one chance meeting between Killian and Cronin on the road and he yearned for an off chance to witness another.

Despite his sixty years the little editor held his own fairly well during this morning's jog. His short legs were counterbalanced by a wondrous wind and his dryingly stringy muscles were stanch. In the sprints he was left far behind, but always he caught up at the first stretch of walking.

So at the end of the second mile the four were abreast as they mounted a stiff bit of rocky knoll that jutted wartlike out of the surrounding prairie. Reddall started up the stony slope at Killian's side. Fifty feet farther he astounded the champion and the two others by hurling his wizened body against Killian and, by a very clever piece of amateur tackling, throwing the unprepared fighter abruptly to one side.

So sudden was the onset that it knocked Killian clean off his balance and sent him caroming against a bowlder a yard to the left of the path. With a grin at the bantam pioneer's furiously uncalled-for attack Killian wheeled about. He had a vaguely humorous inspiration to take the fresh little oldster over his knee and paddle him. But on the instant, the plan died.

For as he turned he saw Reddall stamping with stolid efficiency on something in the path—something that Killian in one more stride must have stepped on. The thing was a ten-button rattlesnake that had been sunning itself in the narrow hillock trail. Killian took one look at the crushed and wiggling thing. He noted its position in the path. Then he glanced down at his own low canvas running shoes and bare ankles. And he blessed the keen eyesight and the swift presence of mind of the little man who had saved him. His blessing took the antiphonal form of a long-breathed "Hel-l-l!" But it was none the less heartfelt.

Reddall finished stamping the life out of the snake, as though it were a matter of every-day routine. Killian observed the editor's low-cut congress gaiters and saw the rattler had thrown a convulsive fold about the lankily lean shin above one of them. He shuddered and then cast a look of new and abiding admiration on the unconcerned Reddall.

"Y'oughta watch out better where you're treadin'," coolly admonished the snake slayer. "There's a passel of those rattlers hereabouts. And I'm lottin' to win a pile of cash on you next week."

Reddall did not know why he had decided all at once that Killian was the man he meant to back—that Killian now looked to him like an absolutely sure winner. Neither did the immortal M. Perichon realize why he gave his daughter to the swain whose life he had saved rather than to the suitor who had saved Perichon's own life. But it was an infallible human trait that actuated old Reddall. He had rescued Killian from certain injury and from possible death. Wherefore his heart went out to the champion, and he was convinced that Cronin could stand no possible chance against such a Paladin. That very day at the Eagle House bar he backed his opinion at even money for a larger slice of his savings than he could well afford to lose.

(Continued on Page 81)

"Good Day, Gentlemen, an' Remember, if You Think I'm Bluffin' Just Go Ahead an' Call Me"

THE YOUNG IDE

By RUTH MILLER

ILLUSTRATED BY TONY SARG

"WE WANT our Abe should learn to play." As she spoke, the infinitesimal scrap of Semitic motherhood watched me timidly out of soft, worried black eyes set in a face fairly powdered with a myriad of fine lines. She was clothed in the most nondescript of shoddy dresses, and sat lost in the recesses of the chair opposite me, her hands twisting the strap of her weather-beaten hand bag as she explained carefully: "And we want that you should teach him."

"I see." I answered a little absent-mindedly, while Abe stood close to his mother and followed my every move with an intense and unblinking stare.

"You said that he has studied before, didn't you? Then suppose he plays something for me."

And so nine-year-old Abe, not overly clean, black-haired and sloe-eyed like his mother, galvanized into eager trembling-fingered action, played. Any educator who has come in contact with members of his race will tell you that they are either dolts or geniuses—that there is no middle intelligence. Abe, standing there, with all his childish anxiety to please writ large on his small face, was not a dolt by any manner of means.

"I am glad," his mother said sometime later, the words coming with a little rush—"I am glad Abe should have you for a teacher. And I hope he should make a good pupil."

I reassured her, and as she stood hesitating near the door, as the unsophisticated do in making a departure, I suddenly wondered how out of her poverty, her tenement, her sweatshop existence, she had been brought to my particular studio door, and I asked her.

There Was an Air of Absolute Triumph About Her When She Finished. I Could See Plainly That I Was Expected to Burst Into Tears of Rapture

The Frozen-Hearted Mansfield

"I WANTED Abe should learn to play." There was the passion of all her own thwarted desires in her voice. "And I wanted that he should have the best teacher. They told me that here in this building I should find a good teacher. So to-day I make up my mind and take Abe and we come down here."

"But there are other teachers in this building."

"Yes"—her eyes twinkled at me shrewdly—"but I asked the elevator man which should be the best and he sent me to you."

It was irrefutable in her mind. If that resplendent liveried individual vouched for me no other recommendation was necessary. But after all her method was hardly much more haphazard than some of those employed by more enlightened music students in the choosing of a teacher.

There is nothing more noble than the profession of teaching. Someone is always hurriedly making this statement as a belated sheepish appreciation whenever one of the guild may momentarily blot his horizon. Yes, yes—the greatest benefactors of the human race! What is more glorious than to have the rare privilege of taking the mind of a little child and molding it and enriching it with the knowledge, the pure distilled wisdom that has been gathered together by the erudite down the ages; to give to the tiny impressionable soul the essence, the flower of our facet experience and to know that our seemingly infinitesimal efforts are the actual foundation on which our country's learning, culture and art are built; that we are making articulate those who otherwise might be mute inglorious Miltons and all that sort of thing? It's a great idea—this exalting of learning. Lovely—with but one trifling flaw. That flaw consists in the positive aversion that the infant soul, unblemished by crude worldly knowledge, often evinces toward having learning, this higher expression, forced upon it. It often simply won't take to it. It prefers to be mute. It clamors to be a clod. Now there was Mansfield.

Mansfield was the more or less promising offspring of the plutocratic head of an enormous business concern. He was eleven years old, a small, indiscriminately thrown together specimen of the aristocracy of money. He wore socks that exposed to the ribald knobby knees and scrawny pathetic legs; he had a chronic sniffle and a cold blue eye that told the world that he had sounded life to its very depths and found it a hollow thing. He was surrounded by the usual flock of governesses, and his mother—to insure his obedience—was continually poking her head into the room where he was in the clutches of instruction and threatening him with instant immersion in an icy bath if he did not pay attention and get his lessons.

I have worked an hour with that boy and h to the point where he was almost human a his mother come in with her eternal thr undo all my drudging effort. That weird afflicted humanity was literally swampe teachers. There was a lurid scandal that he eve French in his bath. Five days a week during the was only an assistant teacher I journeyed acro some eight or nine miles from my obscure boardin to help this young idea to sprout. His was an desperate attitude toward music.

I battled long and hopefully with the hard shel pidity with which he protected himself from thos clan. It always inflicts painful injury on my vanit in anything, and his hard-boiled imperturbability me on to valiant efforts. I endeavored frantically some spark of interest in his turbid breast by stress faithful old stand-by—the human-interest note. the stories I could remember of those master genit made the famous violins which bring such huge day. I never made a point about his lessons that illustrate with some anecdote. Being young a cent, I took to heart all the fool theories originated indifferent or merely stupid people about this ma method appealing to the child's interest in any gi ject. I put music up to Mansfield as a sporting pro and my sole reward was numerous ill-concealed si the small martyr. But I was not going to be down eleven-year-old boy with a sniffle, so I assumed a l overwhelming enthusiasm and slaved on with hi trated and explained and then explained some m my tongue raveled out about the edges.

The Story of the Messiah Strad

ONE day I almost got a rise. To drive some point I'm sure I've forgotten what—I was relating cient yarn anent the violin known as the Messiah St day was hot and I was not worrying myself about t descriptive touches with which I generally emb my story. I was telling apathetically about the l who bought the entire contents of Stradivarius' s the heirs and took them piece by piece to Paris, more ordinary and then the more perfect and exq struments, always telling them of a marvelous vi most beautiful of all instruments, with which h amaze them one day. I related how the little Jew so enamored with this perfect violin that he could himself to the point of parting with it.

When I came to the part of my story where t sians had become disgusted with his continual bra this wonder instrument and had begun to call it siah because it never came, I noticed Mansfield, been standing by a window staring out dully a sweep of lawn, straighten and an eager brightn into his eyes. Excited, I warmed to my subject. myself from my lassitude and wound up with an o flourish and then waited hopefully for the first t pression of the so-called childish mind.

I didn't wait long. Mansfield turned to me wit flush high up on his cheeks. "I wish you'd lo there," he exclaimed tartl ing out of the window graveled drive below.

I did so. All I saw wa little runabout paused b

(Continued on Page

They Made of Him a Typical Infant Prodigy, Velvet-Suited and Spindle-Legged, and Dragged Him Hither and Yon to Play

LOOKING BACKWARD

Men, Women and Events During Eight Decades of American History—By Henry Watterson

DECORATION BY JAMES M. PRESTON

I Associated Press sent me on another fool's errand lsides that of going to Washington to get an act of Congress copyrighting the news of the association.
vs in conjunction with Col. A. K. McClure and Mr.
l Emory Smith the chairmanship of a committee ined and directed to seek a contribution from Andrew ee toward the building of a home for disabled jour-tive aimed to establish in Colorado. We had about (cash in hand. We required half a million.
y olleagues promptly dropped out and left me the told. Perhaps it was for the reason that they knew P sburgh ironmaster better than I did and foresaw ul prove an empty bag. Nevertheless, having myself ant acquaintance with Mr. Carnegie I undertook t ness with cheerful alacrity, confident of success. It seem to me possible that the man who was donating o to libraries all over the country could resist a a appeal so cogent and just. I do not see now how ic But he did.
' Carnegie," I said, "no man owes more than you o e newspapers. They have been universally friendly o They have cost you nothing. Nor could there be r ier charity. The press lacks a contingent fund for is oled veterans. When one of them falls by the way-his taken to the poorhouse to be thence carted to the yrd unless there be relatives or friends rich enough ride for him and to bury him."
I n not a phee-lan-thropeest," he cried.
n was all I could get out of him. I wrote to him. An t rote back evasively. It was suggested that I go to sl rgh and from that vantage set certain specified cs at work. I did this, but without the least encour-n t. Finally I had to give it up.
Conny Scot was Andrew Carnegie. His abilities were is extraordinary. Untoward wealth had marked him down. A new and cheapened process for the making d found him in the iron saddle at iron headquarters.
He was ready to take the fullest advantage of this, with a Protectionist party in Congress ready and ripe to back him. Thus many moons after, the consumers of the country were annually levied on to pile up the Carnegie millions. He was a canny Scot, glib with aphorisms addressed to poor men and meant to soothe them into acquiescence.

No one man, no isolated business house or institution could by normal means earn in profits the stupendous sum of money which Andrew Carnegie amassed before he was fifty years of age; and though he declared that he proposed to give it all away and die a poor man, since no rich man durst go with his millions into the presence of his God, he actually died one of the two or three richest men in the world. I doubt whether his benefactions took more than his income. They certainly did not sensibly reduce his principal.

They were mainly devoted to public libraries. His education had been limited, and having a literary turn he put a disproportioned estimate upon the value of books. He was truly not a phee-lan-thropeest. If he had possessed any depth of feeling or even any breadth of vision he would have contributed the money asked of him to a home for superannuated journalists, commending himself to the good will of a grateful body of men, for he was a vain man, proud of display and eager for notoriety. After his refusal I could never bring myself to feel other than aversion toward him and I dropped the acquaintance, never seeing him again. Charles Emory Smith and Alexander K. McClure knew what they were about when they declined to act as members of the committee of the Associated Press, charged with a duty so idle and thankless.

II

THE American newspaper has had, even in my time, three separate and distinct epochs: The thick-and-thin, more or less servile party organ; the personal, one-man-controlled, rather blatant and would-be independent; and the timorous, corporation or family owned billboard of such news as the ever-increasing censorship of a constantly centralizing Federal Government will allow.

This latter appears to be its present state. Neither its individuality nor its self-exploitation, scarcely its grandiose pretension, remains. There continues to be printed in large type an amount of shallow stuff that would not be missed if it were omitted altogether. But except as a bulletin of yesterday's doings, limited, the daily newspaper counts for little, the single advantage of the editor, in case there is an editor—that is, one clothed with supervising authority who edits—being that he reaches the public with his lucubrations first. The sanctity that once hedged the editorial "we" has long since departed.

The editor dies, even as the actor. He literally leaves no copy. Editorial reputations have been as ephemeral as the publications which gave them contemporary importance. Without going so far back as the Freneaus and the Callenders, who recalls the names of Mordecai Manuel Noah, of Edwin Croswell and of James Watson Webb? In their day and generation they were influential and distinguished journalists. There are dozens of other names once famous but now forgotten: George Wilkins Kendall; Gerard Hallock; Erastus Brooks; Alexander Bullitt; Barnwell Rhett; Morton McMichael; George William Childs, even Thomas Ritchie, Duff Green and Amos Kendall. "Gales and Seaton" sounds like a trade-mark; but it stood for not a little in the national capital, where newspaper vassalage and the public printing went hand in hand.

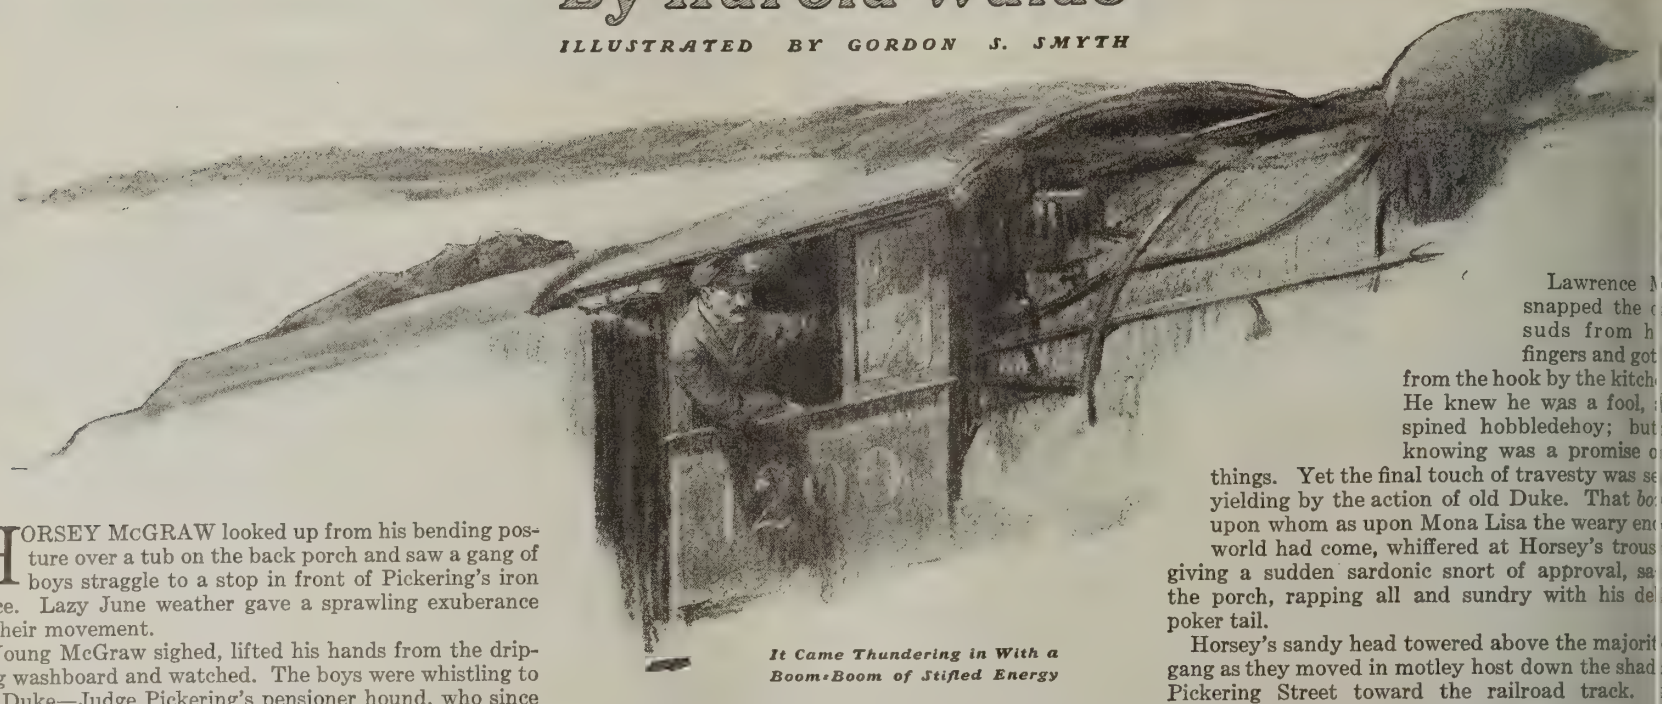
At the outset the duello flourished. There were frequent affairs of honor—notably about Richmond in Virginia and Charleston in South Carolina—sometimes fatal meetings, as in the case of John H. Pleasants and one of the sons of Thomas Ritchie, in which Pleasants was killed; and the yet more celebrated affair between Graves, of Kentucky, and Cilley, of Maine, in which Cilley was killed,

(Continued on Page 149)

OLD TWELVE HUNDRE

By Harold Waldo

ILLUSTRATED BY GORDON S. SMYTH



It Came Thundering in With a Boom-Boom of Stifled Energy

HORSEY McGRAW looked up from his bending posture over a tub on the back porch and saw a gang of boys straggle to a stop in front of Pickering's iron fence. Lazy June weather gave a sprawling exuberance to their movement.

Young McGraw sighed, lifted his hands from the dripping washboard and watched. The boys were whistling to old Duke—Judge Pickering's pensioner hound, who since his hunting days were over had turned to new pursuits and the pawky devices of a town clown. His slopping ears, red eyes and dewlap chin seemed raking round in a buffoonery of mock dejection as he sagged across the yard to greet the boys.

He snuffed negligently at one and another of those twelve and fourteen year old ruffians.

"Heah! quit yoh whifferin' at me, dawg!" whined the darkey boy, Yance Rose.

"He wants a piece of tobacco, Yance," said Bagley McIntyre. It was nothing less than truth that Duke bore among the boys the sad reputation of being a chewing man.

He came to terms with them at length and was helped over the fence, floundering good-naturedly and slapping his large nonskid red-rubber paws on convenient shoulders, ears and faces. Lurching to the walk, he shook himself and sagged out in the van of the three other dogs like a debilitated city alderman just back from French Lick.

Suddenly a piercing whistle tore across the street—and Horsey McGraw felt himself discovered. He trembled with disgust. One of those flashing intuitions that sometimes stormed his adolescent brain leaped to him now. Just as they had collected Duke, they would now in the same wanton humor gather him in—another old hound! An intuition that held the presage of a better future for him, had he but known it. For the present he was caught doing out the family washing—his own and his father's—that stern U. P. minister of predestined grimness.

"Hello, Horsey!"

"Hey, McGraw! Come on down t' the gravel pit!"

"What ya doin', Horsey? Washin'? A-aw, Horsey!"

"Quit it!"

With a gesture young Bagley McIntyre repressed the gang and swung through the side gate that led to the back porch, connected in train with the green-latticed well house. Everything was severely well kept in the McGraw premises; but there was no sign of a woman's touch—nothing frilly at the windows, no trifling beds of sweet Mary or myrtle hanging baskets. The smell of soggy woolen in the tub greeted Bag McIntyre's nostrils.

A masterful chap, this Bag. He stood staring young McGraw out of countenance with his cool-eyed northern exposure, while his square southern exposure held the riotous gang in abeyance, as the lictor's mace once quelled the Roman Senate. His aggressive blue gaze threw the rebellious Horsey into a hypnotic state.

Such a reputation as Bag's is built on grim subtlety and finesse. For instance, in a clique where it was distinction to carry a watch of any running sort, Bag carried one of gold with unctuous tracery upon it that his engineer father had given him—a railroad man's watch. And he never by any dreary fatality said "quarter to twelve," but uttered the time cryptically—"eleven-forty-five." In fact he could instantaneously pull out his watch—always riffled with mighty railroad-looking dirt—and translate the moment with snappy ease: "Three-eighteen, seven-twenty-seven, eight-forty-five or nine-point-nineteen" without a hitch.

It can be seen then what Horsey had to face—bitter as he was at being tolled along for a gawky butt to deck their holiday.

"Are you comin', Mac?" said Bag casually. There was subtle compliment in the title Mac in place of Horsey—Mac, which McIntyre's own intimates called him when most deferential. And the casualness of the question was perfectly calculated. It was in truth the very ne plus ultra, the very nine-point-nineteen of cool tonality and favor.

Rebellion quaked like jelly in Horsey's soul, and he muttered—as was his wont—the clumsiest, the unluckiest excuse at hand:

"I—I got to finish on my father's socks."

The gang burst into cruel uproar.

"Father's socks! Ho, ho, ho!

"Aw, Horsey! Say, Horsey, are they red like those big things on the line?"

"Aw, say, Horsey! I bet they ought to be buried instead of washed, heh?"

"Say, George Ockabok at the power house let me burn up Lily Woodard's dead cat in the furnace—mebbe we could get him to let us ——"

"I'll bet mebbe you don't sell the water to the Chiny gardens."

Bag McIntyre turned on them, frowning, and said briefly, "G'arn!"

When Bag said "G'wan" it was a temporary injunction, but his gritty "G'arn!" was a permanent injunction laid to run until vacated by the higher courts. The wanton humor of the gang abated. Yance Rose had edged near and stood looking over the edge of the tub as if taking a dismal professional interest in the washing. Yance carted washings for his mother on a device as complicated as a traction engine crossed with a well drill.

Bagley protested hoarsely and incredulously:

"You don't want to see old 1200 come in?" As if Horsey were guilty of lese majesty to the great gravel-pit mogul.

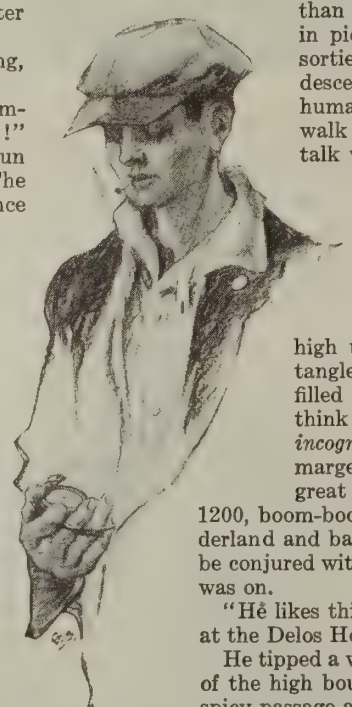
"I didn't know she'd come back," said Horsey feebly.

"Come back!" demanded Bag. "Where you living? Why, that's what we're goin' down for!"

"Bag is goin' to ride on her if Ted Church is on," yipped one of the smaller boys.

"Don't you s'pose Mac knows that?" Bag threw off crushingly.

This final use of that admirable monosyllable "Mac" prevailed on him, and Horsey muttered, "I guess I'll have to go." And even as he yielded, he knew that the masterful McIntyre wanted him mainly to buttress his royalty about with another hulking presence among his jesters, wastrel dogs and buffoons. "Of course you want a smell of old 12 goose eggs!" said Bag with tender and caressing verve in his admirable hoarse voice.



In a Clique Where it Was Distinction to Carry a Watch of Any Running Sort, Bag Carried a Railroad Man's

Lawrence M snapped the suds from h fingers and got from the hook by the kitch
He knew he was a fool, spined hobbledehoy; but knowing was a promise o things. Yet the final touch of travesty was se yielding by the action of old Duke. That bo upon whom as upon Mona Lisa the weary en world had come, whiffered at Horsey's trous giving a sudden sardonic snort of approval, sa the porch, rapping all and sundry with his de poker tail.

Horsey's sandy head towered above the majorit gang as they moved in motley host down the shad Pickering Street toward the railroad track.
straightened himself he would have risen above eve McIntyre, but he walked with a stooping carriag furtively. In fact since a tiny chap he had gone bling fear of his father. That grim Calvinist Horsey in such submission that the boy's cowe even become hateful to the man—an accusatio angered him and led to further grimness. So th circle completed itself. Lawrence remembered hi as a wistful woman who had set a precedent for only too easy to follow. Once only he had rebelle a piano moving in which his leathery young stre discovered itself—but the next morning his fa invaded his bedroom early and roused him for a t
The humiliation of his skimpy nightdress had un his morale.

At a horrible disadvantage, he had suffered t sucker to whine savagely round his bare legs—back to bed in a heap of scorching chagrin.

Now he had no sooner left the hou than a cringing wonder about his pu in pickle came to sap the first elatio sortie and his pleasure in Bag McInty descension. For from some whim of humanity the magerful Bag had el walk with Horsey and make flatter talk with him.

"My dad just told me last we dozen goose eggs would be back. to see Ted on. If he is I'll go f run up to Port Huron this aft.
to-morrah early."

Horsey caught his breath i ecstasy. The very picture of Po high up on the bright-colored lake—tangle of ports and cities as vague as filled him with a pitiable thrill of del think of Bagley McIntyre's penetrating incognita and reaching at last on the fa marge of lake—just as evening was great shipping haven! And returnin 1200, boom-booming down through the night! derland and back in twenty-four hours! Yet a be conjured with a bluff wave of the hand—if Te was on.

"He likes this run," said McIntyre. "He's g at the Delos House."

He tipped a wink to Horsey, who blushed as if of the high bouquet of forbidden lore. Elevate spicy passage and flattered by Bagley's confiden
he found his teetering legs contriving a firmer g tar path. He made a grunting noise intended for chuckle.

Behind them the posse of boys came chatt shouting, while the dogs with no attempt at tea each seemed intent on a mystic unseen blue print infinite trailings and retracings—here, yonder, b between a boy's legs, along the gutter, under a cat returning catawampous way across the track, a gigantic engineering scheme.

These graphs, which Duke Pickering seemed to intending with the cynical lassitude of a bureau errupted by the approach of a gravel-train of es It ground to a stop by the water tank, and oy scrambled on an empty flat car, clamoring fatous din over the lightering and entraining of gs It took three boys and a straw boss to raise old ot There were shouts of "That's not a way!" And hay dog under the belly firm!" There was all the tcry of a South American mobilization.

IcIntyre and Lawrence McGraw alone remained pound when the train began to get under way for el pits. Horsey had listened entranced to Bag's i the train crew round the sloshing water pipe, ai himself now shrinking with icy vibrations before el delicious prospect—monstrously impending—h must swing onto the swarthy carmine caboose.
n crunk-crunk—the flats drummed onward, sifting ir sprays of gravel. Crunk-crunk-crunk—the flat h dogs and boys, shouting and clamorously happy, dy at a smart clip. Crunkety-crunk-te-crunkety-unk! On came the pirate-dark caboose with its n mountain, face shone
a n the high w The ordeal
nd!
rembling emed to be ling away
im. How
—
take her ng Bagley's ce, and he d slouchily l the on-r caboose.
y concenll his facul-watching. It oe of those rs when his ted keenly, ny, as with a light. He e looseored hunch
ng of Bag—ouched his
d simitatively.
h instant——
g face grinned
om the plat-n ncouragbut malic-
y. It was that ni tinge in the tlt touched off
es charge of y He caught in quadrant sjang into the
it a twirl. For l instant he e flying. Then nlegs clattered bang against sps, and the d Bag caught
ar—friendly touch and friendly smile, for Horsey oved up in the emergency. That malicious grin sd: "Do it if you dast, old Horsey, you, but I oiyou dassent!"
nnow he had done it!
il dream of dreams—Lawrence McGraw, jumper of h! And Bag was his friend and pal! Bag—with roroad man's watch crusted with pure railroad —ho uttered the nine-point-nineteen of snappy and r time.
hrush of fresh wind, the mellow humming of a man eountain, the backward-rolling sky—these brought se to the brink of exultant tears. He had a gentle ept for the small chaps on the flat car ahead, for e as something ineradicably gentle in Horsey's slack-te nature.
h passed through the dark arcanum of the caboose, i bunks, its goblin green and ruby eyed lanterns, its l agazines of railroad amours and derring do, and yl over the windbreak onto the first flat. The train ow humming along right merrily and Horsey had e ouble to keep his feet as he followed the swaying
. He soon learned that to walk rapidly and sway yvas the secret of safe progress and was elated with al discovery.
as dangerous to look at the fields close by. Far astretched the wavering yellow road of flats like a ating magic carpet. The black engine, so small, ea plume of pitchy murk into the rich sky and rolled il drumming of majestic energy along the magic roadway to his feet. It was exhilarating beyond anything he had ever known.

They approached the toylike group of dogs and boys on their flat. In that distant symphony Yance Rose's face made an ebony grace note. Only yesterday, and Lawrence McGraw would have considered their position enviable beyond his dreams or daring. And here was he to-day looming infinitely above them. A freight hopper and a man of the railroad world!

It was wonderful—all there was to it! And he sucked in his lips a little sternly.

The boys looked up in curious-eyed submission.

"I thought Horsey was gone," said young Smitty.

"I didn't know he'd a-ever have jumped," shouted Floyd Sossman. "How'd you get him on, Bag?"

"Skunk cats for snakes that don't," said young McIntyre, folding his arms à la Napoleon and adding scornfully: "He sprung it—just like me—young squarehead! What you think he's got those long legs for?" He grinned at Horsey and asked casually, "How tall are you, Mac?"

Suddenly a Piercing Whistle Tore Across the Street—and Horsey McGraw Felt Himself Discovered

Lawrence straightened his shoulders, taking care to shift his feet continually as he noticed Bag did, to keep a good poise.

"Five-ten, I guess."

Bag nodded as if five-ten was precisely to his satisfaction and not one fraction more, and spat with shuttling fluency at the flying bank, where ironweed, burdock and toadflax tilted dreamily in the wind. He began whistling Casey Jones between his teeth; and the small boys took it up, singing shrilly those grandiose epic lines:

He mounted to the cabin
With the orders in his hand.

And when they came to those raffish words, "You've got another Poppa on the Salt Lake Line," Bag grinned at Horsey and observed bluffly: "I s'pose Ted's got some others besides his girl at the Delos House!"

"I s'pose so," said Horsey huskily, grinning with a sense of shamefaced connivance.

But he didn't blush this time. It was wonderful how a fellow caught the bluff manly tone about these things. Cautiously he brought his arms up from his sides, shuffling gingerly, and folded them à la Napoleon.

Like a great amber-colored lake swimming in blue haze the gravel pits spread out to the north. The train slowed down, the boys disembarked and trailed off to the bench where the big Bucyrus shovel snorted, Yance Rose bringing up the tail like a dingy caboose—with his dog, Alice, in his arms. The little wench couldn't walk on the gravel without wincing.

With Bagley McIntyre at their head no one attempted to dispute their progress. It was with a new and proud feeling of self-possession that lanky Lawrence plunged on beside him. He had forgotten his trepidation over the avenging spirit of his father; and then Bag learned that old 1200 would be an hour late.

"That'll be about noon," he said, consulting his watch.

"Gosh!" said Horsey, flooded by sudden apprehension. "I got to be gettin' back already!"

"Back!" snorted young McIntyre. "What's your —— hurry! But go on—if you don't want to see the old road hog!"

His grim take-it-or-leave-it counsel prevailed over Horsey's weakness, and he was a dripping, mud-spattered spectacle for the derisive gods when at last the far-away shimmer of sound told of the royal monster's approach through the blue-and-gold morning. In brief, he and Bag had chosen sides for a water fight in the pit pond, conducted with splatter boards, and Horsey had covered himself—inevitably—with more mud than glory. The evil fortune that served him had again the upper grip. What a shape was he in now to approach the great Ted Church, to say nothing of his father!

"That's her!" sang Bag.

"Are you sure?" queried Lawrence weakly.

"Sure? O' course! She's the only hog round here with a Crosby chimer! Can't you hear?"

Far off the chime whistle pealed again like a sonorous harp and trumpet in one. Old 1200!—beyond a doubt. They scrambled out of the pit from bench to bench. Horsey's clothes slunk limply about him. A wet, miserable, apprehensive figure, he had lost the morning's esprit and was again the butt of catch-as-catch-can ridicule. The excitement of the ponderous arrival of 1200 relieved him momentarily.

It came thundering in with a boom-boom of stifled energy. Far to the rear stretched its yellow ribbon of flats and dwindling toy caboose lost in an azure as of burning bushes. Heaving one monstrous sigh, it settled down to the steady click-click of its air pump and Bagley Mac with a shout of recognition began scaling the fortresslike steps to the toplofty cabin.

There leaned the god out of the machine—a gaunt brown face enameled with sweat and grease and grinning with the muscles that clamped his boot-toe chin and vulture's nose together. He removed his black skimpy cap, which carried all the grandeur of an epic helmet in Horsey's eyes, and slapped young McIntyre on the shoulder. This it meant to be the son of a division supe—and a real railroad man in embryo. Horsey noted flashingly that Bag's nose was already starting out from his face like that promontory of Ted's. He actually called that grizzled god Ted. And Church in turn greeted Bag as Young Hoghead—as though he were already the master of a road hog like 1200.

For a moment or two their grave intimate talk was too low to be heard. They seemed to be communing in the mysteries of the craft. The grandiose ægis of the cab spread above them. Then Horsey hazily heard Bag murmur the name of Stella. A smile touched Church's gaunt face, flashing across it with grim tenderness.

They descended from the cab—like Publius Veturius and train from his royal house above the Forum. And Ted Church addressed the admiring mob: "Nice old Baldwin apple, ain't she though? Apple of the old man's eye."

"Where does Stella come in?" Bag grinned.

Again that smile lit the great man's face.

(Continued on Page 86)

DAUGHTERS OF RUSSI

By Princess Cantacuzène, Countess Spéransky, née Grant

DOWN through the centuries the Russian woman's life has always been in part an Oriental one. The country has been a meeting ground of the East and the West, and until great Peter's time our women's rôle was mainly in the terem, and they took no part in outside or social life. There were exceptions to the rule, of course. Olga, grandmother of Saint Vladimir of Kieff, about the year 955 A. D., went on a trip to Byzantium and brought back to her home country its first knowledge of Christianity, which she had accepted. Later, in 1469, a Byzantine princess came to Moscow as wife of the Czar Ivan III, and she brought with her scholars, scientists and artists. This Czarina, Sophia, was the center of Russia's intellectual life while her husband's reign lasted. Martha of Novgorod led a rebellion against Ivan the Terrible.

A few other names of women also appear in Russian history, but generally speaking all women lived tranquilly, behind closed doors and trellised windows, till the end of the seventeenth century. In the Kremlin palace at Moscow the ancient czarinas' apartment still exists—unless the Bolsheviki have destroyed it—arranged as it was in olden times. The rooms are low and vaulted, with deep small windows placed high up in the walls, from which one can look down on the great square below. There are vast colored stoves of valuable faïence and great splendor of decoration on lines recalling the Far East. The walls are colored much as Persian carpets usually are, with dark brilliant contrasts. Dull gold and silver keep up this impression, as the eye wanders to heavy wrought-metal chandeliers, candlesticks and icons, and to the nail-studded chests for jewels and for clothes which stand about. One can visualize with a little imagination the rich beauties of ancient days dressed in heavy velvets and brocades or in soft silks and cashmeres brought from India and China, sitting about at embroidery frames or doing other fragile work with lazy fingers, to pass the long hours away. They had slaves to do their bidding, also dancers, minstrels and dwarfs to keep them amused, and the Great White Czar frequently visited them; but even so there must have been many a day when bondage weighed heavily; and they all faded young. Some women intrigued in politics through their influence over a powerful husband or a son but in most respects the wives of great boyars—nobles—resembled our czarinas in their futility.

An Emperor in Petticoats

PETER the Great changed this, as he did much else in Russia. He ordered the women out of their retirement, and from national dress into French clothes. He gave Western fêtes at court; and he made everyone take part in his own boisterous fun. His wife, Catharine, a daughter of the people, was made his constant companion; went with him to his wars, and took a share in the work and play of his stirring life at home. When he died it was to her he left his crown; and she reigned for some years, Russia's first empress in fact as well as in name. After her there was a series of them: Ann, the daughter of Peter's elder brother, who was fat and vague, left no impression on our history; Elizabeth, Peter's own daughter, followed; and showed much of her father's temperament, doing a great deal that was fine and constructive in spite of her dissolute life. Last, but not least, greatest and most magnificent of all our sovereigns, the second Catharine reigned and was called emperor. Intellectual, virile, friend of half the philosophers of her epoch, her own letters unconsciously testify to her high instruction, broad cultivation and to the vast range of her interests. Past master of diplomacy, she kept all Europe amazed at her feet; and by her military campaigns she added province after province to her domains. She led in her court's gayety; invited artists, writers, players, soldiers, architects, musicians and scientists to her capital. She gave Russia its finest collections, palaces and public buildings; decorated its towns with monuments and parks; founded industries, planned cities, made a code of laws, which were a wonder of the times.

PHOTOS BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

Catharine the Great. Above—Grand Duke Michael of Russia (a Cousin of the Czar) and His Three Children

She created a university which is still the greatest in Russia and founded the Academy of Fine Arts, which even now, until the revolution, ranked among the first in Europe. She chose for her ministers, admirals and generals the most brilliant men of her empire, whether they were princes or peasants; and kept them in their places if she thought they served the country well, even when they dared to cross her own autocratic will. Her wars and her voyages, her fêtes and her loves were many; and in her one existence she lived, twenty times over, the works, deeds and emotions of an ordinary man. She reconstructed Russia, and put it in touch with the outside world; and in spite of certain faults her brains and high aims with her glory filled her own contemporaries—as they have posterity since—with admiration. One traveled over Russia a hundred years or more died, and one still found this great personality in thest corners of its provin two capitals, Moscow Petersburg, bore her impr the best they held. One w to admit she was a supe and that her country memory deep gratitude work she expended on it love she gave her peopl she truly understood.

Catharine died in 1796 her time Russia's nation changed little. Our wo needed to hold the place ers that empress had them; and society in a the court at least remai brilliant throughout the n century.

Russian Socie

THE peasant woman' the other hand, was the extremest limit, smal She worked always, and children and much mise regular portion—this e the emancipation of th 1863.

In the upper classes o trary there was an élite highly cultivated and mo tive. St. Petersburg ranked high for its salons a the last five reigns of the Romanoffs. There were sian women who made a great mark for themsel in science or in politics, while many cut a credita as secret diplomatic agents, serving their govern in foreign capitals. Between these two extremes crat and peasant there were the intelligentzia and geoise. The first class supplied brains of the firs which contributed to the country's development; from their group came our nihilists and other und over-excited types. Those of the second categ quiet sheltered lives, and did little except to care and families, read romances, eat sweets and tall they who kept the tradition of the terem alive to extent. They grew fat early in life, and had neither nor energy to shine. Whether in society or in thei home duties they seemed always gentle, placid uninterested in all that occurred outside. morally and materially they depended entirely men to keep them going.

When I reached Russia, in 1899, I found the Petersburg absorbing; and the women about me and strange in type, and exceedingly interestin husband's family everyone was most cosmopolit had no typical impressions there at all. My moth was French, and underscored the value of her ow all occasions. She spent much of her time in kept her frame of life on foreign lines. She had b her only daughter at home and taken her abro French governess for the last polishing instruct necessarily turned elsewhere than to our family real Russian experiences. I noticed at once th vim and intense capacity for pleasure of St. P society, where the extraordinary wit and qui repartee, the immense culture, the knowledge of languages and the large variety of subjects discu most striking. Conversations betrayed all th sciously, and there was not the slightest pose. Th kindliness too not usually seen in social gathe where, with a generosity toward one another stranger in their midst, which never failed. beautiful—and there were many handsome wome the attitude of professional beauties.

Those who were rich wore Paris clothes with fi and had palaces where they gave balls and othe fêtes. They brought carloads of fresh flowers south of France for their cotillons, and fruits Caucasus for their supper tables, in spite of ther at thirty below zero. On the other hand those poor were dressed by a seamstress at home, ornaments and lived in a flat; but they asked th to quiet evenings of music or of bridge, simpl them a cup of tea.

Jetnever was a difference made between the rich te and the poor; each could have and keep her re and her friends. All society would gladly go to the te's party, then to that of the other, showing an alpirit of pleasure. It seemed as if nothing counted, no a place in St. Petersburg's charmed circle, save lligence, breeding, good taste and a generally agree- ne; with beauty as a secondary advantage. If i ck befell anyone of the small smart set all her clan icl, while if a sorrow came they wept and prayed ter in simplest good feeling, each taking part in her r trouble.

neral these women seemed to me quite different ny I had known before, both in mentality and in s At first I could judge only their superficial aspects, I was struck immediately by their easy-going un- ways. No fuss was made in welcoming a ner. They had no party manners, but went on t with the general conversation, letting me sit k join in whenever I felt like it. Rather casual ere, and some foreigners called them indiffer- ut it was hardly that and it seemed to me only f frankness. One began to feel at home while the ogressed, as if they took one's personality and dents for granted. One was soon cordially ac- e, and then gradually brought into an intimacy wn elsewhere, made of close camaraderie and hension, with a complete lack of criticism.

I Set Without Feuds or Jealousies

NE I had indicated that I held certain broad prin- les in common with them, wide latitude was w toward individual tastes and ways. No con- was ever demanded from my opinions, which eistened to with amiability and ready interest. t a dinner table I found there were always so varying views held on each subject that came up t ie talk was most original and animated, and gen- very amusing. During the season night after h we all sat up till morning; for balls worthy of me never ended till five or six o'clock, and seven eit was the more frequent bedtime hour; yet no oked fagged or seemed dull or ever wanted to lme. A very marked fact struck me: No two tses ever gave parties the same evening. There s lways a little talk and arranging so everyone l enjoy each pleasure as it came, and there were parent rival- feuds.

The court balls wonderful—six re given in the s with the most gificent palace Europe for background. It only Russian who could a party of thousand peo- h a ballroom hut crowding guests, and who l seat this many per in another g hall. The im- flowers and palms, the the music and e niforms were perfect they hard to outdo. women man- e to shine, how- e in all the light splendor of the . I discovered e marked type ooks among e. Blondes with alinavian blood, e ancestors had into the coun- with Rurik and siking brothers; ettes with Ori- blood handed by Tartar an- rs; tall and , fat and thin— were. Well as a rule, they d healthy but thletic. Rarely but generally cheerful com- , I found my new compatriots especially interesting and attractive in expression. It was as if with a top layer of simplicity there burned beneath the surface vast possibilities of temperament and emotion, of strength and energy, and of serious brain power as well. They never had had to do anything, as they came down developing through the ages; yet were it necessary these souls could and would make good, one felt.

There was a world of sympathy and passion, with a capacity for joy and suffering which was intense, and which lurked always in the quiet charming faces of Russia's upper-class women.

By degrees as I became more used to them I noticed all this less; but whenever occasion presented itself the traits above mentioned came to the surface at once and played their part in our life. Through the years my admiration for these women grew as each new turn in our fortunes showed them in a new light. I have never seen greater dignity than my Russian sisters showed when occasionally they were under the stress of strong emotion. Whether in happiness or sorrow their great sincerity of heart, intensity and brave directness brought them up to the sublime; and always they escaped being awkward or melodramatic. One could approve the course they took or not; but one could not help being carried along with them in feeling, whether one wished it or whether one struggled against the current. No Westerner can realize till he has been among them the latent power of the Slav; neither can any Westerner resist the marvel of these rich natures, which are so soft, so strong and always fresh and new, with their treasures of deep sentiment. This overflows in the music, art and literature of our land.

If Russian parties are attractive Russian life gets into the blood and makes all else seem tame; and I have yet to meet a foreigner who having been for a time in the great empire was not full of regret at leaving, and did not long to return.

PHOTOS. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

The Four Daughters of the Russian Emperor. Above—Grand Duchesses Olga and Tatiana

Gorgeous Robes of Ceremony

AT COURT functions, especially those where national dress was worn, the mere sight of the women was unforgetable. They looked like their own ikons, with their high diademlike kakoshniki of seed pearls, set with great barbarous scintillating colored stones. Long lace veils hanging from the kakoshniki, priceless heirlooms for the most part, covered the top and back of head and shoulders so none of the hair showed. An underdress of white satin, hanging straight, embroidered with seed pearls or rich gold and silver, showed down the front of the figure; while the overdress of Renaissance brocade or of embroidered velvet, though décolleté quite off the shoulders in court fashion, had heavy sleeves which hung in panels to the ground, making a straight sweeping line from the shoulder. The train belonging to this overdress was always so long as to be quite hopelessly unmanageable as it swung out upon the floor. Usually heavily trimmed with fur, sable predominating in the room, these trains were embroidered exquisitely by the patient fingers of our cloistered nuns. Old India or Persia furnished patterns. One I remember, of pale rose velvet, was covered with great sheaves of Easter lilies in natural size and color, seemingly bound together with diamond chains; another chef d'œuvre, of soft gray, had a complete peacock represented in all its glory, tail spread out upon the train with the bird's narrow graceful head and body climbing up the wearer's slender waist. The dowagers usually wore rich plain goods which though made in Russia resembled much those of the palmy days of Venice and Genoa in the early fifteenth century.

One rubbed one's eyes, weary from the riot of color and the flash of precious gems. They seemed a dream of fairyland, those fêtes at court, and the classic beauty of the young empress made her a perfect central figure in the gorgeous grouping round her. She had such height and carriage as fitted her for the splendid things she wore, and she loved to deck herself in cloth of gold or silver, studded and trimmed with jewels. She wore more of these than could anyone else, yet she never seemed

(Continued on Page 98)

THE GREAT ACCIDENT

By Ben Ames Williams

ILLUSTRATED BY F. R. GRUGER

XXXIV

WINT CHASE found himself unable to put Hetty Morfee out of his mind. He had overslept, was late for breakfast, and ate it alone with Hetty serving him. When she came into the dining room he said: "Good morning."

Hetty nodded without answering.

And he asked cheerfully: "Well, how's the world this morning?"

She said the world was all right; and she went out into the kitchen again before he could ask her anything more. Wint, over his toast and coffee, wondered. He was beginning to have some suspicion as to what was wrong with Hetty. But—he could not believe it. It wasn't possible. It couldn't be.

A certain burden of work shut down on him that day and the next, so that he forgot her in his own affairs. He saw her every day of course; but they were never alone together. His mother was always about. And there were other matters on Wint's mind. He was glad to be able to forget her. Wint, like most men, was willing to forget a perplexity if forgetting were possible. And Hetty kept out of his way and seemed to resent his interest.

"Don't Do That, Wint! Don't Go Away and Leave Us Again. We Couldn't Ever Stand It"

He met Agnes on the street one morning, and she stopped him and talked with him. She was very gay and vivacious about it, touching his arm in a friendly way now and then to emphasize some meaningless word. Her hand was on his arm thus when he saw Joan coming, a little way off. He did not know that Agnes had seen her some time before, without seeming to do so. Agnes discovered Joan now with a start of surprise, and she took her hand off Wint's arm in a quick furtive way, as though she did not want Joan to see. Yet Joan must have seen. Wint was uncomfortably conscious that he had been put in an awkward light; but he supposed the whole thing was chance, nothing more.

Agnes cried: "Why, Joan! We didn't see you coming."

Her word conveyed, subtly enough, the impression that if they had seen Joan coming matters would have been different; and Wint scowled and looked at Joan and wondered if she was going to be so foolish as to mind.

Then Agnes turned to him and said: "Run along, Wint. I've something to say to Joan."

He looked at Joan, and thought there was pique in her eyes; and he went away in such a mood of sullen resentment as had not possessed him for months. It stayed with him all that day; he became, for the moment, the old, sulky, stubborn Wint who had made all the trouble.

Agnes and Joan walked uptown together; and Agnes chattered gayly enough. Agnes had always a ready tongue but Joan was of a more silent habit. Agnes said Wint had come down to see her a few days before.

"That is, of course," she explained, "he pretended he came to see dad. But he telephoned, and I told him dad wasn't at home, but he came anyway. We sat on the porch and drank lemonade that night, the moon was full. Wasn't it the most beautiful night, Joan? I think Wint's a peach. I always did. I never could see why you and he quarreled. Seems to me you were awfully foolish. I'll never have a fuss with him, I can tell you."

There was too much sincerity in Joan for this sort of thing; she was almost helpless in Agnes' hands—that is, she did not know how to counter the other girl's shafts. She did say, "Wint and I haven't really quarreled. We're very good friends."

Agnes nodded wisely and said, "Oh, I know." She looked up at Joan. "Was it about that Hetty Morfee, Joan? I know it's none of my business, but I can't help wondering. I shouldn't think you'd mind that. Men are that way. I know it doesn't make a bit of difference to me. Not if —— Well, I shan't quarrel with Wint over Hetty, I can tell you."

Joan had turned white. She could not help it; and Agnes saw, and added cheerfully: "Of course you can't believe half you hear anyway. But they do say that she —— No, I'm not going to. I never was one to tell nasty stories about people, Joan."

Joan could not say anything to save her life. She had to get away from Agnes and she managed it as quickly as she could. She was profoundly troubled, profoundly unhappy. She had not realized how much Wint meant to her. The things that Agnes intimated made her physically sick with unhappiness at their very possibility. She finished her errands as quickly as she could and hurried home. On the way she passed Agnes and Jack Routt together, and they spoke to her, and she responded, holding her voice steady. She was miserably hurt and unhappy.

At home she shut herself in her room to think. There was a picture of Wint on her bureau; a snapshot she had taken two or three years before. Wint had changed since then. The pictured face was boyish and round and good-natured; Wint's face now had a strength which this boy in the picture lacked. Wint was a man now, for good or ill.

She had suddenly a surge of loyal certainty that it was for good and not for ill that Wint was become a man. There was an infinite fund of natural loyalty in Joan; she had been prodded by Agnes into a panic of doubt, but when she was alone this panic passed. A slow fire of anger at Agnes began to burn in her; anger because Agnes had meant to injure Wint, not because Agn hurt her. In Wint's behalf she took up she considered Agnes; she questioned th motives, she went over and over the in trying to meaning i

There is stinctive w in woman passes an in man. long day thinking wonderin questionin came ver hitting up whole trut matter. than she She came that befor appeared evening— arranged a two bef come an her—she gun to ha Routt.

She di know wh was so. S never p larly like Routt; ye always cheerful, able com a good Also, h Wint's and Joa loyal to friends as to Wint. that day thought and ag Jack's ey she saw h Agnes. S herself th been something hidden in them, something she co define. She mistrusted him and before Wint cam she hated Routt and feared him.

Nevertheless, she and Wint talked of matters p commonplace for most of that evening together. were apt to talk of commonplace things in thes because safety lay in the commonplace. There strange balance of emotions between Wint and J little thing might have tipped it either way. At tim wished to bring matters to an issue; he wished to to Joan that he loved her. But he was restrain desperate fear that she was not ready to hear him s He was afraid she would cast him out once more; could not bear the thought of that. It was somethi able to see her, talk with her, be near her. He da risk losing this much.

Thus they talked of ordinary matters, till Wint g go at last. Joan went out on the porch with h stopped on one of the steps a little below her. He h good-by before Joan found courage.

She asked, then: "Wint? Will you let me ——? something I want to ask you."

He was surprised; his heart began to pound throat. "To ask me?" he repeated. "Why—a Joan. What is it?"

"Are you and Routt pretty good friends, Wint?

"Yes," he said at once. "Jack's the best friend I

"Are you sure?"

"Of course. What's the idea, Joan?"

She said reluctantly: "I don't know. Only— seem to trust him. I don't like him. I'm afraid of "Good Lord! Jack's harmless; he's a prince."

"I don't think he's as loyal to you as you are t she said.

Wint exclaimed impatiently: "The way you down on a fellow! Jack's all right."

Wint's impatience made Joan quieter and more herself. "I'm not sure," she repeated, and smiled wistfully. "Just—don't trust him too far, Wint."

"d trust him with all I've got," Wint said flatly. "I ir you're—I'm surprised at you, Joan." The stubborn ng roused in the morning when Joan came upon him it Agnes reawoke in Wint. His jaw set.

Jan was troubled; she wanted to say more, but she did ot now how. And she could not forget Hetty. She had ot neant to speak to Wint of Hetty; but Joan was orn enough to be unable to hold her tongue. Also, Vin's loyalty to Routt had angered her; she was willing hrt him—as men and women are always willing to hurt e ing they love.

S said slowly: "Did you know people are beginning to lk bout Hetty Morfee, Wint? You and Hetty?"

Vnt's anger flamed; he flung up his hand disgustedly: Vt women! You're always ready to jump on each h. Why can't this town let Hetty alone?"

"only meant ——" Joan began.

"don't care what you meant," Wint told her. "You g not to pass gossip on, Joan. I hate it."

"don't see why you have to defend her," she protested.

I said hotly: "I'm not defending her. She doesn't e it. If she did I would, though. Hetty's all right."

Jan drew back a little into the shadow of the porch. After a moment she said, "Good night, Wint."

I said harshly: "Good night. And for heaven's sake rt this foolishness! Routt, and Hetty. They're all gl."

Se did not answer.

I said again: "Good night," and he turned and went w to the gate and away.

Jan watched him go. She thought she ought to be ng with him, and hurt. She was surprised to discover a she was rather proud of Wint, instead; proud of him r ing angry, even at her, for the sake of his friend, and r ne sake of Hetty.

Se was troubled, because she thought he was wrong; a he was infinitely proud too, because he had stuck by s uns.

XXXV

TAN'S warning as to Jack Routt, her word as to Hetty, nd Wint's rejection of both warning and advice did not a to a break between them. They met next day; and Wint had the grace to say to her: "I'm sorry I talked as I did yesterday; last night. I was tired, and—all that. I'm sorry."

"It's all right," Joan told him. "It's natural for you to stick by your friends.'

"I needn't have talked so to you though."

She laughed and said he had been all right. "I guess you've been imagining you were worse than you really were," she told him. "It's quite all right, really."

"But I'm sorry you—dislike Jack," he said. "He's an awfully decent sort."

"Is he?" she asked. "Then I'm glad you and he are friends."

"That's the stuff," Wint told her. "That's the way to talk."

Thereafter for a week or so life in Hardiston went quietly. V. R. Kite still bided his time; there was no liquor being sold; Ote Runns went home sober day after day with a look of desperate longing in his eyes. That sodden man who had embraced Wint in the Weaver House so long ago, whom Wint had jailed more than once for his drinking, suffered as much as Ote—or more. He came to Wint and upbraided him for what he had done.

"It ain't the way to treat a fellow," he told Wint, pleading huskily. "You know how it is. I just gotta have a drink, Mister Mayor. I just gotta. I told Mrs. Moody she's gotta give me a drink, and she told me you wouldn't let her. You ain't got a thing against me now, have you?" The miserable man's fingers were twitching, his lips twisted and writhed. "If I don't get a drink I'm a-going to kill somebuddy, I am."

Wint did not know what to do. He could see at a glance that the man was suffering a very real torment. He had himself never become so soaked with alcohol that his system cried out for it when he abstained; but he knew what torture this might be. He had an idea that candy would alleviate the man's distress; but the idea seemed to him ridiculous and he put it aside. Yet there was an obligation upon him to do something.

He did, in the end, a characteristic thing, an impulsive thing; and yet it was sensible too. There was no saving this man. Highest mercy to him was to let him drink himself to death. Wint told him to come to the house that night; and he gave the poor fellow a quart bottle from his father's store. The derelict wandered away, calling Wint blessed. They found him under a tree in the yard next door in the morning, blissfully sleeping.

The story got round, as it was sure to do. The man told it himself; he boasted that Wint was a good fellow. V. R. Kite heard of it and waved his clenched fists and swore at Wint by every saint in the calendar. Also he sent for Jack Routt.

"We've got him!" he cried. "He can't put over a thing like this on me, Routt. I'll not stand for it. I'll run him out of town. Or get out myself. Damn it, Routt, he's a hypocrite. He's a whited sepulcher. I'll ——"

Routt laughed good-naturedly and held up a quieting hand. "Hold on," he said. "We'll have better than this on Wint before long. Good enough so that I—I'll tell you a secret, Kite."

Kite looked suspicious and asked what the secret was; but Routt decided not to tell; not just yet. "Wait till the time comes," he told Kite. "A little later on."

So Kite waited.

Toward the end of June the street carnival came to town for a week's stay. These carnivals are indigenous to such towns as Hardiston. They resemble nothing so much as an aggregation of the added attractions that usually go with a circus, broken loose from the circus and wandering about the country alone. A merry-go-round reared its tent and set up its clanking organ at Main and Pearl Streets. Down the hill below the tent the snake-eating wild man had his lair; and below him again there was an ocean wave. Along Pearl Street in the other direction the museum of freaks and the galaxy of beauty were located. Main Street itself was given over to venders of popcorn, candy, hot dogs, ice-cream sandwiches, lemonade, ginger pop and every other indigestible on the calendar. There also you might for the matter of a nickel have three tries at ringing a cane worth six cents or a knife worth three. Or you might take a chance in the great lottery, where every entrant drew some prize, even if it was only a packet of hairpins. The arts and crafts were represented by a man

(Continued on Page 70)

"Close Up Your Shows. All of You. Your Permit's Canceled. Get Out of Town To-Morrow"

BLACK SHEEP

By WILL PAYNE

ILLUSTRATED BY CLARENCE F. UNDERWOO

VIII

NEVER in his life had Lowell Winthrop faced anything so disagreeable as the disclosures made to him when he sat in Mr. Dinsmore's den the night before and overheard all that passed between the merchant and McMurtry, the blackmailing lawyer. Never had he imagined that he should face anything so disagreeable. For once in his life he had not slept well. His mother noticed it—as an experienced trainer notices that a race horse has mysteriously gone off from perfect form. He laughed pleasantly at her fond solicitude and suggested that possibly he'd taken a slight cold.

All day at the office he wasn't up to the mark—somewhat distrait, nervous, even somewhat irritable, his smooth brow wrinkling now and then in a frown of disapproval. All the time he was waiting for a message that did not come. At dinner he was still waiting for the message and still it did not come.

Instinctively and consciously he was an artist in living—all should be bright, smooth, perfectly ordered. And here was a great muddy, bloody splotch right down in the middle of it! Naturally, he felt a deep exasperation. He was angry because the message did not come—and felt a contempt for Dinsmore for failing to send it. All the same, he had a duty to perform. He hated it more than he had ever hated anything else in his life; but it was a duty—a duty to himself. After dinner therefore he went to the telephone and called Dinsmore up.

"I should like a talk with you. I'll come down now if you can see me," he said. His voice was cool and even, a pleasant voice; but there was a sort of fatefulness in it. There was to be no dodging him.

So that evening the two men met again in Dinsmore's library—Winthrop as before in a perfectly fitting dinner coat, the color of perfect health in his smooth cheeks; but his gray eyes under heavy yellowish eyebrows looked uneasy. Dinsmore, as often happened when he dined at home, was wearing the sack coat and colored shirt of business hours. And Winthrop noticed at once that he didn't seem in his usual vigorous health and spirits—slightly paler and with circles under his eyes. There was, subtly, a reserve in his manner.

"You asked me here last night, you know," Winthrop began a bit nervously when they were seated.

"Yes," Dinsmore replied.

"It was by your invitation that I overheard anything," Winthrop went on. "I wish you to keep that in mind."

"Of course I owe you an apology," said Dinsmore. "I shouldn't have left you that way. I clean forgot it. It was—only toward morning that I remembered about your being here. I knew you would have gone home before then. Sorry."

"Oh, that's no matter," Winthrop assured him—a note of impatience in the polite tone. He touched his short, neat, blond mustache nervously with the tip of a forefinger, hesitated a moment and said, "Of course I expected to hear from you to-day."

That statement seemed mildly to surprise Dinsmore; but he made no answer, simply waiting.

For once Lowell Winthrop was not in perfect form, but obviously nervous. He frowned and even fidgeted a bit; then fairly blurted in uncontainable impatience, "I heard you accused of murder."

"Don't You Mind, Louie! He's a Brute to Treat You That Way! I'll Never Speak to Him Again!"

That also seemed rather to surprise Dinsmore. He knew the fact before, but seemed now to see it from a new angle. He looked deeply perplexed and said "Yes," in a rather toneless voice; then plucked his beard, stifled a sigh and muttered helplessly, "God knows whether that's true!"

"You mean you don't know?" Winthrop demanded incredulously.

Dinsmore rubbed his brows in perplexity and replied earnestly: "It's a long story, Lowell—an old story. I wish I could go over it all with you. But I can't. I'm simply bound to keep my mouth shut."

Winthrop was frowning and seemed interested in the state of his finger nails. After a moment he asked plumply: "Did you send McMurtry the seventy-five thousand dollars you mentioned to him?"

"Yes," Dinsmore replied.

Again a pause, during which Winthrop stirred a bit in his chair.

"It's true, then, that you've been paying somebody money regularly for a good while?"

"Yes," said Dinsmore.

Winthrop folded his hands and contemplated them and presently looked over at Dinsmore.

"If you're in the hands of blackmailers, Dinsmore, I'll do all I know to rid you of them. I'll make it my business."

It was an honorable offer, earnestly made, and Dinsmore was aware that to a man in that situation Winthrop's eminent law firm might be very helpful.

"I know you would, Lowell," he responded warmly. "It good of you to offer. But the is absolutely nothing you cou do."

"Paying blackmail, yo know, is like a drink habit or drug habit," the lawyer urge "The more you do it the hard it is to stop. The only way to make a stand and down it

"I know that," Dinsmo replied. "But—well, I've not ing to stand on. I simply car do it. I've gone over it a tho sand times. I've just got hump my back and pay—f the present." He looked deep disturbed and added, "Sor day, no doubt, I can tell y all about it. But not no My mouth is shut."

The silence then was long than any preceding one a Winthrop found it necessary clear his throat of a slight hus ness before speaking, but wh he spoke his voice was perfec steady:

"Of course it is treme dously important to me. Is pose the dinner invitations w sent out yesterday?"

Dinsmore evidently did understand the relevance, a looked a blank question.

"The engagement is to formally announced then, y know," Winthrop remind him, looking at the grate.

Slowly an astonishing id dawned upon Dinsmore's mi The astonishment held him some time as he looked ove his perfectly groomed cal Finally he asked in a slow a controlled voice:

"You mean that—what y overheard last night wo make a difference about y engagement to Louise?"

"Decidedly," Winthrop plied, and even looked Di more firmly in the face. T his eyes fell and he said w some emotion: "I wish hear this had not come up until a the marriage. I would h accepted it then as a fact complished. But it has co up. We've got to deal with

"I see—it has come u Dinsmore muttered after little while.

"It has come up," Winthrop repeated firmly. lowered his voice further, looking Dinsmore in the f "You are accused of murder—a very shocking murder it happens. You are paying blackmail to the accus You say you must continue it—you can't make a st against them. Would you expect me to overlook that?

Dinsmore moved in his chair and plucked at his be his eyes avoiding the other man's.

"I hadn't thought of it in that way," he said. "T hadn't occurred to me." He gave a flickering smile added, "No one has accused my daughter of murder."

That suggested the romantic idea of marriage as noth but a love affair between a young man and a yo woman—an idea for which Lowell Winthrop had m contempt.

"Well, look at it!" he suggested. "Things of that have a way of coming to light. I gather that you've b paying somebody to keep still for a good while. somebody else has got wind of the affair. Other people on your back demanding hush money. I told you Murtry was a blackleg. He'll bleed you white and t probably betray you too. Lord help anybody who depend on him for each day's security! Say we're mar and this thing comes out. You can see the mess. It i myself, Dinsmore—not myself alone. You're too sens to think that. I owe something to my family. My me are their messes. You know well enough what I w

(Continued on Page 32)

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF CAMPBELL'S SOUPS

Good to the very last bean!

You will pronounce the last bean on the plate as good as the first! You do not tire of Campbell's. This is because we use the best hand-picked beans and lean bacon pork. With these is blended a full-flavored tomato sauce made from delicious red, ripe tomatoes. Every bean is tender and digestible, the result of our long, slow cooking. Healthful; delightful; convenient. Order Campbell's today!

One size — 15c a Can — One kind

Except west of Mississippi River and in Canada

Campbells' BEANS

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

(Continued from Page 30)

have let them in for. I owe something to my children. People in our position—the grandfather is one of the child's conditions. I wish heartily it hadn't come up until after our marriage. But it has come up. I've got to meet it."

Whenever he fixed his thought on Louise—beautiful Louise, charming Louise—he really did wish heartily that it hadn't come up until after their marriage. But he wasn't always thinking of Louise. Frequently he was thinking of himself, and then his thought was, "In any event, thank God, I got hold of this in time to smoke it out before it was everlastingly too late!"

Fastidious to extreme in all his tastes, any such mess as this affair foreshadowed was simply intolerable to him. He hadn't remained a bachelor so long, in spite of many temptations, in order to wed a ghastly murder. That would harrow him up in the most unbearable fashion. A beautiful wife, and her father hanged, or as good as hanged. The idea fairly sickened him. And always there had been a sort of reluctance in his mind; giving up his comfortable bachelorhood was quite a sacrifice.

"I hadn't thought of it in that way," Dinsmore repeated mechanically.

He was looking at his caller with curiosity, as though finding a new man in him. He knew all about Lowell Winthrop's fastidiousness and formalness; knew he had a very high idea of family—especially his own family. Yet it had been his unformulated, taken-for-granted notion that if a peril confronted his daughter—the peril, say, of disgrace to her father—this young man would be the first to leap to her side, ready to spend his last breath defending her. But in his peril, it seemed, the young man's idea was to scuttle out of harm's way as quickly as possible.

Winthrop addressed him again very earnestly: "I'm ready to do all I know, Dinsmore, to help you out of this. I believe that's the only way. Finally you've got to fight it out with them. If you wish to do that now I'm at your disposal absolutely."

His new idea of this young man prompted Dinsmore to suggest, "But if I did that, most likely there'd be a mess as you term it—a scandal. I might be indicted—a trial. All that would take time. What I'm thinking of, you see, is your affair with Louise. Making a stand would take time. I believe the invitations were sent out yesterday."

Winthrop paused for deliberation. It was a painfully disagreeable point. Looking at the grate he replied under his breath: "All I can say is—unless you can give me a different idea of the situation from what you have given me—the invitations should be recalled. What happened later on—we could only wait and see."

So it was as Dinsmore had suspected. The urgent advice to resist the blackmailers was the advice simply of the conscientious attorney who was warning his client against an unprofitable course of conduct. As to the intimate personal relationship of prospective son-in-law, Mr. Lowell Winthrop proposed to keep his skirts clear until he was assured that Dinsmore was such a person as he could accept for grandfather to his children.

A smile so faint that Winthrop missed it played behind Dinsmore's beard.

"As I get your point of view, probably the only thing is to recall the invitations," he said dryly.

"I think so," Winthrop murmured—with conviction. It was a very painful thing to him. A mental picture of Louise intrigued his heart at that moment. "I think we should wait. In time—it may be different," he added lamely.

There was a moment's silence. Then Dinsmore said, "You will tell Louise?"

"I think you should tell her," Winthrop replied. "It would be difficult for me to tell her without telling more than I have a right to." After a little pause he added, "I must trust to you to make it fair to me."

And Dinsmore was faintly amused at this appeal to the honor and chivalry of a murderer. A moment later he perceived that Winthrop was perhaps not entirely relying on those qualities in him, for the young man observed in what might have been a significant way:

"Of course I shall see her myself later." Which was another indication of how absolutely sure of himself Winthrop felt.

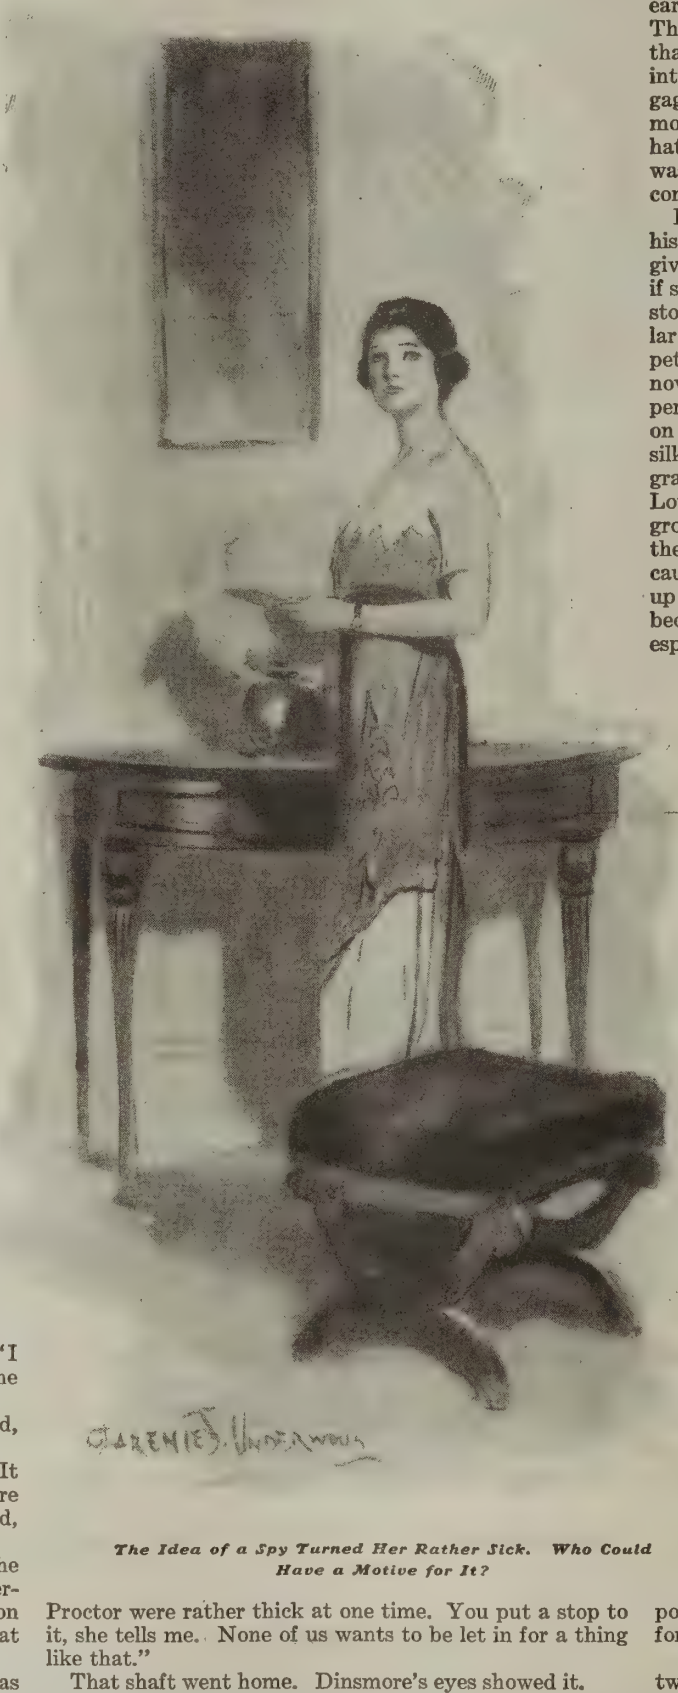
"Well—there seems to be nothing more at present," said Dinsmore.

"No," Winthrop replied.

The two men stood up and there was a certain amazement in Dinsmore's mind as he looked at his caller. The interview had occupied half an hour or so. They had been sitting within ten feet of each other. Yet he now saw Winthrop as though they had been separated by many years and long distances—fairly as though he had just returned from a couple of decades in the Orient. The man looked different. His yellowish eyebrows were thicker, he was heavier, there were marks of age upon him hitherto unperceived.

In a lesser way Lowell Winthrop felt this wide alienation. Practically breaking one's engagement to a gentleman's daughter must involve considerable alienation. It had been intensely disagreeable. He hadn't a doubt that he had acted correctly, yet it was all excessively unsatisfactory.

"I think you can appreciate my point of view," he said as they stood—his nicely modulated voice pitched low and his eyes downcast. "Just put yourself in my place." He looked up at Dinsmore. "You know Louise and young



The Idea of a Spy Turned Her Rather Sick. Who Could Have a Motive for It?

Proctor were rather thick at one time. You put a stop to it, she tells me. None of us wants to be let in for a thing like that."

That shaft went home. Dinsmore's eyes showed it.

"Good night," said Winthrop with courtesy.

"Good night," Dinsmore replied mechanically, and let the young man find his familiar way out.

That reference to Ned Proctor had fairly hit him amidship. He certainly had put a stop to it when disgrace claimed Proctor's father—a disgrace decidedly less black than murder. He could defend himself on the ground that Ned Proctor's career before that hadn't been such as to recommend him; that, in fact, Louise's thickness with him had been disagreeable all along; that the disgrace had involved the young man himself to the extent of getting him indicted; that the senior Proctor's crimes were peculiarly detestable to him—an odious mess of lying and swindling that finally ruined all those savings-bank depositors; that his solicitude for his daughter was rather different from Lowell Winthrop's solicitude for hi that Louise and Ned Proctor were not engaged. He defend himself; but, after all, the shaft went home. man who had just left the room could turn his own against him.

He sat down on the arm of the chair to think it while, and when he went to join his wife it was in a ent mood from that in which he would have gone if throp had omitted the reference to Ned Proctor.

The first mood had been just the reaction of his He couldn't imagine himself negotiating with any m earth as to whether that man should marry his dau There couldn't possibly be anything to negotiate that. If Lowell Winthrop had been a crown prin intimated that for any reason whatever he wished gagement with Miss Louise Dinsmore terminated, more would at once—figuratively—have handed hi hat and indicated the door by which he could depart. was the reaction of his pride. But the Proctor bu coming up—well, he went in a humbler mood.

He found his wife in the living room, and as it hap his daughter was with her. Mrs. Dinsmore was ver given to literature. She looked over a daily newsp if she happened to think of it; sometimes read a ma story and once in a while—a rather epochal event—a lar novel. But she got through life very happily an petently with surprisingly little reliance upon prin now on this quiet evening at home, instead of a b periodical, her pretty hands held a little embroidery on which she was skillfully working a pattern in silk threads. They were very pretty hands—like her graceful, beautifully clean, wholesome, gracious Louise sat on an ottoman at her mother's knees, like grown child—taller than her mother, in fact. Evi the two women had been talking intimately. Din caught that impression as he approached and they up at the intruding male. At sight of them his became more difficult even than he had imagine especially at sight of Louise.

She was but three inches shorter than h full-grown, mature woman. The flowing l her body beneath a filmy gown, as she sa her hands clasped round a knee, proclaime It came to Dinsmore that in playing his benevolently intervening Providence—firs Proctor, next as to Lowell Winthrop—h probably made too little account of the that beat under that filmy gown. This compound of graces and affections on th man might have been bruised by parent tling to this side and that in a way he properly allowed for. He would have li begin by stooping and kissing her; but the that miserable discord; they were off ke sat down opposite them, therefore, and gn corner of his lip. Seldom was a father in difficult situation. He had only his set carry him through.

"Winthrop has just been to see me," he "The invitations to that dinner must be re He wishes the engagement broken off— pended at any rate."

At that amazing statement Mrs. Din dropped her embroidery frame; her lips but no sound came. She sat gorgonized, incredulously at him. Louise also star slowly paled.

"It's no fault of Louise's," Dinsmore pro steadily. "He finds—that I'm not eligib father-in-law." He would have given ver to let it go at that, but he could not. "H me in a disgraceful situation—liable to be b into public disgrace." He forced his eyes main on Louise's face and his lips to say: know how I felt about young Proctor. Wel throp finds me in a worse situation than tor's father. He mentioned that preced me. He doesn't wish—to commit himse to marriage with the daughter of a man position. He wants the engagement—not ann formally at this time."

So he got it out and it seemed mostly all Greek two wide-eyed women before him.

"Proctor?" Mrs. Dinsmore murmured.

"Yes, the Proctor case, only worse—as he sees it," more replied.

And after another incredulous moment Mrs. Di said softly, like one playfully protesting at a joke Alf! I don't believe a word of it."

A sigh escaped him and he said: "It's perfectl He wishes the engagement—suspended or broken c

The sigh, which he would have suppressed if he h time, seemed to carry more conviction than his Mrs. Dinsmore promptly laid down her embroidery stepped over, seated herself on his knee and put round his neck. There was no suspicion of tears in h and except that she had lost color her face showed n

(Continued on Page 34)

emember
LE BOBBIE, a cigar, but very n quality—

7c for 20c

Vest-pockets and mild Havana

VEST-POCKETS the length and breadth of the land rejoice in the fragrance of Robt. Burns' mild Havana.

A fragrance to be proud of, friends! For through the storm and stress of economic change, good Robt. Burns has kept steadfastly true to his high character.

Come what might, no liberties have been taken with his full Havana filler. The vigilant care in curing, which gives to that Havana its rare mildness, never for a moment was relaxed

The result is a cigar of outstanding value. So plain is this fact to experienced smokers that the demand for Robt. Burns still grows by leaps and bounds.

General Cigar Co., Inc.
119 West 40th Street, New York City

HAVE YOU TRIED ONE LATELY?

Robt. Burns Cigar

ROBT. BURNS
Longfellow
(Foil-wrapped)
15c

PATIENCE spite of our best its we cannot at presupply quite enough

Burns Cigars to t demands. As rap-as possible this conn will be remedied.

GENERAL CIGAR
CO., Inc.

(Continued from Page 32)

emotion. Her male person had always been a difficult person in some situations. This was one of them.

"What is it, Alf?" she said. "What has happened?"

He put his hand on her waist and replied, "It's something I can't tell you now, dear."

"But we'll both have to know," she coaxed. "Has the business gone wrong?"

"No, it has nothing whatever to do with the business—any business," he replied.

She pushed back his hair and kissed his forehead, her arm tightening round his neck. He felt immensely grateful to her and immensely proud of her. Her superior friends often confessed to one another indulgently that she had no mind to speak of; but he knew she would go through any ordeal close to his side without a murmur. She was not good at intellectual exercises, but she knew her man to a degree he hardly realized—divining the difficulties he had with his temper. She knew he'd got himself locked up now in obstinate pride.

"There are other people in it?" she guessed as a reason for his silence.

"Yes, some other people." He looked in her eyes—his fond steadfast mate after all—and hugged her against him, saying: "Nell, it will all come out right in the end—for me. You don't need to doubt that."

"I don't doubt it, dear," she said, and kissed his forehead again. "Has the business gone wrong, Alf?"

"Oh, no," he replied with a touch of impatience. "The business was never better. It's nothing about business or money. I wish I could tell you, but I can't now. It will come out right in the end. The thing now is—he breaks the engagement."

The girl on the ottoman had been left out of this little scene between husband and wife—a little scene not exactly agreeable to her, as demonstrations of love between father and mother are apt to be not quite agreeable to grown children, who instinctively regard that as something for youth. But Dinsmore's last words brought the girl into it again. Looking over at her, Mrs. Dinsmore saw that she had lost color and her eyes were round with astonishment.

Certainly it was an affront—an insult—to the young woman. Whatever the reasons for it might have been, it put her in the humiliating position of one rejected. Inevitably it would cause talk—much disparaging talk. That phase of it came to Mrs. Dinsmore. Sitting on her husband's knee, her lip trembled.

"He's a brute!" she said, and tears of sympathetic pain came into her eyes. "I don't care what happened, it's a shame! He's a cad to treat a girl so! She's not to blame! I hate him for it! I'll never speak to him again in my life! He's a brute to treat her so!"

Never had they heard her speak of anyone in that way before. She got up from her husband's knee, returned to her chair, and put her hand on Louise's head, her eyes dropping tears.

"Don't you mind, Louie! You haven't done anything wrong! He's a brute to treat you that way! We're well rid of him! I'll never speak to him again!"

She had been the strongest partisan of Lowell Winthrop, and Louise had thought the social distinction which such a marriage involved was precious to her. But at this injury to her daughter all that was wiped out.

"It's outrageous to treat you so, dear!" she stormed on, her heart wrung with sympathetic pain.

Her rain of tears and sweet, distressed voice afflicted Dinsmore's heart. It came to him bitterly that as husband and father he had little enough to congratulate himself on, seeing what he had brought to his daughter and wife that night. He felt a great guilt and contrition.

"I'm terribly sorry, Lou," he said humbly, his eyes downcast.

"You mustn't mind, father; I don't," her low voice came back like the fond touch of a hand.

But he had no doubt she did mind very much—as who wouldn't? She was rejected, humiliated; and finally it was his work. He felt very humble and an immense kind of disgust with himself. But there was nothing to be done. The matter was settled. He got up and walked from the room silently, leaving the women to their grief of his making.

Louise saw him rise, with a pang. If he had stayed longer she might have spoken out. Her first impression, when he said Lowell Winthrop broke the engagement, was like the cut of a whip. She was astonished and indignant at the affront to her proper self-respect. But that impression was rather fleeting. A little later her heart bounded and she wanted very much to laugh outright.

"You mustn't mind, dear; it's no fault of yours," her mother was saying, weeping, when they were alone.

Louise lifted a shining face to her and exclaimed: "Mother, I don't care a rap! Not a rap! I'm glad! I don't want to marry him any more than he wants to marry me—nor a hundredth part as much! I'm glad!"

She meant it, too; the swirl of emotions in her breast had come round to that. She had accepted Lowell Winthrop deliberately, with her eyes open, but without pretending to herself or him that it was an overmastering passion. He could give her what she wanted in life; with him it would always be front seat as a matter of prescriptive right. He was able and agreeable, always doing the right thing in the right way. She liked his looks—that appearance of perfect bodily condition. There had been another motive—the sharp reaction from her quarrel with her father over Ned Proctor—a sort of heaping of coals of fire. If her father wished to manage her affairs for her, let him have exactly what he liked. She had said that she was very fond of Lowell. Her disposition was warmer and more impulsive than his. In those little matters of a squeeze of the hand, a pressure of the arm, even a kiss, it had rather been she who gave and he who received than the other way round—for she had accepted him without reservations, meaning to be perfectly sweet to him from the moment she said "Yes."

Those little wooings on her part came into her mind when she was upstairs in her own room, after having parted from her astonished mother. There was a certain sting in them. Probably, she thought, he believed she was tremendously in love with him and would humbly sit on the doorstep waiting until he took her back—if he should finally deem himself justified in taking her back. There was a sting to her pride in that thought. But in spite of it she laughed, saying to herself, "He was perfect—a perfect tailor's dummy," and so figuratively threw him out of the window for good.

She had said that she was only decently sorry for poor old Ned; that it was just decent and nothing more to look him up a bit and give him a passing handshake. She had kept on saying that to herself after she knew it was a lie. But of late she had found herself in a monstrous position from which there seemed no escape. How could she avoid marrying Lowell Winthrop when she had deliberately plighted her troth? Well, Lowell Winthrop himself had let her out of that impossible position.

"You're Sensible Enough, McMurtry, to Know There'll be a Real Fight. I'll Take No Punishment Lying Down. Suppose You Spring Your Story"

It all came round to that—the one thing that counted—and her heart laughed. And then misgave somewhat, too, for a settlement with Lowell Winthrop was vastly different from a settlement with the other man. Yet a great and joyous sense of relief was her chief emotion. Under the impulsion of it she went to her writing desk to indite a little note—a very innocent little note, mentioning that she would be round by the bank at five the next afternoon. But as she approached the writing table something else came up in her mind.

Before going downstairs that evening she had laid three letters on the table—two of them addressed to herself, opened, read and replaced in their envelopes; the other written by herself and put into its envelope, but not sealed. The letters looked as though they had been carelessly dropped where they lay, but, in fact, she had so placed them that she could identify their positions by a hair's breadth. Into one of them she had put a tiny bit of tissue paper; into another a speck of face powder; into the third half an inch of white silk thread. Her own wits had suggested th expedients to her.

Approaching the writing table, she remembered this saw at a glance that all three letters had been moved fr the position in which she had left them. As she drew th from their envelopes she saw that the traps had b sprung, for her telltales were missing. Beyond do somebody had read the letters since she went downsta

At their last meeting, as they were driving home fr the tea room, Ned Proctor had said to her: "I suppo I was about as obscure and humble an individual as cc be found nowadays. I thought they'd simply wiped me the slate and forgotten that I was alive. But I must b more account than I supposed, for somebody is eno interested in me to keep watch of me—find out where and what I do. Probably a sleuth's trailing along in shrubbery over there now. I'm sure they're welcome.

"Not really?" she had exclaimed, astonished and dignant.

"Fact, Lou," he replied. "Somebody's hired to k tab on me all the while—some of that old busines father's, I suppose. But you mustn't ever smoke a pip slap a waiter when you're with me. They'll get it dow the report if you do."

It had a light sound, yet there had been something culiar in his manner of saying this—a kind of nervous conscious note. She noticed that he avoided looking at

"The idea!" she had exclaimed once more, but fair In fact, it had occurred to her that he meant to conv warning—let her know by indirection that a watch kept on them. That hint had worked in her mind until decided to find out by this little trap of the letters whe a watch was kept on her; for she had noticed some th which—if she had been inclined to suspicions—might have raised a suspicion that her maid, Jenny Dupee, spying.

Well—she was spied upon. No doubt of that now. test of the letters showed it. She might have imputed solely to Jenny's curiosity but for Ned Proctor's hint

The idea of a spy turned her rather sick—natural nauseating idea. For she could imagine no motive for ing upon her except with regar Ned Proctor. And who could be ting a spy on them? Who could a motive for it? Could Lowell Winthrop? Cou be her father? That ques too, turned her rather

The gilt clock on the r tel showed five minutes ten. Too late, she dec loathly, to call Ned up t She would find out to-m row; but instead of writi note to make an appointr she would take the s means of telephoning.

IX

IT WAS an unhappy ning for Charles Pu managing editor of Leader. He had learne the murder of William P roy about eleven o'clock morning and had prom set the conspiratorial forc motion. He had viewed body of the victim, imm ately and positively iden ing it; Pomeroy was cert dead.

He had telepho McMurtry, saying, "It' man; no doubt about it

And since then not the slightest sign or sound of the spiratorial operations had reached him. He had teleph McMurtry's office during the afternoon, but the la was out; and when he telephoned again at half past the answer was that Mr. McMurtry had not returned the office was closing for the day.

To be left in the dark that way was trying. He wa free to dispose of his time as the lawyer and detective duties at the newspaper office claimed him. He acc his partners of at least slighting him. Surely some was happening. The most momentous things might be pening. Certainly they could have sent him a little

Sometime after Morden sat down to eat in the restaurant at Highlands—no more thinking of Purcell of the man in the moon—the managing editor went o dine, taking care to leave word where he was going, so anyone who called up the office would know where to him. But nobody did call up the office. It came nine o'c ten o'clock, eleven o'clock—and not a word.

The managing editor became increasingly nervous sentful—and suspicious. He didn't like what had pened the night before—McMurtry and Morden me

(Continued on Page 36)

All Sorts and Conditions

The personality of a business is as distinctive as the personality of an individual, but the principles of good taste and sense in business correspondence everywhere require a good paper and a presentable letterhead design.

When it comes to picking a good paper for letterheads and forms, however, the average buyer often is puzzled at the proper balancing of quality and price.

Systems Bond is pre-eminently the paper that satisfactorily answers this problem. Rag-content, loft-dried, it is a real quality sheet—possesses a crispness, a feel, and an appearance that make it fit choice for any business. Produced by an organization that itself performs every step in the making from log-cutting and rag-selection to the final seasoning, it is an ever uniform paper. Standardized and guaranteed by the mill watermark, it stands out from the welter of unknown papers as offering certain satisfaction. And its quality bears no price penalty attached—Systems sells at a true business man's price.

Ask your printer to use Systems on your next order of letterheads. He can also obtain for you our book "The Modern Manufacture of Writing Paper", interesting and valuable to the paper buyer.

Systems Bond is the standard bearer of a comprehensive group of papers—a grade for every Bond and Ledger need—all produced under the same advantageous conditions—and including the well known Pilgrim, Transcript, Atlantic, and Manifest marks.

EASTERN MANUFACTURING COMPANY
501 Fifth Avenue New York
Mills at Bangor and Lincoln, Maine

SYSTEMS BOND

"The Rag-content Loft-dried Paper at the Reasonable Price"

(Continued from Page 34)

before he got there and McMurtry reporting he had got no money. An uneasy man naturally, rather timorous, yet led on by a mighty hunger for money, he was sure to be most unhappy in this situation. He realized that the affair had been taken out of his hands—more than ever since his find, Pomeroy, was dead. McMurtry and Morden could double-cross him if they wanted to—an unpalatable thought to a suspicious nature.

But cowardice is sometimes more dangerous than courage; a cornered rat is a bad opponent.

At half past eleven he called up the Morden Detective Agency—doubtful that anybody would be in at that hour. Somebody was in, however. The sharp-nosed young man answered.

"This is Mr. Purcell of the Leader. Mr. Morden there?" said Purcell.

"No, Mr. Morden hasn't been in this evening," the voice answered.

"Expecting him?"

"He didn't leave any word."

"Take a message for him. I have something of the greatest importance that I want to speak to him about. If he comes in I want him to call me up right away—right away! Get that?"

"Yes, sir; all right, Mr. Purcell. I'll give him the message if he comes in."

"Right away! This can't wait!" Purcell repeated, and hung up the receiver in a fine glow of determination.

Whereupon the sharp-nosed young man with the moth-eaten hair stepped back into the tiny hall, and turning to the open door of the small den on the left, said: "Purcell of the Leader has been asking for you. He said it was important and he wanted you to call him up right away, soon as you came in. He seemed kind of huffy about it."

"Huffy, eh?" Morden asked thoughtfully.

"Sounded that way," said the young man. "He said 'Right away' two or three times."

"I ain't in if anybody else calls," Morden observed, repeating an instruction he had given when he entered the office ten minutes before.

He had repaired to his office after searching James Collingwood's room at Luke's Hotel, partly because he wanted to see if anything in particular had turned up there and partly because he wanted to think. The sharp-nosed young man having withdrawn, he gave himself over to that occupation as he sat square-shouldered, square-jawed and glowering at his desk.

He didn't like McMurtry's report of the night before that Dinsmore had agreed to pay only fifty thousand dollars. Fifty thousand was nothing to Dinsmore. The man ought to have been brought across much stronger than that. He didn't like the further report that even the promised fifty thousand had not been forthcoming. At best, McMurtry was too cautious; not handling the thing right. Morden was perfectly confident of his own ability to bring Dinsmore to time far more satisfactorily. He'd have said half a million—and got it.

He took the odd, murderous knife out of his pocket and looked it over with affection. As the game stood, it was even more in his hands than in McMurtry's hands. That was what he wanted to think over. McMurtry was waiting up for him over at the Hotel Cardinal—or McMurtry was over there, whether waiting up or not, for their last word had been that the lawyer would stay downtown that night and the detective would report to him as soon as his night's work was done, or by breakfast time in the morning in any event. Morden was considering what he should report, or whether he should report at all. Neither of them had thought particularly about Purcell.

Purcell needed some handling, however. All round it needed handling and McMurtry was the only man to do it. Much as he would like to do it, Morden couldn't push the affair through on his own hook. With that conclusion to his cogitation, the detective went over to the Hotel Cardinal, ignoring the managing editor's message. The lawyer was waiting up for him. In the hotel bedroom the two men sat down together and Morden faithfully repeated his discoveries, down to the knife, which McMurtry examined with lively interest.

"Hell, we've got him!" the detective growled. "We've got him cinched seven ways from the ace. We'll pull his leg for a million at ten o'clock to-morrow morning." He glowered at his friend, with his air of a savage dog about to bite, and added significantly: "If you won't, I will. He's got to come across."

McMurtry realized that his intractable associate was perfectly capable of doing just what he said; and as he rubbed his smoothly shaved over-developed jaw, above which there was the hint of an ominous grin, his gray eyes twinkled thoughtfully.

"It does look a sure thing," he admitted conservatively. "I'll go at him in the morning."

Morden, with a steady glance and unmistakable significance, replied: "I'll go along myself. He might just as well know what he's up against. I'll go with you."

In the detective's looks, even more than in his words, there was an ultimatum. One result of his cogitations had been that there should be no more faltering about the business and that he himself would be present when the financial details were concluded. McMurtry understood both motives perfectly; understood also the man with whom he was dealing. So he said readily, "All right, Jake, I'm agreeable," concealing whatever disappointment he felt. He considered a moment further and added: "Meet me here at half past seven in the morning. We may as well get him here as anywhere. We'll catch him before he leaves his house."

"Sure!" said the detective; and on that understanding they parted—Morden not even remembering to mention that Purcell had called him up.

But McMurtry remembered the other partner as he was undressing and called up the newspaper office.

"Our case is moving along," he said pleasantly over the wire. "Our man will probably be working on it all night. I'm going to turn in now, but I expect to hear from him by morning. I'll call you up by noon anyway. It's moving along."

And with that small crumb the managing editor was compelled to be content for the time being. So when the conspirators retired that night each of them was entertaining some strong mental reservations respecting the others.

At half past seven next morning Morden tapped on the door of McMurtry's room and they spent a little time discussing at what hour Dinsmore would probably come downstairs for breakfast.

"We might have found out from Jenny," McMurtry observed with a passing regret.

"What difference does it make? If he ain't up, he can get up. Call him anyhow," said aggressive Morden.

"I'd rather catch him on the wing," the lawyer objected. "We'll wait till a quarter of eight."

At that hour he called Dinsmore's house, saying, "Mr. McMurtry—Mr. Lawrence McMurtry—wishes to speak to Mr. Dinsmore immediately on a very urgent matter."

Some minutes passed and the servant's voice answered, "Mr. Dinsmore is not dressed yet. He will call you." And the speaker immediately rang off.

With a muttered curse at the stupidity of servants in general, McMurtry got the connection again and instructed, "Have Mr. Dinsmore call me at Room 812, Hotel Cardinal." He repeated it to be sure it was taken down properly, then they waited. At twenty minutes past eight he called again and repeated his message: "Mr. Lawrence McMurtry wishes to speak to Mr. Dinsmore at once on a very important matter."

There was a long delay, while McMurtry held the wire; then the answer came, "Mr. Dinsmore has gone downtown."

Repeating the message to the detective, McMurtry observed ominously, "Looks as though the gentleman is trying to dodge the gaff."

"Ought to have given him the gaff in the first place hard enough so's he'd be acquainted with it," Morden retorted, blaming the lawyer's softness for this contemptuous treatment of them on the part of Dinsmore.

That retort nettled McMurtry, who replied, "He'll get it this time. We'll wait a little and try him at his office."

The waiting with their nerves on edge was disagreeable and this difficulty in reaching Dinsmore's ear reminded them of how amply he was protected.

At a quarter past nine McMurtry called up Dinsmore's office. The answer was that Mr. Dinsmore had not arrived yet. The lawyer left no message for him, but called again at twenty minutes to ten. Then the answer was that Mr. Dinsmore was in a conference and could not be disturbed.

So they had spent two hours merely in trying to get word to Dinsmore—and all in vain. Morden's ill nature had increased steadily and McMurtry had been reflecting—knowing well enough that Morden blamed him for their victim's disparaging attitude.

"We'll go over to my office," said the lawyer as soon as the last message came. "I can get a messenger there that I can rely on."

They went over to the law office in almost complete silence, Morden blaming his partner and the partner resenting it. In his office McMurtry took a sheet of note paper with his letterhead on it, and a plain envelope. Looking at his watch, which showed five minutes of ten, he wrote on the sheet:

I have reason to believe that James Collingwood may be arrested on a charge of murder in half an hour. Kindly call me up at my office before 10:30. L. McM.

Showing that to the detective, he commented, "If his private secretary wants to read that, let him."

He put the note in the plain envelope, addressed the latter to Mr. Dinsmore, wrote "personal and immediate" in the corner and underscored the words. Then he called a young man from the outer room and directed him to deliver the note at once at Dinsmore's office.

Again they waited. All this delay, the difficulty in merely getting word to Dinsmore and the contemptuous attitude on his part which that implied, was trying to their nerves and tempers.

"You've let him play horse with you," Morden marked ungraciously. "You ought to have soaked h right when you had him."

Naturally, that was irritating to McMurtry, but he w more diplomatic.

"This Pomeroy business hadn't happened then," he minded his friend; but he added with heat, "If that n don't fetch him by half past ten we'll have Collingwo pinched on some trumped-up charge and see if that j him any."

"Sure!" said the detective, pleased and mollified by t prospect of bold action.

But at twenty minutes past ten the telephone rang a McMurtry with tingling nerves exulted to hear a vo saying: "This is Mr. Dinsmore. What do you want?"

"I want you to come down to my office," the lawyer plied promptly. "I have something very important to to you." There was a little pause and he added, "A w rant may be issued at any moment."

Then the voice said: "Very well; I'll come down the But one thing, McMurtry—you mentioned a Doctor D to me the other night. I want to see him and hear wh he has to say. I want to clean this up once for all. Ther be no use in my coming down there unless you have doctor present. I mean to see him and hear what he to say myself."

"I'll have him here," said the lawyer promptly.

"Very well, I'll be there in fifteen minutes," said voice.

So the lawyer had gained his main point of getting Di more to the office; yet he turned away from the telephi with a thoughtful expression and reported to Morden:

"He wants Doctor Dill here—wants to see him and h what he has to say himself. Says he won't do any busin with us otherwise—or it amounts to that."

"Won't, eh?" Morden growled. "We'll make him! to Doctor Dill, he can go to hell. We're to name the c ditions—not him."

They both realized the vital importance of keep Doctor Dill securely in their own hands; but, after all, greatest thing was to get the money in the easiest quickest way.

"The main thing now," said McMurtry, turning it o in his mind, "is to get him down here. If he doubts t we've got Doctor Dill or that the doctor will stick to story ——" He turned it over further and suggest "He can't start anything against Doctor Dill with tipping off the whole story. I don't see but we'd be enough—here in my office. What could Dinsmore do?"

Morden didn't see that he could do anything in parti lar in the way of getting the doctor out of their hands; he naturally resisted any concession to Dinsmore, repeated: "Let him go to hell! We'll fix the condition

"But if he's holding off because he doubts that we got Doctor Dill or that the doctor will stick to the story may as well satisfy him on both points," McMurtry argu "The great thing, Jake, is to shake him down—get money out of him. If he'll shake easier after he's s Doctor Dill with his own eyes, don't you see—what want is the money. The quickest way to get it is the b so long as it's safe. He couldn't start anything aga Doctor Dill without giving the whole story away—wh is the last thing in the world he wants to do. I don't but we'd be safe enough."

They argued further, with the upshot that Morden t phoned his office so that Doctor Dill could be produce a few minutes if that seemed desirable. And when he finished a stenographer from the outer office tapped on door and said Mr. Dinsmore was there.

He came in with a composed air and a quick glance t took in the scene—a lawyer's private office, one of a s of rooms in a tall office building and as like a thous other lawyers' private offices as two peas. His glance took in the burly, carelessly dressed stranger in the ro with an unspoken question. Whereupon McMurtry sp up with the greatest affability:

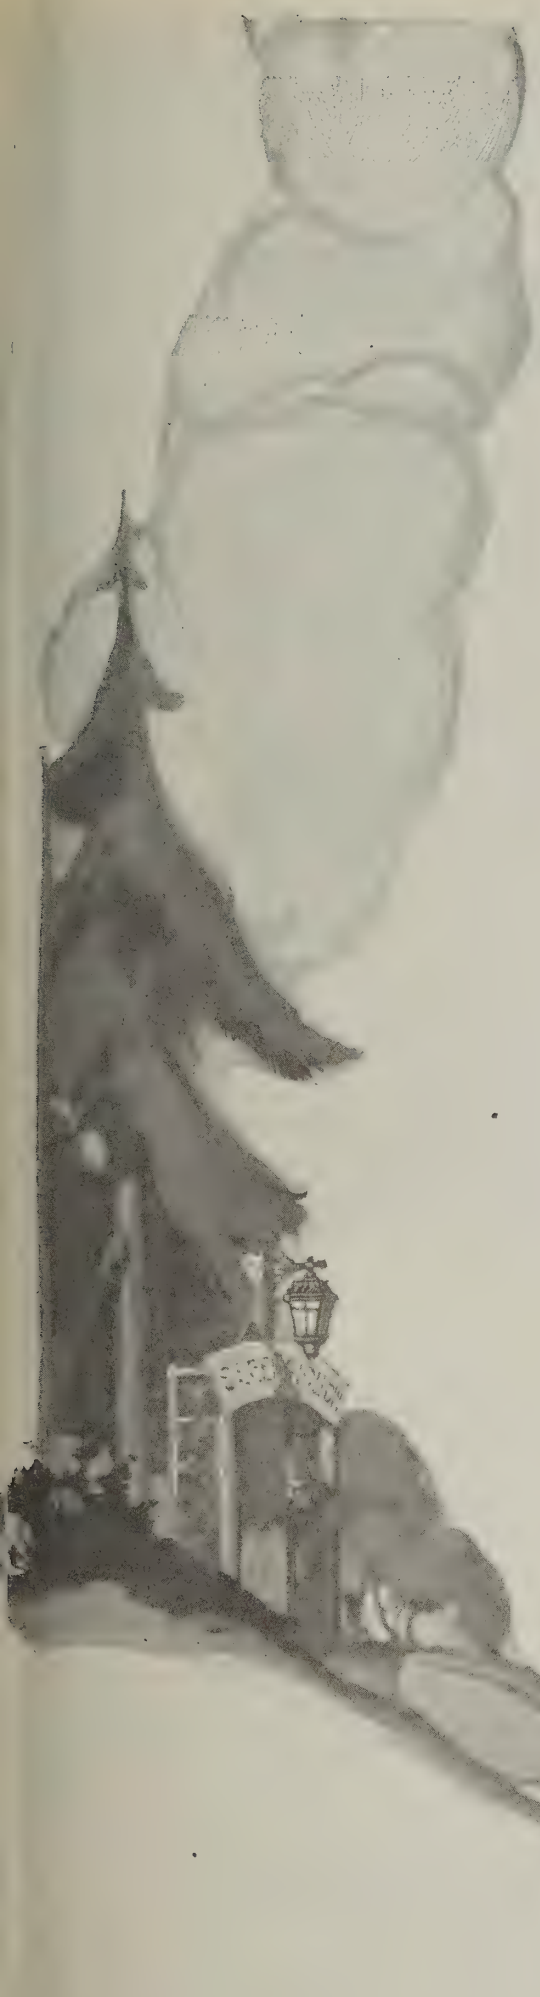
"This is Mr. Morden, Mr. Dinsmore—Mr. Jacob M den of the Morden Detective Agency, who is associa with me in this matter."

It was in the form of an introduction, but the two merely looked at each other—a truculent look on Morde part and a calm survey on Dinsmore's part. Quite in character of affable host, McMurtry motioned to a c at the office table and said "Take a seat."

The indicated chair was on the nearer side of the ta Dinsmore took it and the other two sat down opposite h The scene was thus set and it seemed the lawyer's cue speak.

"Soon after I left your house night before last, Dinsmore," he began in a subdued voice, but very tinctly, "you changed your clothes, put on a black-a gray checked hat and took the ten-eighteen train do town. You went over to the Christopher Columbus Cl called James Collingwood into the hall and after a li talk went away with him. James Collingwood then kil William Pomeroy. The knife with which Pomeroy killed was found in Collingwood's trunk last night—in

(Continued on Page 177)



The Comfort Car

IT is really not strange that many who formerly drove other cars, should now be numbered among our most enthusiastic Hupmobile owners.

The reasons why this is so are perfectly plain.

It is only necessary to recall that The Comfort Car has the name of being a really extraordinary performer among all types; that its economy and freedom from repairs are likewise quite unusual; and that it is regarded as one of the soundest and most lasting values in the automobile market.

Hupmobile

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

By FLOYD W. PARSONS

An Electric Solution

IF ALL the railroad and trolley tracks in the United States were placed end to end they would form a single line that would circle the earth eighteen times. The marvelous system of transportation that has been developed in this country is largely responsible for the rapid industrial growth of the nation. The railway route mileage here in America totals 265,218, while the mileage of all of Europe is only 217,000. The United States railways consume more than 25% of all the coal that is mined in America each year. The carrying capacity of our roads is seriously restricted by the movement of coal required for hauling the trains themselves. One authority estimates that 10 to 12% of the total ton-mileage movement behind the engine draw bar on our steam roads is made up of company coal and coal cars, including in this figure the steam-engine tender and its contents. This indicates that the useful, or revenue-carrying, capacity of our steam roads could be increased at least 10% with existing track facilities by eliminating the entire company coal movement.

Rotary Snow Plow, Operated by an Electric Locomotive, Clearing the Main-Line Track Near the Summit of the Bitter Root Mountains

Few people realize just how serious the nation's transportation problem really is, and how we are driving rapidly toward a situation where industrial progress must inevitably be checked by the failure of railroad development to keep pace with our trade advancement. For months we have damned the telephone companies for the delays and annoyances they have caused us. The average citizen had blamed the phone troubles on every phase of human neglect and inefficiency, while the whole matter in recent months has been a purely mechanical problem brought about by the cessation of telephone development work. It is simply impossible in this day of rapid industrial growth to handle enormous increases in business with old equipment and ancient methods.

Our railroads are even more closely linked with our lives than the telephone, and what we have been remarking about our phone service is nothing compared with the things we shall be saying about the country's railways unless some miraculous change comes soon. Limited telephone facilities created inconvenience; limited transportation service will create actual suffering since the handling of food and fuel is essential to our existence.

No one can say what the outcome of the railroad problem will be in a political way; but the time is appropriate to direct attention to certain scientific remedies that will help quite a little in restoring a healthy condition. Frequently when the future appears to be hopeless the engineer or the inventor steps in, and many obstructions disappear.

The use of electric power on our railroads is not a new subject but it is a science that in late years has been developed far beyond the general public understanding. Some few years ago many railroads were ready for electrification, but the engineering problems connected therewith had not been solved in a thoroughly practical manner. Now that all the elements of electrification have been perfected the railroads are without the necessary capital to make the investment. As a consequence there is urgent need for the country to understand how great are the advantages that will result from the more extended use of electric power. In the transportation business capital surely needs all the encouragement that can be afforded it.

Let me start out by saying that even if we had an abundance of money available not all of our railroad lines would be immediately electrified. Conditions for economical steam haulage and those for electric traction are exactly reversed. Steam roads are most economical when they operate large units—locomotives—and fewer trains. Electric transmission means smaller units and a uniform load all along the line. In most cases it would be very little cheaper to run three or four trains a day by electricity than to run thirty or forty such trains over the same line. The power has to be there continuously to pull the load. It is for this reason that electric haulage pays best on short lines connecting large cities, where the traffic is heavy and frequent. It is likewise true that in localities where fuel is scarce and dear electrification is the one and only system to use.

This does not mean that electrification is not suitable on main-line railroads. What I have tried to convey is the idea that electric power can be used for haulage much more economically in some places than in others. Furthermore, it is well to state at the beginning of such a discussion as this is that electric locomotives are not going to displace steam engines right away. In fact, there are many places where the modern steam locomotive at the present time is the cheapest unit to use.

In the United States we operate more electric locomotives over a greater electrified track mileage than all the other countries in the world combined. The latest figures show that exclusive of our trolley lines we have approximately 680 electric locomotives operating over 4900 miles of route, or 8400 miles of electrified track. Compared with this in all the rest of the world there are only 455 electric locomotives operating over only 1800 miles of track.

In order to show the economy of electric operation Messrs. W. B. Potter and S. T. Dodd, transportation engineers, made a careful examination of recent reports of revenue traffic, and found that the railway traffic for the year under consideration (1914), was 1,000,000,000,000 (one trillion) ton-miles. Out of this the movement of coal for railway purposes, together with coal cars and locomotives carrying same, amounted to about 12%. The actual amount of fuel consumed by the steam roads during this particular year to move this tonnage of one trillion ton-miles w 100,000,000 tons coal and 40,000,0 barrels of oil. Th state that this sa tonnage could ha been moved with el tric locomotives an expenditu of 40,000,000 to of fuel, a saving 100,000,000 tons year.

It is further es mated that the ann electric power nec sary to operate all steam roads would 37,200,000,000 ki watts. Power stati capable of deliver this amount of pow per year would ha an aggregate instal tion capacity of 8,50 000 kilowatts, wh at the present ti the installed capac of power stations the United States approximately 2 000,000 kilowatts- capacity which nearly two and a h times the requirem for operating all steam railroads in country. It is evide therefore, that t task of supplyi enough power to co plete the job of r road electrification no Herculean und taking.

It is not to be pected, however, t the nation will ad any universal plan electrifying our transportation systems. Furthermore is not necessary to enter upon this work so broadly in or to derive many of its benefits. The railroad-fuel pr lem is most serious in our mountainous districts, an is precisely in such situations that electrification has de onstrated its greatest value. Under the most unfavora conditions electrification of a railroad in a mountain region will at least enable a road to double the amount traffic to be moved over existing tracks and grades. T increased capacity results largely from the greater re bility and higher capacity of electric locomotives under conditions of service. Under average conditions electrifi tion permits a speeding up of train schedules by some 25

Likewise, it should be borne in mind that in extrem cold weather, when the steam locomotives practically out of business, the electric engines make their best sh ing. Extreme cold—aside from the physical condition the traffic rail—does not hamper the operation of the el tric locomotive, but actually increases its hauling capaci In January or February, when the steam engines are us up most of their energy by radiation from their boilers i the atmosphere, leaving very little useful power available move the train, the electric locomotive is operating un its most efficient conditions, and at such a time will ha greater load than in warm weather.

As for the use of oil on railroad engines the practic no less than an industrial sin, and will be so considered all who look back in a few years to come. Our limi supply of oil will all be needed in the nation's struggle supremacy in world trade. A coal-burning merch marine will not carry off the palm of victory in our fi for foreign business. We can't electrify a line across ocean. Our merchant ships, farm tractors and mo trucks will soon be demanding more oil than we can eas furnish them.

As to the part water power will play in electrificati experts estimate that there is not less than 25,000,0 horse power of available water in this country. If t were developed and used in driving our railroads e horse power so utilized would save at least six pounds coal now burned under locomotive boilers for each ho power hour developed. In this connection, however

(Continued on Page 40)

Land-marks of romance

IF you were 'way, 'way up in the sky one evening in your aeroplane—so far that you could see all of your State at once, you would shape your course by the lights below.

In every town you would spy a number of clusters of especially bright lights.

These are land-marks of romance upon the Paramount Artcraft map of America.

Go a little nearer to any one of these theatres—plane down in your machine—and except for the noise of your engine you would hear the cheerful swing of music and the little bursts of applause that punctuate the performance.

You could call on any one of the thousands of communities all over the country and you would find exactly the same thing,

—the same great Paramount Artcraft Pictures exciting the admiration of hundreds of thousands of people in all the best theatres, everywhere, simultaneously.

Famous Players-Lasky Corporation is at the helm of the most romantic industry that ever occupied business men, and the measure of its success will always be determined—as it has been in the past—by the good times you and everybody else have with the pictures called Paramount Artcraft.

Paramount Artcraft Motion Pictures

These two trade-marks are the sure way of identifying Paramount Artcraft Pictures—and the theatres that show them

FAMOUS PLAYERS-LASKY CORPORATION
ADOLPH ZUKOR Pres. JESSE L. LASKY Vice Pres. CECIL B. DE MILLE Director General
NEW YORK

Latest Paramount Artcraft Pictures

Released to December 1st

Billie Burke in	"Sadie Love"
Irene Castle in	"The Invisible Bond"
Ethel Clayton in	"A Sporting Chance"
Marguerite Clark in	"Luck in Pawn"
Cecil B. DeMille's Production	"Male and Female"
Elsie Ferguson in	"Counterfeit"
Dorothy Gish in	"Turning the Tables"
D. W. Griffith's Production	"Scarlet Days"
* Wm. S. Hart in	"Wagon Tracks"
Houdini in	"The Grim Game"
Lila Lee in	"Heart of Youth"
Vivian Martin in	"His Official Fiancee"
Wallace Reid in	"The Lottery Man"
Maurice Tourneur's Production	"The Life Line"
George Loane Tucker's Production	"The Miracle Man"
Robert Warwick in	"In Mizzoura"
Bryant Washburn in	"It Pays to Advertise"
"The Teeth of the Tiger"	With a Star Cast
"The Miracle of Love"	A Cosmopolitan Production
"The Dark Star"	A Cosmopolitan Production

* Supervision Thomas H. Ince

Thomas H. Ince Productions

Enid Bennett in	"What Every Woman Learns"
Dorothy Dalton in	"L'Apache"
Douglas MacLean & Doris May in	"23½ Hours' Leave"
Charles Ray in	"Crooked Straight"

Paramount Comedies

Paramount-Arbuckle Comedies	One Each Month
Paramount-Mack Sennett Comedies	Two Each Month
Paramount-Al St. John Comedies	One Each Month
Paramount-Ernest Truex Comedies	One Each Month

Paramount Short Subjects

Paramount Magazine	issued weekly
Paramount-Post Nature Pictures	issued every other week
Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel Pictures	one each week
Paramount-Burlingham Adventure Pictures	every other week
Paramount-Briggs Comedies	one each week

(Continued from Page 38)

should be stated that not all our water power is located in regions where the transportation requirements are greatest. But this does not excuse the nonuse of resources that could be harnessed.

Over in France the lack of mineral combustibles is forcing a detailed study of the country's water resources. A particular investigation is being made of the economical use of electricity for motive power on railroads. A committee has been appointed to draw up a program for the electrification of the principal lines. The preliminary report of the French engineers upholds the conclusions that have been arrived at by our own experts. The committee states that mountain lines should be among the first to be electrified, but also recommends the electric operation of roads having a low grade and heavy traffic. The program proposes the electrification of 5220 miles of track. The probable cost based on prewar prices is estimated to be $335,000,000. Basing their figures on the normal traffic of 1913 the Frenchmen estimate that electrification would save 1,500,000 metric tons of coal annually, and in the near future the economy should not be less than 3,000,000 metric tons.

The amount of coal in the United States is enormous, but nevertheless it is limited. Every ton that is wasted cannot be replaced. Electric power will save millions of tons. Then there is the railroad muddle; electrification is the quickest and cheapest solution. Many a business has saved itself by the simple process of adopting methods that reduce costs and turn deficits into profits. In some localities the steam railroad no more covers transportation possibilities to-day than would a stage coach on a motor-bus route.

Easy Money

A PROMINENT merchant in a large city had been sending a yearly check to a man who bore the self-styled title of "reverend" and who resided in another city a thousand miles away. One day it occurred to the business man to look up the party to whom he had been giving for twenty years and see if the reverend gentleman's activities really were as praiseworthy as had been set forth. The investigation brought out the facts that the man was not a minister of any denomination or a representative of any organization; his solicitations netted him considerable sums of money; he spared no expense in satisfying his personal desires; some years before he had been arrested in two Southern cities on felony charges; he claimed to assist young boys, but was reticent on this subject. The merchant, of course, stopped his annual donations to this dubious cause; but think what a loss he had already sustained!

A visit to the office of the district attorney in most of our large cities will prove to any skeptic that the business of catching or exposing these fake charities is no easy task. In the state of New Jersey there is a law known as the Membership Corporations Law, which forbids any individual or group of people to incorporate a supposedly philanthropic organization without there being a preliminary investigation resulting in approval of the scheme by the State Board of Charities. Notwithstanding this very helpful legal precaution, the district attorney of a near-by metropolis has experienced trouble in frustrating the plans of a society acting under the authority granted by New Jersey incorporation papers. The New York officials found that the society had scattered mite boxes over the entire United States. So many such boxes had been sent out to banks, offices, business houses and places of amusement that the gentleman managing the project did not even know himself where all of these boxes were located.

On each box was displayed an appealing picture and the scheme pulled so well that $19,580.87 was collected before the authorities were able to call a halt. The investigation showed that of the amount gathered in, $17,214.23 was disbursed for overhead expenses, and no attempt had been made to select a site for the proposed home for girls. The result of the inquiry was the ordering in of all the mite boxes, but this was as far as the law could go, and the careless givers are out all they contributed.

Collectors for a home for needy children recently invaded New York. They procured a lot of money before the police caught one of the leaders. This culprit was charged with teaching young boys to steal. His trial resulted in a sentence of several years and a fine of two thousand dollars. Yet many business men gave liberally to this unknown association.

If anything is more amazing than the carelessness people exercise in their giving it must be the ease with which the average citizen is fooled. The easy-money men of the days of Barnum were paragons of virtue compared with the charity swindlers of to-day. The modern dishonest solicitor does not hesitate to use bogus letterheads and forged credentials. He frequently poses as the representative of some reputable and well-known association. Two men were sent to prison recently in New York for soliciting advertisements for a proposed book to be issued by a benevolent association. That the city was easy is proved by the fact that they got away with four thousand dollars before they were apprehended.

Frequently the solicitor and his accomplices create an organization for the sole purpose of getting out a yearbook or a souvenir program. One such group gathered in some unsuspecting dollars in Eastern cities this year. The only copies of the journal of the supposed association were those got out for use in the collecting campaign. The addresses given by the collectors proved to be saloons. Yet many merchants placed advertisements with these dishonest salesmen.

In many cases, even when the cause is worthy, the plan followed in getting contributions does not permit much of the money to reach the charity that needs it. Take, for instance, the case of a magazine selling for ten cents. The agents maintained that the proceeds were applied to sending tubercular children to an institution in a Southern state, and caring for them there. An examination showed that of every ten cents collected the solicitor got four and the managing agent two. The financial report of the organization indicated that $4000 had been spent on the general maintenance of the home, while $25,000 had been applied to printing, headquarters, expenses and overhead charges. In other words, only fourteen per cent of the total money reaching headquarters was used to benefit the children. Furthermore, this fourteen per cent was only about six per cent of the gross receipts.

When it comes to the question of the chain letter, which is used so often to help a cause, the plan is nearly always undesirable, due to the uncertainty and lack of control that attends this method of procuring funds. The mathematical shark knows that such a letter asking that copies be mailed to four friends will reach into the billions in a v short time. This, of course, assumes that the chain is broken and that each series of letters bears the next high number.

Some of these chain letters are pure frauds. A firm in Eastern city started such a letter, promising a cert article of merchandise to all who would remit ten cen The scheme was exposed by the post-office inspectors, at last reports the postmaster in the city where the let was started had received 600,000 of these letters inclos dimes, and since there is absolutely no way to stop a ch letter once it is started the money continues to come notwithstanding the fact that the fraud order was issu some time ago. One chain letter quoting a prayer has b circulating for more than ten years. It predicts calam for those who do not comply, so it is probably good fo century or two.

The remit-or-return scheme for collecting foolish dol has been used extensively in recent years. The Cham of Commerce in Rochester, New York, which body thoroughly investigated the question of dishonest solic tions, tells the story of a method that was unique if successful: A former president of the chamber receive rug, following the receipt of a letter purporting to written at the request of an old friend and offering the as a great bargain. The following extracts are taken fr the correspondence:

"Our mutual friend, Harry Smith, dropped in here morning on his way to the coast and bought a coupl Navajo blankets. During our chat he mentioned y name, stating that you wanted to get some of these go but had not bought any for fear of getting stung. It his intention to pick out half a dozen blankets for you have us ship them on, but there wasn't time—the t only stops a few minutes—so he left it to my judgmen make the selection and forward them. 'Better send first,' thinks I, 'and see how he likes it,' and so I am s ping by parcel post to-day one of the best-woven prettiest blankets in the house—a regular ham-strin Invoice is inclosed. You will note I have made you a per cent discount from the regular price—thank Harry that.

"Shall be going East this summer and expect to stop and see Smith, who has promised to show me round a li Hope to have the pleasure of meeting you at that tim

The prospective customer replied: "Returning bill herewith. I beg to say that I have turned the rug to the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, which ha department looking after this kind of thing. If you like it you may thank Harry for that. I do not recall such friend named Smith. Am amazed you should ex to find anybody so easy as to send a check for $23.85 something he doesn't want or wouldn't take the troubl pack up and send back. Of course the parcel is subjec your order, or will be delivered to your duly author representative."

The Western man replied: "You're there when it co to spotting a frame-up. A Chicago firm said I could away with t game—that ch would come in f nine people ou ten. I fell for idea, though I di like it and I d like it any be now. I'm goin quit."

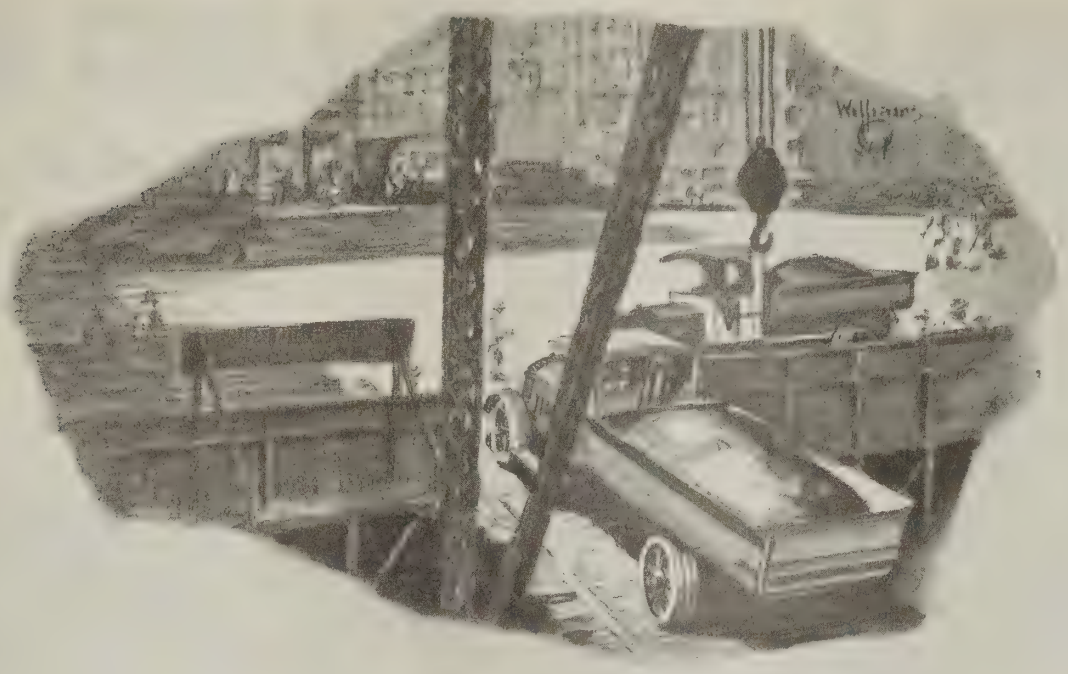
Then the le asks Mr. Blanl try to sell blanket to som his friends, offe a further ten cent reduction, ends with: course if they pa up I'll quickly stamps for re postage."

In this schem remit or return cles of merchar are sometimes with the req that a certain su money be remi or the goods turned. Usuall sender claims t suffering from incurable illn and has a famil support. such fraud was posed and it

(Concluded o Page 81)

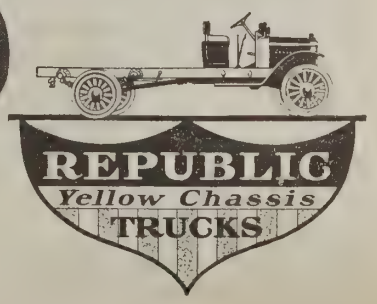
PHOTO. BY COURTESY OF THE GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY

An Electric Train Descending a Two Per Cent Grade on the Eastern Slope of the Rockies



You can't get away from the fact that 60,000 Republic Trucks have been bought by shrewd, sensible business men. Among them will be found a solid conviction that their trucks are not equalled —in performance, in ruggedness, in economy. In six years, this preference—based solely on the wonderful Republic record—has made this company the largest manufacturer of motor trucks in the world.

REPUBLIC TRUCKS



Republic Motor Truck Co., Inc., Alma, Michigan

ON THE LORDSBURG ROAD

By Frederick R. Bechdolt

ILLUSTRATED BY E. F. WARD

"'Kick Down That Box and Stick Up Yo'r Hands,' Says the Road Agent. I Did 'em Both at the Same Time"

ONE blazing windy Arizona afternoon in the days when liquor selling was still a licensed privilege over in New Mexico, Sheriff Bob Reed and I were sitting under a hackberry tree beside the Lordsburg road. The sheriff's roadster, parked near by, was smeared with dust, its fenders bore scars from recent reckless driving and the sheriff himself showed signs of much hard usage. Unshaven, stained by wind and dirt and sun, he blinked his weary eyes—sometimes he nodded—peering down the road into the east.

We had been watching that highway for a week now, traveling back and forth over its dusty reaches through the long hot days, lurking beside it through the cool nights while the mocking birds sang all about us in the darkness. On the branch roads which twisted in and out among the swarthy malapi hills deputies were maintaining similar vigils, at what expense in gasoline, tires and repair bills we did not know or care to think of; time enough for such griefs when it came to turning in accounts to the board of supervisors.

Some tokens of small success marked the devious routes we had traveled—a half dozen heaps of broken glass, each with its array of paper labels fluttering in the breezes and its aroma suggestive of pay-day night in a wide-open mining town. There was also a wrecked touring car where the road makes the sharp turn at the head of the grade; and there were four dismal young fellows in the jail at Chiricahua, writing their friends for bail. But the fragments of bottles merely marked the points where first offenders—their illicit wares destroyed by their own hands—had departed from our company on their promises to sin no more against the laws of the commonwealth. The overturned auto belonged to a novice at bootlegging, unfamiliar with the hazards of our county highways; and as for the prisoners, they were small fry. The big game whom the sheriff had come forth to hunt was still at large. Just now he was—or anyway we hoped he was—somewhere down that gray road which twined away between the sun-baked hills to New Mexico.

Big Tom Williams was the name men knew him by—it may have been his own for all I ever learned, but that is doubtful—and he was old in the crafty game of smuggling long before Bob Reed wore a star on his vest. Back in the days when Black Jack Ketchum was robbing express cars he had learned the art of packing rifle cartridges so that they would pass scrutiny as sacked flour; and the more recent years of border warfare had afforded him a post-graduate course in smuggling munitions, to the end that when prohibition came it found him not only ready and willing but apt at carrying contraband. So long as he traveled the road to Lordsburg the miners in the copper camps need never go thirsty.

We had met him at the beginning of the week, while this expedition was still young and our hopes were high, and he had stopped his high-powered touring car long enough to tell us flat-footed that he was on his way to Lordsburg after whisky. With which he sped off in a cloud of dust and left the sheriff frowning, even as he frowned now under the hackberry tree, gazing off into the tawny landscape.

A hundred yards or so up the road Bill Savage was sitting in the shade of his huge eight-cylinder car and I could see the cow-puncher who did chauffeur duty for him removing a deflated tire. They had passed us some minutes ago, to come to grief on one of the sharp rock fragments at the creek crossing. I looked from the old-timer, who had established his ranch down in the valley in the days when Cochise was on the warpath and had maintained it by force of arms until the coming of the railroads, to Sheriff Bob Reed and found the latter still peering off into the distance. I knew what he was thinking. I had asked myself the same question:

"Where in that tangle of hills is the route Tom Williams traveled?"

"Why don't you ask Bill Savage?" I said.

The sheriff shook his head.

"Bill," he answered, "is an old-timer."

"Sure!" I argued. "That's the idea. He's tracked Apaches over every rod of this country, and if there's a road ——"

"You don't get me," Reed interrupted. "And I'll explain. Did you ever hear of the time Bill Savage got into trouble in Tucson? No? Well, some years back he came to town—the place had changed a whole lot since his last visit, along of Eastern people, but he didn't know it. He had his dog with him.

"One day this dog of Bill's got into a fight with a dog belonging to some newcomer from the Middle West. It was a pretty hot scrap and at the beginning Bill's dog was getting the worst of it, taking a devil of a lacing. Bill stood by and listened to the other fellow laugh, but didn't make a move to stop the fun. Finally his dog made out to climb on top and just as it was sinking its teeth in for a good hold the man from the Middle West kicked it.

"Bill shot him through the foot.

"'There,' says he, 'you won't kick another dog for a while, pardner.'

"It cost his friends a heap of money to square the case, because people were getting so they didn't understand such things any more."

"Well," I said hopelessly, "I'm afraid I don't get you yet."

The sheriff sm
but forbore to mind me that I, was a newcom
the country.

"It's like this the old-timers,'

went on quietly. "They don't go to meddle with the c fellow's business, not even when the other fellow is own dog."

He paused to relight his cigarette, which had gone a half hour ago, and then: "Savage," said he, "do look on bootlegging as a matter of lawbreaking—like ing beef or rustling cattle. He'd regard this as a pers affair between me and Tom Williams.

"He's known me ever since I was a boy and likes whole lot, but if I was to get into a gun fight with Williams he'd stand by and never turn a hand. That would be my business and Bill would figure he'd ha keep out of it—unless he saw that Williams was sta
the cards on me some way."

He puffed on his cigarette, exhaled a thin blue clo smoke, and then I saw his eyes narrow as he peered the road. But when I looked into the east there wa sign of traveler there. A few moments later he rose.

"We may as well go over and pass the time of day Bill," he told me. "It's no more than neighborly."

We walked through the flaring sunshine to the crossing and Savage rose from his seat on the running b to shake hands with us. From shoulder to knee he surrendered himself to present-day conventions, but trousers of his neat business suit were tucked into the of high-heeled boots and his hat was the old-fashi broadbrim. He wore a spade beard and his eyelids w have betrayed him anywhere as one of that implac breed who wrested the West from Indians and bad for they did not curve above the eyes but curtained in rigid slanting lines, which is the case with men who learned to sight their rifles in the face of death with same cool accuracy they attain on a target range.

"Howdy, Bob," he said, and to me, "Howdy."

The cow-puncher glanced up from his toil on the s tire to nod and we three disposed ourselves with what fort we could inside the patch of shade which the bi afforded to talk for some time on such everyday topi
the prospects of a badly needed rain, the bewildering va

(Continued on Page 45)

(Continued from Page 42)

iti which Mexican generals were imposing on cattle, er brisk rise, the new tungsten discoveries just north . say we talked; the sheriff did, and I helped out os I could. But Savage contented himself with an sic al fragmentary phrase. Conversation came from li water from a dried-out pump—in jerky dashes rich priming.

e ind tortured the little willows by the scanty stream a housand grotesque posturings; the sun beat down o tark rocks about us; a bunch of cows came to the ith their calves, caught sight of us and departed ip ately, waving their tails on high. The cow-puncher the dismal task of pumping his tire.

Be down the road?" Savage asked, and as Reed e "Thought so when I saw those piles of busted le Bob, that's first-degree murder." After which un- e gush he subsided to thick uncompromising silence. sheriff explained the circumstances leading to those s glass fragments.

ter to let the fellows go than have them hire a re who'd get it into their heads they could beat the in," he concluded. "Besides, I don't want to go t Chiricahua just yet; I'm after Big Tom Williams."

vge made a sound resembling that which the Indians n sed in place of an articulate exclamation.

W met up with him a week back." The sheriff went o count the incident of the bootlegger's bold defiance. ot to get that hombre now," he growled.

hibition," said Bill Savage, "is plumb nonsense. n day we wasn't bothered by such triflin' laws."

It not my law," Reed answered bitterly. "I didn't e , but I'm up against enforcing it." He looked ag in the eyes. "This fellow Williams has a road ewere over there," he waved his hand toward the ; a road he carries whisky by to Chiri- ua The election's coming on this fall and ac the Republicans are making a lot out t ecause—they claim—I don't stop boot- it."

vge shook his head.

Fol law!" he muttered. "It's you and n Williams for it, Bob. If you ketch him 'r the best man. None o' my business."

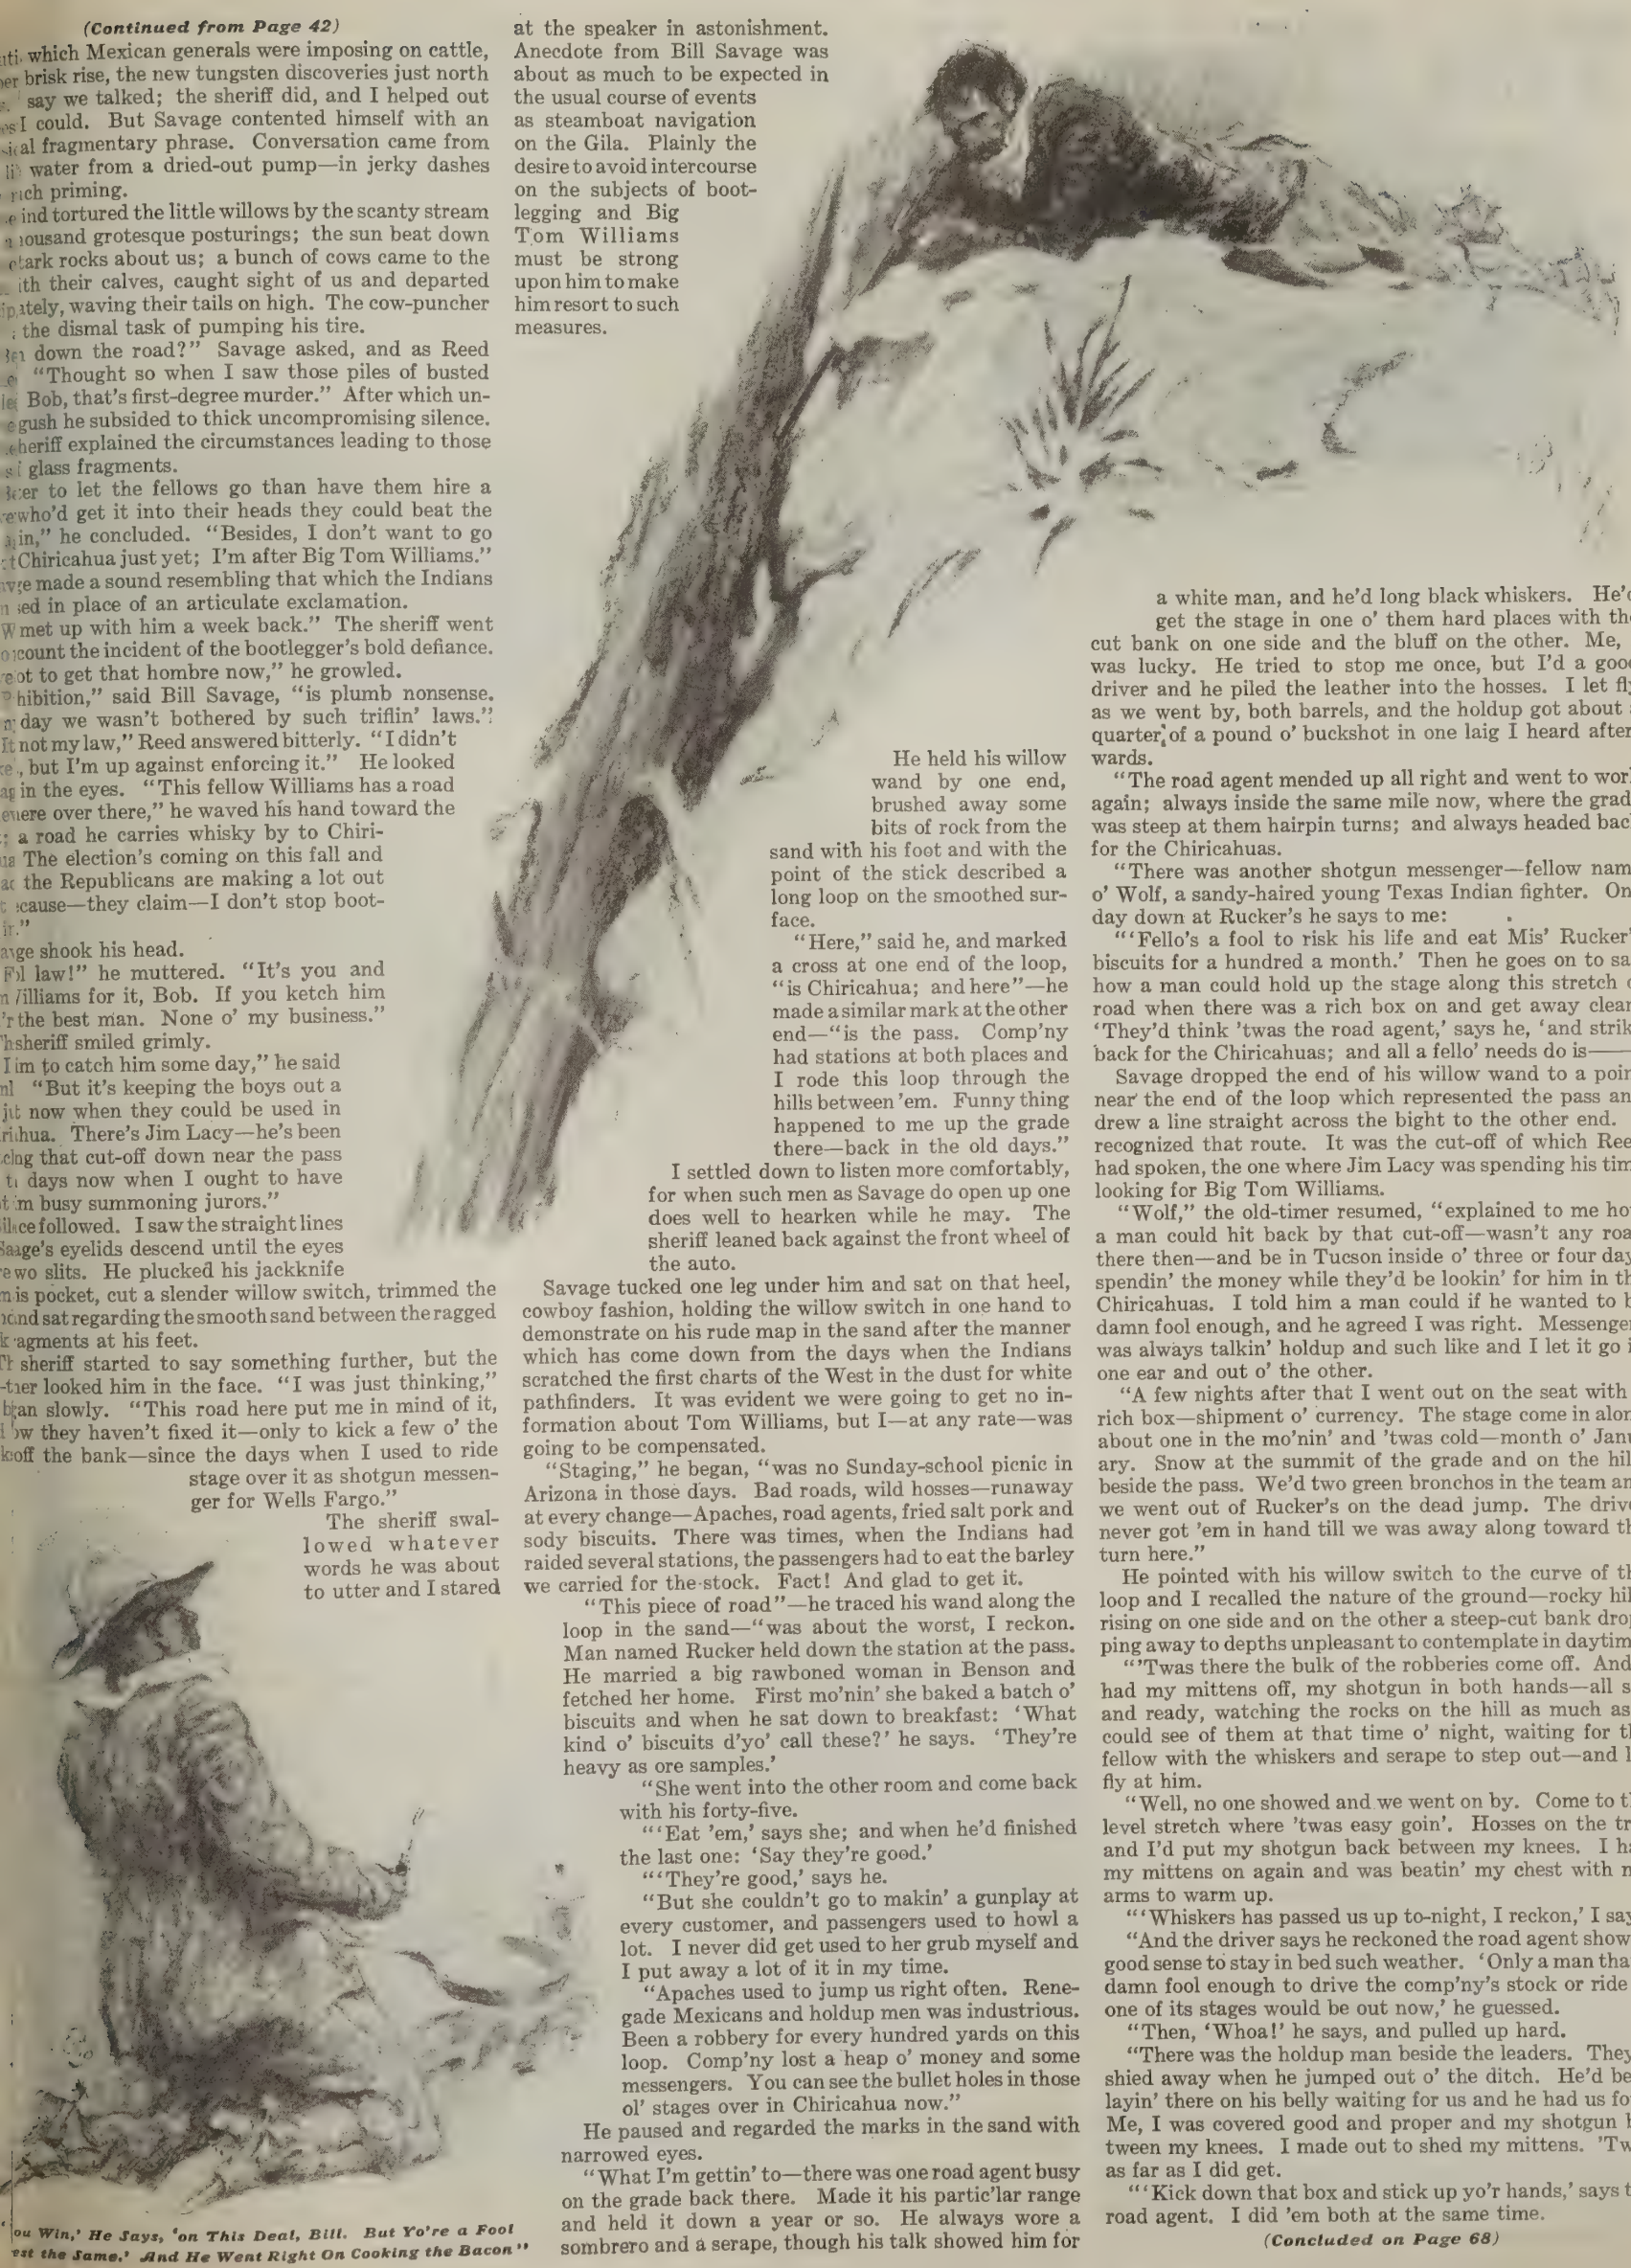
The sheriff smiled grimly.

I im to catch him some day," he said nl "But it's keeping the boys out a jut now when they could be used in rihua. There's Jim Lacy—he's been cing that cut-off down near the pass t days now when I ought to have t im busy summoning jurors."

ilence followed. I saw the straight lines Savage's eyelids descend until the eyes e wo slits. He plucked his jackknife n is pocket, cut a slender willow switch, trimmed the nand sat regarding the smooth sand between the ragged k agments at his feet.

The sheriff started to say something further, but the ther looked him in the face. "I was just thinking," began slowly. "This road here put me in mind of it, ow they haven't fixed it—only to kick a few o' the koff the bank—since the days when I used to ride stage over it as shotgun messen- ger for Wells Fargo."

The sheriff swallowed whatever words he was about to utter and I stared at the speaker in astonishment. Anecdote from Bill Savage was about as much to be expected in the usual course of events as steamboat navigation on the Gila. Plainly the desire to avoid intercourse on the subjects of bootlegging and Big Tom Williams must be strong upon him to make him resort to such measures.



'ou Win,' He Says, 'on This Deal, Bill. But Yo're a Fool 'est the Same.' And He Went Right On Cooking the Bacon"

He held his willow wand by one end, brushed away some bits of rock from the sand with his foot and with the point of the stick described a long loop on the smoothed surface.

"Here," said he, and marked a cross at one end of the loop, "is Chiricahua; and here"—he made a similar mark at the other end—"is the pass. Comp'ny had stations at both places and I rode this loop through the hills between 'em. Funny thing happened to me up the grade there—back in the old days."

I settled down to listen more comfortably, for when such men as Savage do open up one does well to hearken while he may. The sheriff leaned back against the front wheel of the auto.

Savage tucked one leg under him and sat on that heel, cowboy fashion, holding the willow switch in one hand to demonstrate on his rude map in the sand after the manner which has come down from the days when the Indians scratched the first charts of the West in the dust for white pathfinders. It was evident we were going to get no information about Tom Williams, but I—at any rate—was going to be compensated.

"Staging," he began, "was no Sunday-school picnic in Arizona in those days. Bad roads, wild hosses—runaway at every change—Apaches, road agents, fried salt pork and sody biscuits. There was times, when the Indians had raided several stations, the passengers had to eat the barley we carried for the stock. Fact! And glad to get it.

"This piece of road"—he traced his wand along the loop in the sand—"was about the worst, I reckon. Man named Rucker held down the station at the pass. He married a big rawboned woman in Benson and fetched her home. First mo'nin' she baked a batch o' biscuits and when he sat down to breakfast: 'What kind o' biscuits d'yo' call these?' he says. 'They're heavy as ore samples.'

"She went into the other room and come back with his forty-five.

"'Eat 'em,' says she; and when he'd finished the last one: 'Say they're good.'

"'They're good,' says he.

"But she couldn't go to makin' a gunplay at every customer, and passengers used to howl a lot. I never did get used to her grub myself and I put away a lot of it in my time.

"Apaches used to jump us right often. Renegade Mexicans and holdup men was industrious. Been a robbery for every hundred yards on this loop. Comp'ny lost a heap o' money and some messengers. You can see the bullet holes in those ol' stages over in Chiricahua now."

He paused and regarded the marks in the sand with narrowed eyes.

"What I'm gettin' to—there was one road agent busy on the grade back there. Made it his partic'lar range and held it down a year or so. He always wore a sombrero and a serape, though his talk showed him for a white man, and he'd long black whiskers. He'd get the stage in one o' them hard places with the cut bank on one side and the bluff on the other. Me, I was lucky. He tried to stop me once, but I'd a good driver and he piled the leather into the hosses. I let fly as we went by, both barrels, and the holdup got about a quarter of a pound o' buckshot in one laig I heard afterwards.

"The road agent mended up all right and went to work again; always inside the same mile now, where the grade was steep at them hairpin turns; and always headed back for the Chiricahuas.

"There was another shotgun messenger—fellow name o' Wolf, a sandy-haired young Texas Indian fighter. One day down at Rucker's he says to me:

"'Fello's a fool to risk his life and eat Mis' Rucker's biscuits for a hundred a month.' Then he goes on to say how a man could hold up the stage along this stretch o' road when there was a rich box on and get away clean. 'They'd think 'twas the road agent,' says he, 'and strike back for the Chiricahuas; and all a fello' needs do is——"

Savage dropped the end of his willow wand to a point near the end of the loop which represented the pass and drew a line straight across the bight to the other end. I recognized that route. It was the cut-off of which Reed had spoken, the one where Jim Lacy was spending his time looking for Big Tom Williams.

"Wolf," the old-timer resumed, "explained to me how a man could hit back by that cut-off—wasn't any road there then—and be in Tucson inside o' three or four days spendin' the money while they'd be lookin' for him in the Chiricahuas. I told him a man could if he wanted to be damn fool enough, and he agreed I was right. Messengers was always talkin' holdup and such like and I let it go in one ear and out o' the other.

"A few nights after that I went out on the seat with a rich box—shipment o' currency. The stage come in along about one in the mo'nin' and 'twas cold—month o' January. Snow at the summit of the grade and on the hills beside the pass. We'd two green bronchos in the team and we went out of Rucker's on the dead jump. The driver never got 'em in hand till we was away along toward the turn here."

He pointed with his willow switch to the curve of the loop and I recalled the nature of the ground—rocky hills rising on one side and on the other a steep-cut bank dropping away to depths unpleasant to contemplate in daytime.

"'Twas there the bulk of the robberies come off. And I had my mittens off, my shotgun in both hands—all set and ready, watching the rocks on the hill as much as I could see of them at that time o' night, waiting for the fellow with the whiskers and serape to step out—and let fly at him.

"Well, no one showed and we went on by. Come to the level stretch where 'twas easy goin'. Hosses on the trot and I'd put my shotgun back between my knees. I had my mittens on again and was beatin' my chest with my arms to warm up.

"'Whiskers has passed us up to-night, I reckon,' I says.

"And the driver says he reckoned the road agent showed good sense to stay in bed such weather. 'Only a man that's damn fool enough to drive the comp'ny's stock or ride in one of its stages would be out now,' he guessed.

"Then, 'Whoa!' he says, and pulled up hard.

"There was the holdup man beside the leaders. They'd shied away when he jumped out o' the ditch. He'd been layin' there on his belly waiting for us and he had us foul. Me, I was covered good and proper and my shotgun between my knees. I made out to shed my mittens. 'Twas as far as I did get.

"'Kick down that box and stick up yo'r hands,' says the road agent. I did 'em both at the same time.

(Concluded on Page 68)

The Big Bull of the Shoshon

By HAL G. EVARTS

MEN who should know say that it is true. All those who have lived long lives on the headwaters of the Shoshone believe it. They say that a calf elk gives off no scent; that a coyote, the keenest-nosed animal of all the wild, will pass downwind and never turn; that the mountain lion, the lurking slayer of the hills, may almost step upon the motionless mite of new life and still be unaware of it. It must be true, for the long tawny shape which glided down the slope passed within a few feet of the two calves. The old cows were far down in the timber, yet their scent was heavy in the quivering nostrils of the big cat—but when he could have touched the calves he passed them by without turning his head. If either had moved a muscle he would have seen it, but no calf elk will move an inch from the spot where its mother leaves it.

The lion crept like a noiseless shadow through the trees. One of the cows saw a movement thirty feet away and bounded wildly to her feet. Four sets of claws struck wickedly through the skin of her back as the killer fastened there, his teeth tearing at her neck as she plunged madly down the slope.

All through the night the two calves lay motionless and both were suffering the pangs of hunger when the bull-calf's mother slipped through the shadowy trees at dawn. The little bull, shaking with eagerness, sprang up to nuzzle her flank.

The she calf lay without a move. The warm milk scent reached her baby nostrils and she breathed deep of it. It was only the drag of starvation which at last caused her to move before her own mother returned. She scrambled suddenly to her feet and edged in beside the bull calf for a share of the meal.

The old cow angrily drove her off. She could conquer her fear of the mountain lion, her deadliest enemy, and return to her own; nurse the motherless offspring of another she would not. This was not mere callous savagery, but stern necessity. There was but milk enough for one. The rules which govern the lives of the wild things of the hills are the rules of expediency, not those of tender sentiment. Self-preservation and the she brute's care of her own young are the guiding factors in the bitter struggle of all wild things to live, ruling to the exclusion of all less selfish aims. The bull calf did not know that he was but one tiny cog in the law—that some must die that others might live.

Given the history of any single animal met in the hills and it would prove conclusively that he survived only through the sacrifice of others. If he be a meat eater, then the mere fact that he exists is evidence of a continual series of victims who died that he might live. If he be not a meat eater his past life would reveal a thousand near-tragedies through which he had won only because the next one fell in his stead; that his life was spared at the expense of another's life—spared that he might live to be winter-killed in his old age, and this only to the end that scavenger beasts and the meat-eating birds of the hills might feed upon his wasted frame and so keep life in their own.

White men know this as a law of Nature and are prone to view it as a planless scheme of haphazard killing without point or purpose. The Shoshones who had once peopled the head reaches of the river knew it for Manitou's law of balance—the law which regulated the numbers of the animal tribes—and they saw the intricate plan and reason for it all. They knew that each nonkiller had some weakness which rendered him not too difficult a prey for the killers; that every meat eater had his limitations which prevented his killing too wantonly and thus exterminating the browsing and grazing tribes.

The lion had struck down one cow, while the other escaped, and thus the bull calf survived at another's expense. As the old cow moved on he followed her, unconscious of the fact that Manitou held him gripped in the meshes of the law. He was conscious only of a full stomach and a returned sense of well-being after the long fast. He capered awkwardly about on his baby legs and butted the she calf playfully. The heifer calf tried repeatedly to nurse and each time was driven off. She was very weak by nightfall and flinched away from even his tiny rushes. When the old cow left her bed in the spruce at dawn the heifer calf lay still and the little bull followed his mother on alone. He had lost his first playmate in the struggle to exist. He looked back once and could see nothing of her. A flight of magpies were chattering toward the spot and a single raven wheeled overhead, making one spiraling tour of observation before swooping down to the feast.

Manitou has endowed some beasts with a memory so short that all bitterness of tragedy is soon obliterated and the knowledge gained through the circumstance is all that remains of it. In less than an hour the bull calf had forgotten. Even then he was menaced by the relentless workings of the law.

Jacques Lear hunted for meat upon a ridge that flanked the bottoms where the old cow was feeding. His sturdy six-year-old son, Matt Lear, traveled with his father. The boy was old for his years, having known only adults. He was the first white child born in the Shoshone Valley and playmates of his ow were unknown to His fairy tales were the folk tales of his Fr Canadian father and the Indian legends of his shone mother.

From the one he learned of the workings of the man's Nature. From his mother, Meteetse, the last cess of the Shoshones, he learned of the wise teachir Manitou. Between the two he was taught the art of ing signs as other children are taught to read the pr page. Matt Lear suddenly pointed to the bottom spoke one word.

"Wapiti," he said softly, and Jacques knew that th had seen an elk. It was the name by which his I mother called them.

He lined down the long barrel of his rifle as the co the edge of the timber and grazed across an opening trees, but lowered it as the boy spoke again.

"Ne-Wapiti," he said as the calf trotted from the ti

It was no thrill of sympathy which caused Jacques to hold his hand. His law was the law—the same as t the wild things themselves. The few settlers on the lived by killing. They killed for meat and clothing, f which they traded for the simple necessities of life needed fresh meat for himself and family. His own first, and the fact that the calf would perish if he sh cow mattered as little to him as the desertion o motherless calf had mattered to the old cow herse hour past.

But Jacques sought for a young bull or a fat barre and the meat of a nursing mother would be lean and t This he knew only as a fact, but his son knew wha behind the fact. From his mother he had learned tha was a provision of Manitou, to make the meat of a nu cow less palatable and thus drape animal mothers wi least partial immunity from man, the most ruthless of all.

The wind blew from the cow to the hunters on the r so she could not scent the menace, and Wapiti fr round the meadow with no thought of the danger hovered near.

As they entered the timber at the far edge o opening he heard a shattering report. Once he lived at another's expense. Jac had slain a yearling cow. Wa mother fled at the sound and he r after her, his heart beating wildly. meaning of the sound was unknov him, but he felt the fear of it. came easily to him. For countless erations his ancestors had one an felt fear. Wapiti's relation to the was that of fear. Not that he w cringing beast; on the contrar sprang from a noble race. Manit most gracious gift had been th fear—which was but the realizati his own weaknesses, and only thr the exercise of caution bred from did the antlered tribes survive.

The great bands of elk that wintered in the Shoshone bott were breaking up. Cows were g off by themselves to calve,

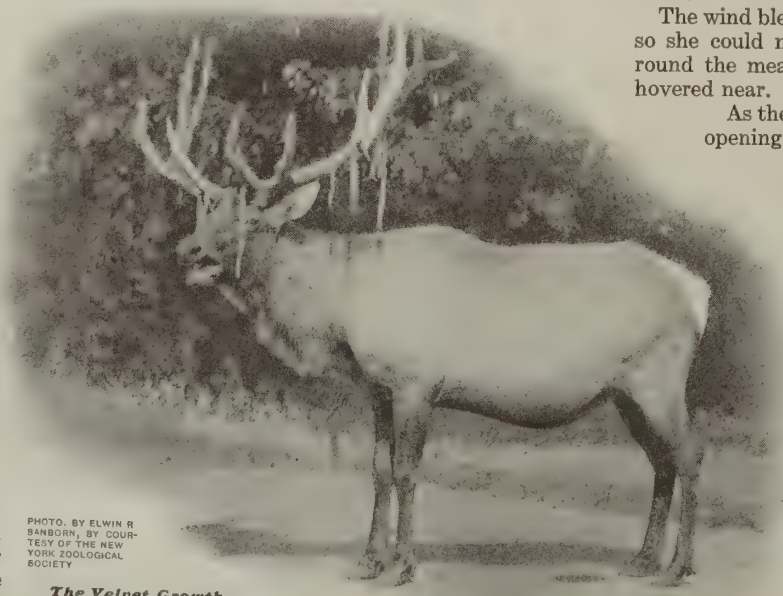


PHOTO. BY ELWIN R SANBORN, BY COURTESY OF THE NEW YORK ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY

The Velvet Growth is Proportionate to the Animal's Physical Well-Being and His Antlers are Indicative of the Conditions Under Which He Wintered

(Continued on Page 49)

(Continued from Page 46)

mling in smaller droves and drifting toward the er nge.
ng ith fifty other cows, calves and yearlings, Wapiti
s rther grazed slowly up Seclusion Creek and over n art Pass; down the Thoroughfare to the big bins at the head of the Yellowstone, the summer e f the elk. They reveled in the rank knee-deep and the bull calf grew strong.
rou d him the law was working; from the smallest to g, all life was touched by it. Insects preyed on sts and were themselves preyed upon by the birds and the trout in the streams, while they in turn ficed that the lives of hawks and mink might go t hawks and mink were not killed in turn it mat-r in Manitou's scheme of things—for eventually e and the lesser insects fed upon them.
dless circle temporarily passed Wapiti by and n ntouched. His mind was not one to learn from saps of others.
hie things which d nim personally
asting impres-
His true that he l om things which o ers of his own
f ose things were tpe which roused
h saving grace.
heeared the crash-pos from which his r ed, but this was ou fear and therevaue. From the lie of other races of lsie learned noth-
a.
e n August the vre sharp with the sts of the high ry In early morn-
he tall grass bent derfoot, but as u thawed it the s resumed their
iss. Only bitter drs and cures the tn hay. The cows
gwing restless and grom one pocket
rxt. They sounded
h:h-pitched barks
f quently.
ei Wapiti heard a snd in the hills.
svery bugle notes pealed among the rough coun-
g above the valleys where the cows had summered.
ew days of increasing clamor a wonderful creature he band. He looked much like Wapiti's mother that he wore great branching antlers on his head.
rpled with them throughout the fall and early in mer he herded them back across the divide to the range.
e Wapiti suddenly missed the tyrant who had ruled r so long. He expected his return, but he saw no chim and the bugle notes were no longer heard.
eollowing spring Wapiti found another calf at his es side and she had no further use for him. But he hi other things to occupy his mind. Two bulbs of velvet sprouted from his skull. These grew rapidly last they towered in two slightly curving rods a full ei inches above his head. In the late summer the 'aich fed the velvet sheath dried up and it shriveled cked away from the hardened inner core.
ti tried these new weapons out upon a feathery spruce, tenderly at first, then more vigorously.
e had ruined a dozen young trees he stood forth cvith a pair of polished spears. He was now a year-pike bull. He was vastly proud, but he was to lose ll too soon. Wapiti belonged to that tribe whose are deciduous, falling each year as the leaves and ng anew each spring. Late in February his antlers rd round the bur and he shed first one and a day ie next. He had only a short time in which to be nd of his nakedness of head, for the velvet growth
e sprouting shortly after the falling of the discarded iti felt no desire to spend the summer with the ut instead retired to a rock-rimmed pocket near line and spent the season nursing the tender velvet from harm. It branched out and up, having five on each side where but one straight shaft had before.

other bulls and a blacktail buck shared his lofty . Many times during the summer Wapiti knew the Three times some great grizzly came swaying h the pocket, his swagger announcing that fear was portion—the opposite in fact.

Each time one came the buck and the oldest bull rose and watched him warily. Their attitudes showed controlled fear and from this Wapiti and the other young bull felt the quickening of their own. Each time the grizzly passed on after a brief look at them. Once certain that they were aware of his presence and thus eliminating the chances of his stalking close enough for a rush, he lost interest in them. He knew that he had not the requisite speed to overtake Wapiti in a fair race and he was far too wise to waste time and energy in useless chases.

Then Wapiti learned the great fear, the awful dread which all horned game are doomed to feel when the wind bears the message that the tawny killer is near. He was grazing with the other young bull in the narrow strip of grass between the timber and the rim of the pocket. The shifting breeze carried a new scent to them. Instantly the buck was in full flight along under the rims, followed by the old bull with his velvet growth thrown low upon his back as he exerted all his speed. It was then that one of the weaknesses showed up. Wapiti knew from their actions that the danger was grave. Before he could wheel to follow them the other young bull fled in a blind panic. His was uncontrolled fear and led him to his death. He stopped not even to locate the source or direction of the menace, but plunged down a game trail which led down through the timber on the steep slope below the rims. In his inexperience Wapiti followed one leap behind him.

A long shape was launched from an overhanging limb and a lioness fastened on the bull ahead. At the same instant her half-grown cub sprang for Wapiti. The leap was short, but the young cat's foreclaws fastened on his rump and the hooks of the hind feet slashed his legs as it struggled to retain its hold. It fell off at last and Wapiti ran on for miles. He returned to the pocket no more, but sought out another summer home. He trampled the soft dirt near a sidehill spring and made a bull wallow, in which he rolled, plastering his cuts with mud.

Thereafter he knew that controlled fear was his salvation—uncontrolled fear his worst enemy. Never again did he rush off in a panic without first making sure that the direction of his flight led away from the danger.

The fall brought him a set of five-point antlers and also brought ambitions. He tried out his voice and was pleased with it, finding no fault with the shrill quaver of his bugle note. He descended from his lofty home and joined a band of cows. He paraded his glory before them for a full three days before an old herd bull came down and drove him off.

Wapiti scouted on the flanks of the cow herds throughout the running moon and followed the migration across the range to the winter feed, feeling the urge of the season but getting soundly thrashed whenever he attempted to cut out a few cows for his own. He added his peevish bugling to that of other disgruntled young bulls until the whole expanse of the hills rang with the music of discontent.

Wapiti's knowledge of man was derived solely from the actions of other elk and from no actual experience of his own—and for that reason was not large. Older elk moved off from the man scent and were uneasy when the deep reports came from afar. From this he knew that men were to be feared by his kind.

During the first heavy storm of the winter he grazed out into a long opening in the Shoshone bottoms. At the far edge of it stood a solid mass of logs before which was a small animal who walked about on two legs. The wind brought the man scent and he knew then that the small figure was of that kind.

A spike bull fed with him, and another weakness was evidenced in each of them. The fear was so vague that its effect was counteracted by curiosity. The two bulls stood and gazed at the small figure of Matt Lear. His voice reached them as he called to someone inside. A larger figure emerged from an opening, which suddenly appeared among the logs, and moved into the timber close behind. The two bulls stayed on, pawing the snow away for each bite of the cured grass and watching the boy.

Jacques had circled swiftly downwind and come up from the opposite direction. The first Wapiti knew of it was when the roar of a muzzle-loader sounded from the timber edge of his own side of the open. The spike bull gave a great coughing outrush of breath and the fresh blood scent was hot in Wapiti's flaring nostrils. He fled across the snowy meadow and the spike bull ran with him, staggering in his stride. He gave one last desperate bound and fell with his neck doubled back beneath his body—fell to rise no more, and Wapiti ran on alone.

The effects of the slashing claws had left him thin and he had not yet plumped out, so looked less sleek than the luckless spike. But he would have been judged fat enough except for the other's presence.

Thereafter Wapiti classed man as his enemy and feared him second only to the big yellow cat. He spent no more time in the bottoms, but climbed to a long bald ridge, the crest of which was kept scoured free of snow by the winds which followed each storm. Here he found a number of other bulls, their differences buried and forgotten since they no longer contended for the favor of the cows.

There was game in abundance in the bottoms and those who hunted for meat did not trouble to climb the adjacent ridges. Wapiti wintered unmolested and only heard the dread reports softened by distance.

His next velvet growth was heavier than ever before. It seemed to grow and lengthen endlessly; swept outward and upward and at last arched back and toward the center, the perfect shape called the basket spread by the trophy seekers.

Wapiti's tribe are not long-lived and so reach maturity as three-year-olds. When the inner horn grew solid under the sheath he rubbed off the shreds of velvet and polished his points on the young second-growth trees. He now had a perfect set of six-point antlers, wonderful in length and spread, beautifully proportioned and with massive beam. This beam was very dark, but the tip of each point was keen and ivory white. He had reached his prime. Below him he could hear the yelping barks of the cows, excited at the nearness of the season. The forest echoed with the pealing bugles of lesser bulls.

After a week of ever-increasing clamor he sounded his own note. It was round and clear, but with more volume than formerly, and carried a hoarse undertone. Then he dropped down from his lofty home—down through the dense spruce belt to the land of the lodgepole pine, open parks and the cow elk. Far down an open meadow he spied a bunch of cows. Forward he thrust his head, the massive antlers lowered almost to the level of his back as he issued his clarion edict. The old herd bull with the cows heard the hoarse undertone and understood—knew that this was no paltry bull but a big six-pointer come to take his own. Eyes flashing and nostrils distended, he pawed the ground and returned the challenge.

Wapiti advanced majestically down the long open, pausing to bugle once again. He covered the last hundred yards with a rush and the antlers of the two met with a ringing clash. Again and again they charged. It was a battle without rules or quarter and they struggled long. For an hour at a time they stood with locked horns, neck muscles bulging and bodies heaving as each exerted every ounce of magnificent strength to drive the other back and force him from his feet; then drew suddenly apart, charging desperately time after time only to clash horn against horn. Neither could find an opening behind that defense.

The cows, indifferent to the outcome, retired to the timber and slept, but the two bulls battled on. An acre of soft sod was torn and uprooted under their churning feet. After four hours, during which the valley was tortured by the clattering crash of horns, the older bull began to weaken.

PHOTO. BY ELWIN R. SANBORN, BY COURTESY OF THE NEW YORK ZOÖLOGICAL SOCIETY

The Great Bands of Elk That Had Wintered in the Shoshone Bottoms Were Breaking Up

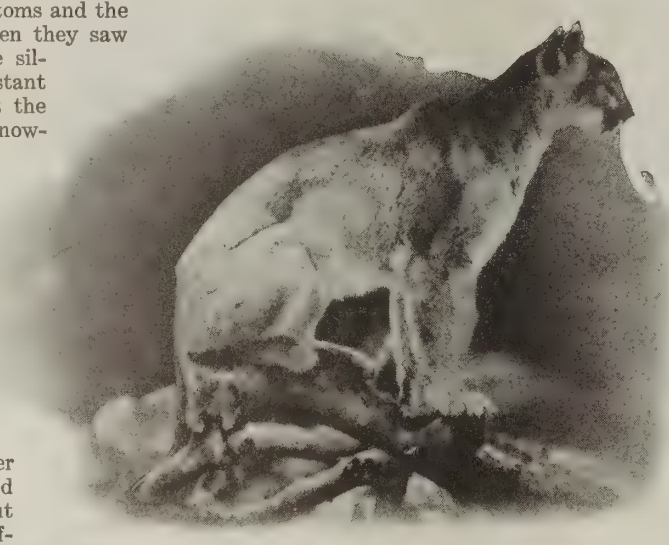
In one last furious lock he failed. Slowly at first, then more rapidly, he gave ground in short circles under the heaving pressure of the other's drive. The bloody froth dripped from his jaws and streaked his breast, but his eyes glared undying hate.

Wapiti pressed him without respite and with one mighty wrench he overthrew him. As the old bull gained his feet the brow tines of his adversary raked his side and flank. Twice more he was overthrown and the flashing brow tines cut him. Then a royal tine swept full up against him, driven by a terrible upward surge of Wapiti's head and neck. It sank deep between two ribs and a gush of blood bubbled forth. Then he fled—an old bull whipped from his band and destined to spend his remaining years alone.

Wapiti stood proudly in the open park, his sleek fall coat flashing against the dark background of the forest as he issued his challenge again. The bull calf had won through the perils of the law to his rightful kingship. He had come into his own at last.

Every winter thereafter for many years Jacques and Matt Lear saw a great bull who brought more cows across the divide to the winter range than any other herd bull. And each season he deserted them shortly after the crossing. Matt Lear knew that fatherhood in the antlered tribes carries with it no responsibility; that the bull elk who remains the year round with his wives and offspring is the bull elk of fairyland. It was Manitou's plan that bulls should leave the cows at the end of rutting and consort with them no more for the next ten months.

Other men who sometimes threaded the valley in the dead of winter also caught glimpses of the mighty bull—only long-range glimpses, it is true, for Wapiti avoided the bottoms and the proximity of man. When they saw him at all it was while silhouetted upon some distant rim or outlined against the white background of a snow-clad slope. They marveled at the spread of his antlers and came to speak of him as the Big Bull of the Shoshone.



The Mountain Lion, the Lurking Slayer of the Hills

Jacques' interest was only casual. As long as young bulls and fat cows were abundant he would waste no powder and lead on any tough and stringy herd bull. But with Matt Lear it was different. The low country at the foot of the hills was settling up and a village now stood at the mouth of the valley forty miles below. These men hunted not for meat alone but for trophies and they spoke of record heads. Some day when he had a gun of his own he would take the horns of this giant bull.

Matt Lear knew the ways of Wapiti as no other did. He scoured the hills and studied the habits of the wild things. He applied himself to this schooling with a single-hearted purpose seldom equaled by those of his age who attend the school of books. Thus he fitted himself for his future calling. Later he would live as the other settlers of the valley lived, to hunt and trap. They lived to kill and killed to live, an integral part of the endless circle. Matt Lear knew no other way. He therefore learned the habits of game and fur that he might later attain the highest efficiency as a killer.

The big bull, being easily recognized, was the best subject for the study of his kind. The boy noted that Wapiti was even more shy than other old bulls. When he climbed the ridges upon which they wintered he found that many of these had grown careless from long immunity and were easily approached. Even after being apprised of danger they were slow to start. But Wapiti seemed to make swift decisions. His caution was never relaxed. He bedded down with the wind at his back and a fair field of view in front. When wind or crunching snow warned him of the boy's approach he was off upon the instant. From this and many other things Matt Lear learned that Wapiti was a superior bull—that the fear was more easily quickened in him than in other bulls. And Wapiti's was controlled fear.

Early in the fall of Matt's sixteenth year a sportsman came up the valley and made his base camp near Jacques' cabin. Matt Lear knew the man who acted as his guide and went over to visit the camp. From the guide he learned that this man was a famous surgeon from a distant city who spent each succeeding vacation hunting in the hills; that his wealth was great, far beyond imagining, and that his one hobby was the collecting of fine animal specimens. Matt Lear knew only those who killed for money or its equivalent. This man paid money to those who showed him where to hunt and kill. Conditions were thus reversed.

The boy was shy, having known few men, and he spoke but little. His eyes followed the surgeon's every move and Enright divined the truth—that this half-wild youth looked upon him as a being wonderful among men, one whose wealth and mode of life set him apart from other men. He tried to draw him out and spoke to him of simple things, but these fell upon Matt's ears as miracles previously unknown. His respect increased with every word. When at last the boy gained confidence to speak of the things he knew, Enright found this wonder to be mutual.

PHOTOS. BY ELWIN R. SANBORN, BY COURTESY OF THE NEW YORK ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY

No Calf Elk Will Move an Inch From the Spot Where its Mother Leaves It

The surgeon's spare time had been spent outdoors in the study of animal ways and habits, but this time had necessarily been restricted. Even so, he felt that his knowledge of the subject was far-reaching—and found that it was merely infantile when compared to the knowledge of this boy.

The gods of Matt Lear's parents were different gods. Manitou, the god of his mother Meteetse, seemed so much nearer and more easily understood than the distant Creator of his father. Manitou's words were all of the daily habits of wild things and the reasons for these habits. Every day the wisdom of Manitou's teachings was proved before his very eyes. He had long since questioned Jacques as to why there should be two different gods in the same household.

"There is but one, my son," Jacques had told him. "All those who have lived their lives in the open know that some great mind planned all Nature. It matters little by what name we know him."

So Matt Lear told Enright of the work of Manitou—told it as he himself had found it to be true. As his self-confidence expanded under the surgeon's interest he spoke of the law, which was the endless circle, and of its purpose, which was the balancing of the animal tribes. He knew the difference between courage and ferocity, between fear and cowardice, and their relation to the law. He told Enright of the fear—controlled and uncontrolled; of the weaknesses of each nonkiller and the limitations of each meat eater.

In a few short weeks Enright learned more of his chosen hobby than in all his past life combined.

Enright's object was to take an elk head for his collection. There were many elk who did not follow the migration across the divide but summered on the Shoshone slope. But they found no bulls with the cows and the guide was puzzled.

This Was No Paltry Bull, But a Big Six-Pointer Come to Take His Own

"They should be now," he frequently sai is time for t son."

Matt Lea his head.

"The seas yet begun," "True, it is t time for r That it means bu thing—th snow will la the hills next Manitou h back the r moon so th will not dro calves while the drifts still lay deep in the valleys. will take M'sieur Enright to the high rims you that the bulls are there."

They acted upon this and there they found them. heads were poor, the antlers slender and irregular. suggested that trophy hunting had exterminated th bulls, but Matt Lear knew that this surmise was

Bulls who wear massive antlers one year may gro poor set the next. The velvet growth is proportio the animal's physical well-being and his antlers are tive of the conditions under which he wintered. Ma explained this and advanced as the reason that had but to look at the antlers of the bulls to determi the whole elk tribe had fared the preceding winte this last one had been long and hard.

Enright hunted for quality, not quantity, and wo shoot until he found a head worthy of a place amon others on his walls. He left the hills without h Before leaving he talked with Matt Lear at length u law of the endless circle. He knew the boy for a t that in different environment he would have appli self to books with the same absorption which showed for reading signs.

"There is another name and another purpose endless circle of Manitou," he told Matt Lear. "Y found one purpose for yourself—that of regulat numbers of the animal tribes. I will give you the na let you find the other purpose. Men call it evoluti

"I'll give you one point to work on. A good man sand years ago there was a small beast, the thr Eohippus. Our horse of to-day descends direct fro The relation of the Eohippus to the law was that To-day some of our best-bred horses shy away fro ows along the trail."

He took from his pocket a common screw and t the point.

"Call this point the Eohippus and the end of t spiral at the top the horse. Think of Manitou's circle as the threads round this screw—the circle d meet, but each completed circuit is a trifle higher t last. Then think of each spiral as ten thousand y time, for time as we measure it has little meaning plans of Manitou, who lives on forever. Rememb men pick the most mettlesome high-bred horses selective breeding of choice strains, those whose q they wish to see handed down. If you can assor scraps of information in your mind, then when I com next year you can tell me another purpose of the circle."

As he followed his trap line over the hills that Matt Lear carried with him the screw and day after traced with his finger t ral from the Eohippus horse. As he strove t this problem he als force of habit contin study of the ways of and fur. He found Wa alert than in the pas antlers in common wit of other bulls were po it was not this alone. lost much of his lordl of carriage, and Mat out of his vast knowl wild life guessed the Late in the season Wap been whipped from hi by a young bull in h prime. With his great head ing dejectedly he had travel trail over which he himself h so many others, off by him die.

Matt Lear found that th of Wapiti were interwover the knotty problem roused right's words. He made bu wa in unraveling it. It was these thoughts of Wapiti h a last led to its solution. When he thought of the bri horses handing down their qualities it occurred m iat even though Wapiti, the greatest of all bulls, oa ed his prime, yet his qualities had been handed t many hundreds of elk.

(Concluded on Page 53

(Concluded from Page 50)

h pondered over the fact that the best-bred horses a shadows along the trail he was conscious of the a Wapiti was a very shy bull. This blended imper- l with his thoughts of the fear and its relation to w and suddenly the fragmentary shreds of thought u ed into the whole. He knew!

d btedly there were those among every tribe of ll s who exercised their fear to better purpose than olesser brain, and through this quicker response to liv l longer than their fellows. Naturally then their n nts had been more numerous. All along the trail th Eohippus to the horse the way was dotted with the s smaller circles, the circles of each individual's span e, ut the sluggards had fallen first. Not invariably, e was still the element of chance with individuals, n ie main those with a quick sense of controlled fear t ond the mass. The horse who shied at shadows n possessed of the remnants of Eohippus' fear.

a other purpose of Manitou was to make each tribe r.

ie after he ceased to look upon Wapiti merely as an a o be killed. He stood for the improvement of his

h Enright's pack train came winding up the valley e ll Matt Lear went down to meet it. As he drew up le he surgeon's horse he greeted him as if their last e ution had been interrupted only for an instant, not ar

I ve found it," he said simply. "Manitou's real pur- in he law is to improve."

ic Enright nodded assent as he smiled down into the e er face, knowing that his seed of thought had fallen a rtile soil and sprouted.

stad of lessening, Matt Lear's respect for Enright a d ripened with every hour spent in his company. dluded the time when his friend should leave and et im.

helk herds had wintered well and the bulls were in e norn than the season past. Enright at last brought he ead of a splendid bull. He was well pleased and no ced it the prize of his collection. It was this elation ch ave Matt Lear the clew to a way in which—even though far away—he would still be remembered by his friend. If only he could make a gift more highly prized than this latest trophy, then most assuredly Enright would frequently think of him.

"If M'sieur Enright would care to have it I will some day send him a better one," he offered.

"I'm afraid that is impossible," Enright smiled. "There are no better heads than this."

"But surely—far better!" the boy stated. "I myself have seen him often. Men speak of him as the Big Bull of the Shoshone."

The guide nodded.

"I have heard of him," he said. "He is said to be a monster bull."

"Then why has no one taken him?" Enright asked.

"For the reason that he summers far beyond the divide in the high country where few men go. He comes back late, after the trophy hunters have left the river. Those who live here hunt for meat alone and the meat of this old bull would not be good. Therefore he still lives—unless he has died this very summer of old age. I will buy a gun with the money for my winter's catch, and if he still lives I will procure his horns for you."

Enright broke camp on the following day, but Matt Lear's sense of loss was lightened by his promise to return. As the surgeon rode down the trail the boy stood gazing after him and in his hand he gripped a rifle, Enright's own, and two full boxes of glistening shells.

"Here's the gun," Enright had said in parting. "Now don't forget that you're going to get those record horns."

And he had gone on with no least thought that he would ever see the head of the fabled bull.

The rifle was one such as Matt Lear had never dreamed of owning. One did not have to tamp powder and ball down the barrel for each succeeding shot. It handled brass cartridges and could be fired many times without reloading—a gun such as only rich men could buy.

While the pack train was still visible in the distance Matt Lear set forth to scour the hills for the record bull. He was still essentially a killer; knew only to live by killing, but his views had been qualified by his knowledge of the real purpose of the law. The gaining of this truth had been simultaneous with the loss of his desire to kill the bull. It had seemed that to do this would be to obstruct the workings of the circle. But he knew, too, the value men attached to record heads. Wapiti had been whipped from his band and would hand down his qualities no more. He lived now only to die of old age in some obscure spot where his massive antlers would be lost to men.

He watched the migration lanes, but the big bull failed to come. The routes were not always the same, so he ransacked the high hills in his search, but Wapiti was not to be found in his old haunts. He began to fear that the old bull had died on the summer range and that his hopes of a fine gift for his friend would never be fulfilled. But he persisted in his search even after the last stragglers had come back to the winter feed.

Wapiti had not followed the migration to the summer range the preceding spring, but remained behind on the Shoshone side, electing to let his old bones bleach on the same slope of the divide that had seen his birth. The deposed monarch drowsed away the summer in a grassy pocket high up among the rims. A few hours morning and evening he grazed, but for the most part he slept. He polished his points as usual in the fall, but felt no desire to go forth in search of cows. The season was in full swing about him, but the old once-dominating impulse was manifested only by a vague restlessness which sent him wandering aimlessly from one high pocket to the next.

The first few storms did not drive him down. Instead he pawed through the ever-deepening snow for what little grass he needed. Then a heavy storm swept across the hills and caught him high up among the peaks. Experience told him that this would be a long one and that the snow which fell now would lie in the hills till spring. But lethargy held him in its grip and he was disinclined to leave his comfortable bed in the spruce. That spark which impels all life to struggle to the last eventually drove him forth. The snowfall ceased on the third day and he started out to buck the drifts toward the lower feed.

Far off on a distant ridge Matt Lear hunted on the fresh tracking snow. He saw a dark speck plowing through the white of an open slope and started swiftly for the spot.

The old bull was weak and tired and cared little to exert himself. He stopped frequently to rest. Each succeeding attempt was more futile than the last. After a seemingly endless struggle against the drifts he came out of the timber on the lip of a bald ridge that overlooked the valley. He sprawled prone on the edge to rest, his head stretched forth and his lower jaw resting flat upon the snow to ease the weight of the massive horns. The details of the valley faded and blurred before his eyes. The bright light of the sun on the dazzling snow seemed to gray and dim and then turn dark. The Big Bull of the Shoshone heaved a sigh and made that last great migration of all elk to the summer feeding grounds.

And a bare hundred yards back up the slope Matt Lear was following along on the trail of the record bull.

MIND THE PAINT—By Berton Braley

THE door in the kitchen," said Mrs. George Gray, Addressing her middle-aged mate,
Is stained and discolored. I noticed to-day
It almost impossible state.
I had the maid rub it
Ad wipe it and scrub it n she made frenzied complaint, ut till it looks queer,
o ask you, my dear,
o ing home a small can of paint,
n also a brush and some turpentine too.
'soo small a job for a painter to do."

lo Mrs. Gray, you wot not what you've done.
o words sounded harmless and yet you have spun a web of black magic.
ou know not how tragic—
u whoa, there, my muse, for the tale's scarce begun!

MiGeorge Gray, like a dutiful man, ought home the paint in a nice little can,
n that was innocent-looking enough nd labeled "Gloss White"; but the Fates will agree Tere better for him were it filled up with stuff ke cyanide, lyddite or else T. N. T.
Iepened the can, stirred its contents with care, nd then on the door he began to apply
A rst coat of paint with no small savoir faire, hile Mrs. Gray watched with affectionate eye
He husband's endeavor; and little she thought
Wat havoc she'd started, what ruin she'd wrought.

No Mr. George Gray was no clumsy old dub.
e finished that door in a scant half an hour,
Tn scrubbed up his hands and went off to his club, emarking, "That's done"; unaware of the power Malevolent Destiny held over him.
T next night he glanced at the door.
"It looks dim,"
He thoughtfully stated. "I'll get out my brush
And give it another coat. Truly, the white
I put on last night seems a faint bluish blush.
One more application will fix it all right."

The coat was applied. Next evening he eyed
His work with anxiety rather than pride.
"My dear," he complained
With voice slightly strained,
"It's true it looks better by far than before.
But still, to be perfect, it needs one coat more."
He gave it that coat and next morning he viewed it
And rushed back at night to the paint and renewed it.
In fact, to cut short
This part, I'll report
He gave that door seventeen coatings of white
And, after all that, wasn't satisfied—quite.

II

MR. GEORGE GRAY on the day after that Wavered a moment when starting to town,
Picked up his overcoat, put on his hat,
Then with a frown
Laid them both down,
Sneaked for the kitchen and gazed at it long.
"Nope, it's all wrong," he said, "totally wrong!
The rest of the woodwork won't match with that door,
I rise to remark;
It looks dull and dark.
I'll give the whole kitchen one coat—and no more."

Well, you know the rest,
Or it might be guessed.
He toiled in that kitchen like one who's possessed.
Neglected his office, neglected his wife,
He had but one interest left in his life—
To paint and to paint.
He broke all restraint,
For when he had finished
The kitchen he cried,
"The pantry looks dingy
And cheap, mean and stingy."
With zeal undiminished
His brush was applied.
And thus he went on through the rest of the house,
A drunkard on paint with a permanent souse,
Who covered the walls
Of rooms and of halls
With coat after coat and with can after can
Of gleaming Gloss White. The unfortunate man
Was gripped in a habit far worse for the brain
Than drugs such as heroin, morphine, cocaine!
His good wife would plead and his children would weep,
But he went on painting with maniac fury.
He'd paint when awake and he'd paint when asleep
Until it was plain that a medical jury
Would have to take note of his piteous state.
But George wouldn't quit
For a long enough space
So the experts could sit
To consider his case,
And it took seven men, or it may have been eight,
To seize him and bind him.
And now you will find him
Within a strong cell, where's he's happy, it seems,
Because in his lunatic fancies and dreams
He thinks—just to paraphrase Kipling somewhat—He's located up in a heavenly spot
And painting with brushes of asteroid's hair
The thousand-league walls of Elysium there!

MORAL

Beware of the paint can, or wiser and sadder
You'll learn that it biteth as sharp as an adder.
Leave paint to the painters, or if you must do it
Beware of the white—for there's no finish to it;
And—one coat or twenty—it never seems quite
As good as it should be. The black is the best:
One coat shows as well as a hundred by test!

FADE OUT

By FRANK CONDO

ILLUSTRATED BY RALPH PALLEN COLEM

SOME people might conclude that I got all the worst of that deal, and that any mental solace coming my way could never square up for the fifteen thousand dollars which I trustingly took out of my hip pocket and handed those people. Maybe so. It was what might be called a fifteen-thousand-dollar joke, and that's the best I'll ever get out of it.

The money has gone where the woodbine twineth, and of course I don't mind that money. It was of no more importance to me than so much spinal column. But gone it is, and I am better satisfied than I was a few days ago. Kotch Creamer likewise feels more like a human being than he did, and after all Kotch and I were the main sufferers.

Until the afternoon he dies Kotch Creamer will regard me as a gifted genius whose talents have been misdirected, but this is not so. I merely saw a place to go in, and I went while the door was open; and to get both arms round what happened out there in Santa Barbara, California, it would be just as well to crank up our harkers and hark back to the early days when I first knew Ollie Thorpe and met but did not know Kotch Creamer.

I think it was about twelve years ago—maybe thirteen. At that time I was a sprightly and eager-eyed optimist with about as much general acumen as a very young waterbug on a strange pond. I had embarked gayly upon the theatrical sea, and became a manager, owning and operating road companies and similar unprofitable things. In association with my loyal troupers I have often fasted all through Lent, and occasionally we kept right on fasting, even after the rest of the Christian world had resumed diplomatic relations with food. However, we were a cheery and hopeful lot, and our road shows wandered both here and there among the towns on the gaslight circuit.

I owned outright and in fee simple the two companies playing East Lynne and The Fireman's Bride, and I likewise fathered a burlesque show, of which little need now be said. It was one of those airy and red-clad exhibitions that kept the ministers in peppery sermons, and I am now ashamed of myself, though at that time I saw nothing very wicked about a good burlesque show.

In addition to these sundry amusement enterprises I had other irons in the fire, and some of them burned me most painfully before I wound up. For instance, I was a fight promoter in a small way, a lover of things pugilistic, and I maintained in New York City a small stable of promising young athletes, all of whom still owe me both interest and principal. I think there were four boxers in my New York squad, and I expected champions, but none of them ever rose from the ranks. They were rank when I took them to mold into topnotchers, and they were ranker when I handed them their final ten dollars and told them to begone. My pugilistic hopefuls were supposed to earn the money that I squandered on my theatrical ventures, and it was a lovely theory, only it didn't work.

The road shows, being what they were, played in towns that can be found on any good map with a strong glass. We never performed south of Poughkeepsie, New York, on account of the public taste, and my stars never walked down Broadway to gaze upon their names in electric globes. None of my players ever found themselves blazoned from the metropolitan billboards, though they all owed metropolitan board bills, which evened it up.

Personally I traveled with The Fireman's Bride, being the manager, treasurer, complaint receiver, paymaster on rare occasions and usher. There was in that company an exceedingly undercooked young man named Ollie Thorpe, and for playing the villain, or what he claimed was playing the villain, he nicked me for twenty dollars a week during his first year. In the course of time we moved into the boundless West and came upon the town of Delaware, Ohio.

We had made formal arrangements to edify the population thereof with three performances of The Fireman's Bride, beginning on Monday night and ending on Wednesday, but there was also an additional interest for me in Delaware, Ohio. Jake Reeves, manager of my pugilistic department, had informed me that there was in Delaware an unsung young boxer who might some day mount to the heights of a championship, and that I would do well to investigate.

Ollie Thorpe Walked Condescendingly Over and Shook Hands With Creamer. The Local Fighter Acted Friendly, But I Could See He Was Depressed

I had written to this youngster, whose name was Kotch Creamer, saying I would arrive in his town presently and confer with him. If he was any good at all, I told him, I might take him under my managerial wing and lead him on to opulence and fame. About him and his ability I knew nothing, except what Jake had told me, and Jake's own information was fairly vague.

Passing through the sleeping car the night before we were due in Delaware I paused and talked with Ollie Thorpe, who was fretting me with conversations about more salary. I happened to mention Delaware and Kotch Creamer, and young Mr. Thorpe laughed heartily.

"You don't mean to stand there and tell me you're going to be his manager?" he exclaimed.

"If he can fight—sure," I replied. "Why?"

"You wouldn't think of taking me in hand, would you, and announcing me as a coming champion?" he demanded.

"No," I answered. "Not while still sane. What's that got to do with it?"

"Nothing," he grinned. "Not a thing in the world except that I can personally lick the daylights out of Kotch Creamer. I've done it forty times. You may not know it, but this here town of Delaware is my home grounds, and I've known this prodigy of yours since he quit teething."

I had never regarded Thorpe as a needless liar and saw no reason to doubt him now. He was an athletic sort himself, and I knew he had done some genteel and amateur boxing, but he was not a fighter. If it was true that he could trim Jake's up-country find it was likewise true that I wished of Kotch Creamer in mine. I ha delayed pugilists already.

"If you don't believe me," T continued, observing my regret just put on the gloves with again and mop him up for you wh get to Delaware. Somebody ha making merry with you, Mr. I Creamer fight? He couldn't pu setting hen off her nest."

That's the way we left it. Th morning we crashed upon the t Delaware, and when our train st I dropped off the smoker and myself in a crowd that had come to see the actors arrive. A young man with straw-colored burst through and shook me vig by the hand. He was about t years old, with blue eyes, a h grin and many words. In his fi the letter I had written before New York.

"Howdy, Mr. Loftus," he said ily, holding out the letter. "I'm here to meet you. I'm Kotch Crea

I looked again and saw that h a sturdy well-built lad and ha outward signs of a fighter. He intellectual giant, but there wa warm light of ambition in his ey his manner was earnest.

"Glad to know you," I ret "I've got eight or nine hundred to do in the next hour, but I'll s later. Come over to the hote afternoon."

"All right," he answered. " there."

When he went away I took theatrical affairs, which consum morning. In the afternoon I sat to a late lunch and was interr by a waiter with the news tha Creamer had called again. He in a minute later and I invited sit down and partake. He refu eat but was willing to talk.

"Now," I said, "let's get do this quick. My New York ma steered me onto you, and where his information I don't know. H you could box and had a future, that's so I'd like to know, and do business. If it isn't so I want to know that too. Thorpe, on the contrary, told me last night that I'm ing up the wrong tree. He says he's known you for and that somebody has been kidding Jake and me quickest way is for you to bring an armful of gloves to the theater to-morrow morning and we'll see."

"That's all I ask, Mr. Loftus," Kotch said ea "I'm ready to show you what I've got. I know heart if you take me to New York I'll make good. shall I box to-morrow?"

"Box Ollie Thorpe," I said. "He claims he can little."

"Ollie," he repeated blankly. "Ollie Thorpe! Mr. Loftus, he ain't no fighter. He's—he's an ain't he?"

"He certainly is no fighter," I admitted, "and a intelligent people claim he's no actor either. Only he can trim you the best day you ever saw. If tha and if you can't murder him, what right will you h the ring with a regular slugger?"

"All right, Mr. Loftus," Creamer said. "I'll be in the morning with the gloves."

He turned and walked slowly out, and I could se he was thinking of something unpleasant. I felt maybe Ollie was right about it.

At ten the following morning my new prospect ca through the stage door with a set of gloves under his and we halted the rehearsal and cleared a space i center of the stage. Ollie Thorpe laid down a ladde which he was rehearsing, walked condescendingly shook hands with Creamer, and took a pair of gloves him. The local fighter acted friendly, but I could s was depressed.

The rest of The Fireman's Bride climbed on trunk scenery and I announced a recess until we could see mi-time gladiator had. I observed the supercilious c the countenance of my boxing actor, but mes manner was without resentment.

(Continued on Page 57)

(Continued from Page 54)

e exhibition that followed was interesting but fatal. rie the hopes of Kotch Creamer right there on the of ne old Lyceum Theater in Delaware, and I looked gr ved astonishment while Ollie Thorpe whaled the r .t of this alleged box fighter who yearned for r wrlds. It was amazing. The spectacle of a fourth- ac r knocking the spots off a legitimate pugilist sad- l ir, but The Fireman's Bride whooped for joy and Ole to leave nothing but a carcass. It was a three- l tng and Mr. Thorpe pasted Mr. Creamer all over ts. When they concluded I took the gloves from an handed them to Kotch.

el" I said, "I came here to see you box, and now see you box, and you can take your gloves and go hoever told Jake Reeves that you were a coming pi is himself a coming candidate for the hoosegow. 't now when I've seen anybody as bad as you are pa ded gloves on his fists. I'm sorry, but I can't ge you. Good-by and good luck, and if you want gd free advice give up pugilism."

e Delaware lad said nothing, but stood there breath- ar and fumbling with his gloves. Thorpe turned his ar walked off smiling, while his fellow actors com- nt him. I felt sorry for the boy in front of me, us ess is business, and I was no millionaire.

ot I see you privately, Mr. Loftus?" he asked, ng a bit of gore from his mouth. "I'd like to say h g."

ve seen all I want to see," I answered, and maybe s tutal. "I've got a hard day ahead."

ll ght," he said, and he turned and walked out into lle. The Fireman's Bride resumed rehearsal and in ir tes I had forgotten about Kotch Creamer and his ics. We proceeded with our three performances, ec p in Delaware with moderate success, and moved t the next town.

d at is roughly the end of the first reel. That was e thirteen years ago, and since that morning when ll d dismally out of the Lyceum stage door into the I d never laid an eye on Kotch Creamer, until week e st, which naturally leads us into the opening rs f Reel Two.

II

Last spring found the world full of a number of in., including me and my nervous bank roll. I had le with theatrical affairs all these dozen years since ne ed The Fireman's Bride, sometimes enjoying a lu x, and frequently beating the county sheriff over ta line by superior footwork. I can think of no remarkable change than that which has taken place lie Thorpe, the same young man who worked for me e ad show, and who is now none other than Oliver w Thorpe, the famous.

s, r, he is now that same Oliver Thorpe you read t i the daily prints, the romantic and athletic movie o r whom little girls rave delightedly and write s the Answer Department, inquiring is the rumor a ut his having dark-brown eyes, or not.

u e his portrait in the trade magazines about every n inutes, and you notice him leaping precipices on r ian horse or posing with a Nubian lion under each o n evening clothes shaking hands with the Duke of Uruguay. Sometimes he can be seen in a picture entitled Throwing the Bull, wherein he has a sloe-eyed steer on the ground with its innocent neck half twisted off. Always he can be heard throwing the same bull, because with the advancing years Ollie's modesty has not shrunk to any noticeable degree.

That's the Delaware, Ohio, product who played the villain for me in The Fireman's Bride, and now he has a pink-and-gold studio all to himself in Santa Barbara, California, with hot and cold running water, a private secretary to answer the four hundred daily letters which he receives from a rabid citizenry, a private yacht, a private press agent, four automobiles with gold ignition keys and Persian tapestry trimmings, a French château on a hill, and all that lucre, all that fame e'er gave. That's Ollie to-day, and I will tell a waiting world it's nothing but bull-headed, blind, indiscriminating luck.

The funny part is that he can't act now any more than he could when he trouped with me twelve years ago and murdered such rôles as the innocent villain in The Fireman's Bride. He has a row of even teeth, a few regular features, a pleasing grin, and he looks strong and hairy in his undershirt. He can leap upon a horse without borrowing a ladder from somebody, and he fits snugly into evening clothes; and so far as I can see the pop-eyed public demands little more.

My own calm affairs have squirmed along about the same, though I long ago gave up the road-show business and took to less explosive forms of entertainment. I am still interested in taking two dollars out for a walk and mating it up with two more whenever possible, and that's why I sat up and noticed when Ollie Thorpe burst upon New York this last spring, emerging from his private car and smiling tolerantly upon the public.

As everyone bitten by the movies knows, Oliver came to the large metropolis for the sole and laudable purpose of gouging the Redwood Film Company for more of that stuff the strikes are about. He has been drawing one thousand dollars a week for the past two years, which is fair enough when compared with the twenty I paid him. His contract expired last spring, and it was common gossip that he would sign again with the Redwood Company, but not until that large corporation came across with what is slangily known as an increase in salary.

The rumor was that Ollie craved about fifteen hundred a week, beginning with the new contract, and having been absent from New York for a year he combined business and pleasure and appeared once more upon our streets, clad in garments that might have been stolen off Solomon's clothesline.

For the last six months I have had a bee in my own bonnet, and the moment I heard Ollie Thorpe was in town it began buzzing with renewed ferocity. Six months ago some dilapidated genius sold me a manuscript, and I still think it contains an original story, though the chances are it was either stolen bodily or founded on something else. Anyhow the owner wanted money in a hurry, and I bought the thing, after which I took it home and reread it with great care, finally coming to the conclusion that by a modern miracle I was now in possession of the greatest motion-picture story ever discovered. This mental condition is not unusual or alarming among us movie magnates. I said to myself that if I ever produced this story on the screen, and did it right, with the right actors, I should make either one or two million dollars, and then retire in dignity to a small ten-thousand-acre ranch in New Jersey.

When I finished rereading the manuscript, which was called Sunrise, I knew that the one actor who fitted the leading part was Ollie Thorpe. It needed him, and him only. Without him Sunrise might be made into a half-good picture, but with him I should still be packing away large sums years after the Republicans of Texas got together and elected a governor. I started out the morning I heard he was in town, and found him leaning against an onyx pillar in one of our better-class hotels.

"Hello, Aleck," he said cordially. "How's things?"

"Good," I answered, looking him over carefully. "I hear you're going back with the Redwood people as soon as they increase the tariff."

"That's somewhere near it," he laughed. "And I'm not worrying. Either they come through with fifteen hundred a week or I'll sign with someone else. There are producers round the corner who would mightily like to see my name on the end of a contract. Believe that, Aleck!"

"It's so," I admitted. "You stick round and they'll ante without a doubt. Keep them anxious. And in the meantime, Ollie, I've got a little proposition of my own. Your contract with the Redwood Film Company has just expired, and you won't sign a new one until they say fifteen hundred. That may take a month. During that month why can't you do something for me? You may recall, Ollie, that I gave you what you called your chance."

"You did, Aleck," he agreed, "and I know it. What's on your chest? I never forget a friend, and if I can do something for you now I'll do it."

"I've got the greatest story in the world," I said moderately. "It needs you to play the lead. It will probably take three weeks to make it, but with a lot of speed we may be able to shoot it in two. The continuity is in typewriting, and everything is ready for the director. I've had expert advice and they tell me it's one of the cleanest scenarios they ever saw. The story was tailor-made for you, and my aim is to produce a masterpiece and advertise it wherever the printer pursues his trade."

"It sounds," said Ollie, smiling. "And what will my remuneration be?"

"You'll drag down ten thousand for two weeks and fifteen thousand if it takes a full three. It will be so much clear velvet for you, Ollie. It won't interfere with your old contract, which is dead, or your new one, which isn't born; and furthermore, when this picture starts showing, the fame you have now will be a mere drop in the bucket. This is a great thing, Ollie. Now, how about?"

"I'll let you know in the morning," he replied, appearing to be wrapped in deep thought. "I don't want to decide definitely to-night. I'll say, though, that ten thousand for two weeks sounds right enough. The Redwood Film Company will probably take some time to see things right, and I may as well gather what I can. Come round to-morrow morning, Aleck. I'll let you know for certain."

I knew then what his answer would be, and I was tickled a light pink. I know Ollie and his method. When I telephoned him next morning he stated that he had been thinking about it and saw no reason why two old friends shouldn't get together and hammer out some pin money.

"Then it's on?" I asked cheerfully.

"It is," he said; "and glad to do it for you. I'm starting back to Santa Barbara in a day or two and I'll be ready to work whenever you say the word."

"Good," I returned, and hung up. I then hurried round to where you can still buy a colored drink and celebrated to the extent of one. In my mind's eyes I beheld that

It Didn't Last Long, But When it Was Over There Was a Near-Riot on the Ball Lot ranch over in New Jersey, with the red-astrakhan cows being milked by my hired men, and my automobile parked in a stone mansion with gargoyles on the roof.

For the next few days I worked hard. I visited the trade papers, consulted advertising agencies, and laid the foundation for a large and comprehensive publicity campaign which would inform movie lovers throughout the land that Oliver Caldwell Thorpe would appear in a new superproduction entitled Sunrise, under the sole management of Alexander Loftus.

I looked over the actors and actresses I might need, telephoned to some and had others call at my office, where I engaged a few and handed them the money to get them to Santa Barbara. My plan was to engage half the cast in New York and the rest in California, and this I did. I bought a few costumes in New York, following my own ideas, and finally started West, full of bright hopes. The morning I reached Santa Barbara Ollie met me and declared he was ready to begin the picture the minute I was.

From then on Speed was my middle name. I located a large airy studio at the north end of town and rented the whole place for a month, paying the owner enough money to satisfy even a studio owner, who was the original profiteer. I engaged carpenters and a studio manager, and the director with whom I had been corresponding came up from Los Angeles and began reading the continuity. His demand was moderate. I paid him four hundred a week, and gave him two weeks' salary in advance to gain his confidence.

The organization began to take form and I watched them start building the interior sets and select locations in the mountains for the exteriors. On Saturday of that week we began shooting, with two cameras, and the director told me he would be ready for Ollie on Monday morning.

This news I communicated to Mr. Thorpe at his handsome lodge on Saturday night, over the telephone, and he replied that he would be on the job bright and early. At ten o'clock Sunday morning the telephone rang in my bedroom at the hotel, and when I sleepily answered Ollie said a few words.

"There's some news for you, Aleck," he said. "I can't play that lead for you after all."

"You can't what?" I asked, holding up my pyjamas, and feeling certain that long slumber was still interfering with my reason.

"Can't play—can't start to-morrow," he repeated.

"Why?" I asked.

"Just signed up the new contract with the Redwood people," he explained. "Naturally they object to my working with anyone else. It came rather sooner than I expected. You understand that, Aleck."

"I guess I'll come over and talk to you when I get dressed," I said slowly. "I'll have to talk to you about this, Ollie."

"No use talking," he said brightly. "Nothing to talk about, Aleck. Sorry I promised to play that part but you can see how it is. I thought I'd have plenty of time before the Redwood people met my terms, but they rushed me. I'm going to get that extra five hundred a week."

"That's fine," I gulped. "I've invested fifteen thousand in cold cash in this Sunrise picture, the cast is hired, the director is waiting, and everything depends on you. How about that? I've got to talk to you, Ollie."

"It won't do any good," he assured me. "None at all."

He then calmly hung up on me, and I sat on the edge of my bed looking the situation in the face and trying to decide what to do with it. If Ollie Thorpe played the lead I might produce a big famous picture, and enjoy deserved increment; but without him the enterprise was only a perilous gamble and would never make any real money. I could hire an unknown actor and substitute him; or even a moderately well-known star; but even if I did I should probably stand myself in for an additional loss. The leading part in Sunrise was made for Ollie, and for nobody else in California or New York. When he threw me down he blasted my picture.

The worst of it was I had let myself in for so many expenses that I hated to quit, but quit I must. The advertising, which would presently appear in the trade press, would make a blithering ass of me, and my associates would grin. I looked painfully back to the days when this low wretch had started his theatrical career, and I regretted my part in starting him. After a great many baleful and useless thoughts I dressed myself, ate a hurried breakfast, and started to find Ollie and have words with him. In this I was foiled, though I hunted diligently all day Sunday.

III

MONDAY morning I appeared in my rented studio and discharged everybody connected with the new superproduction called Sunrise, whereat there was vast surprise and mingled complaint. I explained that Mr. Thorpe had given us all the rawsberry, and that any actor desiring redress might turn to Ollie for it. I returned the studio to its owner, who seemed surprised but said nothing about refunding, and when I started down the hill toward town that afternoon I was a man who had just come hurriedly out of the motion-picture business and never wished to return.

That day I missed Oliver C. Thorpe twice by narrow margins, because despite the fact that I was no longer a movie magnate I still wished to get close to the star and tell him a few earnest thoughts. Tuesday he left a fashionable downtown hotel at one end while I prowled for him at the other; and on Wednesday the yellow-haired vampire at the telephone window in the new and ornate Redwood Studio informed me that Mr. Thorpe was extremely busy to-day and could not possibly see Mr. Loftus or anyone else. I thanked the lady and moved away, and as I started morosely for the hotel, wondering whether to buy a shiny new ticket to New York and forget the whole disagreeable mess, a sad-faced individual halted me.

"Would it be too much to ask you to stake me to a meal?" he inquired.

"No," I said, looking at him somewhat grumpily, "it wouldn't be too much, but it would be about enough. What's the matter with you throwing your pride aside and earning a meal? This is the land of prosperity."

I stared bellicosely at the succotash solicitor, and saw that here was a chap who needed a shine, a couple of shaves and the attention of a tailor; but on the other hand he was no regular bum of the freight-car and back-door variety.

"Mister," he said seriously, "I tried to get work. I tried over and over. I've been throwed out of this here Redwood Studio more than three times already, and the bouncer says the next time I ooze in there he's going to make it a hospital throw-out."

"What kind of work do you work at when toiling?" I demanded. "Are you one of these performers in the silent drama?"

"Me? No," he said. "I'm no actor. I used to be a stage hand, but right now I'm nothing. I'm dead broke and in need of food; and it's on the level about me trying to get a job too. If Ollie Thorpe kept his word I'd never have to ask you for a meal."

"Kept his word," I murmured. "Have you had business dealings with Ollie Thorpe?"

"Me?" said the man. "I'm here from Chicago. I came some of the way on a coal car. And when I got here there was no job, like he promised me the other day in Chicago."

He paused and gazed sadly toward the entrance to the studio.

"He promised you a job?" I asked.

"He did that. And when I get here there's no job. I keep on going in to see the director, and the bouncer keeps on chucking me out. I met Ollie yesterday, and all he said was that the director has charge of everything, and if the director can't place me he guesses it's all off. Whereupon I get hurled out once more."

"You know Ollie very well?" I inquired.

"Long, but not well," replied the applicant for work. "He asked me in Chicago would I like to have a steady job, and I said I would. So he tells me if I ever get to California the thing is done. I worked my way West; and here I am, worse off now than I was in Chicago."

"Come on," I said, stirred by a fellow feeling. "I'll buy you a reasonable amount of food. What's your name?"

"Kotch Creamer," he answered, and for a minute it struck me I had heard it before. However, thirteen years may blur the memory.

"I don't need to ask yours," he went on as we started for the edibles; "I know your name."

"Do you?" I asked in surprise.

"Sure," he said. "You probably don't recall me, because I've changed some. Maybe you can remember blowing into Delaware, Ohio, about a dozen years ago with your theatrical troupe, and this here same Ollie Thorpe. You wanted to see if a guy named Kotch Creamer would be a good-enough boxer for you to add to your string in New York."

"I got you," I said, staring at him, and noting that he had indeed changed. "Are you ——"

"That's me," he grinned. "Kotch Creamer, formerly a promising boxer, who broke his promise."

"You didn't quite come up to what I expected."

"No, I didn't suit; and there was a reason for that too. The reason is inside that studio we just left. Ollie Thorpe was working for you then."

"I won't ever forget it," I said grimly.

"Me neither. He found out you were interested in me, and then told you I was a bogus boxer. He told you I'd never amount to a whoop in hell, and then offered to prove it by boxing me while you looked on. Remember?"

"I do, indeed," I said; "and he slammed you round the stage."

"He slammed me round the stage is right," Mr. Creamer admitted calmly. "He showed me up before you and your actors. He always showed me up in a fight, even before he went on the stage. That was Ollie Thorpe's chief job in life—showing me up. I never could figure it out."

"Figure what out?"

"I mean that Ollie always had something on me from the day I started to school at St. Mary's and met him. He whipped me that first day and he whipped me ever afterward. The funny thing is that if I had boxed anybody else in America the day you were in Delaware I'd have made a better showing, and you might have taken me to New York. With Ollie sparring I beat before I put on a glove. It was so, and he knew it."

"That's funny," I said. "Ollie c fight."

"Don't I know that?" Kotc pausing in one of the largest bites e ten out of a chunk of bread. "I know it? That's why I say he ha thing on me, which I never could stand. He couldn't fight, and he whip the boys that I whipped easy, Ollie always trimmed me. How figure that?"

I watched Mr. Creamer dine, dined with sincerity and enthusiasm a time he slowed up. He discussed days in Delaware, and his first mor meeting with Ollie Thorpe, along licking that accompanied it.

"I can remember it well," he said ing a fresh cup of coffee. "A gan older boys told me to walk up behi and throw a piece of rope on his s Being a new arrival I did it. Ollie back to me, and I did what the b told me to do. I sneaked up with a rope, tossed it on Ollie's shoulder, a 'Snakes, Ollie!' as the boys d Ollie was standing on the school carrying his school things, and the the rope landed he threw his bo way, his coat another and his slat where else. He yelled and struck o both hands, like a guy gone sudd his bean. Then he calmed down ou spasm, and I started to run, but it late. He caught me, and that was fight."

"Was he nervous about snakes?"

"Nervous? He was scared to d them. That rope performance alwa him slash out blindly at anything of him. The bigger boys used to p same trick on him, only he didn tackle them. The point is this: H me in that first fight, and he lic every other time in the years that f I got to be pretty nifty with my fi put away a lot of the boys—the sa had sent Ollie Thorpe home with b shut; and yet Ollie was the one lad school who had it on me. I used to and provoke him into scraps, just I couldn't beat him for once, but did. Then he got to be an actor. when he came to Delaware with y you said I had to box him, that my of ever getting under your mana was gone for good. I could have the best regular fighter in Ameri morning and made a better s Funny, ain't it?"

"Funny in one way," I admitte not so much in another."

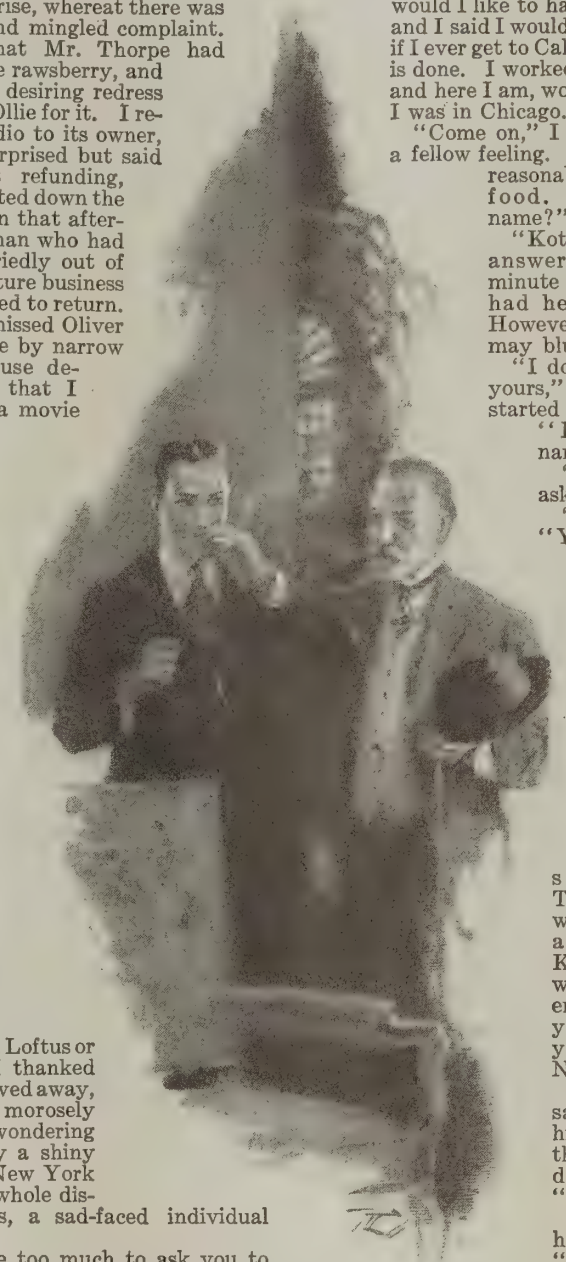
"After you ditched me," Kotch winding up his meal, "I sort of lost in the game. I'd always figured if get to New York and have a real and some good fighters to work might make something of myself, there in Delaware—well, you kno ware. I fought a couple of bouts a quit and got a job as stage hand in ater where your company played. round a few years and finally drift Lately I've been in Chicago, and I you might say I've made a pret failure of life."

"Like a lot of us," I replied. that's over, and let it go. You c had hard luck, especially where O anything to do with you. I'm going you a few dollars for old times' sa you might get ready to go back Eas I go—that is, if you want to."

He thanked me, and when we par arrangement was that Kotch woul to New York when I left, and I p to land him a job, probably in n office. Meantime I had decided to Santa Barbara a few days, and what this decision was the announcemen rodeo. I had previously read of thi without any great interest, and reg as merely another device to adver much-advertised Thorpe.

Santa Barbara was in need of a marble statues for the city park, a town had all the money necessary pease the sculptor, except about te sand dollars. Ollie Thorpe as a leadi zen naturally had a finger in the p when he suggested a rodeo to help a statue fund, charging a dollar adm the town accepted with pleasure baseball people turned the park Ollie, and the Redwood Film Co sent out for Indians, cowboys and

(Concluded on Page 61)



"I'm Not Worrying. Either They Come Through With Fifteen Hundred a Week or I'll Sign With Someone Else"

(Included from Page 58)

e.erprising press agent likewise ht o something of his own. There ist rived in San Francisco the new alia champion, Bill Holt, a heavyghter who had gone utterly n e ranks of the antipodean gladi-B was accompanied on his tour of l by Australian sporting writers, e husiasts with money, and lesser
, id a few days before the Santa a odeo Bill and his entourage l no San Francisco and submitted n istic interviews.

I rpe press agent believed that if d t the new champion of Australia a t the rodeo it would be a strong a d, and he galloped up to San a and made the arrangement.

d en reading about this big Bill j f with considerable interest, beth gh I quit the game years ago I t a my old fondness for it. What a y impressed me in this new i was his personal eccentricities, p him in a class by himself. He g a.ed in his native land as one of s t orose, melancholy and irritable s t it ever kicked a kangaroo off the p rt.

f ught his way up from the bottom
t ing kind or friendly to anyone.
f l to talk about himself to res, be nice to promoters, or have l ations with mankind. He was a l hagnail, and took refuge in heavy r ged silence. Every so often his y ked him, whereupon big Bill dis-d s manager with few words and l ge. He was chronically irritable h he carried this irritability into g s antagonist always looked bad r ds next day. I wondered if these s ut Bill Holt were true, because f t fighters I knew were a genial lot.

e e Redwood press agent first app ir Bill and his party the champ d profanely to have anything to h nta Barbara. It took the entire r delegation to convince him that v d to be popular in America and m y he would do well to humor a he Americans were a fussy lot k a man only if he liked them.
p ded this thought through Bill's s l until he finally consented to d n to Santa Barbara for one day p r at the rodeo in person. He s reed to box three friendly rounds O r Caldwell Thorpe, and when I t his item of news I decided to re-w e I was and see everything.

ow would you like to go to this roasked Kotch Creamer, who b ter without his whiskers.

re, he replied, "I'd just as soon go.
th ght you were in a hurry to reach Y k."

m ut I can wait till after the rodeo.
t a couple of tickets and we'll go out e fi of it. I'm crazy about Indians w ys."

le day was on Saturday. I bought ck back to New York on the train g Saturday night, so that Kotch and I d't have to linger long after the W reached the ball park about two in the afternoon and found a crowd of five or six thousand. Our seats were behind third base, near the rail, and the early part of the rodeo was very sad indeed.

They had some tame horse races and some even tamer bulldogging of steers, but finally it worked round to big Bill Holt and his Australian friends, which was the part I wanted. The film people had erected a ring over the pitcher's box, raising it a foot or two from the ground, and the Champion of all the Australias walked grimly out, climbed into the ring, accompanied by a dozen or more of the smaller celebrities, and all were introduced by the official announcer.

The six thousand citizens who had remained in their seats during the rodeo proper now flocked upon the ball field to have a close-up of the champion and the friendly bout with Oliver Caldwell Thorpe. After they had cheered Mr. Holt there came a lull while we waited for the star. He timed his coming to get all the drama possible out of it, and when he appeared he was a gorgeous sight, in blue silk trunks, a wonderful shirt with a lay-down collar, and a dainty cravat of robin's-egg blue.

Then the folks gave huzzas for Ollie, because he spent quite a bit with the local merchants. The Australian fighters of the lesser group were introduced by a man who couldn't talk English in public, and the battery of camera operators gathered round the ring to take a few pictures.

I left Kotch in his seat and clambered over the rail with the rest. The crowd was densely massed round the ring when Ollie climbed in to shake hands with Champion Holt and be photographed. I plowed through till I was up beside the post in Ollie's corner, where there was plenty of confusion, with persons crowding into the ring and being pushed back out so that the cameras could get Mr. Thorpe shaking the hand of Mr. Holt.

You couldn't tell just what was going on, because of the general tumult, but about the time Ollie struck a handsome pose and shook hands with the antipodean warrior he likewise seemed to go out of his mind.

Instead of shaking hands friendly with big Bill, Ollie let out a yell that could be readily heard in Athabasca. He leaped into the air and banged big Bill Holt on the nose twice in rapid succession before that astounded slugger could stagger back out of range. Without waiting an instant the famous Australian beezer began to bleed.

There was a surprised roar of rage from big Bill, and another roar of indignation from the kangaroo delegation. It looked to those innocent foreigners as though they had run into a conspiracy to denude their idol of his title before he had got his land legs.

All the suppressed moroseness in Mr. Holt's character came to the top, and in the next thirty seconds, with the Redwood film employees trying to save their star's life, and the outraged Australians holding them back, and the spectators yelling bloody murder, big Bill stepped into Mr. Thorpe and showed the world just how he came to be a champion.

I have never seen so much genuine action crammed into such a short time. Wherever I looked I could see big Bill's hairy arms swinging this way and that, and every time Bill hit anything it was Ollie. There were many dull thuds, and with every thud some more of Mr. Thorpe's features were erased on the end of Mr. Holt's glove. It was a stirring sight, but not joyous to the Redwood film officials, who expected Ollie to start work on Monday.

It didn't last long but when it was over there was a near-riot on the ball lot. The police swarmed in and surrounded the Australians, who were escorted from the grounds amid flying bricks. Everyone present realized that Champion Bill Holt was without doubt a grouchy guy when hit unexpectedly upon the nose. He lived up to his name, and even more.

Strong hands tenderly scraped Ollie Thorpe off the floor of the ring and bore him away, probably to a waiting ambulance. His silk shirt was a row of small waving pennons, and his lovely trunks were splashed with his own precious gore, while his face resembled something that may be of some use again, and may not.

I found Kotch Creamer with his mouth permanently open, clinging to a pillar and viewing the catastrophe with astonishment and concern.

"What's all this about? That big guy has ruined Ollie," he said as he came down and we started out.

"Well, Ollie attacked him," I remarked. "Didn't you see Ollie bang him on the nose, just as they were shaking hands?"

"I did," Kotch answered in wonderment. "Why should Ollie slam the champion of Australia? He must be off his nut."

"Yes," I said, "but the crowd was thick, and you didn't see it all."

"Didn't see what?" he asked.

"You didn't see me," I explained as we got into a taxicab and started for town. "I was right there all the time."

Kotch looked at me in growing wonder.

"Yes," I went on; "I was there. When I crawled over the railing there was a small piece of rope hanging from a nail, and I took it along, thinking I might find use for it. And I did."

Kotch's newly shaved countenance cracked wide open in a grin that made him look cheerful for the first time.

"Snakes!" he yelled.

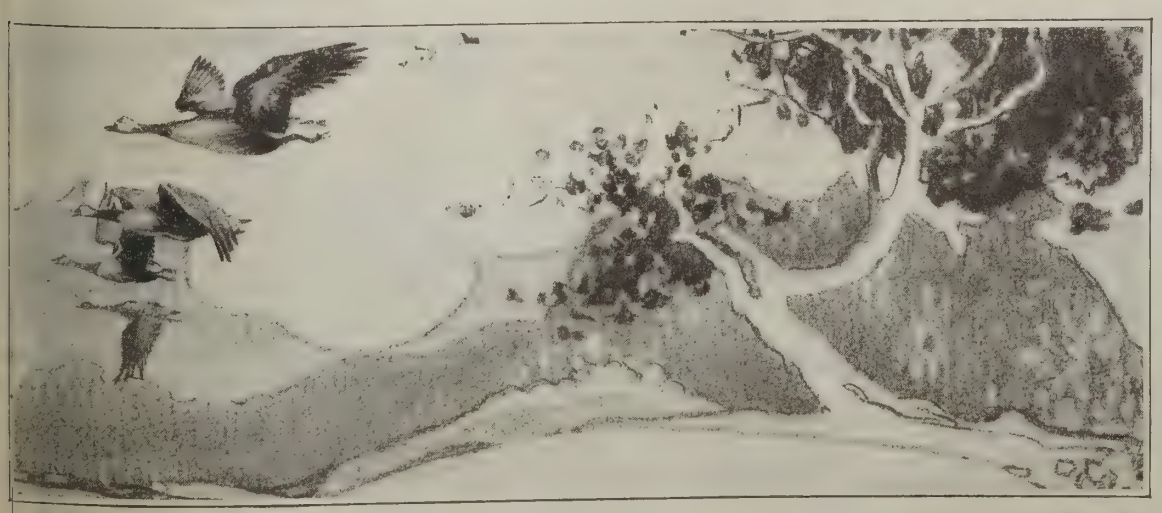
"Sure," I said. "When Ollie shook the gentleman's hand I tossed up the rope. It was a ragged small piece of hemp, but it cost me about fifteen thousand dollars. Anyone with sharp ears might have heard me mention the general subject of reptiles too. Ollie heard me all right. I'll say he did!"

Kotch leaned back and rocked in silent ecstasy.

"I'm pretty near even with that bird," he said finally. "He did me a lot of dirt, but I'm even."

"I'm not," I retorted; "but I'm evener than I was. Fifteen thousand is a high price for what big Bill did to him, admitting that Bill did plenty."

All of which may help to explain why the Redwood Film Company has been so extremely behind with its releases of pictures in which the star is Oliver Caldwell Thorpe. I do believe the young man is convalescent, though I haven't heard.



DON'T

© Vanity Fair

get left behind!

THIS car meets the special train for Broadway, Greenwich Village, Wall Street, the bridge club—picking up P. G. Wodehouse, Heywood Broun, F. P. A., Dorothy Parker, Robert Benchley, George Chappell, John Held, Jr., Ethel Plummer, Merryle S. Rukeyser, R. F. Foster, and others just as numerous and festive.

Makes a special stop-over at the links to collect Grantland Rice, H. H. Hilton and other star players and talkers. Adds a specialist or so on airplanes—motors—motor boats.

Runs over to London and takes on Hugh Walpole, A. A. Milne, Thomas Burke, G. K. Chesterton, Lord Dunsany, George Arliss, Fish, Lady Russell.

read

VANITY FAIR

Vanity Fair is running six monthly excursions from wherever you are, to wherever you'd rather be. Your very own special season ticket—price $1—is in the lower right hand corner of this announcement.

You'll have the best of company—stage folk, humorists, artists, poets, dancers, literary men, golf celebrities, cartoonists. Some of them run the train; all of them come along and talk about it. And it isn't the usual blue-penciled conversation. You'll enjoy every minute of it.

Five Issues of Vanity Fair $1.

Six, if you mail the coupon now

Get on board! Tear off that coupon

Every Issue Contains

Golf: Two pages of Grantland Rice's golf talk. Plenty of action pictures. Motors and Motor Boats: New models, their doings and fittings. Racing cars and speed boats. Touring routes. The Stage: Who's who and how much, in the New York spotlight. The Movies: Stills and stories of the best of them. Press agents prohibited. The Arts: Highbrow, but not bad to take. Painting, literature, sculpture. Humor: Not custard pie, nor Sunday supplement. Sold by the laugh, not by the mile. Dancing: All varieties, wild and hot house, taken in the act. Assorted Nuts: Portraits and revelations (voluntary and otherwise) of the well-known and wild-eyed. Essays and Reviews: Nothing long; nothing dry. Timely and full of chuckle. Finance: Rukeyser on money. After-hours talk by an expert. Clothes for Men: Real clothes and accessories for the regular man. Pictures: And more pictures, and then some more again. New people, new artists, new poses, new ideas.

VANITY FAIR

Vanity Fair, 19 West 44th St., New York City. Here's my dollar. Send along your next FIVE issues—SIX, if this coupon gets to you in time (OR) I'll remit one dollar on receipt of your bill. (Canadian $1.25)

Name

City

Street

State

S. E. P. 11-1-19

GETTING A REPUTATION

By J. R. Sprague

DECORATIONS BY GUERNSEY MOORE

THERE was going to be a new store on Main Street. Carpenters had been at work for days tearing out the old-fashioned front and putting in a new one, all plate glass and marble, with unexpected promontories and depressions calculated to give a twenty-foot frontage the display space of fifty feet. Inside the painters and paper-hangers were earning their wages in leisurely fashion, while the new merchant stood round impatiently waiting for the time to arrive when he might unpack his handsome new show cases and get ready for business. A stranger picked his way among the workmen, stepping over the piles of lumber and rolls of wall paper and approaching the future merchant.

"You are the proprietor here?" he asked.

"I will be if the contractor ever gets out," replied the young man discontentedly.

The stranger handed out his card. "I am the representative of the commercial agency," he said, "and I have come to get a statement from you as to your financial affairs."

The young man looked at the card disagreeably. It was his first venture as a merchant; he had always been employed as a salesman before, and knew very little about the financial part of running a business. That a total stranger should come in off the street to ask him how much money he had seemed about the limit of impudence. He wanted to tear up the card and tell the giver to get out; but realizing that a new storekeeper cannot afford to make even a single enemy he answered with a civility that he did not feel.

"It isn't necessary for me to make a financial statement," he said, "because I don't owe anybody. I am paying cash for all my opening bills."

The agency man was a diplomat. "I know exactly how you feel," he said to the merchant apologetically. "You are thinking I have got an awful nerve to come in here and ask about your private affairs. You intend to pay cash for all the goods you buy, and so you think your finances are nobody's business but your own. But you need to be in the rating books just the same. That big department store across the street is worth nearly a million dollars and discounts every bill that it buys, but it looks out for its rating just as carefully as though it was asking six months' time on all its purchases. It sends a statement once a year to my office without even being asked."

The Advantages of Credit Rating

"POSSIBLY you think because you are starting business in a small way that you don't need a rating; that a financial statement is a rich man's luxury. But if you don't have a rating you are handicapped from the start. Take the matter of your fire insurance, for instance; any first-class insurance company will insist on knowing something about your affairs before it will allow its agent to sell you a policy. It will want to know how much goods you have got in your store no matter whether you have bought for cash or on credit. An insurance company that sells a policy to anyone who comes along with enough money to pay a year's premium isn't a good company to insure with.

"There is another place where you will lose by not giving a statement. You will not be offered goods by the highest class of manufacturers. To be sure, plenty of traveling men will come in here and solicit your business anyhow, but they will be from houses that deliberately take chances on selling unrated merchants—and charge enough profit to cover their inevitable losses. The manufacturers who make really fine goods and sell them at a close margin of profit are not looking for new customers about whom there is any element of doubt. Unless you are in the rating books they simply ignore you; their traveling men do not call on you, and so unless you go to the markets frequently you do not even see the high-class lines of merchandise.

"Now you say you are going to pay cash for all your merchandise. A manufacturer will not want to ship you goods even on a C. O. D. basis without knowing something about you, because you might decline to receive the goods when they arrived, in which case he would be put to a lot of useless expense. Or suppose you order some goods by mail and inclose a check with the order. Unless the manufacturer knows something about you he is not going to ship those goods until the check has gone through the banks and he has actually got the cash money. All that takes time; and meanwhile you are probably losing sales by not having the goods in stock."

Eventually the young merchant was persuaded to give the agency man a statement; it showed that he had been employed as salesman in his line for more than ten years and had saved up a little less than three thousand dollars, which was the capital he had to start in business for himself. He had made arrangements to buy all his goods from a single wholesale house with which he had a thorough understanding. He had felt that it was a rather meager showing and this feeling had made him shy about telling it to the commercial-agency man. But to his surprise he was rated as a desirable credit risk. His long experience as a salesman was all in his favor, as well as the fact that he had actually earned the money that he put into his business. That he had confined his buying to one house was distinctly to his credit because it was a long-established house and well able to take care of its customers.

At once the young merchant was in a position where he could write or wire to almost any wholesaler in his line and get merchandise by return express without question. He is now one of the leading merchants in his town and a large part of his growth has come from the fact that he could get anything a customer wanted promptly even though he did not have it in stock.

When a man first opens business he is always surprised to learn that with the hanging out of his sign he has become a public character. Committees come in to ask him to buy tickets to entertainments; to contribute to the fund for lighting Main Street; to help out on the purse to be given the manager of the pennant-winning team. He is expected to let the public use his telephone. And as a part of the business world he is under obligations to tell credit men how much he is worth.

One of the hardest things to convince a new merchant is that the commercial-agency man who comes round to ask questions does not do so purely from offensive curiosity. It seems particularly offensive when the business man has more debts than capital to report.

The manager of a nation-wide commercial agency in an important Western city recently talked to the writer.

"We seldom have any trouble in getting the big concerns to give us statements," he said; "they recognize it as a necessary part of business. But men who are in business on small capital or who are inexperienced are sometimes afraid to tell anyone just how they stand.

"A few years ago a young man opened a clothing business in my city and I went round to get a statement from him so we could report on him intelligently to any inquirers. At first he wouldn't even talk with me. He said he didn't need any rating because he bought only from houses who knew all about him. He also used the argument that if he was in the rating books favorably he would be pestered to death by traveling salesmen trying to sell him all the time. I had my doubts as to whether his rating would be so good that people would fall over themselves trying to sell him, but I finally argued him into giving me a statement.

"I really didn't blame him much for being reticent about his financial affairs after I had seen his figures; his net worth was less than a thousand dollars after paying for his fixtures, which of course could not be classed as quick assets. He had borrowed a few thousand dollars from a relative to pay for part of his merchandise, and for the rest he had made arrangements with two or three wholesalers to let him have what he needed on long credit.

"Before I was old enough to understand much about business I used to see the statements of banks published in the newspapers, and it always puzzled me that their assets and liabilities always added up to exac same amount. I knew banks were worth a lot of but the statements seemed to indicate that the just as much as they had. Anyhow, that was this clothing man stood. His merchandise on one side and h on the other just about balanced affairs had had to be liquidated notice his creditors would have g twenty cents on the dollar.

"At the end of his first year ness I went to the clothing ma for a statement. It wasn't so hard out of him as the first time, but I c that he was not very anxious to tell ju the results of the year's operations ha Like most other retailers he was not an expert book his statement did not contain a single technical te as Accounts Receivable, Current Liabilities or Assets. There was one column showing how muc he had on hand and another showing what debts h which after all is a pretty satisfactory form of sta though it would have been a scandal in the eyes o pert accountant. But I have always been unprof enough to believe that if a man tells you what he and how much money he owes you can subtract o the other and find out how much he is actually wo

"The clothing man's figures showed that he wa twelve hundred dollars better off than he had bee before; when he handed me the statement he lool of anxiously at me to see what I thought of it. It very brilliant showing. In drama and fiction the he has more than thirty days in which to make a for borrowed capital and win the girl; but here this merchant had been operating a whole year for a twelve hundred dollars, and even that was not in c tied up in merchandise.

"It was his lack of capital that was holding hi He had done a very good business, but his expens too heavy. In the whole year he had never been pay for a bill of goods in ten days and earn his c count. He was paying interest on merchandise a that were past due."

The Man Who Paid Interest

"'IT SEEMS to me that you might sidestep this l of paying interest on the overdue accounts, him. 'Your creditors certainly ought to give you lon without interest until you get on your feet.'

"'Well, I don't know about that,' he replied. grateful enough to them for taking a chance on selling me at all. If I buy a bill of goods that is pay a certain date and I am not able to meet it on th then I certainly ought to pay interest on the amoun do settle it. I want to get ahead as fast as I can, but want anything that isn't coming to me.'

"A little while after this a man walked into my o day and stated that he was sales manager for a well-known manufacturing concern which was loo an account in town. Merchants do not generally but wholesale houses when entering a new territ quently instruct their men to go to the local offic commercial agency and select from the agency rep retailers they intend to call on. This sales manag over the reports but did not seem to find what he some of the retailers were already tied up wit manufacturers and others had reputations for not their bills willingly. Finally he asked me if I had him our reports on all the retailers who might be market for his line.

"'Practically all of them,' I answered, 'except three little fellows who haven't much capital.'

"'Let's see them anyhow,' he said.

"The first one I happened to bring out was th ment I had got from the young clothing man w made only twelve hundred dollars on his first year's tions. The sales manager glanced over it. 'This bi hasn't got any too much capital,' was his first co then adding: 'But he must be a hustler to make a at all, owing as much money as he does. I see that been paying out a lot of money as interest on p accounts. Does that mean he is in a bad fix w creditors?'

"'No; I don't think so,' I answered. 'No com have ever been turned into this office against him. got an idea that he ought to pay interest on an that is past due, and he just does it.'

"'I believe I will go round and see the fellow,' s sales manager. 'Would it be putting you to to trouble to go along and introduce me?'

(Continued on Page 65)

(Continued from Page 62)

"Together we walked up the street and the sales manager explained something of the policy of his firm. 'We don't go altogether on the amount of capital a man has in becoming a new dealer,' he said. 'Of course we want a man to sell his bills with reasonable promptness, but we have enough capital to take care of our customers under any circumstances. A man may not have much money when he forms a connection with him, but we expect he will make good with our line and eventually get on a good footing. The main thing we want in a customer is a sense of fairness. If he is continually going to try to get the best of us in little ways we don't want him on our books at all.'

"The merchant was busy with a customer when we entered his store, and while waiting the sales manager looked around red round the place looking at the window trims and the general way the merchandise was arranged in the show cases. I noticed him rub his finger on the top of one of the showcases and look to see if any dust had come off. After introducing the two men I went back to my office.

"It was perhaps a couple of months later that I picked up a morning paper one day and saw a full-page advertisement announcing that my merchant friend had taken the exclusive agency for one of the most celebrated lines of men's clothing in America. That was three years ago, and ever since then his reports have shown a gain of more than twenty thousand dollars each year."

Credit men for many of the largest wholesale houses pay little attention to the actual amount of money a man has invested in his business. Presuming a man has reasonable business ability and a suitable location, his chance at success lies in making good wholesale connections. And his reputation for acting fairly has more to do with making good wholesale connections than most men dream of.

"The gamble on the man himself more than on the money he has got," a successful wholesaler said to the writer recently. "The main thing we want is to know that he is going to give us a square deal. Just selling a merchant a bill of goods doesn't mean anything to a wholesale house; we are looking for a whole series of profitable transactions. If a man is contentious and always trying to get something over he is more trouble than he is worth."

A Shifty Customer Dropped

"WE RECENTLY quit selling a customer in an Eastern city who had been dealing with us for years. There had been some labor troubles in his town and business got into a slump; this merchant began to get slow in paying his bills. If he had merely written us that he needed more time on account we should have been glad enough to accommodate him, but he didn't do it that way.

"Instead he began finding fault. He would claim that a salesman had promised to give him an extra thirty-day dating; that he had not ordered the goods shipped until later; that some of the items were not as ordered and would have to be returned; anything to start some correspondence and so get an excuse to stand off payment of the bill.

"We finally told our traveling man not to call on him any more. We gave the merchant plenty of time to pay what he already owed us, and just faded out of his life."

A merchant in one of the larger Southern cities started in business on one of the side streets and with small capital, catering to the working people. He did extremely well as many side-street merchants do. His rent was a quarter of the price charged in the fashionable shopping district only two blocks away. He did not have to tie up a great capital in expensive fixtures; he did not know what it was to pay for a full-page ad in the morning paper; no one would look at his show windows and believe for a moment that he employed a professional window dresser.

But he did do the business. On Saturday nights when his high-class competitors had been closed for hours his store would still be full of customers, who not only paid cash for their purchases but carried the bundles home themselves. Every ring of the cash-register bell celebrated a profitable transaction. Within ten years of the time the merchant had started business on a capital of less than two thousand he was easily worth a hundred thousand dollars.

The merchant was naturally proud of his success; he was clever at selling goods, but what he most prided himself on was his shrewdness in buying. In moments of relaxation he would tell his intimates how shrewd he really was.

"You mustn't let the other fellow make too much money off you," he would say. "If you can't beat him down on the price, frame up on him in some way."

He never let a shipment of goods get into stock without hunting up a reason for a rebate. If the invoice called for fifteen dozen suits he would always claim at least half a dozen short. If it was a case of alarm clocks he would find that seven of them would not run, and of course it was only right to charge the repair bill back to the manufacturer. In all his years of business no shipment of glass ever came into his store without a claim for breakage due to careless packing.

He was quite a wizard when it came to paying his bills. He never missed a cash discount. The account might be sixty days past due, but he would take off the cash discount anyhow. "Deduct the five per cent," he would say to his bookkeeper. "If they holler too much maybe I will have to pay it; but it's no harm in trying. Probably they will let it go."

His merchandise bills were always payable in New York or Chicago drafts, but he always sent his personal checks. "Why should I go to the trouble and expense of buying a draft?" he would ask. "If they don't want to pay a little exchange on my check let them send it back."

It is doubtful if the merchant knew that he was crooked in his relations with his wholesalers. His training had been in those methods of business and he thought he was playing the game in the conventional manner. As a matter of fact he was not gaining anything at all. The high-class houses did not sell him after one or two adventures; and the others were perfectly able to look out for themselves. Their salesmen were always instructed to quote prices high enough to cover all shrinkage.

Eventually the merchant decided that he would like to quit the modest side-street location and move up into the aristocratic shopping district, where electric signs, expensive delivery cars and doormen in livery were necessary equipment. Personally he liked the old location, but the social ambitions of a growing family had to be considered. He secured a lease on a building in the heart of the shopping district, arranged to have it remodeled, and took the train for the Northern manufacturing centers to lay in a stock of merchandise suitable for his new location.

New York was his first stop. He put up at a first-class hotel, had it announced in the trade bulletins that he was in the market for high-grade lines of merchandise, and waited for the salesmen to look him up. Some of the houses of which he was already a customer sent their official entertainers round to buy him dinners and take him to shows, but none of the concerns with which he wanted to form connections seemed to know he was in town.

After two or three days he started out to hunt up the high-grade lines himself. But invariably there seemed to be something in the way of making the connections he wanted. One or two of the firms he called on stated that they were glad to meet him, but their lines were already handled in his city and of course they could not afford to open another account there, as it would antagonize their present customers. One executive said he might consider doing business with the merchant later on, but his product had already been contracted for several months in advance.

At last the manager of a concern that is known from coast to coast frankly told him what was the matter.

"Why, yes," he said, "we would like to have a good account in your city; we are not getting the business there that we ought. But I am afraid we cannot do business with you. I saw your arrival announced in the trade bulletins and thought of going round to your hotel to see you, but after looking you up in our commercial agency I decided that it would not be wise to do business with you at this time."

The merchant looked up the address of the commercial agency referred to and hurried there, full of indignation.

"What is this I hear about your giving me a bad report?" he demanded of the manager. "I am worth clear money more than a hundred thousand dollars, and yet none of these high-class houses even call on me. I can pay cash for every dollar's worth of goods that I buy. You can wire my bank if you don't believe me."

"I have no doubt in the world that you are worth more than a hundred thousand dollars," replied the agency man, "but that doesn't change matters. When it was announced a few days ago that you were in town several concerns phoned us asking for a report on you. We at once wired our manager in your home city for information and his reply is in my desk. It says that you are legally good for all purchases that you might make, but that there are more than thirty complaints on file in his office where you have made unjust claims on firms with whom you have had dealings. I had no choice but to turn this report over to the houses who had inquired about you, and I presume that is the reason you are having trouble in buying goods."

A Talk With the Credit Man

"BUT I wouldn't treat these high-class houses that way," pleaded the merchant. "I promise you that if you will change that report ——"

"I couldn't change the report if I wanted to," interrupted the agency man. "It was made by our manager in your home city, and even he can't change it. It isn't our personal opinion; we don't have opinions. It is simply a statement of facts reported to our office."

The merchant went home empty-handed. Even before going to his store he went to the office of the commercial agency. "What grudge have you got against me that you should tell those New York people I am a bad risk?" he demanded excitedly. "They wouldn't let me buy their goods even for cash."

"I haven't any grudge at all," replied the manager. "In fact, I have never had any dealings with you personally. But I think I can tell you why they didn't want to do business with you." He went to a file and took out a bundle of papers. "Here is a statement from Johnson & Frank stating that you claimed shortages in four consecutive invoices; but close investigation fails to show incompetence in their shipping department or similar losses on the railroads in packages going to other local firms. Then here is a complaint from Marks & McDonnell to the effect that you have several times taken the cash discounts from invoices ninety days past due."

"Well, I had to protect myself," exclaimed the merchant. "They were all trying to get the best of me, and I just showed that I was smarter than they were."

"But these high-class houses with whom you want to do business don't see it that way," explained the agency man. "They don't care anything about selling you one bill of goods even though you pay cash in advance. When they put their lines into a man's store they want it to be a permanent connection. Now suppose, when you were up in New York, you had induced one of the big houses to sell you. The merchandise would be shipped and when you got

VITALIC
Bicycle Tires

Some Inside Information

All Vitalic Tires are made with an extra strong 14½-ounce fabric. The strongest fabric used in any other bicycle tire is 12-ounce—and most bicycle-tire fabrics are even lighter. Here is a magnified cross-section of 14½-ounce Vitalic fabric compared with an equally magnified cross-section of 12-ounce fabric. That's one reason why Vitalics give more miles for less money—also why the few punctures you get with Vitalics are so quickly, easily, and permanently repaired.

You Pay by the Mile

WHEN you ride on a railroad you pay by the mile. When you ride on a bicycle you pay by the mile. But, unlike the railroads, bicycle tires don't all tax you at the same rate per mile. Cheap tires cost you a lot per mile; good tires less per mile; Vitalic Tires least per mile.

Vitalic Tires cost you least per mile because they last longest—they travel more miles. It's the pure, strong rubber outside, and the tough, closely woven fabric inside that enable Vitalics to give the most miles for your money.

CONTINENTAL RUBBER WORKS, ERIE, PA.

it into your store and opened it up you would find a few pieces short and others damaged, the claim amounting to about twenty dollars. The house would allow your claim as a matter of course; but the matter wouldn't stop there. They wouldn't try to get their twenty dollars back by soaking you on your next purchase. Instead they would investigate their packing and shipping departments, and they would come to the conclusion that the shortage originated in your store. Then they would be through with you forever. These houses you have been doing business with are willing to make money any old way, just so they make it. The others don't want to make money at all if they can't do it in a first-class way."

The merchant got the idea. "All right," he said cheerfully. "I won't make any more claims even if the best cut-glass bowl in the package comes broken. I guess now you will change my rating so I can begin buying goods for my new store about the first of the month, won't you?"

The agency manager had to explain again. "Can't you see that I don't make or change ratings?" he demanded. "I only report what you have done; not what I think you are going to do. I am not supposed to give advice either; but if you want to know how to get yourself in position to buy the lines you want I will tell you.

"You have got to quit making claims for adjustments that you are not entitled to. You have got to quit taking the cash discounts off from invoices that are sixty days old when the terms plainly state that ten days is the limit. Your credit wouldn't be hurt a bit with a first-class house if you let a bill run three months past due, just so you had a reasonable excuse for the delay and you didn't do it too often. But the same house would give you a black mark if you skinned them out of ten cents by sending your personal check when the invoice called for New York exchange.

"You thought because you are worth more than a hundred thousand dollars that everyone would want to sell you. But credit isn't based on the amount of money you have got; money is too easily lost. It is your habits of doing business that count most, and your habits evidently don't suit the people you want to buy from. If no one turns in a complaint about you during the next year, then it will probably be assumed that you have changed your habits and will make a desirable customer."

It was hard punishment but the merchant had to stand it. He could not buy the high-grade lines he needed for his new store and it would have been ruinous to try to do business in that location carrying only cheap merchandise. And so the merchant paid rent on an empty building while he was trying to get a reputation.

For nearly a year he sternly curbed natural tendencies. It was hard to package after package come into his st without even looking for a chance to n a claim, but he did it.

He did not even deduct the freight on a single shipment or write that traveling man had quoted a lower than charged on invoice. He even ac interest on one payment because the was thirty days past due. In time vi had its reward.

One day a well-dressed young man denly appeared before the merchant, sit gloomily at his desk thinking about vacant store on which he was paying less rent.

"I represent the Electra Manufactu Company," said the young man, han out a card. "I understand you were in New York office last spring to look at line, but we were so busy then that couldn't take on any new accounts. N can talk business; I have got my sam all opened up over at the hotel and if will step over there I promise to show the finest line coming into your territo

As the merchant started out with salesman he paused long enough to whi to his bookkeeper, "Get ready the copy a big ad in to-morrow morning's pa We will start a closing-out sale to run sixty days while we are getting read move into our new store."

SENSE AND NONSENSE

No Rash Promises

JOHN L. MOON told recently a quaint story of his friend, the late James J. Hill, of the Great Northern Railroad. It seems that Mr. Hill was in Chicago and attended a fat-stock show or stock breeders' convention and exhibit or something which greatly impressed him. He saw a fine opportunity for the farmers of the Northwest to improve their droves, flocks and herds, and promptly caused to be announced far and wide in the territory where he was a reigning railway king that he would defray the transportation charges home on all fancy stock bought by the stock growers in attendance. Many took advantage of the offer.

One farmer bought a magnificent example of live pork and expressed it in a crate marked to his son at home. In the car the porker became somewhat persona non grata—close quarters, hot day, and so on—and as Number 66 was to stand for a couple of hours at a way station the man in the express car as a relief measure pushed old porker's crate out on a freight platform. A loose slat or something on the crate explains why the express man later wired to a station agent one hundred miles ahead: "Have three hundred pound hog, black with white spots, ready to put in crate on sixty-six to-morrow."

This was done. The hog was delivered at his destination and everything was all right until father got home and blew up.

"Not my hog at all!" he yelled. "It's an ornery runt."

"Impossible!" said the express company suavely. "Your hog was delivered to your son to whom it was addressed; we have his personal receipt."

He fretted and fumed, finally playing his trump card.

"How," he said triumphantly, "could the sex of a hog change in a little journey of four hundred and fifty miles?"

"Ah, that is something the express company never guarantees," said the official who had the last word.

More Dollars Than Pictures

AN OLD acquaintance of a millionaire picture collector tells a characteristic anecdote showing to what good purpose business instinct may be applied to a hobby.

Some years ago the whole art world sat up and took notice when the newspapers related that this collector had paid $350,000 for a remarkably fine painting by Frans Hals. Only a few weeks after the picture had come into his possession a story got abroad to the effect that he had been offered half a million dollars for it.

A friend asked the owner if there was any truth in the report, and was told that it was quite correct. Immediately he began to congratulate him upon making such a handsome profit in so short a time.

"But," replied the collector, "I did not sell. I declined the offer."

"What! You declined it?"

"Most certainly. I can find $150,000 whenever I chance to need it; but where in all the world could I find another Frans Hals equal to mine for three or even four times that sum?"

The Latest Styles

ONE must approach the contemplation of a new social phenomenon in the spirit of inquiry and of tolerance as well. To the one extreme type of mind anything that is new must be right. To the other extreme type anything that is new must be wrong.

Recently an American magazine writer, well known for her interest in social service, was in the city of Budapest. She was simply delighted with Bolshevism as displayed in that city. She sought permission to travel to Riga, from which city she desired, if possible, to proceed to Petrograd.

When asked why she wished to visit these cities she replied, "I do get such thrills from these new governments!"

The Wrong Hymn

A STORY comes from the City of Churches to the effect that the pastor of one of the most conservative religious organizations in that borough some time ago shattered the tradition of generations by inviting a noted evangelist to conduct a week of revival services in his church.

At every service the church was packed to overflowing, and the number of those who flocked to the mourners' bench every evening testified to the enthusiasm of the congregation. At the concluding service the pastor announced that a collection would be taken for the gifted brother who had just preached from his pulpit for the last time. He had no doubt that it would be a generous one.

Next day when the offering was counted the pastor was amazed and disappointed to find that it amounted to only about half the sum he thought would be forthcoming.

In his distress he went to Deacon Perkins and asked him if he had any theory to account for the meagerness of the collection. The deacon smiled knowingly and replied: "Do you recall the name of the offertory hymn you selected?"

And then the situation dawned upon the good man. He had announced from the pulpit: "While the collection is being taken the choir will lead us in singing that grand old hymn, Never Give Up! Never Give Up!"

Judging from the receipts fully half the congregation had not given up a penny!

Taking No Chances

AN AMERICAN doughboy of the 8(Pioneer Infantry, which policed area of the Argonne Forest after the a stice, had come upon the bodies of t boches belonging to the 254th Reser fallen in such positions as to indicate unmistakably they had been stalkir single Yank. Their tactics had been succ ful. Within twenty yards lay the quart khaki, his cheek cuddled along his sight, his eyes closed—much as if ha taken three of the enemy as escort he soul-wearied of the killing and would a while.

"I'll say this boy put up a scrap—I'll he did!" And the searcher calling tc nearest comrade began with roughly re ent fingers to remove the identifica tags.

The lank loose-jointed Middle Weste who joined him presently was accred among his buddies with imagination capable of conjecturing beyond the re rent probability of seconds at the c cart—never a thought above the te But now with eyes distended and adroop he mentally revitalized the figh he looked from one lifeless figure to anot Finally he vented his admiration in elongated, "Bo-o-oy how-dee!"

Then with palpable motive in his he went to the body of the nearest bo snapped open the blade of a giant j knife and quickly, distastefully shearec the Gott-Mit-Uns buckle.

Pocketing it he proceeded to the sec German's form and duplicated his seen ghoulishness.

As he leaned over the third body first comer, who had been watching quizzically, called in deprecation: "W t'ell you want with that Gott-Mit- junk, ol'-timer?"

What indeed was his object? For to tr who followed the infantry souvenirs every description were as commonp as cooties, belt buckles especially b numerous.

"Well," replied the other, "I figge it this way: They's on'y one place any Je what comes up against a guy three to should go. An' I'm takin' no chance these birds' gettin' past Saint Peter u false pretenses."

The Jailer's Welcome

FLYING over the county jail at L rence, Kansas, is a service flag twenty-three silver stars on it.

Not to be outdone in patriotism by neighboring competitors since the Ka and Missouri troops began to arrive h the jailer has strung this banner in letters under the service flag and over doorway of the jail:

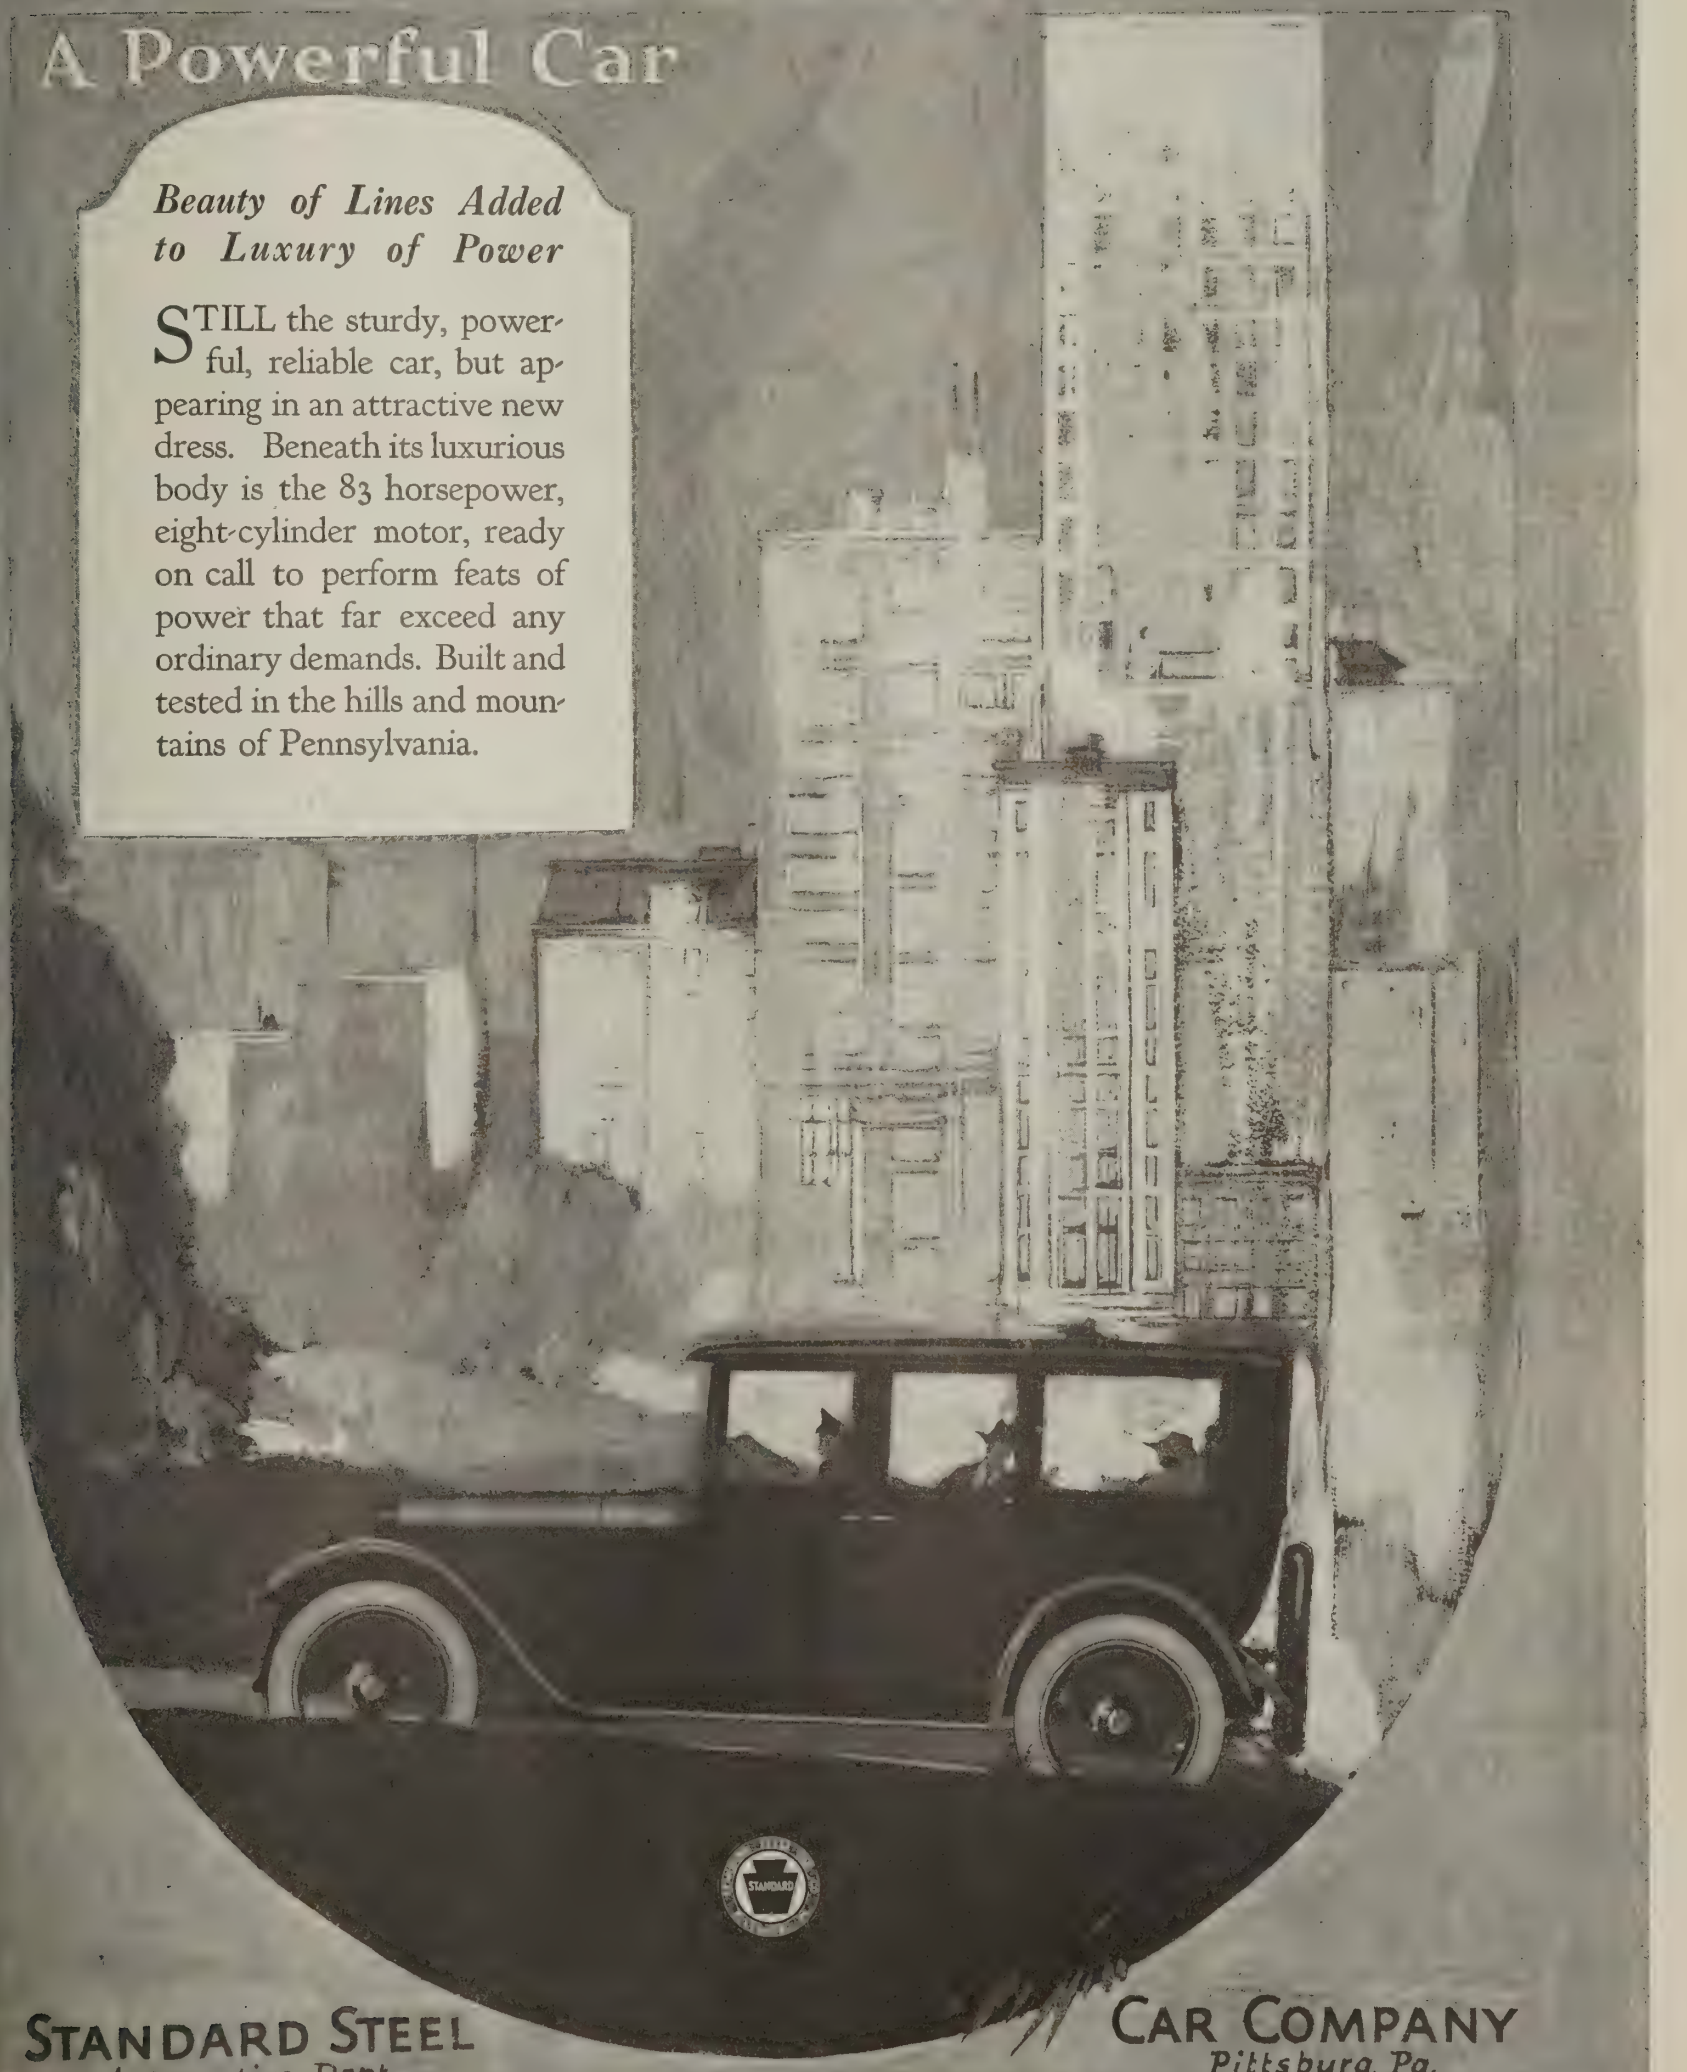
"Welcome Home, Victorious Sons."

STANDARD EIGHT

A Powerful Car

Beauty of Lines Added to Luxury of Power

STILL the sturdy, powerful, reliable car, but appearing in an attractive new dress. Beneath its luxurious body is the 83 horsepower, eight-cylinder motor, ready on call to perform feats of power that far exceed any ordinary demands. Built and tested in the hills and mountains of Pennsylvania.



STANDARD STEEL
Automotive Dept.

CAR COMPANY
Pittsburg, Pa.

From Bookkeeper to General Auditor

Only a few months ago he was a bookkeeper, taking orders instead of giving them! LaSalle training took him from the high desk of the $75 a month routine worker—"one of the crowd of office help"—to the big $5,000 a year job as General Auditor.

This man, who now directs others, quickly broke out of the rut, because he realized the value of training. He clearly saw the tremendous advantage of SPECIALIZED knowledge as a power for advancement in the modern world of business.

And he capitalized his spare hours by home study of the Higher Accountancy Course given by LaSalle Extension University. His salary is equal to the annual income from $100,000 invested at five per cent—a splendid record for a few months of easy, pleasant home study.

Be An Expert Accountant

There is an urgent demand for the man trained in Higher Accounting. Thousands of American business concerns today need trained ability for the elimination of waste, installation of scientific cost systems, the "charting" of conditions in figures that only the Expert Accountant can supply quickly and accurately.

This widespread call for Higher Accountants brings opportunity for better jobs and much higher pay close to every bookkeeper, clerk, correspondent and office worker who wants to break out of the "rut" and make rapid headway to better things.

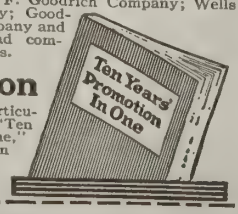
Learn Higher Accounting By Mail

The LaSalle method will train you under the direct supervision of William B. Castenholtz, A. M., C. P. A., a former Comptroller and Instructor, University of Illinois, assisted by a staff of Certified Public Accountants including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Step by step these experts will train you in the underlying principles of Business Analysis and Organization, Systematizing, Office Management, Auditing, Cost Accounting, Commercial Law and Financial Management. And besides you will have the privilege of using our Business Consulting Service free whenever you need special advice on any business matters.

LaSalle Students and Graduates

can now be found employed in the executive departments of practically all the large railroads, business houses and commercial organizations in the United States. Many prominent business concerns can be named in each of which 100 to 2,000 or more LaSalle students or graduates from our several specialized departments are employed in responsible positions. For instance—Pennsylvania Railroad, 2102; American Telegraph & Telephone Company, 811; United States Steel Corporation, 309; Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, 946; Armour & Company, 364; Chicago & North Western Railway, 712; Ford Motor Company, 214; Swift & Company, 303; Standard Oil Company, 390.

Among the numerous firms and corporations employing 50 to 100 or more LaSalle students or graduates are the following: Western Electric Company; International Harvester Company; B. F. Goodrich Company; Wells Fargo Express Company; Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company and every important railroad company in the United States.



Send Coupon

We will send full particulars, also a free copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," the book that has been an inspiration to more than 100,000 ambitious men. Send for your copy now.

LASALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY

"The World's Greatest Extension University"

Dept. 1171-HB Chicago, Illinois

Without cost or obligation on my part, please send me particulars regarding your Home Study Course of Training in Higher Accounting and your valuable book for ambitious men, "Ten Years' Promotion in One."

Name_____

Present Position_____

Address_____

ON THE LORDSBURG ROAD

(Concluded from Page 45)

"'Now come down yourself,' he says, 'and leave your artillery up there.'

"He had on his serape and the Mex hat, and I could see the long black whiskers when I got clost to him.

"'My turn this time,' he says to me, comin' back to take a look inside the stage for passengers, which there was none, 'an' don't get fussy or I'll pay yo' back for them buckshot.'

"I stood there by the wheel feelin' more like a fool than I ever did since. He'd outguessed me so nice it made me sick to think of it.

"It took him some time to bust the lock off the box and all the while he kep' his back to me. I could of got him then if the driver had been a mite quicker. I motioned to him to slip me down the shotgun, but he didn't take holt o' the idee right away and when he did get started the holdup was onto the play.

"'Never mind that there gun,' he says. 'I'll do what shootin' is done round here just now.'

"So I had to leave that chance go by and watch him pile the comp'ny's money into a sack. He backed off among the rocks, and directly I heard his hoss' hoofs on the hill."

Savage paused and pointed to his rude map in the sand, indicating the end of the loop which represented the pass.

"We turned back," he resumed, "and when we got here to Rucker's I saddled up a hoss and changed my shotgun for a rifle. I struck out alone." He pointed the switch at the line indicating the cut-off of which he had spoken. "I headed straight for that trail—though 'twasn't even a trail then.

"The way I figured it, I had plenty of time and I let the hoss take it easy. It come on mo'nin' and I was getting hungry. I had an idee the road agent would be wanting his breakfast, too, and I climbed a malapi butte. Sure enough, there was a little fire showing down in that dry wash nigh the place where Russel's ranch house stands now; right under the bank so 'twouldn't show—unless you'd come on high ground.

"That give me a big advantage, for if he was hid, so was I when I come on him. But just the same, I played Indian. I didn't aim to give him the aidge a second time. I crawled amongst the rocks on my belly and when I stuck my head out over the bank, there he was right under me—with his rifle on one side o' the fire and him on the other frying bacon. Pot o' coffee setting on the coals, and the smell of it was plumb good in the cold of the mo'nin'.

"He'd shed his whiskers and serape, and when he looked up I was looking back at him across my sights.

"'Hello, Wolf,' I says. 'Just keep your eyes on that bacon and see you don't burn it.'

"'You win,' he says, 'on this deal, Bill. But yo're a fool not to of throwed in with me jest the same.' And he went right on cooking the bacon."

It was at this to me the most interesting point of the narrative that I saw the sheriff's attention begin to wander. He was no longer watching Savage; his eyes kept going down the road to the eastward.

"We argued it out over the fire," the old-timer went on, "me on the gun side and him dealing out the breakfast. 'I got the money buried where all hell cain't find it,' he says, 'and if I got to do ten years I'm rich when I get out. Besides, I may get the drop on yo' yet.'

"But he didn't; and I had the last say when I turned him over to the sheriff. 'You was the fool,' I told him, 'to talk to me about your private road.'"

The cow-puncher had finished and was stowing away the pump. Savage brushed out the map in the sand with his foot and climbed into the car. He turned his eyes on us.

"So long," said he, and Reed answered over his shoulder. He was already starting for the hackberry tree.

"First time I ever heard of Savage opening up like that," I said when I caught up with him; "and that was some story too!"

Reed nodded in an absent-minded manner and busied himself at rolling a cigarette. By the time he had lighted it we reached the roadster.

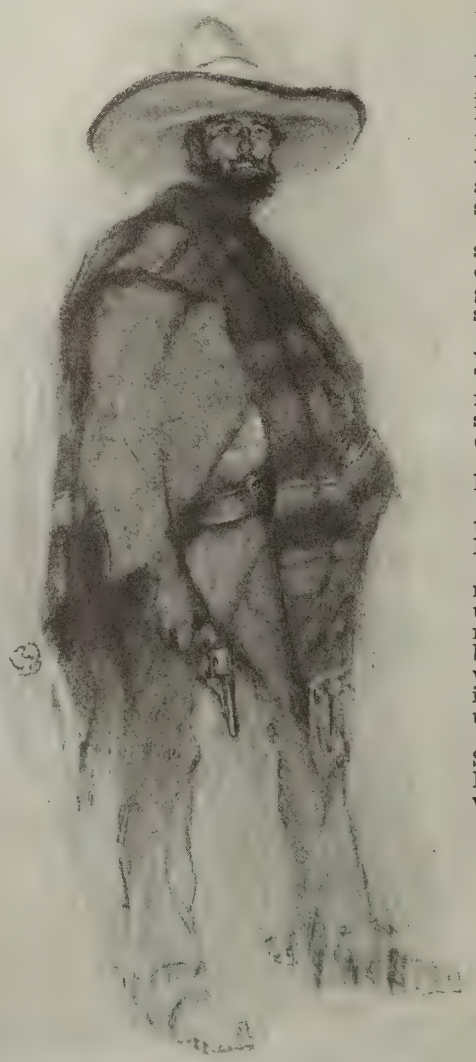
"Hop in," he said.

I told myself that there was such a thing as being too conscientious in the pursuit of one's official duty, but this was not my expedition and I followed the example of the old-timers—minding my own business. The self-starter uttered its complaining cry, the motor rumbled, the roadster gathered speed. We crossed the wagon track at right angles, struck out over a mesquite flat toward the red-brown malapi hills and left all signs of man behind us. The sheriff was sitting bolt upright as if he were in the saddle. He peered straight before him and there was that in his narrowed eyes which made me continue my devotion to my own affairs.

And truly my affairs were of enough moment to demand all my attention. Cross-country riding on a good horse is considered strenuous sport by those who have not tried cross-country riding in a car down on the border with an Arizona driver. At such times as I was able to spare some of my faculties from the task of holding to the seat I got occasional glimpses of the hazards we were continually encountering; and each new spectacle awakened within me fresh wonder at the madness which had drawn me from security and home and happiness to a region whose inhabitants persist in handling motor cars like cow ponies.

We darted in and out among the mesquite bushes, crossed two dry washes where it seemed to me no sane man would try to drive a buckboard, sped along a sidehill, bounding from one malapi fragment to another, rounded several sharp turns whose possibilities made my hair rise, and came among a tangle of swarthy summits where I lost what little of my orientation I had been able to keep thus far. I knew we must be heading for some road or other, taking this route in order that no tracks might betray us. But what road it was I had no idea. And what was more, there were times when I did not believe we were ever going to get there.

Evening came and with the dusk the wind died, the air turned cool. Reed stopped the car and while we cooked a bit of supper over an infinitesimal fire I was too weary to ask any questions; he was too absorbed in his own thoughts to volunteer any information. We climbed back into the roadster after the meal, smoked and I fell asleep wondering when he meant to go on again.



"'Never Mind That There Gun,' He Says. 'I'll Do What Shootin' is Done Round Here Just Now'"

Night was far along when I wa Down below us where the mesquit some mocking birds were singing; was filled with soft dry perfumes of plants. The stars blazed large and overhead. I came to full conscious see a moving shaft of radiance sw skyward as it approached us. It va
A moment later the headlights of a s automobile topped a rise less than mile away.

I heard the sheriff moving. O starter drowned the humming of proaching car and now the roadster tr with the vibrations from our engine.
out the benefit of our lamps we bum way across a bowlder-strewn inter drew up sharply, facing the oncom tomobile.

During the next few moments t shreds of weariness departed from fore the thrill which comes to one w lies in ambush. Then the lights be wavered; I knew the driver had disc us. They swerved in a wide arc. I the sheriff swear, and our lamps ca revealing wheel tracks within their pathway.

I lurched back against the seat e with the suddenness of our start. Th shrieked as Reed shifted them. Thefu red tail light bobbed up and down bef
I felt the rush of great winds again face and clung for dear life as the race

Time passed—how much I cann but it was jammed with large terrify cidents—and now the red tail light gl more brightly before us. As I realize we were gaining, it swerved and I drunkenly with the suddenness of o turning. Before I had recovered m was being tossed about on the seat cork on troubled waters.

As we sped away from the road a malapi-strewn slope I saw the brin cut bank on our right hand. It drew and there came an enormous momen
I would have sworn one hind whe hanging in midair.

The ground began to rise before as we climbed the grade we gained until there was a scant fifty feet b our headlights and that tail lamp. I the roaring of the other engine, the the gears shifted too suddenly.

Reed wrestled madly with the st wheel. We swung sharply to the righ the brink of the cut bank, which ha ished in the darkness, reappeared.
the fugitive car beside our left front
I caught a glimpse of a steep rocky which it was skirting. And then it s as if that car had slipped backwa swiftly we came on abreast of it.

There followed a sick instant w seemed to me that we were dashing st out over the bank's edge. It ended wi grinding of crumpled fenders, the sh sudden stopping.

By the time I had recovered my s wits Reed was on the other running The driver was leaning forward wi right hand on the emergency brake straightened and I saw his face in the of his dash lamp. It was Big Tom Wil

"That," he said, "is some engin have got, Bob."

From the rear of his touring car the jingle of glass fragments, the aro Lordsburg whisky.

We made camp together in amity f remainder of the night and the sun wa up when we started for Chiricahua.
radiance of the young morning I g bearings and recognized the wagon ro was the cut-off of which Savage had s in his story—and then revelation d upon me.

And some hours later as I was le Sheriff Bob Reed in his office at Chiri
I said confidently: "You see you wrong about the old-timers after a when Savage gave you that hi broke his rule, didn't he now?"

The sheriff shook his head and was a shadow in his eyes.

"Don't you understand," he swered. "If Tom Williams hadn't stacking the cards on me Bill S would never have told that story.
sighed and the shadow deepened hate to take a man's star away from But I've sent word for Jim Lacy to in and turn over his. And at tha getting off easy for double-crossin this way."

"Mutual Benefit" at Hydraulic

WHAT IT REALLY MEANS

N a recent article in this series there appear these words:

> "Much misunderstanding (at Hydraulic) is avoided as to motive. Everybody at Hydraulic knows what is proposed almost as soon as it is under way, and long before a positive decision has been reached. Everybody's mind goes to work, and suggestions come from all directions. We make every endeavor to see that no man lacks information or opportunity for expression. Every man knows his suggestions will be received with respect, and carefully considered."

These sweeping statements mean nothing, r they mean everything.

They mean nothing if not substantiated y examples in actual practice.

To Hydraulic they mean everything be- ause they mean a spirit among Hydraulic orkers, managers and owners—a spirit so eal, so much a tangible thing, that when an ctual accomplishment takes place every tatement contained in these quoted words nds itself justified.

This article presents an example of results. t deals with the Hydraulic Mutual Benefit ssociation—not with the details of organi- ation, nor with the details of benefits. It quite likely that others have worked out etails in similar plans better than we have orked them out; that is largely a matter f evolution and we hope to help and be elped in this regard as time goes on.

But the question which constitutes the acid est of Hydraulic spirit—of the character of he Hydraulic Mutual Benefit Association, s we see it, is not a question concerning ome detail—but this question:

Is it of the men, by the men, for the men?

Is it of the men? Let us see.

THE conception of a Mutual Benefit Association embracing all the Hydraulic lants was presented to the Workmen's epresentative Committee and the then xisting Aid Societies and an expression of pinion asked. Only the broadest outlines f the idea could then be discussed. A villingness to support such a venture meant ot a pledge to a tangible, definite thing; it could mean but one thing, an expression of confidence on the part of the men that no ulterior motive lay behind the suggestion—of confidence, that they would have a voice in the framing of the association and in the actual operation, and that the final result would be to their benefit.

Ninety-five per cent of Hydraulic employes at all plants made application at the outset for membership, thereby giving unqualified approval of the suggestion.

These men, having applied for membership, then proceeded to elect from their own ranks, Directors, with the understanding that the Directors would draw up the constitution and by-laws that should govern the association.

These Directors, half of them elected from among the foremen and other representatives of management, and half of them elected from among the workmen of each plant, then proceeded to gather suggestions from among the men, studying on the one hand the workman's financial ability to support such an association and on the other hand, the workman's vital needs in his family circle—the circle for whose benefit the association came into being. Having done this, and utilizing their best judgment and the best of the suggestions, the Directors formulated the constitution.

Was it of the men? It was the voice of ninety-five per cent of them from the outset.

Was it by the men? Every Director is a Director only by virtue of the confidence that put him in office through popular vote. Every officer is an officer only by virtue of the popular vote of the Directors themselves —the men's spokesmen.

Is it for the men?

Today the constitution, a thing to which support was yesterday pledged on faith (complete or incomplete as some expert might view it) is at least one thing, viz., a fabric through which every thread of power is a thread that conserves the workers' interests and the interests of those closer to him than life itself.

What does it Do for them?

It provides sick benefits, accident benefits, life insurance on the members and, in lesser degree, on their wives and children. It has power to loan money to members for building and improving homes, etc. These, and other advantages, are provided, as a natural course.

Where does the money Come From?

From the men and from the company—the men pay a dollar a month—the company duplicates every dollar so paid.

Who Administers the money?

The men's representatives (the General Board of Directors) who direct all payments —all investments of surplus funds—and from whose final decisions there is no appeal.

DOES this spell a spirit of mutual confidence, of mutual respect, on the part of the company and on the part of the workers?

Can anyone say that an institution conceived in this spirit and brought into being in this manner is a good business proposition and nothing more?

Does a development so plainly for the men, as it is also of the men and by the men, point out nothing more than material advancement?

The Mutual Benefit Association now under way at Hydraulic marks material development desirable from every standpoint, but in the Hydraulic "family" it is recognized first, not for what it does but for what it is —a visible evidence of a spirit at Hydraulic, of mutual trust, of trust which begets more trust in more things, which shall open up possible avenues of still greater team-work between those who invest their capital and those who invest their labor—which means dividends in a confidence for the future, in contentment, and in money, to every one who has come to know Hydraulic as "more than a place to work."

This is the eleventh of a series of articles in this publication. Reprints of former articles will be sent free on request.

THE HYDRAULIC PRESSED STEEL COMPANY of Cleveland

HYDRAULIC PRESSED STEEL COMPANY

THE GREAT ACCIDENT

(Continued from Page 27)

who would twist a bit of gilded wire into the likeness of your signature for half a dollar.

The first tents of the carnival began to rise one Saturday morning; and all that day and the next the boys of the town, and the grown-ups too, watched the show take shape. It was almost as good as a circus. At noon Monday the carnival opened for business, with the ballyhoo men in full voice before every tent. The moderate afternoon crowd grew into a throng in the evening, when the kerosene torches flared and smoked on every pole, and the normal things of daylight took on a dusky glamour in the jerky illumination of the flares.

Everyone went uptown to the carnival that first evening. Wint was there, and Jack Routt, Agnes, Joan, V. R. Kite—everyone. In the midevening the quieter folks drifted home, but Wint stayed to watch what passed. A little after eleven he bumped into a drunken man.

In spite of his warning to the advance agent of this carnival Wint had been expecting to see drunken men. It was the nature of the carnival breed. He wandered back and forth till he came upon Jim Radabaugh, and called the marshal aside.

"Jim," he said, "they're selling booze."

Radabaugh shifted that lump in his cheek and spat. "So?" he asked mildly.

"I want it stopped," said Wint. "If you pin it on the carnival bunch I'll shut them up."

"I'll see," Radabaugh promised.

"Come along, first, and let's talk to the boss," Wint suggested; and they sought out that man. He was running the merry-go-round; a hard little fellow with a cold blue eye. Wint introduced himself; and the man shook hands effusively.

"My name's Rand," he said. "Mike Rand. Glad t'meet you, Mister Mayor."

Wint said, "That's all right." And he asked: "Did your advance man give you my orders?"

"What orders?"

"I told him I didn't want any booze peddling."

"Sure, he told me."

Wint jerked his head backward, toward Main Street. "I ran into a drunk up there," he said.

Rand grinned. "Can't help that. We're not selling any."

"I'm holding you responsible," said Wint. "If there's any sold I'll cancel your permits."

The little man stared at him bleakly. "You've got a nerve. You can't pin anything on us."

"I can't help that," Wint told him. "In fact, I don't care. If there's booze sold you get out. If I pin it on any man he goes to jail. Is that clear?"

"What is this town anyway? A damned Sunday school?"

"If you like," said Wint sweetly; and he and Radabaugh turned away.

Rand's engine man left his throttle to approach his chief and ask: "What's up? Who was that?"

"Mayor of this burg, and the marshal. Says we've got to shut down on the booze."

"Like hell!"

Rand grinned. "Sure. He can't run a whizzer on me."

When he left Radabaugh Wint ran into Jack Routt, and they strolled about together through the crowd. Once they saw Hetty, and Wint thought she was unnaturally cheerful and gay. He wondered if it was possible she had been drinking again; and he stared after her so long that Routt asked: "Takes your eye, does she?"

"I was—wondering," said Wint.

Routt touched his arm. "You take it from me, Wint, you want to keep clear of her. I'd get her out of the house if I were you. They're beginning to talk."

Wint asked angrily: "Who's beginning to talk? What about?"

"Everybody. About Hetty. And you, naturally."

"I wish they—I wish people in this town would mind their own business."

Routt grinned and said, "You act as though there was something in it."

"Don't be a darned fool!"

"Well, I'm telling you what people say. If I were you—you're a public official, you know, in the public eye—I'd be careful. Tell your mother to get rid of her. Safest thing to do."

"I'm not looking for safe things to do." Wint liked the defiant sound of that.

Routt nodded. "I'd be worried if it was me. That's all."

"I'm not worried," said Wint. "Hetty's all right. And if she weren't—I don't propose to be scared."

"We-ell, it's your funeral," Routt told him.

Wint laughed. "I guess it's not as bad as that. It's almost twelve. I'm going home."

XXXVI

IT WAS upon the carnival that Wint scored first blood in his fight to clean up Hardiston. Mike Rand, carnival boss, was a hard man, willing to take a chance, afraid only of being bluffed. So he took Wint's warning as a challenge. Nevertheless, for the sake of making things as sure as might be, he went to see V. R. Kite. He and Kite had known and understood each other for a good many years.

He dropped in to see Kite Tuesday morning; and the little man remembered his church connections and his outward respectability, and worried for fear someone had seen Rand come in. His worry took the form of resentment at Rand's imprudence.

"Ought to be more careful," he protested. "Have more sense, man. I have to watch myself in this town. Don't you know that? I have a position to keep up. You're all right, of course"—this as Rand's eyes hardened in a stare that made Kite wince—"but I can't afford to be hitched up with you openly. It wouldn't do either of us any good."

Rand said dryly: "You don't need to worry about me. I can stand it."

"I can be useful to you now, whereas my usefulness would be gone if I were less respected."

"Respected, hell!" said Rand without emotion. "Don't they call you 'The Buzzard' round here? I've heard so. That don't sound respectful."

"That's a jest," said Kite. "Nothing more."

"Pinned on you by this shrimp mayor, wasn't it?"

"Yes, good-naturedly. He was drunk."

"Drunk? Him?" Rand lifted his hands in pious horror. "I thought he was one of these lips-that-touch-liquor-shall-never-touch-mine guys—to hear him talk."

"He's not drinking now; not openly. He was a sot a few months ago. Dead drunk in the Weaver House the night he was elected mayor. I saw him there."

Rand drawled, "I'd say this is some town." He leaned forward. "What I want to know is: How about the booze? He serves notice on me that I'm responsible if any's sold. How about it? Will he go through? Or is it a bluff?"

Kite considered. "I don't know," he said.

"Has he shut you down?"

"He gave us orders not to sell; and we're not selling. But we're not idle. We're preparing to spring a mine under that young man."

"He's got you bluffed."

Kite's face twisted with a sudden rush of fury. "I tell you we're going to destroy him. Blast him. In our own good time."

Rand studied the little man; then he nodded: "Well, that's all right. Just the same, he's got you shut down."

"Yes."

"Has he pulled anyone yet for selling?"

"No."

"How about the marshal? Is he reasonable?"

"I believe he will obey the mayor's orders."

"Only question is the mayor's nerve, then?"

"Yes."

"And you haven't tried it out?"

"No; we're waiting to strike when we're sure of winning."

"Hell!" said Rand disgustedly. "He's got you bluffed. I don't believe he's got the nerve to go through with it; but one thing's sure: He's got your number, you old skate."

Kite answered hotly: "If you're so brave why don't you go ahead and fight him?"

"Are you with me?"

"I'm not ready to fight."

Rand got up. "Well, I am. I never dodged a fight yet. You watch, old man; you'll see the fur fly yet."

He stalked out, head back and shoulders squared aggressively. Kite watched him go and nodded to himself with a measure of satisfaction. He was perfectly willing to see Wint forced to fight—provided someone besides himself did the forcing. Rand looked like a fighter.

Wint and Jack Routt met on the way uptown after supper that evening. Routt asked if Wint were going to the carnival again, and Wint nodded.

"Keeping an eye on it," he said.

They went to the post office first; and Routt stopped at his office. "Come up," he said. "I'll only be a minute."

Wint went up with him. Routt dropped a letter or two on his desk, then from a lower drawer produced a bottle. "Don't mind if I mix myself a highball, do you, Wint?" he asked cheerfully. "I don't suppose you'll feel called on to arrest me."

"Go ahead," Wint said. Routt poured some whisky into a glass and filled it from a siphon.

"You're wise to leave the stuff alone," he said, between the first and second sips from the glass. "It's bad stuff unless a fellow can handle it."

Wint nodded uneasily. There was no physical craving in him; nevertheless there was an acute desire to drink for the sake of drinking, for the sake of being like other men, for the sake of defying the danger.

"That's right," he said. "I'm off it."

"At that," Routt remarked, the highball half gone, "I guess you've shown you can take it or let it alone. I lay off of it myself once in a while, just to be sure I can."

"Oh, I don't miss it," Wint said brazenly.

"Sure you don't," Routt agreed. "You're no toper. Never were. Anyone likes to drink for the sake of being a good fellow. That's all I drink for." He finished the glass, poured in a little more whisky. "Long as I'm sure I can stop when I want to, the way you have done, I go ahead and drink whenever I feel like it."

Wint nodded. Routt looked at him with a curious intentness. "Another glass here, if you'd like," he said.

"I guess not."

Routt laughed. "All right. You know best. If you can't let it alone when you get started ——"

"Oh, I can take a drink and quit."

"Want one?"

"No, I don't think so."

Routt chuckled. "Funny to see you afraid of anything," he said. "I never expected to see it."

Wint got up abruptly. The old Wint would have reached for the bottle: this was the new Wint's impulse. But he fought it down, steadied his voice.

"Jack," he said a little huskily, "you're a friend of mine. I don't want to drink. Never. Don't offer it to me. Some day I might accept. Don't ever offer me a drink, Jack. Please."

Routt was ashamed of himself, and angry at Wint for making him ashamed. "Hell, all right!" he said, and dropped the bottle into its place. "Come on. Let's take the air."

At a little after eleven that night Mike Rand sought out Wint. Wint was standing before the cane booth, watching the ring tossers. Rand pushed up beside him and touched his arm, and Wint looked round.

The carnival boss said harshly: "Hey, you!"

Wint looked round at him and said quietly: "Evening. What's the matter?"

"Your damned hick marshal has pulled one of my men. I want to bail him out."

Wint took a minute to consider this, get his bearings. He had not seen Radabaugh all evening. He asked Rand: "You mean he's made an arrest? What's the charge?"

"Claims the man was selling booze to a bum."

"Was he?" Wint inquired gently.

"Was he?" Rand growled. "No! Of course not! You must think we're bad men, coming here to dirty your pretty little town. He was selling liver pills or pink tea. What the hell of it? I want to bail him out."

"No bail accepted," said Wint quietly. "He'll have to stay in the calaboose overnight."

Rand exploded, as though he had been half expecting this. He said some harsh things about Hardiston and some harsher things about Wint, none of which will bear repeating. In the midst of them Wint stirred a little and struck the man heavily in the mouth with his right fist; at the same time his left started and land the other's throat, and his right went again on Rand's hard little jaw. Ra in a snoring heap.

Wint was curiously elated. He round. A crowd had gathered, and s the carnival men were pushing throu crowd. There was a belligerent look them. Then he saw Marshal Jim baugh elbowing through the circl Wint was glad to see Jim.

He called to him, "Marshal, here's I've arrested."

That halted Rand's underlings. himself was groaning back to cons ness. Wint pointed down at him. him to jail," he said.

One of the carnival men protested. turned to him. "Close up your show of you," he told the man. "Your pe canceled. Get out of town to-morr Radabaugh had Rand on his fe gripped the man, his left hand twis the other's collar. Two or three of men surged toward them, and Radab gun flickered into sight. It had a ste effect; no one pressed closer.

All the fighting blood had flowed Rand's smashed lips. He was whinin

"Come, old man, what's the idea?

Wint and Radabaugh marche between them through the crowd. three score curious, cheering or spectators followed them to the ce hind the fire-engine house. Ran mitted to being locked up there w more than querulous protests. He s thoroughly tamed. He asked for a l but Wint said there was no need of yer that night. Two of the fire depar on duty had come out to see the busi locking up this second prisoner. baugh bade them keep an eye on th and they agreed to do so. Then th shal scattered the crowd. Wint was bruised hands in the engine house.

After a little Radabaugh came i Wint asked, "Is it true you got selling?"

"Yes. The capper at the lottery.'

"How'd you get him?"

Radabaugh chuckled and shifte lump in his cheek. "Saw Ote Runn said. "Figured Ote would nose ou loose booze, so I kind of kept an eye o He talked to two or three men, and to this fellow. Then went in behind billboard by the hotel; and I saw hi Ote the bottle and take Ote's mone I nabbed him."

"Ote? Get him too?"

"Yes; him and his half pint. I keep it. He was pretty shaky. Nee I guess."

Wint nodded. "Be round in the ing?" he asked. "I'll be down early Radabaugh assented. Wint hesi then he said: "Good work, Jim."

The marshal grinned. "Well," h Wint, "from the looks of Rand's fa did some good work too."

They shook hands. There was tinctly mutual liking and admirati their grip. Then Wint started for and Radabaugh went back to keep on his prisoners.

One of Rand's men went to V. R with the news of the trouble; and uncertain what to do, sent for Jack and told him what had happened. was at midnight.

"I've got to stand by Rand," Kite "The question is: Are we ready to ge Wint?"

Routt shook his head. "Time for Hold off," he advised.

Kite asked impatiently: "How What makes you think you can ge thing on him?"

"It's ripe," said Routt. "Apt to any time. I've been working on it."

In the end he persuaded Kite to "Well then," Kite asked, "what a going to do about Rand?"

"He's got to take his medicine."

"He won't. He'll fight."

"I'll tell you," said Routt. "I'll him and fix it up with him."

"Can you do it without Wint's fi out?"

Routt laughed. "I'm a lawyer. right to have clients, even in the m court. I'll take their case."

Kite in the end agreed to that. Routt left the little man he intended

(Continued on Page 73)

(Continued from Page 70)

rec to the jail; but on the way he anid his mind. As well to let the men cl heir heels. It would make Rand ready to listen to reason.
lewent up Main Street toward the ud, and found that the tents were ir down, one of Radabaugh's officers ig a watchful eye on the proceedings.
t orders that the shows be closed ıot be evaded. This much at least s scored. Routt went home and did ehinking.
appeared at the jail half an hour be-int came to hold court; and Rada-let him talk with Rand and with the nan.
Wn Wint appeared the two were ut into court, with Ote Runns as a
, for good measure. Wint was sure to see Routt.
Ja nodded to him, and went up to desk and said: "Rand sent for me.
red me to e is case. He ow he's licked,
hir. He'lltake edicine if u n't make it sff."
"In charging
m ith assault d with using ofnity," said in "ssault?"
ou laughed.
Thught it was u nat did the rting."
'e made
es. Threats
scute an as-lt You know ts well as I
"
Routt nodded.
h sure." He d: "You y the carni-l'shut up. It's s ng Rand o ey. You igl go as light yı can."
"m going to rele otherman
e mit," said n "hat's all gl," Routt
rel. "Rand's reat him for eting caught.
e'llet the poor n take his edine."
Wnt nodded
b ractedly.
ısr, the city
lictor, had just ore in, and ir beckoned to mand asked:
Nit's the worst cn do on a ıa e of illegal qu selling?"
"wo hundred ol rs' fine on ne first offense s ne limit,"
osr told him.
Tree minutes later the offender was rosting that he could not pay such a ne he was appealing desperately to Rand.
Vil bade the carnival boss stand up.
ail got to his feet.
"m sorry for this business," he said urply. "I thought you were just trying o sve your face. Running a bluff."
"re you paying his fine for your rie1?" Wint asked coldly.
Ind said, "No, blast him! If he wants o et caught by a hick constable let him ak his medicine—work it out."
"I wouldn't call Radabaugh a hick to is ace," Wint suggested in a mild voice;
nc Rand apologized.
"I didn't mean a thing," he said.
Vint, in a hurry to be done, told him:
You're fined ten for assault, and five for rc nity. And costs."
"hat's all right," Rand cheerfully
gred. "I'll pay."
Vint nodded, disgusted at the man beate he submitted so tamely. He sat ba in his chair, listening idly to what Rott was saying, paying no apparent ne. Rand settled his fines and costs with the clerk, shook hands with Routt and departed. When he was gone Wint sat up with new energy.

"I hope we're rid of him for good," he said.

"You are, I'll say," Routt told him. "He's had all he wants."

The carnival got out of town that day; but before he departed Rand had a word with Kite, and Kite comforted him.

"Don't worry," Kite said. "This won't last. You'll make a harvest here next summer."

Rand said ruefully: "I'm not making any harvest now. And they tell me you helped elect this guy."

"He was a common drunk then. How could I know?"

Rand fingered his swollen face gingerly. "I tell you he's got a punch."

"He won't have any punch left when we're done with him," Kite promised. "Wait and see."

"I Know it's None of My Business, But I Can't Help Wondering"

"I'm waiting," said Rand. And a little later he and his cohorts went their way.

XXXVII

IN MID-JULY Wint at last found out the truth about Hetty. That is to say, he found out a part of the truth; enough to make him heartsick and sorry.

His eventual enlightenment was inevitable as to-morrow morning's sunrise. A more sophisticated young man—Jack Routt, for example—would not have remained in the dark so long. But Wint, aside from noticing that Hetty looked bad and aside from some casual consideration of Routt's repeated warnings, gave very little thought to his mother's handmaiden. There were too many other and more important things to occupy him—his work as mayor, his studies, his Joan. Joan was bulking very large in his life in those days. He found understanding and sympathy in her. They were better than sweethearts; they were friends. The other—this thought must have been lying unspoken in the mind of each—the other could wait and must wait till Wint had proved himself for good and all. Then —— Once in a while Wint allowed himself to look forward, and to dream; but not often. The present was too engrossing to give much time for dreaming of the future.

So, though he saw Hetty daily when she served the meals at home or when he went into the kitchen or when he encountered her at her cleaning in the front part of the house Wint gave her very little consideration. His mother protested once in a while that Hetty was growing lazy.

"She slacks things," the voluble little woman said. "She leaves dust about; and she's not so neat as she used to be. I declare, you just can't get a girl that will keep up her work. They all get so lazy after a while, but I did think that Hetty was going to be ——"

Wint's father said tolerantly that Hetty was all right; that she was a good cook and did her work well enough so far as he could see. The elder Chase had always been a good-natured man; but a new generosity in his appraisal of others was developing in the man now. He had been in some trouble of mind since that day in May when Amos Caretall came home. Chase was oppressed by the conviction that he had acted unworthily in that matter; yet he could not admit as much. His hostility toward Amos would not let him. The result was that he felt at odds with his son; they avoided discussions of the town's affairs; they lived together in a polite neutrality. It was working changes in Chase. He was becoming in some fashion a sympathetic, rather likable figure. One felt he was unhappy, needed comforting.

So on this day he spoke well of Hetty; and because Mrs. Chase was always the loyal mirror of her husband's opinions she also ceased to criticize the girl. Wint had heard the conversation, but it made little impression on him. He was thinking of other things; wondering, for example, when Kite would make the first move in the conflict that was sure to come. He had heard that day—Gergue told him—that Routt was thinking of running for mayor against him in the fall. Wint was having difficulty in understanding that. He knew Routt was his friend; and, of course, political opponents might still be personal friends. Nevertheless the thing puzzled him. It did not jibe with his opinion of Routt.

After supper that night the elder Chase went uptown. Wint had some writing to do and went upstairs to his room to do it. Mrs. Chase had a caller, Mrs. Hullis, from next door. They were sewing and talking together in the sitting room. Wint could hear the murmur of his mother's voice, steady and persistent. Mrs. Hullis was a good listener.

About an hour after supper Wint realized that he wanted a drink of water. There was water in the bathroom; but there was a filter on the faucet in the kitchen, and Hardiston water needed filtering. It was pure enough, clean enough, but there was a proportion of iron in it that sometimes gave the water a slightly rusty color.

So Wint went down, by the back stairs in order not to disturb his mother, into the kitchen.

He found Hetty sitting in a kitchen chair with her arms hanging limply and her feet outstretched before her. The girl's whole body was slumped down as though she had fainted; and at first Wint thought this was what had happened, for Hetty's eyes were closed.

He cried out, "Why, Hetty, what's the matter? Are you sick?" And he went quickly toward her across the kitchen.

But when he spoke Hetty opened her eyes and looked at him and shook her head. "No," she said in the sullen tone that had become habitual to her. "No; I'm all right."

"You are not," Wint protested. "You're as white as a rag." He saw the dishes piled in the sink. "You've not cleaned up after supper. How long have you been this way?"

Hetty closed her eyes wearily, and opened them again, and managed a smile. "Oh, I'm all right, Wint," she said. "You're a nice boy. Run along. Don't bother about me."

Wint laughed. "I'm not bothering. I want to help. What happened?"

"I—just felt terribly tired—all of a sudden," she said. There was a suggestion of surrender in her voice; as though the barriers of reserve were breaking down. "That's all, Wint; I'm just tired."

"You need a rest," Wint agreed. "You've been plugging away taking care of us for a long time now. Come in and lie down on the couch in the dining room."

Hetty shook her head in a frightened little way; the bravado was going out of her. She seemed very helpless and feminine. "No, no," she protested. "I'll be all right as soon as I rest a little. Do run along, Wint."

Wint put his hand on her forehead. "There's more than just being tired the matter with you. You're sick, Hetty. Your head's hot. I'll tell you, you go up and go to bed, and I'll clean up down here. I'm a champion dishwasher."

Hetty laughed wearily: "You're a champion decent boy, Wint," she said.

Gordon Coats

RIGHT from the start you expect a Gordon labeled coat to be good—after a season's wear you know it is.

When Gordon puts his name on a coat, it's his promise of satisfaction—and no Gordon coat ever went to protest.

Whether your interest is in a Sheep-lined coat or a Leather coat, don't let your interest in the Gordon label lag.

GORDON & FERGUSON
SAINT PAUL MINNESOTA

"But you'll just have to let me alone. There's nothing you can do for me."

"I can see that you go up to bed."

"No, no; I'm all right. Nearly."

Wint started for the door. "I'm going to telephone for a doctor," he declared. "You're sick, Hetty. That's the plain English of it. I'm going to telephone."

She had moved so swiftly that she startled him; moved after him, caught his arm, shook it fiercely. "You'll not telephone for anyone, do you hear?" she told him hotly. "You let me alone, Wint! What do I want with a doctor?"

Wint was honestly uneasy about her. He said: "Then let me call mother. She's a good hand to make sick people well. She ——"

"No, no; not your mother," Hetty protested. And half to herself she added: "Not your mother. She would know."

The little phrase was profoundly revealing. "She would know." It struck Wint like a splash of cold water in the face. "She would know." It told so old a story. Wint understood at last; and Hetty saw understanding in his eyes and braced herself to defy him.

But Wint only said softly, "Hetty? That? You poor kid! I'm so sorry."

Hetty laughed harshly; and her face began to twist and work and assume strange contortions, and abruptly she began to cry. She turned and groped her way to the chair again, and sat down with her head pillowed on her arms on the table and sobbed as though her heart was broken.

Wint stood very still, stunned and miserable, watching her. There was no sound at all in the kitchen except the sound of Hetty's racking, choking sobs. In the stillness Wint could hear the even murmur of his mother's voice, three rooms away, as she talked to Mrs. Hullis. He could almost hear the words she said. And Hetty sobbed, with her head on her arms.

Wint went across to her and touched her head with his hand; and she brushed it away with an angry gesture, as a hurt dog snarls at the hand that comes to heal its hurt. She was like a hurt animal, he thought; she was quite alone in the world. Worse than alone, for she was here in Hardiston, where all the folks would make her business their business, for that is the way of small towns. Wint was terribly sorry for her, terribly anxious to help her. He had no thought in this moment of Jack Routt's warnings; and if he had remembered them they would only have hardened his determination to help her. Which may have been what Jack intended.

He said: "Cry it out, Hetty. Then I want to talk to you."

She said thickly: "Go away. Let me alone." But Wint did not move, while she cried and cried.

He stood just beside her. Hetty at last shifted her position so that she could look down between her arms and see his feet where he waited. She said again, "Go away."

Wint told her comfortingly: "I'm not going away. This is the time your friends will stick by you. I'm going to stick by you."

"I don't want you to," she said. "I don't want anyone to. Go away. Let me alone. Let me do what I want to."

Wint said: "You mustn't think this is too desperately hopeless, Hetty. I'm going to do anything I can; and mother will take care of you."

She lifted her head at that and looked at him and laughed in a hard disillusioned way. "A lot you know about women, Wint," she said.

"I know that you think things are darker than they are," he assured her. "You'll see. We'll manage—mother and I."

"Your mother'll order me out of the house, minute she knows," said Hetty unemotionally.

Wint protested, "No; you don't know her. Mother couldn't hurt anyone. You'll see. She'll do everything."

Hetty got up and went to work on the dishes, like an automaton. She had to busy herself with something or she would have screamed. She was trembling, hysterically astir.

Wint watched her for a little; then he said, "You're going to let us help you."

"All the help I'll get will be a kick," she said. "Your mother won't want the like of me in her house."

"You don't know her," he insisted. "Mother's fine, underneath. She's always doing things for people. You'll see."

Hetty looked at him sidewise, smil little. "You never would believe any was so till you'd tried it, Wint," she him. "But you're pretty decent, jus same."

He said, studying her "You're lo better already. Feeling better?"

She nodded. "It helps some—ju tell someone," she admitted. "And spell is over anyway."

"Having friends always helps," he her. "You'll find it so." She smiled fully; and he went on: "I'm goin speak to mother to-night."

Hetty said, "Well, she's got a rig know. I'll pack up my things."

"After Mrs. Hullis goes."

"Why not tell her, too? Your m will, first thing in the morning."

Wint laughed. "You like to look a black side, don't you? I tell you it's to be all right."

She whirled to face him, and said, her breath, with a terrible earnest "All right? All right? If you say again I'll yell at you! You poor, straight fool of a kid! You talk like a baby that had stubbed its toe. An the time I'd better be dead, dead. T no stubbed toe, Wint. Wake up. I be a ——"

Abruptly she collapsed again, wee into the chair.

Wint said insistently: "Just the s Hetty, you'll see I know what I'm ta about. Things will come out better you think."

She cried, "Oh, get out of here! Ge of here, you poor little fool!"

Wint went up to his room. Mrs. was still with his mother. He would till Mrs. Hullis was gone.

XXXVIII

MRS. HULLIS stayed late and had time to do some thinking b she finally departed. But he did little; he was in no mood for thinkin was characteristic of Wint that whe sympathies were roused he was an u tering partisan; and there was no que that his sympathies had been rous behalf of Hetty.

It was equally characteristic of him he wasted very little time wondering was to blame for what had happened; that he wasted no time at all in consid what Hardiston would say about it all was going to help the girl; he had ma his mind to that. The rest did not m

He counted on his mother's symp and understanding; and when after a he heard her showing Mrs. Hullis t door, and heard their two voices upr in a last babel as they cleaned up th ends of conversation and said good-b went out into the upper hall, to be r to descend. Hetty had gone upsta little earlier; he could hear her now, ing about in her room.

His mother went out on the front with Mrs. Hullis, to be sure no word been forgotten; and when she cam after her visitor had gone Wint was wa for her.

She said, "Why, Wint, I thought y gone to bed long ago. I told Mrs. H you were studying the law books u your room. Mr. Hullis is a lawyer, know. She says he brings his books h and sits up half the night, but I told you were always one to go early to ever since you was a boy. And she she ——"

Wint took her arm good-natur "There, mother," he said, "I don't what Mrs. Hullis said. I want to tal you about something that has just c up. Come in and sit down."

Mrs. Chase, like most talkative wo was habitually so absorbed in her own versation and her own thoughts that it hard to surprise her. She took W announcement as a matter of course; they went into the sitting room arm in arm. She picked up her sewing basket sat down in the chair she had occupie evening, and began to rock primly and forth while she stretched a sock on fingers to discover any holes it might acquired.

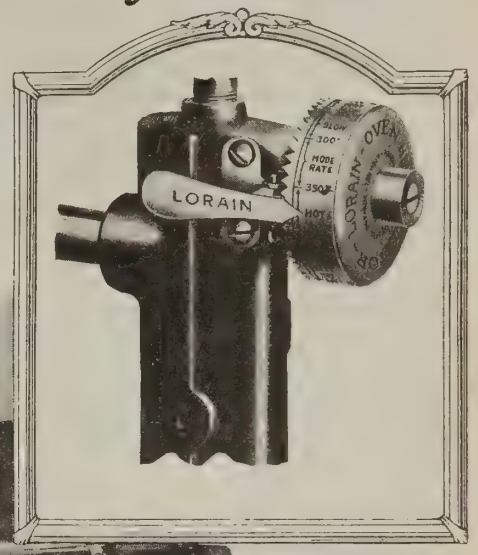
"I do get such a comfort out of tal to Mrs. Hullis," she was saying as she down. "She's such a nice woman, W I never could see why you don't like more. She and I ——"

Wint said: "I don't want to talk to about Mrs. Hullis, mother. I want to to you about Hetty."

(Continued on Page 76)

"LORAIN"

"the oven heat regulator that places 44 oven temperatures at your command"



Save Kitchen Hours

A Wonderful Device that Guards Your Cooking While You Rest

NOW women can be free for all time from those tiring hours spent each day pot watching over the hot stove.

For invention has given to housewives a scientific oven heat regulator that guards her cooking as securely as if she were constantly there.

Extra Recreation Hours

It is called the LORAIN Oven Heat Regulator.

With this scientific device on your stove, you simply set the wheel at any one of the 44 temperatures provided for. Then you can forget all about your cooking. You know exactly what time it will be ready to be taken from the oven. For once the wheel has been set the heat never varies.

Those hours formerly spent in endless watching lest the food burn, or be overdone or underdone, can now become rest or recreation hours.

Measured Heat

But this remarkable invention accomplishes a great deal more. It takes the guesswork out of baking.

By scientifically measuring your heat, so as to enable you to secure and maintain the exact heat you need for the best results, your baking and roasting is always uniform. Every day's results are as delicious as your "luckiest day."

Stop cooking in the old-time way. You owe it to yourself and your family to protect your health by eliminating needless, strength-sapping drudgery. And to make every meal uniformly delicious.

This Booklet Free

We have just published a booklet "An Easier Day's Work." Every woman should have this valuable booklet. Write for it NOW. Please mention your dealer's name.

Below are listed six famous stoves. On each of them you can get the LORAIN Oven Heat Regulator. Go to your dealer and see this wonderful device demonstrated. Only then can you fully appreciate the worry, steps, time and money it will save you.

AMERICAN STOVE COMPANY
111 Chouteau Ave., St. Louis, Mo.
Largest Makers of Gas Ranges in the World

These Famous Stoves Are Equipped With the LORAIN

Clark Jewel, George M. Clark & Co. Div., Chicago, Ill.
Dangler, Dangler Stove Co. Div., Cleveland, Ohio
Direct Action, National Stove Co. Div., Lorain, Ohio
New Process, New Process Stove Co. Div., Cleveland, O.
Quick Meal, Ringen Stove Co. Div., St. Louis, Mo.
Reliable, Reliable Stove Co. Div., Cleveland, Ohio

(Continued from Page 74)

Mrs. Chase did drop her work in her lap at that. "About Hetty?" she echoed. "Why should you want to talk about Hetty? Wint! You're never going to marry her, are you? I ——"

Wint laughed. "No, no. Not that Hetty isn't a nice girl; and she'll make some fellow a mighty fine wife. But I want to ——"

"There," said Mrs. Chase, immensely reassured. "I knew it couldn't be that. I always knew you and Joan—I said to Mrs. Hullis to-night that you and Joan were friendly as ever. She's a nice girl, Wint. I don't see why you don't get married right away. Your father and I were married before ——"

Wint said, persistently bringing her back to the point, "I don't want to talk about Joan either, mother. It's Hetty."

"Well, I should think you would want to talk about Joan," Mrs. Chase declared. "She's worth talking about. I'm sure she wouldn't like it very much to know you don't want to talk about her, Wint. She ——"

"Mother," Wint insisted, "Hetty needs our help. I want you to ——"

Mrs. Chase looked at him with a face that had suddenly turned white and cold. She put one trembling hand to her throat. "Wint," she asked in a husky whisper, "what's the matter with Hetty? What are you talking about? What is the ——"

"Hetty's going to have a little baby," said Wint gently.

Mrs. Chase cried, "Wint! You're not—you haven't—it isn't you?"

"No, no," Wint said impatiently. "Of course not. I ——"

"The shameless girl!" his mother cried, all her alarm turning into anger. "The shameless hussy! In my house! I declare, I ——"

"Please," her son protested. His mother got up.

"She shan't sleep another night under my roof," she declared. "I never thought to live to ——"

"Mother!" said Wint, so sternly that his mother stopped in the doorway. "Come back," he told her. And she obeyed him, protesting weakly. "Sit down," he said. "Hetty needs our help, don't you understand?"

When a wolf is injured his own pack pulls him down; when a crow is hurt his fellows of the flock peck him to death relentlessly; but wolf and crow are merciful compared to womankind. There is no deeper instinct in woman than that which condemns the sister who has strayed. It is true that in many women the compassion overpowers the cruelty of wrath; but Mrs. Chase was a very simple person, elemental, a woman and nothing more.

She sat down at Wint's command; but she said implacably: "I won't have her in the house, Wint. A girl like that. I should think you'd be ashamed to stand up for her. A shameless, worthless thing! You can talk all you've a mind to, but I'm going to send her packing. You and your father have your own way most of the time, but this is once that I'm going to have mine. I always knew she was too pretty for any good. Pretty, and impudent, and all. I won't have her."

Wint asked: "Hasn't she worked hard enough for you? Done her work well? Tried to do what you wanted?"

"'Course she's done her work or I wouldn't have kept her. That hasn't a thing to do with it, Wint. I'm surprised at you standing up for her. I told Mrs. Hullis only the other day that she was too pretty for her own good. I might have known she would get into trouble. The nasty little ——"

"Mother," Wint cried sharply, "I won't let you talk like that. I told Hetty we'd help her; and she said you'd be against her; and I wouldn't believe it. I can't believe it. A poor girl without a friend anywhere, in the worst kind of trouble, and you ——"

"Wint, I don't see why you stand up for her if you aren't ——"

"You know I'm not. Don't be ridiculous, mother. But I've known her all our lives. Grew up with her. And I'm going to ——"

His mother shook her head positively. "I'm not going to have her in the house, Wint. You don't need to talk any more. That's all there is to it. I won't!"

"I counted on you."

"Well, you needn't to count on me any more. I know what's best; and I'm not going to have that shameless ——"

She was interrupted this time by the arrival of Wint's father. They heard the front door open and heard him come in. Wint got up and went to the door that led into the hall. The elder Chase was hanging up his hat. Mrs. Chase, behind Wint, was talking steadily.

Wint said to his father, "Come in, will you? Mother and I are talking something over."

Chase nodded; but he had news of his own. "Heard uptown to-night that Routt's going to run against you in the fall," he said. "Did you know that, Wint?"

Wint nodded. "I'd heard so."

"I thought you and he were good friends."

"We are," Wint said good-naturedly. "But that doesn't prevent our being political enemies. He's had some break with Amos. Come in, dad. I want you to hear ——"

But the older man heard it first from Mrs. Chase. She came across the room to meet them, pouring it out indignantly.

"And Wint wants me to keep her," she concluded. "Wants me to keep that girl in the house after this. I told him ——"

Chase asked, "What's that? Wint, what is this? Hetty—in trouble?"

"Yes, sir," said Wint. "I found it out to-night; and I promised her we'd stand by her—help her."

Chase demanded sharply: "What right had you to commit us? If she chooses to destroy herself how does that concern us? I'm surprised at you, Wint. It's impossible."

Wint said in a steady voice: "She needs friends badly. She hasn't anyone to turn to. And Hetty's a good sort, underneath. I told her ——"

"Why doesn't she turn to the man?" Chase interjected. "He's the one that ought to ——"

"As a matter of fact I haven't thought of him," said Wint. "But if he were likely to help her it seems to me he would have taken a hand before this. Don't you think so?"

"Don't I think so?" Wint's father was outraged and angry. "I don't think anything about it. It's no concern of ours. So long as she packs herself out of here. Let her get out of her own mess."

"I'm going to make it a concern of mine," said Wint, his jaw stiffening. "I'm not going to see her turned adrift. I'm going to help her."

Chase looked at him keenly. "Wint, is this your doing? Are you ——"

Wint said a little wearily: "That was the first thing mother asked. You people don't think very highly of me, do you?"

"Isn't it the natural question to ask?" his father demanded. "Isn't it the only possible explanation of this attitude on your part? Is it true, young man, that you ——"

"Have it any way you want," Wint exclaimed, too angry to deny again. "I don't care. The point is this: Hetty is in trouble; she needs friends. I've promised that we would help her. I've promised you and mother would back me up. I counted on you."

Chase lifted his hand in a terrible silent rage. "You're anxious to shame us, your mother and me, in the face of all Hardiston. I tell you, Wint, whether it's your doing or not you're crazy. If it's you—then we'll give her some money and get rid of her. If it's not, then she gets out of here to-night—inside the hour."

Wint said, half to himself, "We'd have to send her away in any case—somewhere—for a while."

Chase laughed bitterly. "All right. If this is a new scrape you've got yourself into I'll buy you out of it. How much does the girl want?"

Wint flamed at him: "It's not my concern, I tell you! You ought not to need to be told."

"Then get her out of the house," Chase exclaimed; "as quick as you can—or I will. Where is she?" He turned toward the door. But Wint was before him, blocking the doorway. "Father," he said, "you and mother—I've promised her help. Promised you would be good to her."

"The more fool you! She goes out to-night."

"If she goes," Wint cried, "I go with her. You can do as you please."

For a little after that there was silence in the room. Wint stood in the doorway, head high and eyes hot. His father faced him. His mother stood by her chair across the room, her lips moving soundlessly. It was she who first found voice. She came toward Wint in a clumsy stumbling little run; and she caught his arms, and she pleaded with him:

"Don't you do that, Wint! Don't you! Don't go away and leave us again. We're getting old, sonny—your father and I. Your old mother. Don't you go away. We'd—we couldn't ever stand it again. We ——"

Wint said gently: "I don't want to go. I want to stay at home here with you both, and be proud of you and love you."

"You shall stay," she told him. "You shall. Anything you want, Wint, sonny. I don't care whether you did it or not. I'll be good to her. I will, Wint; if you'll stay."

The boy said, half abashed: "I don't want to seem to drive you to it. Only—I've promised her. I can't break my word to her. Please, can't you see?"

"It's all right," his mother protested. "I'll do anything." She clutched her husband's arm. "Tell him to stay, Winthrop," she begged. "Don't let him go away. We'll take care of Hetty."

Chase said: "You're making lots of trouble for us, Wint." He smiled a little unsteadily. "We're too old for so much excitement. You'll have to remember that. Remember to take care of us—as well as Hetty."

Wint could not hold out. He said: "All right. I won't go away. Do as you think best about Hetty. I hope you'll let her ——"

"I'll keep her," his mother cried. "I'll be as good as I know how to her."

And his father echoed: "We'll take care of her, Wint."

"You're doing it because you want to?" Wint pleaded. "You don't have to. I'll stay anyway. But I—hope you'll want to help her, anyway."

"Yes," Chase said; "we'll keep her—because we want to do what we can."

But they were not to keep her very long, for Hetty's time was near. It was decided that she should go to Columbus for a little while and return to them in the fall. Wint wrote a check to cover her expenses. Hetty's old sullenness had returned to her. She took the check without thanks, and tucked it away in her pocketbook. She was to go to the train alone, to avoid talk.

The night of her going Jack Routt met V. R. Kite and took Kite to his office; and he told him certain things, an evil elation in his eyes; told him in detail that which he had planned.

Kite listened with eyes shining; and at the end he said, "He'll deny it. What can you prove?"

"This proves the whole thing," said Routt triumphantly, and slid a slip of paper across the desk to Kite.

Kite looked at it. A check, drawn by Winthrop Chase, Jr., to the order of Henrietta Morfee.

The buzzard of a man banged his hard old fist upon the table. "Routt," he cried, "we win! We'll skin that cub. We'll hang his hide on the barn."

Routt reached into the drawer of his desk. "And that means," he said, "that it's time to have a drink. Say when."

XXXIX

AT THIS time and for a little while afterward it seemed to Wint that all was well with the world. He had some reason to think so. He had kept his promise to Hetty; and that matter, which had threatened to cause a difference between him and his father and mother, had resulted in the end in a closer understanding between them. They had let him see their dependence on him; they had let him see something of the depths of affection in their hearts for him. The Chases were not a demonstrative family, not given to much talk of these matters; and Wint found their attitude in some sort a happy revelation. His father began in an uncertain way to defer to Wint; the elder Chase began to ask his son's advice now and then; he seemed to have recognized the fact of Wint's manhood; he seemed to have discovered that Wint was no longer a boy. There was a new respect in his bearing toward his son.

Wint's mother had changed too; she was perhaps a little less loquacious. She and the elder Chase were beginning to be proud of Wint; and this pride forced them to see him in a new light, not as their boy, their son, their child; but as a man whom other men respected.

For Wint was respected. That was one of the things that made the world look bright to him. He was surprised to find as the days passed, and as it was seen his orders to clean up the town were b enforced, that good citizens rallied to Hardiston was normally a law-abic decent place; its people were norm decent and law-abiding people. T would not have condemned Wint for ure to enforce the law; in fact with antecedents they had expected him to They were the more pleased when he enforce it; and they took occasion t him see it. Also they took occasion t the elder Chase that his son was doing and Winthrop Chase, Senior, took a fident pride in these assurances. C was never a hypocrite, even with him he could not forget that he had urged to rescind those orders to Radabaugh.

Wint found a surprising number variety of people rallying to his suppo those days after his clash with the car men and his victory in that matter. Hoover's father, for example; a solid r a lawyer of the old school, and one spoke little and to the point. Hoover Wint he had done well.

Wint said he had tried to do well.

"You understand, young man," Ho drawled in the slow whimsical fashion was characteristic of him—"you un stand, I'm no teetotaler myself. I've accustomed to a drink when I chose, good many years. This—crusade—of y has made it damned inconvenient for too. But it's a good cause. I've no plaint. More power to your elbow!"

Wint laughed and said, "I guess t would be no kick at anything you m do, sir."

Hoover nodded. "Oh, of course I bring the stuff in if I chose. But a can't afford to be on the wrong side in t matters, you know; not if he want keep his self-respect. And I can do wit it. I can do without it. Stick to guns, young man."

"I'm going to," Wint told him, flu and proud at the older man's praise. going to, sir."

Peter Gergue came to Wint, scratc the back of his head and grinning a sly knowing grin, and told Wint he was ma votes by what he had done.

"That's a funny thing too," said Ger "Man'd think you'd make a pile of mies. But I could name two or thre the worst soaks in town that say yo all right; got good stuff in you; all th Gergue scratched his head again. sir, men are funny things, Wint."

Wint had never particularly l Gergue, because he had never seen u the surface of the man. He was comin have a quite genuine respect and affec for Amos' lieutenant.

"I'm not doing it to make votes," said good-naturedly.

"That's the reason you're making v by it," Gergue assured him. "And th the way politics goes. Take James Hollow now; he's always trying to do v is right. He says so hisself. But it d get him anywhere; and I reckon th because he does what's right becaus thinks there's votes in it. You go al and do it anyway. Maybe you do it bec you think it'll start a fight, make s folks mad. And instead of that they out o' your hand."

Wint nodded. "Even Kite," he s "He made some fuss at first. But it l as though he had decided to submit."

Gergue shook his head. "Don't make any mistake about V. R. Kite," warned Wint. "He don't like a f much. Getting too old. But he'll f when he's got a gun in both hands. play poker when he holds four aces the joker. V. R. will start something w he's ready. I wasn't talking about hi

"I'm ready when he is," Wint decla

"He won't be ready till he thinks ain't," Gergue insisted.

But Wint was in no mood to be depre by a possibility of future trouble; in he rather looked forward to this poter clash with V. R. Kite. It added to the of life.

Old Mrs. Mueller, who ran the bak whispered to Wint when he stopped f loaf of bread one night that he was a boy. "My Hans," she said grate "he is working now; and that he w never do when he could get his beer r lar, every second day a case of it. there is more money in the drawer all time too."

And Davy Morgan, the foreman of father's furnace, told Wint that save

(Continued on Page 79)

(Continued from Page 76)

e ontwo irreconcilables the men at the nac were with him.
"Ad the men that kick the most, they th ones who are the better off for it," explained in the careful English of an Wshman to whom the language must y be an acquired and unfamiliar ent.
Wliam Ryan has never been fit for t Mondays until now."
u hie, former attorney-general of the , ho lived up the creek, and who had speaker at the elder Chase's rallies he st mayoral campaign, happened into n e day and told Wint he had heard he latter at Columbus and that people lking about him, Wint Chase, up re.
"Ty know old Kite, you see," he told
t. "He comes up there to lobby on quor bill; and they like to see him ick in the slats, as you might say.
y'll have to look out for him."
going to," Wint assured Murchie.
"You can down Kite there'll be a ce or you at Columbus some day," rdie predicted. "They don't like te there."
San O'Brien, the fat restaurant man,
p. laughing long enough to tell Wint all right, had good stuff in him, was ne. "The Greek next door," he ex-ine—"he thinks you're a tin god. He is e candy store, you know. Says re ever was so much candy sold. He'll te it you, my boy, if he ever gets his per and learns to read; and if you e tit long."
Wi got most pleasure perhaps out of e aitude of B. B. Beecham. He had hoest respect for the editor's opinion mc matters. Everyone had. Beecham s ibitually right. In his editorial pacy he took no notice of what had me o pass in Hardiston. When the rnival men were arrested he printed the t vthout comment.
"Mhael Rand was fined for assault
d iproper language," the Journal said;
e ofer man for "illegal sales of liquor";
d t; "permit of the carnival for the use th streets was canceled." Thus the ws as recorded, and every man might aw is own deductions. B. B. was never e t force his opinions on any man, which may have been the reason why people went out of their way to discover them.

Wint stopped in at the Journal office one hot day in July. B. B. was in his shirt sleeves and collarless. He wore, habitually, stiff-bosomed shirts of the kind usually associated with evening dress. On this particular day he had been working over the press—his foreman was ill—and there were inky smears on the white bosom. Nevertheless, B. B.'s pink countenance above the shirt was as clean as a baby's. There was always this refreshing atmosphere of cleanliness about the editor. Wint went into the office, sat down in one of the chairs and took off his hat and fanned himself. The afternoon sun was beginning to strike in through the open door and the big window; but there was a pleasantly cool breath from the dark regions behind the office, where the press and the apparatus that goes to make a small-town printing shop were housed.

Wint said: "This is one hot day."

"Hottest day of the summer," B. B. agreed.

"How hot is it? Happen to know?"

"Ninety-four in the shade at one o'clock," said B. B. "Mr. Waters telephoned to me, half an hour ago."

"J. B. Waters? He keeps a weather record, doesn't he?"

"Yes. Has, for a good many years. We print his record every week. Perhaps you haven't noticed it."

Wint nodded. "Yes. I suppose everyone likes to read about the weather. Even on a hot day."

B. B. smiled. "That's because everyone likes to read about things they have experienced. You won't find a big daily in the country without its paragraph or its temperature tables devoted to the weather, every day in the year. And a day like this is worth a front-page story any time."

"You know what a day like this always makes me think of?" Wint asked; and B. B. looked interested. "A glass of beer," said Wint. "Cool, and brown, with beads on the outside of the glass."

The editor smiled. "The beads on the outside of the glass won't cool you off half as much as the beads on the outside of your head," he said. "Did you ever stop to think of that?"

"Sweat, you mean?"

"Exactly. You know, when troops go into a hot country they get flannel-covered canteens; and when they want to cool off the water in the canteens they wet the flannel and let it dry. The evaporation of your own perspiration is the finest cooling agency in the world."

"Maybe," Wint agreed; "but it doesn't stop your thirst."

B. B. said good-naturedly: "A thirst is one of the handicaps of the smoker. I quit smoking a good many years ago. A nonsmoker can satisfy his own thirst by swallowing his own spittle. I don't suppose you ever thought of that."

"Is that straight?"

"Yes indeed."

Wint asked amiably: "Mean to say you wouldn't have to take a barrel of water to cross the Sahara?"

"Oh, when the bodily juices are exhausted, of course ——"

Wint grinned. "I'll stick to my beer."

B. B. laughed and said, "I expect a good many Hardiston men are cussing you today because they can't get beer."

"I suppose so. I've a notion to cuss myself."

He added, a moment later: "You know, B. B., it's surprising to me how little a fuss has been made over that."

"You mean—the—enforcing the law?"

"Yes. I looked for a row."

"Oh, you'll find most people are on your side. You know, most people are for the decent thing, in the long run. That's what makes the world go round."

"Think so?"

"Yes, indeed. If that weren't so where would be the virtue in democracy?"

"Well," Wint said good-naturedly, "I've always had an idea that a democracy was a poor way to run things anyway. About all you can say for it is that a man has a right to make a fool of himself."

"Well, that's about all you can say against slavery, isn't it?"

Wint considered. "I don't get you."

"There were good men in the South before the war, owning slaves," said B. B., "and the slaves were better off than their descendants are now. Materially; perhaps morally too. But that doesn't prove slavery was right." He added: "The darkies had a right to make fools of themselves if they chose, you see. Their masters—even the good masters—prevented them."

"I suppose that's what a benevolent despot does?"

"Exactly."

"If it wasn't so hot I'd give three cheers for democracy." He considered thoughtfully, fanning himself with his hat. "But that's what I'm doing, B. B. I'm refusing to let some that would like to make fools of themselves with booze."

B. B. shook his head. "Not at all. It's not your doing. The people are doing it themselves. They voted dry; they elected you to enforce their vote. See the distinction?"

"Think I've done right, then?" Wint asked.

And B. B. said, "Yes, indeed."

Wint got a surprising amount of satisfaction out of that. Because, as has been said, he valued B. B.'s opinion. So, on the whole, that month of July was a cheerful one for Wint. Things were going his way; the world was bright; the skies were sunny.

The first cloud upon them came on the third of August. It was a very little cloud; but it was a forerunner of bigger ones to come. Wint did not in the beginning appreciate its full significance; in fact he was not sure it had any significance at all. It merely puzzled him.

His month's statement from the bank came in. When it first came he tossed the long envelope aside without opening it; and it was not till that night that he compared the bank statement with the balance in his check book.

He discovered then that there was a mistake somewhere. The bank credited him with more money than he should have. He said to himself good-naturedly that he ought not to kick about that. Nevertheless he ran through his canceled checks, comparing them with his stubs, to see where the difference lay.

He located the discrepancy almost at once; and when he discovered it he sat back and considered its significance with a puzzled look in his eyes.

The trouble was that his check to Hetty for her expense in Columbus had never been cashed; and Wint could not understand that at all.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

THE POETS' CORNER

The Village Blacksmith
(Modern Version)

By enry Wadsworth Longfellow and Channing Pollock

UDER a spreading chestnut tree
The village smithy stands; Thsmith, a wealthy man is he,
ith diamonds on his hands;
An the bracelets sported by his wife
re broad as iron bands.

Hiroll is crisp, and green, and thick,
e calls his chauffeur Dan; Hibrow is dry beneath a highriced hat that shades his pan;
Ar he looks the whole world in the face,
nd sasses any man.

Wit in, week out, from ten till five
e hears the hooters blow;
Aumobiles, with wabbly wheels,
hat do not want to go,
Pd tribute to his doubtful skill—
nd the tribute's never low!

He rives to town most ev'ry eve,
nd goes out with the boys;
He ears the latest jazz with meals,
e hears the soubrette's voice
Sing in the cabaret,
nd it makes his heart rejoice.

Tding when there's naught else to do,
ward through life he goes;
Ea morning sees him open shop,
nd very promptly close;
So ething attempted, someone done,
as earned a night's repose.

Thnks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend, or the lesson thou hast taught!
Th in a job that serves the mob ur fortunes must be wrought;
Sa e now we pay so much a day or ev'rything but thought!

In Wartime, or How I Tried to Raise a Pig for Uncle Sam

I TRIED to raise a pig for Uncle Sam.
Big bankers urged it was the thing to do;
Just feed it with the garbage from the can;
So simple anyone could see it through.

I tried to raise a pig for Uncle Sam
And for our boys across the seas in blue;
The neighbors rose against it as one man.
They said, "We'll get the justice after you."

I tried to raise a pig for Uncle Sam.
The complications grew and grew and grew.
So many and so varied the demands
I only can enumerate a few.

Such as a house, well built, both warm and dry,
Sufficiently removed as space permits,
Secured with hog-proof wire as farmers do
To keep the animal from breaking through.

An ample runway underneath some trees,
Oozy with nice black mud in which to snooze,
A varied menu served from day to day
Of milk and grain, a costly kind of booze,

Compared with economic garbage stew,
Which was quite all they said we'd have to do,
A weekly bath in scented kerosene,
A frequent coat of whitewash to the pen.

Simple, indeed, the raising of a pig—
The innocence of these big banker men—
I know now that the pig is overlord
And that the pen—is mightier than the sword.

—Emily B. Larned.

Lackawanna Ferry

JENKINS is used to spending his days
With bills and drafts and an adding machine;
Used to humdrum office ways
And traffic's dull routine.
Jenkins is faithful to his work—
Plodding along with Jack and Jerry:
Yet, what wakes in the dried old clerk
As his home road leads to the ferry?

See him over the ferry's rail
Drinking the glamour of tides and shores;
Noting each far, faint, homing sail;
Heeding the chants of the stevedores;
Measuring liners at their slips;
Feeling the engine's throb and quiver;
Watching the soldier-laden ships
And Liberty, guarding the river!

Clearly he sees the ports they seek,
Steamers and schooners fading away—
Sydney, Shanghai, Mozambique,
Malta, Lisbon or Bombay!
Ports enchanted! Yet at home
Scenes as fair is he espying:
Look! Where currents tumble and foam
He sees the great fleet lying!

Jenkins is one with destiny—
Crumpled notes and canceled checks!
Jenkins has tamed his love for the sea,
For wind-beat, wave-washed decks!
Yet come times when he sheds the dull;
When his ferry road to Rangoon reaches!
When his spirit soars like a swift-winged gull
To skim the uttermost beaches!

—Daniel Henderson.

The Great Adventure
(With acknowledgments to George Matthew Adams)

WHAT is the profit that men can find
In the frozen North or the jungle heat?
What is the vision they hold in mind
When they face the hardships that they must meet?
It cannot pay, yet they see it through,
And the magic purpose that keeps them to it
Is doing the work that they want to do
In the way that they want to do it.

It isn't money, it isn't fame
That stirs the soul to a true adventure,
Or makes men stick to the grimmest game
In spite of ridicule, doubt and censure.
It's just the spirit that holds you true
To what you've started, and bears you through it;
It's doing the work that you want to do
In the way that you want to do it.

Oh, the weary souls who are chained by chance
To a treadmill track they must always amble,
Who never thrilled to a mad romance,
Who feared the risk of a mighty gamble—
They are the failures in life, not those Who dreamed and struggled and risked and lost,
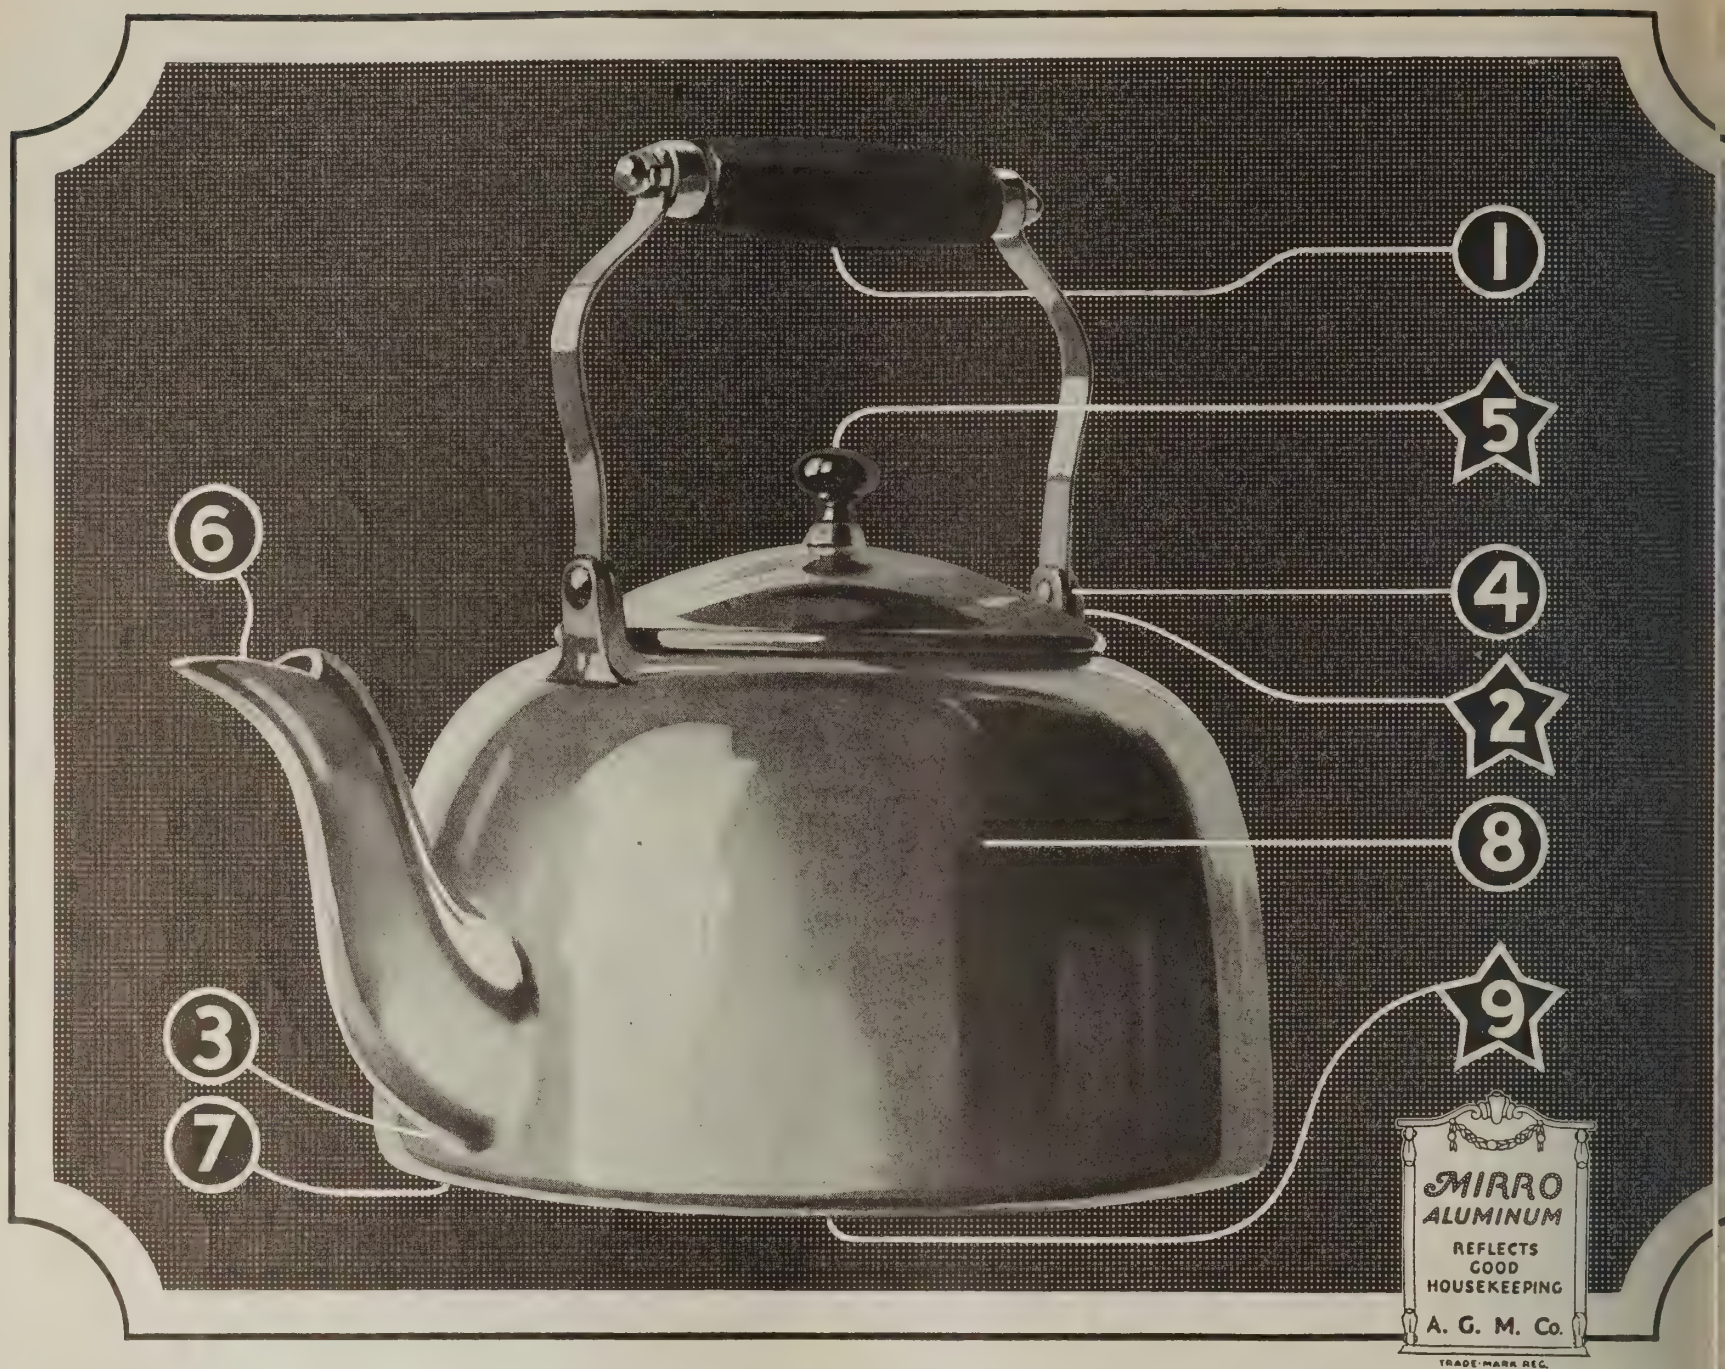
Who toiled and battled and baked and froze
But never whined when the dice were tossed.

It's the thought that lifts us above the beast,
The dream that moves us to discontent,
The thing that's driven us west and east
And conquered ocean and continent;
And when we win to the heaven true
We'll find a place, when we come to view it,
Where men do work that they want to do
In the way that they want to do it!

—Berton Braley.



Years Do Not Age Mirro

Time treats Mirro Aluminum gently. Given a modicum of care, it remains beautiful and of unimpaired usefulness through long, long years of service.

Madame may be assured that if her kitchen is equipped with Mirro, it is well equipped. Not only is Mirro designed for easier and better cooking; it is also built to last. Because Mirro utensils need no replacement and their first cost is not high, they are a real economy.

As for convenience!

Note the many features of convenience in this Mirro Tea Kettle. You will not find them in ordinary aluminum ware.

(1) Highly ebonized, sure-grip, detachable handle. ☆(2) Handle ears are welded on—an exclusive Mirro feature. (3) Spout also welded on—no loosening—no dirt-catching joint.

(4) Slotted ears permit handle to be shifted to any desired position without coming in contact with sides of kettle. ☆(5) Rivetless, no-burn, ebonized knob—another exclusive feature.

(6) Quick-filling, easy-pouring spout. (7) Unusually wide base—quick heating and fuel saving. Also prevents flame from creeping up around sides.

(8) Famous Mirro finish. ☆(9) All these features are assured by your guarantee of quality—the famous Mirro trade-mark stamped into the bottom of every Mirro utensil.

It will add to your appreciation of Mirro to know that it is the culmination of more than twenty-five years' experience in aluminum making.

Sold everywhere at the better stores.

Aluminum Goods Manufacturing Company
General Offices: Manitowoc, Wis., U. S. A.
Makers of Everything in Aluminum

MIRRO ALUMINUM
Reflects Good Housekeeping

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

(Concluded from Page 40)

re that the vender had netted from tchirty dollars a day from sales of al pins.
gas it may appear, many men still ely living out of the plan of capi-pple's vanity. The usual method olicitor to appear suddenly in a wn and launch his scheme for a graphies of the leading citizens.
ective subject is told that if he specified amount his biography tten and will be included in the money is asked for on the ground pay for a steel engraving. This en worked with a hundred vari-metimes these same men, by nge, temporarily give up their shing game and start a canvass make water-color enlargements for one dollar and ninety-nine ure. The time and the talent of is free and the one dollar and e cents is only for paper and is further claimed that only a mber of these enlargements will n that respective town. Howuth is that the number of orders ted by the number of people who rested.
ig individual recently appeared le-West town. He showed a cata-it wonderful values offered in it.
as to collect a stated sum weekly ousewives he had interested and amount paid in totaled twenty woman was to have her choice nty dollars' worth of goods ex-the catalogue. Several weeks subscribers' accounts began to e visits of the collector ceased.
ed an investigation, which disfact that the office of the collec-en closed for some days and the ad disappeared.
hemes of the kind here described sful only because the people of munities are careless in their hab-ging. Often the fault lies with o permit the indiscriminate use mes and influence. If the people ame the public is solicited were e responsible for any and all deat is practiced a different story told. One case is recited of an on seemingly created for a laudrpose and on whose letterheads were names of about thirty men—all ppear in Who's Who in America.
nt to these individuals elicited ation that nearly all of them knew nothing of how the funds were xended and not one was familiar with the plans of management. None assumed any responsibility whatever. A few of the men had never consented to the use of their names.

On the letterhead of another society of national scope appeared the names of prominent men, among them those of a former secretary of a department of the United States Government and a former United States diplomatic representative. An official investigator inquired of these gentlemen as to whether or not they were giving personal attention to the conduct of the association. The former cabinet member replied that he did not know much about the organization himself, but he had unbounded faith in his friend, the former diplomatic official. The latter, on his part, replied that the committee on which he served carried no responsibility, this being vested in the trustees. He was only interested in an advisory capacity. In such cases there is no doubt but that people throughout the country take it for granted that the men named were acquainted with all the activities of the society and many contributions were given by people who were so impressed.

Never in our history as a people has there been so much solicitation by so many individuals for so great a number of worthy and unworthy causes. The streets of our cities abound with collectors of all kinds. One investigator tells the story of an old colored woman who recently took part in the mad scramble for some easy money. When approached to do some housework for a local family the colored woman replied that she had to go out collecting "foh de missionary society."

"But I have work for you," said the housewife, "and you need all you can earn. What do they pay you for collecting?"

"I don't get paid at all," said the colored solicitor. "I just gets what I collect."

In the matter of giving it might be well for all of us to bear in mind a few simple rules mentioned by Mrs. Mosiman, of the Charity Organization Society in New York. An observance of these will tend to reduce the sum total of losses which now occur. First, require that collectors show their credentials. Second, do not contribute just to get rid of a solicitor. Third, do not give to any organization that has only a post-office box number for an address. Fourth, mail your check to the treasurer—don't give cash to the collector. Fifth, beware of the concern that does not make a public annual financial statement. Sixth, be very careful about giving to a one-man organization—investigate first.

THE BEAN SPILLER

(Continued from Page 19)

heo Killian had regarded the editor mily diverting pest—a yap whom it n do to snub because of the newsail of Reddall's quietly great local ut now he found himself an ardrrer of the little man and within his sul a warm sense of gratitude was llian had a horror of snakes—a bn of lifelong sojourn in cities. He fe Reddall's service to him and the editor a guest of honor whenever ue dome hove in sight at the ene t the champion's camp.
e gernoon before the fight Reddall
ed the rickety stairs to the Sentinel aer ten hours of unceasing work.
ioiwas alive with strangers. Thou-al thousands of newcomers were ngnto the city from every point of omass. Special trains from the At-aboard, from the West, from h a l from South were vomiting hourly gsnto the place. Every hotel and din house and guest shack and every abl private home was crammed with vis ors. The saloons were refusing to e gden time in serving mixed drinks.
tw gambling houses were running op and had a queue of waiting patlt trailed far out into the street.
gaes were on a dozen corners. The y ciet of the afternoon was banished mtiple roar of voices. Scorpion had dicovered. For the moment it was ne hap. It was the most important inforth America.
s ful expanding and his brain in a fullaze, H. Abiff Reddall had been everywhere at once. He had headed the crowd-handling contingent. He had found accommodations for guests where no visible accommodations were to be found. He had kept the board of trade lashed to a furious burst of energy in showing bored New Yorkers and Chicagoans the glorious business prospects of Scorpion. And now he was stealing an hour or two for work on the morrow's paper. Up the creaky outside stairs of the Sentinel office he skipped, humming rapturously under his breath a paraphrase of a camp-meeting hymn of his youth:

This is the day I long have sought,
And mourned because I found it not!
The day when all the stranger band
Find Scorpion their Promised Land!

Through the Sentinel's outer room he pattered and threw open the door of his private office. There he halted in some astonishment. Joe Killian was seated in his desk chair, which squeaked under the two hundred pounds of muscular weight. The champion's feet were on the sacred desk. In the champion's mouth was a large and lighted cigar.

Reddall stood staring in speechless amaze as his eyes and his mind focused on that cigar. From his late-learned lore he knew that no fighter in training is allowed to smoke or to drink. Yet here was Killian sucking contentedly at a cigar of much magnitude, and in the airless cubbyhole office hovered a faint aroma of whisky.

At sight of his host the champion took his feet off the desk and nodded right

WALLACE SILVER

Breakfast

Diagram shows correct placing of silver for breakfast. Send 20 cents for complete book on "Table Settings and Social Conventions."

Wallace Silver lends an atmosphere of distinction to any table it graces.

Guaranteed without time limit.

R. Wallace & Sons Manufacturing Co.
Advertising Dept. Wallingford, Connecticut

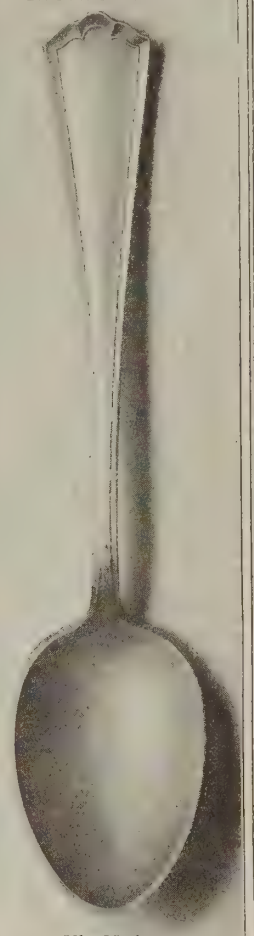
A very graceful pattern in "R. Wallace" Sectional Silver Plate



The Hudson
Tea Spoons $2.75
the Half Dozen Prices of other pieces proportionately moderate

The Greatest Novel Ever Written—by the Most Popular Author in All the World

Harold Bell Wright

Vibrant with the local color of the mystic, enchanted Ozarks—the Shepherd of the Hills country. Brian Kent, Auntie Sue, Judy and Betty Jo are more than creations—they are actual, human realities.

Illustrations by J. Allen St. John

THE RE-CREATION OF BRIAN KENT

First Printing—Forty Carloads—750,000 Copies

THE RE-CREATION OF BRIAN KENT carries a message that will strengthen human faith to happiness: "The foundation principles of life—honesty, courage, fidelity, morality, etc.—are eternal facts. Life must and will go on. You can neither stop it nor turn it back." In the author's inimitable, fascinating style this message is like a heaven-sent blessing that will cheer and give courage to millions of weary, storm-tossed souls that have all but gone down in these recent years of world chaos. "The Re-Creation of Brian Kent" is a delightful Ozark story of life and love, sweet and appealing with pathos, rich in philosophy, masterful in character analysis, charming in description and intensely dramatic, not with physical combat, but with skillful visualization of the clash and conflicts of the invisible forces of life.

Full Cloth, 12mo., $1.50

Other Novels by Harold Bell Wright—Over Eight Million Sold
That Printer of Udell's—The Shepherd of the Hills—The Calling of Dan Matthews—The Winning of Barbara Worth—Their Yesterdays—The Eyes of the World—When a Man's a Man

Harold Bell Wright's Books Are Sold Everywhere

Mr. Wright's Allegory of Life "A literary gem that will live" — The Uncrowned King — 16mo., Cloth 60 Cents

Our Big Catalog of Books of All Publishers FREE We catalog and send by mail, at a big saving to you, over 25,000 books of other publishers. We supply the largest number of public, private and school libraries and individuals with all their books. Our service is quick and satisfying. Write for catalog today. A post card will bring it.

THE BOOK SUPPLY COMPANY, Publishers and Booksellers
E. W. REYNOLDS, President 231-233 West Monroe St., CHICAGO

affably. He made as though to rise and greet Reddall. Then suddenly remembering that a champion does not get up from his chair to speak to mere mortals he sat still. Certain grandees of Spain have the hereditary right to remain covered in the presence of royalty. This privilege they cling to with ludicrous tenacity, yet not more so than does a ring champion to his prerogative of remaining seated when lesser folk would be expected to stand. But Killian stretched forth a friendly hand to Reddall, grinning pleasantly up at him, and with his free hand he proffered him the twin of the plump cigar he was smoking.

"I been waitin' here for you," explained the champion. "Marston brought me to a house to meet some men and I gave 'em the slip. How's ev'rything?"

Speech came back to Reddall in a sputtering rush. He pointed to the cigar in Killian's mouth, demanding:

"What—how—why—how come you to be doin' that? To-morrow's the fight, an' ——"

"This smoke?" queried Killian. "Oh, that's all right! Nobody'll see me do it. I'll finish it before I go out of here. I had a drink, too, with Marston an' them. A couple of drinks. Gee, but the old stuff tastes good when you've been layin' off it a while! Tobacco does too. Have a cigar?"

Dumfounded, Reddall continued to stare. Killian reached across and swung shut the office door. Lowering his rumbly voice the champion proceeded to expound.

"You did me a damn good turn, little feller," he said affectionately. "An' I'm here to get back at you for it. You said somethin' about puttin' a big piece of money on me for this fight."

He paused. Reddall nodded stupidly.

"That's why I'm here," repeated Killian. "That's why I shook Marston an' the rest an' sneaked up here to give you the tip. It's got to be kep' dead quiet. Marston'd put up a hell of a holler if he knew I told you. But I ain't goin' to see you lose out on me after you ——"

"What—what are you talkin' about?" bleated Reddall. "Lose out? How?"

"Don't go talkin' so loud!" admonished Killian. "Here's the tip: Take down all your bets an' pile ev'ry cent you can raise on Cronin—on Cronin in ten rounds or under. An' for the love of glory, keep your mouth shut. That's all!"

There was a long silence, while Reddall gaped, slack jawed, and while Killian began to fidget and to frown.

"I'll keep my mouth shut," said Reddall at last, his soft drawl almost humble, yet with a queer little trickle of iron authority running through its meek cadences. "I'll keep my mouth shut, that bein' my way. You c'n count on my mouth stayin' shut. But you're wrong when you say that's all. That ain't all. Not by a city square. An' I'm waitin' patientlike to hear the rest."

Again Killian fidgeted. He scowled and made as though to get up and depart. But something held him where he was. Perhaps it was a power behind the mild blue eyes blinking into his. Perhaps it was his inherent love of babbling. Perhaps it was his newborn fondness for the quaint old fellow who stamped with thin-shod feet upon rattlesnakes. Presently he spoke.

"Marston an' Sludge has got together on it," he began with a sort of relishful reluctance. "They've been chewin' it all week under cover. But it wasn't settled downright till to-day, when we saw how the final bettin' was. It's a gold mine, the way Marston an' Sludge has it worked. I'm to lose out in the ninth to-morrow. That'll save the ten-round bets an' still give the movie fellers a look-in. It ——"

A wordless gobble from Reddall checked him. But as the little man's twisting mouth emitted no further sounds the champion went on:

"I'm to lose out in the ninth. Up to then it's to be a dingdong slammin' grand-stand bout—the kind a crowd yells itself drunk over, the kind that shows up grand in the pictures. Each of us is due to score a knockdown or two, but it's to be my fight all the way. An' once Cronin's goin' to be saved by the bell. Then in the middle of the ninth I'm to run into something that looks like a chance blow just as I've got him pretty near licked to a standstill, an' I'm to take the count. See?"

Reddall did not see. If he had been a fiction hero he would perhaps have seen red. But he saw nothing. He merely blinked and his thin lips kept on working as though he were chewing at the mysterious cud of senility.

"The papers an' the crowd will get to yammerin' how I pretty near had him out," resumed Killian, warming to his theme. "They'll say I'd 'a' won if it wouldn't of been for runnin' into a chance blow. Chance blow, hell! There ain't such a thing! All blows is chance blows. Then Cronin is due to give me a return match. An' all the talk about this first fight will make folks crazy about the second one. The second one is due to draw a bigger crowd than what this one will, an' I'm to win the second one. Then he'll want another—both of us havin' win one—an' that's goin' to pull a bigger crowd yet. Get the notion? There's never yet been a heavyweight champ that lose the champ'nship an' then win it back. That's a big card by itself. An' the third fight—say, Marston's a bird! It was him that thought it out first. Think of the advertisin' it's all bound to give any show Cronin or me goes out with for the next two years! An' ——"

"Yes," assented Reddall in a dry whisper. "I see. I see now. Would—would you mind if I was to sit an' think for a minute, please?"

He slumped into a chair and huddled there like a sick raccoon. Killian smiled amusedly at the little man's dazed aspect and inturned gaze, but as the pause grew long the champion got to his feet.

"Well," he said, "so long! I've gotta get back to Marston before he sends out a posse to find me. I gotta get back to camp too. There's a slew of yaps out there rubberin' for a squint at me."

"Wait!"

The command did not ring out like a bugle call. It was all but cringing. Reddall's primitive emotions were few and infrequent, and hero worship ever dies hard. The new sport, the new ideals, the new interests of the past month or so had made much impression on him. Their utter overturning had bewildered him. But now he was himself again—very calm, very resourceful, very much master of his faculties and of events. Yet his voice was meek and his manner was deprecatory. It was as though voice and manner were apologizing for the inner man's odd metamorphosis.

"Wait!" he repeated, waving a clawlike little hand at Killian. "Just a minute or two. I want you should."

The champion, dully puzzled and still amused, hesitated in his hegira toward the outer office. Reddall pattered shufflingly between him and the door.

"Here's the notion," began the editor, speaking stiltedly at first and as if groping for words: "When I hit this man's city first off there wa'n't any fine prosp'rous city here at all—no, nor yet a 'dobe village. Nothin' but sand an' cactus an' such an' a fine spring with a quarter acre of greenishness round it. That was all. There was eighteen of us laid out Scorpion. By an' by there was only me of the old-timers. I'm the oldest here. I've seen the place grow an' grow an' grow. It's not a part of me. I'm a part of it. It's all I got. It's all I want. That's why I was so tickled when the fight brought folks a-crowdin' here. Scorpion had its chance an' I helped bring that chance here. There'll maybe never be such another chance. Friend, I'm not lottin' on throwin' it all away, nor yet on allowin' anyone else to. Scorpion's goin' to make good on this. We're comin' through clean. Scorpion isn't goin' pirootin' down the echoin' corr'dors of time with a tag on its coat tails sayin' 'This yer's the fake-fight burg!' Not while I'm here to steer things right. It ——"

The champion laughed aloud. It was a whole-hearted laugh of friendly amusement.

"Don't you go losin' no sleep on that!" he adjured. "This stunt's goin' to be pulled classy. Not a raw thing to it. We got too much staked for that. Not a fan there will be hep. Not even the ref'ree. I tell you it'll be done as classy as ——"

"An' I'm tellin' you," interposed the timid little voice, "that it's not goin' to be done at all. Maybe you could do it so's nobody'd know an' maybe you couldn't. Not that that's the point. The point is that it isn't on the square. Over to Obispo they run off a hip'drome pony race. It was framed reel clever an' it was rehearsed some, too, but it got out. Ev'rybody knew. The grand stand was bust to matchwood an' two of the jockeys was feathered an' tarred, an' Obispo's known till now as the fake-race town. Down to Bolivar some chaps started a bank. The bank was spoke of reel fav'rable in the p'spectuses. Lots of us invested. The fellers made a clean-up an' got out. What happened? Folks are 'shamed to say they're from Bolivar for fear of bein' laughed at for comin' from the swindle town. Obispo an' Bolivar's both got black eyes thataway. Once ——"

"But I tell you, we ——"

"Once laugh at a town hereabouts," went on Reddall, "an' you might as well sell it for its timbers. Nobody's a-goin' to laugh at Scorpion. Nobody's a-goin' to have the shadder of a right to say Scorpion isn't the squarest an' whitest place this side the Mississippi. Next time a big fight is due its backers'll say: 'Let's hold it out there. That's a city the whole world knows is on the square!' That's what they'll say. They won't say: 'Let's go round Scorpion like it was a lake. That's where the slickest crook game was worked in the hist'ry of the ring!' No, sir, Mr. Killian, I've helped make Scorpion an' I'm goin' to see that this crowd goes away from it feelin' they've sure got their money's worth, an' wantin' to come back an' tellin' the home folks what a grand upstandin' burg it is. Likewise they're goin' to. I reckon that's all I gotta say," he ended apologetically.

Killian's smile had grown as broad as his lean face would permit. The champion had the refined sense of humor common to his breed. It was a humor attuned to such subtleties as the yanking of a chair from under a fat man and to pouring beer into a new high hat. And this same sense was titillated to the full by the spectacle of a windy little old man calmly declaring the Sludge-Marston ruse should not be carried through. Killian was about to voice his mirthful sentiments in some characteristic way when the door was kicked open and a rotund person with many diamonds stormed in.

"Afternoon, Mr. Marston," said Reddall politely. "Won't you ——"

The great manager paid no heed to his courteous little host. Bearing down on Killian, he demanded:

"Didn't I tell you to stick with me till we get back to camp? Hey, didn't I? Lord, but you gave me a scare! When I missed you I figgered you'd blown the whole show by boozin' in some bar. Then Scholes said he'd seen you sneakin' up here to ——"

Marston checked himself. He saw Reddall for the first time. Hitherto his angry little eyes had had scope only for the vision of his runaway champion. He acknowledged Reddall's timid salute with a courteous grunt. Then he seemed to recall his own words about blowing the whole show and he frowned portentously. Before he could speak Reddall was addressing him.

"Mr. Marston," said the editor, passing a withered hand over his suède dome and looking almost as uncomfortable as he felt, "I'm glad you came here. I was just goin' to look you up. I wanted to tell you that Mr. Killian has gotta win to-morrow. He's ——"

"Sure, he's goin' to win!" trumpeted Marston right jovially. "Who says he ain't? He's goin' to win like he always has. You can say that in your paper over my sign'ture and you can say I've got my whole bank roll on him to win—in under ten rounds at that. He ——"

"I'm glad to hear you say so," answered Reddall gratefully. "I'm thankin' you. It saves me a heap of trouble. Likewise," he added shamefacedly, "it keeps him an' you from a fun'ral."

There was no swagger in the gentle tone, no hint of threat. Marston looked perplexed. Killian cut in, certain of betrayal and wishing to save as much of his face as he could by forestalling revelation with confession.

"I tipped him off," he said uneasily. "He won't spill it. He'd backed me for his whole roll an' he'd saved me from ——"

An avalanche of lurid blasphemy from the manager drowned the sheepish admission. Marston spoke for nearly two minutes and scarce repeated himself once. His language hurtled forth into the room in ragged chunks, assailing the ears of his listeners like an endless succession of fist blows.

Killian, who could have killed the obese blasphemer with a single right lead, fairly cowered under the tempest. Reddall, on the contrary, listened with grave attention, his bald head a little to one side, his pale-blue eyes alert. He was as one who receives a free lesson from an inspired master. Presently Marston found his scattered self-control. In the midst of his tirade he swallowed hard and broke into a loud laugh. Slapping Reddall agonizingly on the shoulder he exclaimed:

"The champ here is one gra
He's been stringin' you long enoug
There ain't a word of truth in it.
judged him wrong. He's been—h stringin' you."

The speech, which began so upr dwindled to a hesitant growl unde focus of Reddall's gaze.

"I'm glad," said the little ma
"Mighty glad, gentlemen. Be fight's got to be on the square.
got to know it is. An' the only know it for sure is for Mr. Killi it—like I know he can if he tries.

"Win it!" snorted Marston
ously, albeit his bunchy face m begun to sag. "Win it? Surest th world he'll win it! Nothing to He'll win out. He'll ——"

"Mr. Marston," humbly interp dall, "pardon me for saying it you're lyin'. You know you are.
lian knows it. I know it. You're Marston with a ferocious snarl fat bulk toward the little man.

fragile body did not flinch. The eyes held the angry manager's as ever. He broke in upon Marst less roar in the same deprecatory

"I'm not spillin' the beans b about this, Mr. Marston," said h promised not to an' not wantin' smirched by any talk of a fake I'm spillin' the beans just the sam how I'm doin' it—if you'll sto an' garglin' an' listen to me.
ranch some eight miles from here, you know. Not much of a ran pays its way. It pays, because s boys workin' on it are pretty stro
One an' another, I've got 'em ou now an' again. There's four of trust to do like I say an' ask no q

"What the hell do I ——" be ton.

"Those four boys an' me," t drawl meandered on, "will be s ringside box to-morrow—the box
I was goin' to fill it with prom'n but I reckon me an' the boys wil useful there. We'll be heeled. I lian stays on the floor any lon count of eight, any time, there'll
.45 bullets driftin' into his yell an' two more .45's siftin' through Marston. I reckon when I tell any Scorpion jury's due to b'lie turn me loose. If you think I'm he added with his friendly smile, me. That's all, gentlemen. Goo

There was something in the m drawl, in the unwavering pale ol the absolute dearth of bluster t under the skins of his hearers.

Then, by common consent ar thereto by a tacit impulse of self tion, the champion and his man for the speaker. The rush started suddenness. It halted even more An elderly revolver of past-centur had attached itself to Reddall's right hand, which had been hove irresolution above the half-open his desk. The long barrel was like a snake's head between the t ing visitors. Reddall did not rais
He was aiming from the hip.
nothing dramatic in his movemer

"Good day, gentlemen," he wa the friendly smile extending from lips to the mild eyes above an straggly gray beard below. "An ber, if you think I'm bluffin' just an' call me. Mr. Killian, you to-morrow. I'm sure you c'n do reely apply yourself. Likewise y to do. I'm not a-takin' down a bets. Shut the door behind you, got an ed'torial to write."

When the two men found them the foot of the wabbly stair they each other dizzily.

"That mangy little four-flusher Marston, the blur of hypnotism d
"The mangy little four-flushi Thought he had us buffaloed, he there's no witnesses, and a man the chair by shootin' in public.
crowd'd lynch him! He ——"

"You weren't on deck the day h on that snake," mumbled Killian no four-flusher. The beans are s right, all right. We gotta ——"

A new blast of profanity from cut in on the gloomy forecast.
Killian had been deposited safel training camp Marston took furi cautions by coming back to town a ing up three or four mossbacked olc

(Concluded on Page 85)

(Concluded from Page 82)

heywere gravely willing to accept his ferof drinks and to smoke his thirty-cent gar Also, under this dual influence they nusсted to be pumped as to the life and rsсality of Scorpion's venerated first ze.

Mston listened. He asked adroit catch sons. He sought to convince himself t s informants were conning him. But r nd ever he became aware of an in- sgly cold sensation in the pit of his nch. Then he strolled off in search of tting commissioner and he swore fly as he remembered the two drinks e cigar he had permitted Killian to sme—after which he returned to camp ent into executive session with the nion. Poor Marston's beautiful day s uite spoiled.

At one o'clock, next afternoon, Young n. stepped into the ring at the stadium th center of a cloud of handlers and cors. The thick-packed mass of spec- rorshook off the trance of boredom into hic the antics of the two sets of pre- mirry boxers had thrown them id ney howled joyous greeting thchallenger.

Cnin replied to the ovation a tiff-backed bow. Then he ent is intellect to the task of tteng to his manager's al epetition of the well- he sed instructions for e- fht.

Mston had not confided Cmin or to Sludge the s nat the splendid plan d en betrayed and that ne deal would probably e ncled. There was always chace that Reddall might pen, or—far more likely—nat ne little man on sober nout would realize the rgus chance to profit by s nide information and to ap fortune in long-odds ets. In any case there was ded in risking verbal auuter by confiding in ndb, so Marston had held pace.

Tl roar from the stadium eld the dressing room erKillian was undergoing assge and other final treat- enfat the hands of his at- endits. Five minutes later the crowd ut shame its welcome of Young Cronin y a ultiple screech of joy at sight of the nion.

Swthed in a check-pattern bath robe, Killi was making his leisurely way through twting path of aisle toward the corner th ring. Ahead of him swaggered two eef seconds to clear the path. Behind im touched Marston, sick looking and dea yed. Then followed an imperial pairof undershirted men with pails and owe and bottles.

Cnin schooled his own craggy features a scowl of malignant hate as Killian imed into the ring. So busy was the nanion in scanning the ringside boxes nate quite neglected to return the scowl. Whi breach of professional etiquette from god a friend hurt Cronin's sensitive eelgs to momentary vexation against his bse:-minded foe.

Kian, like Marston, was sweeping the ren boxes with a foreboding gaze. The car of manager and of champion settled t th same instant upon a box abutting on coer of the ring. It was the only box in ne eat arena whose eight seats were not ill. Only five men sat therein. Four of nen were tanned and simple-faced souls n gy felt hats and nonpicturesque rai- nen The fifth was Reddall.

T Killian and Marston it seemed as nouh two of the box's five occupants t oce trained their solemnly attentive azem the manager while the three others lue their eyes to the champion. During he rief interval while the professionals lowred at the box Reddall smiled upon her in meek friendliness and spoke a raved word to his four companions.

Instant obedience the quartet took off hei wide-brimmed gray hats and laid them thwrt their knees. Then, plainly visible o Killian and his manager, they slipped ron their pockets certain metallic objects whi they placed carefully in their laps ind shelter of the hats.

"ou gotta do it, Joe!" groaned Mars- on, weating fluently from every clogged pore. "You gotta! Lord, if only you could 'a' kept your mouth shut! And if I'd only of held you off'n those two drinks and the smoke! Get him as quick as you can, at that! And for the love of Mike, don't go taking no chances! I—I got a headache. I guess I'll beat it back to the room. Skelly can look after you as good as I can. So long. I ——"

The words trailed away into stillness. At the manager's first recessive step Reddall lifted himself slightly in his seat and pointed the way back toward Killian's corner. The hat-concealed hand also moved suggestively. Marston groaned and slunk back to his sputteringly indignant principal.

Far above, the motion-picture machines were droning. In the ring the last dreary introduction had been made. The two men were called to the center for referee instructions. According to schedule they refused to shake hands—though Killian so far forgot himself as to extend one open glove a few inches before Cronin's warning frown recalled him to his rôle.

The Quartet Slipped From Their Pockets Certain Metallic Objects Which They Placed Carefully in Their Laps

The Killian-Cronin fight at Scorpion was not worth the high admission prices, to say nothing of the cost and annoyance of traveling all the way to so God-forsaken a spot. Nine-tenths of the audience were later agreed on that. The remaining ten per cent—an unusually large proportion, by the way, of men who really understand ring work—did not know whether they had witnessed a great fight or a rotten one.

At the sound of the gong Killian was after his man and he was after him in a highly unspectacular and businesslike manner. There were none of those noisily harmless slaps which rouse a crowd to frenzy. There was no posing. There was no grinning, no glaring, no grand-stand work.

Killian bored in unobtrusively, covering when he had to, but fighting with a nonflamboyant deadliness, and always on the aggressive. He had little enough to fear from Cronin. He was certain the latter would not willfully damage him to any extent but would stick to the original program.

Cronin before the end of the first round was woefully bewildered. He tried to follow instructions to the letter, but Killian would not play up to his opponent's work. The champion was inflicting cruel and needless damage—and was not showing off. Thus men fight when they hate or when all hangs on their victory, and Cronin could not understand.

Once, in a bit of in-fighting, Cronin blocked an incipient uppercut in such a way that Killian's glove brushed him an inch or two below the knotted green flag which served him as a belt. The referee cautioned the champion against repeating the unintended foul, and Killian's strength for a moment turned to water. Suppose he were to lose on a foul! The thought made him risk his chances still further by a hasty glance over Cronin's shoulder toward a ringside box wherein five meager figures sat statuelike with hats on their knees and with a hand apiece under their hats.

At the end of the first round Young Cronin went back to his corner badly shaken up and sore puzzled. Sludge, as perplexed as his principal, risked much by looking across in vexed query at Marston. He caught the plump manager's eye before Marston could look away and at what the glance told him Sludge went purple.

"The swine!" he burbled, fairly spitting the words into Cronin's ear. "The swine of hell! They're double-crossin' us! Get him! They've framed us!"

Wherefore the second round was unlike any in the cut-and-dried chronicles of heavyweight championship contests. There were no seeming openings cleverly defended, no staggering blows, no fiercely melodramatic rallies to bring the house shrieking to its feet. Two men were simply trying with all their might and skill to murder each other by every method which could get past the dumfounded referee.

As a result the bout had an aspect of awkward tameness. It fell flat. Blows that turned their recipients sick with pain were delivered and received in so commonplace a fashion that onlookers began to hiss. Once or twice cries of actual derision scraped through the looser volume of arena racket. The combatants apparently were not fighting hard enough to keep themselves warm.

Cronin late in the third round slipped inside of a misjudged swing and sent Killian reeling to the ropes under a volley of half-arm blows to heart and wind. As the champion tried to clinch Cronin shot an uppercut to the point of his jaw. Killian sprawled crablike across the ropes, his wrists and ankles jumping convulsively. Thence by degrees he slid to the floor. To the average spectator such in-fighting means next to nothing, and those who understand it are not of the breed that gets up and yells. So the bulk of the audience viewed Killian's ungraceful fall as an accident—and a laugh greeted it.

The referee's pendulum arm was rising and falling. Cronin stood crouched forward, fended off by the referee's other hand. Marston had no eyes for his supine champion. Pupils glazed, he was staring at Reddall. And now there could be no mistake. Two of the men in the box were viewing Marston with steady intent. The three others had their gaze fixed on Killian.

"Get up!" shrilled Marston, his voice a scream with terror. "D'you want us to be shot?"

It was at the count of six that his dreaded manager's howl pierced the slowly lifting mists in Killian's brain, and it brought back memory. At the count of eight the groggy champion was lurching to his unsteady feet and falling into a life-saving clinch with the savage who rushed him the instant the referee's barring arm permitted. Cronin shook him off and sent him to earth with a second jaw hook, and this time Killian lay where he fell. At the count of five the gong saved him. Marston passed a wet hand over his own wetter brow and tried not to blubber.

Valiantly the handlers wrought over the stricken champion during the sixty seconds rest. And valiantly did youth and condition respond to the treatment. Killian was on his feet for the fourth round, his brain and body once more practically normal. But he and Marston alone knew how thoroughly he had recovered. To the casual spectator he was still in little better case than had been the limp body the seconds had dragged to its corner a minute earlier. For the first time in the fight Killian had begun to act.

He was lifted to his feet by the seconds, but he seemed scarce able to stand. He swayed from side to side like a sick elephant. His long arms hung almost nerveless at his sides. His shoulders were slumped. His head rolled weakly on a neck that seemed too boneless to support it. His jaw swung ajar. His eyes were bleared and vacant. By mere instinct, apparently, he lurched out of his corner to the ring's center, facing a homicidal wild beast who was dashing forward to destroy him. Sludge—a veteran in every ring trick—shouted:

"Look out for him! Maybe he ain't so dead as he looks!"

But the belated warning went unheard. With all the high conceit of his trade Young Cronin beheld the result of his own mighty prowess. He had bested the man who had sought to double-cross him. The championship lay within his grasp. The finishing blow alone was needed. A child surely could push over that tottering wreck! And Cronin, wide open, flung himself to the slaughter.

Then in the midst of his murderous rush Young Cronin dreamed a dream. This was odd, for his sleep usually was as blankly dreamless as a cow's. He dreamed he had mastered the art of swimming through the air and that it was a ludicrously easy thing to do. So he swam upward straight into a sky that was alive with shooting stars. Behind him on earth, as he dimly remembered, there had been a swayingly drunken figure which had straightened up with lightning swiftness as he had charged upon it, and which had assailed him with wildcat deadliness before he could block its attack. But that was before he had learned to swim upward through the air. No—through the water. There were gallons of water cascading over his face.

Cronin opened one eye to protest against this deluge. He opened it to see two bored men dumping another pailful of water on his upturned face. The ring was athrong with stamping and jostling people—all of them slapping Joe Killian on the back or pump-handling him.

And there was an unadvertised and laughable fight still going on in one corner of the inclosure, where Sludge had hurled himself bodily upon the palsied Marston and was pummeling him with ferocity.

"After all championship prize fights," the Sentinel's leading editorial concluded its half-column course next morning, "there are unsportsmanly claims of fake. But the editor of this paper strongly advises persons to make no such claim about yesterday's fight. It was strictly on the square and the best man won. The editor of this paper herewith and hereby gives his word of honor for that statement. And in Scorpion and its beautiful purlieus the word of honor of the editor of this paper has a way of being taken at par value. It was a square fight, we repeat, and the best man won.

"But the editor of this paper also wishes to reiterate the opinion, voiced earlier in this editorial, namely, that a championship prize fight does not add to the morale or the lasting prosperity and growth and well-being of the city in which it is held. Scorpion will do well to remember that for future reference.

"The fight was strictly fair, we repeat, but we feel we could not pledge as much for the next fight."

Autumn

OH, THE poplars burn gold in the sheen of the sun
And the little winds whisper and sing,
For a sprinkle of dew
As it catches the skies
Is a twinkle of blue—
And it matches her eyes!
Let the forests turn gold in the sheen of the sun,
In my heart it is spring, it is spring!

—Perrin Holmes Lowrey.

OLD TWELVE HUNDRED

(Continued from Page 23)

"She's the peach," he muttered succinctly, "and the cream!"

"Old Buke's nearly got your string loaded," said Bag.

"Near," said Church.

"Port Huron this aft?"

Church nodded—over a match and cigar. He pulled out a watch and Bag pulled out his own for comparison.

"That used to be the old man's, didn't it?"

Bag nodded.

"How'd you know?"

Church grinned noncommittally.

"Here's my old one. I haven't a young son-of-a-gun like you to give it to an' I couldn't give it to Stella—she'd snort, you know, at anything but little blue-enamel things as big as a bachelor button. But it's a good watch yet for any ordinary fellow. I kinda hated to turn it in on the new one."

He toppled it over on his palm, eying it reminiscently. There was a vein of sentiment running through the brown sandstone of the man.

"I got another one than this at home," said Bag, "but it ain't adjusted to five positions."

He spoke with austere disparagement.

"What's that?" one of the other boys asked.

Bag waved his curiosity aside as beneath notice. But Church genially explained the adjustments of a five-position watch, canting his old watch the while with infinite precise tilts.

"It's got to run perfectly in every one of those positions—uphill, downhill, underhill—so no damn conceivable angle or tangent will throw it off the true. Flipped like a dollar, cart-wheeling or swinging to hell in a hanging basket—it's got to run just so. And that's what your common watch won't do."

He looked at his old watch again with reminiscent favor. The posse stared with open-mouthed wonder and the darky boy, Yance, edged so close that his head hung right over Church's huge hand, his eyes rolling up awesomely into Church's face.

"Be careful, boy," the engineer grinned; "don't get too near the tender—you might get some black off on your face."

The posse burst into a shrill shout over this and clutched each other's shoulders in a seasick passion of merriment. Undoubtedly the great man had uttered this for their benefit. Yance himself was utterly charmed. The other boys turned toward Horsey—automatically, instinctively.

"Looka here!" shrilled Bill Menke. "Here's a fellah that washes his father's socks! Don't he look like he needed a washing?"

Church glanced at Horsey's dismal costume and shame-reddened face.

The other boys now joined the chorus:

"Yeah—we told him to burn 'em! What d'you think? He does their washing for him and his old man!"

"Aw, Horsey!"

"Yeh, Horsey, we're goin' to chaw beef on your old man's red underdrawers—you'll find 'em full of knots on the line!"

Having pitched on something to entertain the great man they worried it to a finish. Their clamor grew hysterical, maudlin! And Horsey stood in the spotlight of this ridiculous acclaim—red and white by turns, and sick at heart. He stood humiliated before Ted Church and the new and wonderful pal—Bag.

Church blew the ashes from his cigar and cleared his throat.

"You do the family washing, heh?" His gray eyes with chiseled white flecks seemed cutting deep into Horsey's mind. "Mother gone?"

Young McGraw nodded mutely.

Church continued to stare at him mesmerically a minute, and then added as if coming back from a long way off, "It ain't so good when the mother's gone." He threw his cigar aside so suddenly that two of the boys jumped.

A silence had come on the little circle.

"When I go out with my girl"—Church suddenly grinned, as at some old play joke—"I like to look real scrumptious. I kind of got a habit of buying silk shirts. I thought I could take 'em or leave 'em alone, but they seem to get you after a while—that's right. But for wear—nothing in 'em! They anyway aren't adjusted to the fifty bull-bent directions those steam mangles run to. If I could get some real country washing done on 'em an' some of my h things—not mentioning socks ——" H grinned warmly at Horsey, almost i somely it seemed to the boy, with some i rich and grand in that big hawk fac almost seemed as if he must have pra that smile on someone sweet and gen

"I could do 'em for you," Horsey himself muttering huskily.

"Would you kindly, boy?" Church face turned grave. "It'd be a real o tion to me. Mind you, I wouldn't tak hocus-pocus job on 'em. They'd ha be done smooth and right up."

"An' ironing, too, I could do."

"Oh, I forgot that—o' course. St have the laugh on me sure. Well, we' it a go then. You could get my thir old Tronjem's shanty on Tilly Street ing. You know Tron—the old frost? Fine old fellow! I'd leave 'em him."

When the signal came for 1200 to in and pick up its string of loaded Bag calmly beckoned Horsey.

"Want to ride in, Mac?"

Horsey was half stupefied and l to Church for confirmation. That worthy nodded briefly and Lawrence Graw found himself climbing the for like steps of the looming black broads old 1200. Bag mounted behind C and Horsey climbed to the green le cushion behind the fireman.

Before him loomed the great crown glistening with the sheen of dials, g and puttering valves. From this high it looked ten feet to the floor of the ca was the glistening immensity of the that struck Horsey, who had thoug cabin would be confined—the glitt and glooming immensity, and above a tremendous majesty of it.

He looked through the window far on the posse of boys, their faces splotches in the shadow which spread and dark to the rim of the glaring y pit. Out they drew—R-r-oum! B-r-r-R-r-oum! B-r-r-oum—a thunderou bration roaring through the walls monster road hog lifting Horsey's pri scalp with a sensation of wonder, fea delight unspeakable. Yes, and pride he was proud this day—a feeling long ing to his slack humbled nature.

They coupled onto the endless ribb gravel cars; and now with wheels spi and tearing sand, with Horsey helping every muscle, they slowly gathered and began drumming on the long ro Port Huron. Within twenty minutes, ever, they stopped at Sidney and H prepared to leave. The fireman had s open the fire door and handed the s to Bag, who filled it and made the lon man's sweep which carries the coals into the grate. Then the fireman w grin handed it to Horsey. He fille shovel, poised heavily on one foot, l the other foot swivel on its toe—n nothing had he coaled the church fu on cold winter mornings—and sho heavy shovelful, twice Bagley's rumbling onto the bars. It was a shot, better than he had hoped. W sense for effective exit he swung hur down the steps. But the fireman leane to tip a forefinger to his cap in the rai man's grave token of address. H touched his forehead—his lost hat w the red pond of the gravel pit, but wh that matter!

The water was gushing and snortin the tender. Church turned to him shoveling down in his corduroy p pulled out a dollar.

"Here's to bind that bargain about shirts and things."

Horsey hesitated, and plucking u courage, which was pitching down th him like a bucket in an old chain-pull "I'd like," he husked, "'stead of the m to work out that watch—your old on

A slow grin spread over Church's "You'd be better gettin' a new one."

"But"—Horsey's face fell—"but one," he mumbled, "because it's your

Even a grand seigneur of locomo may be touched by a hobbledehoy's worship. He drew out the watch, gl at it and handed it over.

"That's all right! I'll trust you. don't run right tell me—an' I'll see t it cleaned. Call it ten dollars, and i have to give it back before you've worl

(Concluded on Page 89)

(Concluded from Page 86)

t I square you for what you've done, e?–vhatever's coming to you."
Lavence slid it home into the pristine tel ocket of his overalls and tried to ak but found his throat too husky.
ur had turned to climb the steps and ll Horsey failed to articulate his thanks.
tlosis awaited him. The big engineer
e with a smile on his bronze eagle –alling into wrinkles that must have e om smiling at someone gentle and t yet a look withal that graced his astere face. And then inspiration me o Horsey. He raised his forefinger his andy shock of hair in the railroad an hail of greeting and farewell. And d urch of 1200 returned it.
Baey whirled his arm over his head in random gesture of good-by. The black ons r snorted, pounded, strained, gained ad y and thundered out of the shadow the station and faced the road to Port uro
As Horsey turned home his heart sank.
wa ll over. Maybe never again. Maybe e vtch would have to be given back.
t r a little while at least—his hand rea d the lump in his overalls pocket.
me w he felt that the worst punishment co d expect would be more than comnsa d by such a sign and guerdon.
u strangely, the worst was hardly as d : he had expected—a matter of a ek duress and extra work. The business a anging the washing required some enga ement, but Horsey found himself ua lo it. He sneaked home the basket, nic had been left at old Tronjem's ant, when he went for the afternoon ail, nd coming home the back way he d under the woodshed before present-g haself in the house or at his father's udy Later he brought it in when he did e hme washing. His father, who gave tle eed to these temporal processes so ng s they were done regularly, didn't sere the candy-striped shirts of fine mbc and silk—gaudy wanton articles nic Horsey pictured the engineer as arig when he went queening his hotel aid or waitress, Stella. A slippery, mpious, sylphine name that reminded orse of the ladies on perfumery and ter-medicine calendars. He wondered ch engineer did have one in every wn It gave the great man an air of ows and mystery; and yet something Horsey's Scotch soul boggled over this.
me element of Puritanism in his callow ul belled at the thought of his great an enslaved and voluptuously indulnt-faugh! It somehow stuck in his roa At other times—be it said—he the slyly admired the man for being a rt silk-shirted devil among the ladies.
ad terward was shocked to think such ulc dery lurked in his heart.
Th day came when, his week's duress er, he found time to hang round the tetank, waiting for the boom-boom of 1200. He had harked each day for the r simmer of its Crosby chimer and felt s hurt grow big as he heard that mellow uron ringing across the flatlands. At ghthe had wakened to it and pictured e engineer's head lurching into the purple rk ast cities strange as Bagdad toward rtsm the wing-spread lakes.

It was Saturday morning again. And Horsey thought soberly of the change in s h that one short week had worked.
Tom ow he felt himself of larger stature, more confident, more worldly, more hopeful of himself.
Old 1200 drummed somberly in. Horsey's heart raced with icy thrills. He rmed a big head in the cab window and ise a finger to his cap. A few moments ad felt Church's hand on his shoulder.
Apparently the big man was impressed by some change in the boy's freckled high-boned Scotch face.

"You did a good job, son—a mighty good job. We'll check a dollar and a half off on that account. All right? Don't let me cheat you, y' know. And I hope," he grinned, "you haven't neglected the old man's socks."

Horsey shook his head, still sober.

"I put the shirts through two rinsings," he said.

"Well, I don' know about the rights of that, but I'll say they looked it. They did! It's a nightmare to get a man's hand in my business clean enough to suit a girl. And the wristbands show it if he don't—as well as her belt. One thing I liked, kid, was that you didn't act 'shamed to do the job. That's a mark of sand. Now I'm going to ask you fair if you'd mind doing some of Stella's things. Lace—you know—gets torn. These fluffy shirt waists the girls wear—Georgia crêpe—and that."

Horsey's face flushed crimson and he muttered something inaudible.

"There now!" Church declared. "Don't do it if you're 'fraid it'll get out and the boys have something on you! So far as that goes, I'd never let on a word—and you'd get your watch worked out that much quicker. Before it went kaflooey on you and showed me up for old Sol Slick! But just as you say."

And Horsey said he would, though half choking with a kind of repulsion and shame at being involved in the toilet processes of the sumptuous Stella. However, there were no feminine farradels in the basket left at Tron's shanty. Perhaps Church had realized his mistake. But when Horsey carried the things back to Tronjem's den Thursday night the old Norwegian said: "Tad Church he laft word you want to go to Port Huron Saturday you bay down by water tank."

Horsey ran home with head on fire. Port Huron with Ted Church—an incredible shining prospect! Was he to penetrate the towns as unreal as Bagdad that clustered the Huron peninsula? Unbelievable! His heart fell. It simply couldn't happen. It was a mere dream. He alternated between grandiose hopes and drab despairs—and lay awake half the night planning.

The day of chimera approached. A hundred times he resolved to say nothing to his father, but simply skip; and a hundred times changed his mind, determining to tell him bluntly and demand his permission. But, of course, he knew in the depths of his heart that he would never be equal to demanding anything of his father; knew that those hard gray eyes would plunge into him, shattering his resolution like a diamond drill.

The morning passed in aguelike spasms of chill dread and hopeful fever. As noon approached he secretly looked at his watch for the hundredth time, and suddenly gulped out: "Ted Church, th' engineer on 1200 promised—he ——"

"He what ——" demanded the elder McGraw.

"That I could go to Port Huron with him 's afternoon. Bag McIntyre goes with him sometimes."

"It's not necessary to argue the matter," his father gratuitously rejoined. "I've got something else for you to do this afternoon." A characteristic remark with the elder, who could always summon a job out of the nowhere into the here with the stern affectation of having long planned it. "I've been thinking of paying you for the work you do additional to your regular chores—you can add it to your bank account. How did this arrangement you speak of come about?"

"Why"—Horsey hesitated lugubriously, on the verge of tears—"that day I—I was down at the gravel pit. I got to know him."

"I thought as much," said his father. "I thought as much." He turned back after closing the matter to add: "And I want you to keep away from the depot and the tracks—they're a set of loose-living low-lived fellows."

"I—I don't care!" husked Horsey.

"What's that?" his father demanded. But Lawrence had sunk his head on his arms. In this security he slid out his watch secretly and looked at it. Without overt reasoning his mind automatically calculated the distance and sprinting time to the water tank. The seconds slid fast. The minutes dragged indifferently by. Horsey's heart whined with disappointment. Of course at the last minute he could break and run.

But something grotesque about this forbade him—just as his father's strictures of immorality undermined his confidence in Ted Church. He turned the watch over, caressing it with his blurred vision. Suddenly his whole being rose in challenge of that imputation against the big, winsome, smiling engineer. What did he care anyway? The big man had been kind to him.

The minutes were flying fast now. Soon the harping shimmer of sound would chime the mogul's approach.

It was intolerable that such a chance should slip by. He found himself on his feet, staggering toward his father with face burning and heart pounding. He had heard the belling murmur of old 1200 fast approaching. It was now or never—just as that morning when he had hopped the caboose with Bagley McIntyre.

"It's coming," he croaked. "I can't lose any more time! I've hung round long enough!" He met his father's stare of thunderous incredulity with growing courage. A little more sand on the track! "I've stood it all I'm going to—and when I get back, if you dare to do what you did that morning, I'll—by the Almighty —— I'm goin'! It's eleven-nineteen already!"

Glancing at his watch he sprang off the steps. He raced down Pickering Street, round the corner, and reached the tank just as 1200 scoured in with its yellow streamer of gravel cars.

Church greeted him, smiling, and before he could realize it all they were boom-booming across Tilly, Towne and Butler Streets. Horsey, riding on wave after wave of exultation, felt that his confidence in the great hawk head before him was well paid.

The crown sheet dazzled with its trembling gauges, gaskets and injectors. Boom—boom! Boom—boom! The town slid back like a magic carpet, while the great fortress of moving metal towered on past green and red signals and tiny track walkers and foot travelers.

"I expect Stella'll be waving at the next crossing," Church murmured with a friendly smile at Horsey. With genial nonchalance the boy pictured the opulent waitress at the crossing and got ready to touch his finger to the visor of his cap.

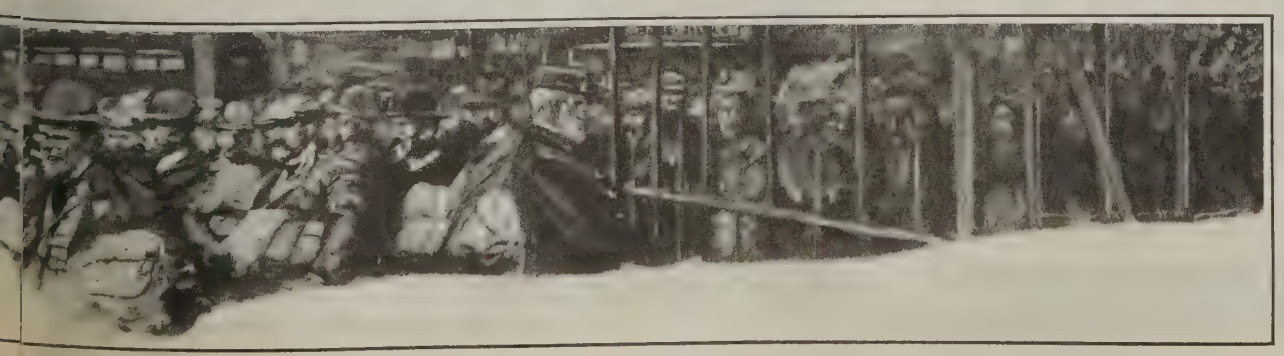
A waggish chuckle waxed in his throat. He had raised his finger halfway when the astral shape of the imagined waitress glimmered out into a little fourteen-year-old girl in a plaid poplin dress and white leghorn, waving a slim arm and calling silverly: "Good-by,dad! Hoo,hoo,good-by!"

Horsey tipped his finger gravely, and the name of Stella as if by magic lost its fulsome meaning and became silverly starlike—as its Latin coinage rightly intended.

Old 1200 scoured on. With the falling of evening would come mystery and the great purple lake. Huron!

Horsey began humming gruffly:

He mounted to the cabin
With the orders in his hand,
And took his farewell trip
To that promised land.



"it has saved us over $1000"

That's one user's record. And this duplicator costs only $38.50 completely equipped. It is used by the U. S. Government, by big and little manufacturers, merchants, associations, professional men, banks, schools and churches—saving 92% on form letter work, making sales, collecting money, speeding up business.

ROTOSPEED STENCIL DUPLICATOR

prints form letters, illustrated bulletins and ruled forms on any kind of paper and any size up to 8½ x 16 inches. Does everything that any stencil duplicator can do—and with fewer operations. It prints 1000 COPIES FOR 20c.

It produces clean-cut letters, with illustrations and fac-simile signature, in one operation—at a rate of 75 a minute. No type to set, no trouble, no muss.

Only One Model
Price $38.50 Complete

Every Rotospeed is fully equipped and ready for all kinds of work. There are no extras—no accessories. It's sold direct, without salesmen or demonstrators. You save the difference.

Send for Free Trial Offer

We will put this money-maker in your office on trial. It will save its cost before you decide whether you want it or not.

Mail the coupon for details of our FREE TRIAL offer, booklet and samples of work done by others with problems similar to yours.

The Rotospeed Co.
750 W. 5th Street
Dayton, Ohio

FREE TRIAL

The Rotospeed Co.,
750 W. 5th Street, Dayton, Ohio

Send at once details of FREE TRIAL offer, samples and booklet.

Name_____

Address_____

THE makers of NOKORODE do more than manufacture the best soldering paste on the market. They have made themselves soldering experts for a continent.

Send 25¢
in Stamps

for illustrated book describing many new Soldering Kinks. A Free sample of Nokorode on request.

THE M. W. DUNTON CO.
Providence, R. I., U. S. A.

NOKORODE

PLAY
SPOOF
TRADE MARK
THE CHEER UP GAME

"Take joy home with you" tonight in the form of

SPOOF

"The Cheer-up Game"

Every minute of SPOOF breeds happiness, quickens thought and action. There's a refreshing newness about it that grips and holds the interest of young and old. Played with cards—by any number of players.

Price 50 Cents. At your dealer's or direct from us.

MILTON BRADLEY COMPANY, Springfield, Mass.

"Makers of the World's Best Games"

PRICE'S VANILLA

You need so little of a good vanilla to give a rich full flavor to your puddings and pastries, candies and ice creams, that you can afford the best.

Price's Vanilla Extract is just the pure juice of the finest vanilla beans aged in wood to mellow its flavor. When you order vanilla say "Price's" to your grocer.

Look for Price's Tropikid on the label

PRICE FLAVORING EXTRACT CO.
Chicago, U. S. A.
In Business 66 Years

For the Cold Garage

The Winter Necessity 10th Successful Season

U. S. Patent, Nov. 8, '04
Canada, Nov. 20, '17
Others Pend.

Keep your auto warm and the garage comfortable in the coldest weather. Made to fit any car or truck. Absolutely efficient and exceedingly economical. Built by heating experts and endorsed by thousands of owners. Price $27.50, complete. Express prepaid. No installation required.

The Neverout
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

AUTO RADIATOR & GARAGE HEATER

DIRECT HEATING SYSTEM FOR THE UNHEATED GARAGE

¶ Does everything an elaborate heating plant would do at a small fraction of original outlay and only ⅓ the operating cost. Burns kerosene, 36 hours with one filling—capacity 1½ gallons.

¶ Applies the heat direct to the power plant of your auto and then to the garage. Makes starting as easy in Winter as Summer. Eliminates the necessity of draining radiator. Keeps the water warm in circulating system, preventing cracked radiators and water-jackets.

¶ Approved by leading insurance companies. Solve the cold garage and coal problems economically. Orders filled on receipt of price, money back if not as represented.

Rose Mfg. Co. (Dept. A, Heater Division) 910 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Makers of the well known Neverout Lamps

DAUGHTERS OF RUSSIA

(Continued from Page 25)

weighted down or overdressed. Physically she was the ideal sovereign, moving with majestic dignity or standing in statuesque pose among us. The beauty of her features and coloring was unmarred by the tragic expression which always lurked both in the large blue eyes and in the severe but well-drawn mouth. She rarely spoke, and always looked bored and intensely sad; but merely for its decorative quality her presence was beyond all praise; and one thinks of her as part of the historic tableaux now forever past and gone.

In their homes the Russian women seemed to me at their best. On country estates they led an active life, for the owner's wife always took charge of certain parts of the administration, besides attending to the vast household with its numerous departments—smoking the meats, conserving the vegetables and fruits and making the native wines being the least of these duties. The woman managed the hothouses, the vegetable, fruit and flower gardens, she attended to the barnyard, the dairy and the splendid poultry, and had the lace and carpet factories, the carpenter shops, and so on, under her complete control. Often when the husband did not care for farming or was engaged in some outside military or civil career his aristocratic lady even handled all the business of estates, and showed herself an expert in agriculture, the breeding of stock, and everything connected with running from fifty to a hundred thousand acres, upon the income of which whole families must live. All this was taken as a matter of course, and there was no fuss made over it, nor any looking for praise from outside.

The charities handled by our women, the industrial schools, and all the thousand and one occupations which came from the rescue of their people's needs kept these landowners immensely busy, yet I s know of any one of them who struck being rushed or too preoccupied to si for a friendly chat.

Those who did not read all the goo lications coming out in three or fo guages could be counted on one's finge everyone had as a matter of course re digested the classics of standard lit from many countries. I found th American writers were well known the most varied moderns—from Twain and Jack London to Henry J were digested and appreciated, remer and quoted. It is not surprisin women were attractive companions home life was delightful.

The mother was always the center home and spent much time in ap freedom, sitting behind her tea tabl ting; while with an air of its being at certain hours of each day husban dren and the intimate friends w grown into the household found tunities to bring to her their pr their troubles or their joys, certain pathy and understanding. One had ably a feeling of warmth and hosp however modest was the lodging, h simple the fare; and one wise old la me once gently: "I don't like it a because there no one has what we that is, time for friendship."

I fancied that my Slav compatriot love more and better and longer t other races of women, because th more time and had better learn science of life and the enjoyment o simple things. No other people w had ever seen gave their lives such

(Continued on Page 92)

PHOTO. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

Grand Duke Michael Michaelovitch and His Wife

LONDON DUPLEX

PELTERS

TRADE-MARK

Coats of Real Leather

The Coats for Every Wear Everywhere—

FROM New York to Frisco — on Fifth Avenue and on Main Street of your own home town — the best dressed men are wearing Pelters.

The Pelter is the favorite coat of the season—it's the smartest, snappiest garment you could put in your wardrobe. It keeps you warm, dry, and stylish despite any weather. It's the partner of the business man and a pal of the sportsman. It's better winter health insurance than a dozen doctors.

Then, too, Pelters are reversible; — "Gabardine and leather, there's a side for every weather"— and double the wear of a coat you can't reverse. A Pelter's second season finds it as handsome as ever, and twice as precious to its owner.

The leather in Pelters is so fine and soft it lends itself admirably to truly smart tailoring. Just try one on this week and see how much you like it.

Pelters come in men's, women's and children's sizes, many sizes, many models, all lengths, in a variety of linings—reversible and non-reversible. Prices range from $30 up. Look for the name on every Pelter.

Go to the store nearest you that sells Pelters, and pick out your model. If you don't know which store it is, write us.

International Duplex Coat Co.

Pioneer Makers of Leather Coats

114–116 Fifth Avenue
New York City

(Continued from Page 90)

rich note of meaning or got so much out of it as did our upper class until the war.

Nowhere either have I observed women grow old with such smiling contentment. A clever Italian said once after he had spent a season in St. Petersburg, when I asked him what he had most liked:

"The old women, without a doubt; they are so comprehending and so fresh at heart. They mellow into age, like fine old wine, which gives one strength and courage to go on.

"There is no dryness, no bitterness; and they are so clever and so in the movement, and unaffectedly interested in everything. I find them quite adorable! No wonder they keep large groups of relations, friends and devoted servitors about them, whom they have gathered through long lives. They are your most wonderful feature, for it is not difficult to be attractive when one is young and beautiful; but to attract at sixty or seventy, and hold admiration without a sign of effort or of aid from dress—one cannot quite seize the art! It is an innate national trait, I believe."

Women's War Work

I found this so; and by degrees decided it was the sincere deep sympathy they had toward all humanity and all work and effort. They loved their neighbors as themselves and kept a ready hand outstretched; and they truly forgave others as they hoped to be forgiven what sins lay on their consciences. Not many these, and none which came from meanness. There seemed very little straining at life's harness, somehow. In Russia marriages of convenience were never much the fashion, so young couples started out with a fair chance for happiness at home; divorce was difficult and much frowned upon until the war, so if the hearth was unhappy the pair either tried to swallow their situation and make no moan or else one heard vaguely of romances which lasted through the years and turned with time into softened tender friendships. Sometimes I noticed, on the contrary, these ended in renunciation and a sacrifice to duties.

The light-headed and cold-hearted flirtations for amusement and from boredom, such as one sees almost universally in other gay societies, seemed almost totally lacking, or at any rate were rare exceptions. Though occasionally things went wrong I can think of no single case where deep sentiment and much suffering were lacking; and there always seemed a serious excuse for the lapses from law and convention. Strangely also, society was generally tolerant to such culprits as there were in its midst, and showed more sympathy than blame. Pity for the woman was expressed, and understanding help was ready, and was given invariably. This trait seemed to me one of the most soft and winning qualities to be found among my compatriots.

The war demolished the old severities completely and divorce became an easy thing, with the church's consent; but the high-bred group had largely scattered by that time, and what social units renaissant Russia will show or what will be her accepted standards it is difficult to surmise.

Our lower classes were always quite uneducated and had lived for generations in the dark, but there too the woman seemed at least to do her share in carrying the general burden. She kept her home and children, got on well habitually with the good-natured giant she married, and she worked hard under her mother-in-law's orders, in patriarchal fashion. Generally she obeyed both parents and husband, and loved and reared a large family, until she faded, very young, as the Orientals do. But she was a transformed creature if brought into a better atmosphere. Such girls as came into our household, as maids and nurses or in other positions for service, showed intelligence, devotion and touching gratitude. One wanted to give them aid, one felt, and not only to them but to all their kind. It was not possible for any small group, however, to bring about the immense changes in the laws that would have been necessary to develop our peasantry; so when we gave our village people our care, and work to do, or when we helped them through a bad year now and again, we had reached the limit of our possibilities. It was very striking to see them so grateful for such things as they received; and their unbelievable quickness to respond to any advantage offered was most winning.

When the war came, in one great wave the women rose to meet the situation. Without exception they gave their men, for the mobilization was general; fathers, sons, lovers, brothers, husbands—all were going, and yet the work of these men, whether in village or on estate, must go on or national production would come to a standstill and armies and population would both lack food. Every woman realized the government could supply nothing to our armies but the bare necessities of war. There were neither nurses nor doctors nor medicines nor Red Cross supplies of any kind; there were no warm clothes for the soldiers and refugees, no underclothes or overcoats, not even enough boots to go round among the troops. Misery and suffering beyond all calculation stared the people and the fighters in the face; and the powers above were swamped by demands they could not meet.

The women rose then to their full height and carried through individually and collectively real miracles of organization. No labor was too heavy, no strain too great. The lazy manner of old was replaced by one of suppressed fire, as brains and bodies which till then had known but pleasant things worked twenty hours in the twenty-four. Everywhere there was rapid preparation, sudden efficiency. Within a month flying columns of first-aid units were on the firing line, while back of it at every château and in every city palace a hospital was improvised and offered gratis to the local administration, with volunteer nurses and doctors waiting in their places.

In St. Petersburg as in the country every motor was given and used in Red Cross work; and homes too small to use as storehouses or hospitals were turned into shops producing clothes and bandages. Sewn and knitted comfort lay piled up in every salon, rows of hospital beds and furniture stretched across ballrooms; sewing machines—whether one or fifty of them—hummed in every house. Conversation was reduced to the news, military and political, and to the discussion of ways and means to treat problems that cropped up. To face these was not easy, for there were few able to teach or lead. Almost no one knew anything; largely we had to feel our way, and it was hard to judge what thing was most needed when so much was being called for. All one had was given without counting and without stint; jewels were pawned to pay for Red Cross trains and other practical small things. Faces went white and strained; and the passion in the eyes, dormant of old, was all alight. It took the outward form of exalted sacrifice.

I read here once on a begging poster: "Give till it hurts!" and I thought of the Russian women and children in those early days of the great war—and for nearly three years afterward—when they gave and stinted and pared down their own lives but never seemed to feel it even, as time and money, hearts and souls, went into the great movement. In the largest houses meals were cut down to one dish or two; dresses were not renewed, and everyone walked in the snowy streets—those who before had owned rich motors. One sitting room was generally kept heated, and great reception halls became mere warehouses; or if all these were warm it was because the wounded and convalescent were living there. Everyone responded to the calls, to the extreme limit of his or her possibilities. Perhaps this great overstraining was one reason why, when deeper troubles came, the population was no longer able to hold out against them and broke down.

The war went on for weeks and months and years; some women physically suffered a collapse, others mentally or morally could not stand the strain, with the constant wear of work, the intense anxiety as to home conditions, and the agony of slow retreats and frightful losses at the Front. Yet most of these patriots went on mechanically with their duties, though their figures wore to shadows of what they had been before.

After about a year of war a new type of woman appeared among us: Amazons who did men's work in field and stable, f yard and street, and who did it well, ing men's wages easily. In the cou these developed rapidly and handled n duties never thought of before in connection; and the new phase pron much for the future of woman's pow the land. Many daughters of the soil soldiering early in the war, especially from our mountain districts who poss magnificent physiques. I was in the casus in the summer of 1916 and I f the small town where I spent two m had sent a contingent of fifty women t Front, who were fighting as volun while another unit equally large was paring to leave.

They usually engaged themselves as and often their sex was not recognized ing long service. One case like this can my notice, which seemed especially s ing. Several wounded soldiers fro single regiment were brought into a pital back of the firing line one day. A them a tall slim young chap was disco by nurses and doctors to be a wo Badly wounded she was, and her com whom the surgeon questioned se greatly surprised to learn the secret o sex, which she had guarded perfectly thr much hard fighting and life in camp the trenches. They said she had shown the least fatigue or the slig tremor of fear; had been always the to volunteer for any dangerous duty, was the fiercest warrior in the regi when the battle was on. They could h believe the news.

The Caucasian Woman's Sto

When she was well enough to speak self she told the head sister her s Young and strong, a Caucasian t woman, she had remained at home a and let her men go out to war. The mans had killed her father, her hus and her three brothers in the firs months. Then she felt she must kill mans to revenge her own family, wiped out; so she had gone to the n recruiting station, given a false n and as they were in a hurry draftin new men they made no physical e nation of anyone who looked as s as she. Also they accepted the tale she had lost her identification pass and she was given a soldier's without question. She went forwa the training station.

"After that it was smooth en sailing, for I had always handled a and could ride and walk and shoot i the best, and was used to our mountain life and camping. Only ter, I must get well now quickly, return to my duty to revenge my and shoot more of the enemy!"

There were a lot of such girls women in the ranks—sometimes t ing for revenge, sometimes follow husband or a lover. The general mony was to their splendid pluck endurance. I never heard any crit of their conduct; nor could fau found with the discipline they sh

Aside from these female soldiers were many women in more normal living constantly during three year on the firing line. Great ladies st with the troops and turned their hardened, blackened hands to chores; risking their lives daily to the wounded back toward home help. They established long lin motor cars, and were generally sup ing these machines from their purses. Aristocrats were ably seco by their sisters from every walk in as they all struggled shoulder to sho in the great cause. Ex-beauties o court and their own maids were we the same khaki, doing the same fin ing of mankind; and groups were tered up and down the Front, wher saw artists, workwomen, courte peasants or bourgeoises giving fai service in nurse's dress. They al without beds or sufficient food, and worked night and day to feed and c the soldiers before battles; and to ga transport and care for the wou afterward.

Hundreds of these sisters won m of St. George, and some had several cessive grades awarded them for repe services. One, the head of a f column, whom I had known well in rograd's gay days, as a fragile bel

(Concluded on Page 97)

PHOTO. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

The Princess Irina Alexandrovna and the Grand Duchess Marie Georgorovna

(Concluded from Page 92)

may a ball, seized an enemy's boat moored to riverbank and ferried it back and forth forwo long days and nights under the Germa fire, carrying provisions and munitions woig and the wounded on her return trips. nother Red Cross sister, who had been ttched for some time to a certain unit of ccos on the Polish Front, volunteered an went into battle with a company of infitry sent forward to capture some creches. The fight was especially deadly; evy officer in the small band was shot beire the last trench was reached. The sisr and her stretcher bearers, with the voig student doctor attached, had helped all hose they could. These officers had be stretched out, and when possible mae comfortable, but not one of them was ab to stand or to give orders; and still the remained that last trench to take. In he emergency this woman, seizing a sw'd, rushed to the head of the small waitinpand of soldiers and shouting the order to harge, with her veil and skirt flying shled the way!

f course every man followed her. With rmendous enthusiasm the trench was ca.ured, and the little Red Cross sister ha time to realize the victory was won bere she dropped dead, her heart pierced byt German bullet.

With deep reverence the men carried her bcy back to safety. Later she was given a ilitary funeral, and because she had already received the whole series of decoraties given to women she was now awarded a an's decoration for her man's work—the Ocers' Cross of the Order of St. George was la upon her coffin by the committee of that ore. I was told at the time her honors we unique; as much so as her actions w ch had merited them so well.

The Battalion of Death

Back of the lines all over Russia, each in hi quiet corner, women worked, and prayed, and worked again; and perhaps thir quiet patience and the way they faced th gathering difficulties through those hard months of 1914, 1915 and 1916 were no le brave than was the action of their siers who accompanied our armies.

was always hearing of their courage in the field and their power of making a litle go a long way to help the men; ab of the inspiration which the women gre. It was all the soldiers ever reived in the way of care and comfort, fc from first to last the government cold do nothing in this line at all. Tere was never even a question of mking trenches livable, or the possibty of giving proper uniforms; and of curse no one thought of offering a pleasu: or distraction to either the officers othe soldiers who for three long years stove to hold our frontiers in the comn cause. They had no vacations from t: firing line save ten days once in eh three months; and that was only tought of in the second year of war! A the money we women could scrape t:ether went for absolute necessities vich the authorities could not provide, ad the latter felt they had every reasn to be proud if they managed to sve munitions and black bread in sufficnt quantities to keep such huge armies s were needed on a battle line two tousand miles in length. The governrnt was not successful always in givi even so much to its sons, and misery vas always great. No wonder German lopaganda sowed its seeds on fertile ground!

When the revolution came every oman rejoiced; for high and low, in ch stratum of the nation, its daughtrs had been discouraged by the compete helplessness of the autocratic gime in facing war problems. To ery fireside the new theories therefore lought fresh hope and courage. Those rthest from the capital kept these ngest, but after the third or fourth onth of liberty had passed illusions ded out all over Russia. The women gan to wonder what their duties would in the conditions of growing disorder. me soon faced a business crisis, with e wrecking of homes, the arrest, mardom and murder of their sons, husnds, brothers and fathers, while they eard insults never ending addressed to l they held most dear.

Others faced the breaking up of their ar-work organizations. All saw their rtunes by degrees crumble, and the ancient frame of life blow down. Worn and weary, racked in soul and body, they watched the slow disintegration of our whole nation's fabric, through the German propaganda and the growing movement of Bolshevism. It was amazing how they stood the test and still braced against the fatal current. The women in the villages everywhere fought vodka and disorders, which gained ground in spite of them.

In the upper classes the women leaders of the revolution preached publicly true liberty and against blind tyranny with all their strength. The venerable Bréschkaia-Bréschkovsky forgot her age and her thirty years of prison and traveled about calling to arms in the crusade against anarchy. Then she went to live near Kérensky, doubtless to uphold the demagogue's failing will. Many other women worked and spoke, hoped and believed to the eleventh hour; loath to give up the fair ideals born of the revolution.

The action of Maria Batchkarova was perhaps the most marvelous of all. A peasant with a cruel life behind her, a soldier in the front ranks since the war began, she realized in the early months of the revolution how the monster anarchy was threatening Russia's safety and her honor. Without hesitation she acted; and by her own personal effort alone she created, drilled and conducted into battle that wonderful organization, the Women's Death Battalion. The members of it took an oath to save our national honor or to die. They made it their business to be such an example as men might well be proud to follow. To me this group collectively stands in our history on a par with that single heroine of France, Joan of Arc. They suffered for the lack of all material things, but never complained; they withstood the test of ridicule and all temptations, as they did also the taunts of prejudiced onlookers.

First they fought against the Germans at the Front, and were killed like flies because the regiments on each side broke and fled, leaving these women to face a bloody fate. Their ranks were reformed at once then, and companies were filled out with fresh volunteers. Again they threw themselves into the mêlée. Against terrific odds they stayed there, fighting, dying, till they were called away for a still rougher and more tragic duty. Kérensky, the people's idol once, could no longer, after October, 1917, trust his own guardians about the Winter Palace, so he ordered back the women from the battle front to protect him. And they did so most faithfully until the end.

The crash came, and the mob of Bolshevik soldiers attacked the palace of the ancient czars, become Kérensky's home and offices under the new régime. The troop of women stood their ground there firmly. Hour after hour, day after day through that time of chaos and of blood they defended the last citadel of law and order.

The fight continued till nearly all were sacrificed, and they were too few to cover more than one entrance to the great building. Long since, Kérensky the dictator had fled, leaving his defenders to their destiny, while the other ministers, braver than he, had remained only to be arrested in the council hall. Still Batchkarova's company rallied again and again. At last only a few women were left and they had nothing more to hold, for the mob had seized the palace's rear doors and entered it. So it was all over, and the Bolsheviki took over the government in triumph.

All the leaders of the first revolution have long been exiles abroad, begging allies for their assistance in the great cause of Russia's liberty; and waiting in patience for the rebirth of our land. Such women as were the femmes des halles in Paris or the Rosa Luxemburgs of Berlin are conspicuous by their absence in our country throughout the present reign of terror.

Undoubtedly, like others, Russian people have many faults, but throughout their history and as I have known them our women seem soft and gentle creatures, utterly feminine. Orient's heat and northern snows, the vague broad steppes and the closed-in forests, low Baltic marshes and high pinnacles of Caucasian rock—each is reflected in the woman Slav's greatest mystery, each has contributed something to her nature. When her present trials are over and she comes at last into her own it will be seen what late experiences have done to mold the riches of her nature. She has learned from suffering and sacrifice throughout the centuries, and yet has labored on and has accomplished much. How she will blossom out when at last the sunlight shines upon her is a question for the future to decide.

PHOTO. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

The Dowager Empress of Russia

Amateur Stargazers

THERE appears to be no more fertile field in which amateurs may attain to distinction than that of astronomy. Hundreds of such amateurs are scattered all over the country and their contributions toward the advancement of their chosen science have done a vast deal in putting the United States in the very forefront of astronomy.

Some of these students of the heavens are rich men with costly telescopes and elaborate apparatus, but the great body of them are men in modest circumstances who earn their daily bread in other vocations. More than once European astronomers while visiting America have gone hundreds of miles out of their way to make the acquaintance of amateurs of international reputation. Usually their cab drivers instead of taking them to a modern, well-equipped observatory have deposited them in front of a dingy house in an obscure side street, and the visitors have learned to their dismay that their brother scientist was a bank clerk or school-teacher whose observatory was a pine shack on his roof top and whose telescope was a homemade affair of the crudest description.

And yet these are the very men who are continually telegraphing the great heavily endowed observatories giving the whereabouts of the comets and asteroids and what not that their own keen eyes have been the first to discover.

A case in point is furnished by the Rev. Joel H. Metcalf, pastor of a church at Winchester, near Boston, who spent the month of August at South Hero, Vermont. Before leaving town for his summer holiday Doctor Metcalf packed in the clerical portmanteau his small but trusty telescope. South Hero, Vermont, had not previously been known as an astronomical center; but before the amateur from Winchester had been there many days he announced the discovery of a celestial body absolutely unmentioned in the latest editions of Who's Who in the Heavens.

The discovery of stars appears to require a peculiar knack, or faculty, just as some men can find Indian arrowheads in almost any plowed field and others never see them except in a glass case in a museum. At all events the astronomer of South Hero scarcely allowed time for his discovery to be telegraphed round the world before he made a second one, and again the name of his little Vermont village went humming over the cables.

Doctor Metcalf had previously discovered more than forty minor planets, three comets and several variable stars. When the weather is unfavorable for sky work he puts in his odd moments building telescopes. Every now and then some learned society sends him a medal in recognition of his remarkable work.

Doctor Metcalf does not pretend to have the business acumen of a certain German astronomer who discovered an uncatalogued asteroid and determined to turn his discovery to practical account. He advertised his asteroid in the European press and stated that whoever was first to send him a post-office order for $250 might have the honor of naming it.

Curiously enough the advertisement came under the eye of Baron Rothschild, who at once perceived that a morsel of immortality was to be had at a bargain. The gallant baron immediately sent his check for the amount named and directed that the new asteroid be named in honor of one of the ladies of his family.

Many clergymen have become amateur watchers of the skies. They say that after the writing and preaching of two sermons and raising enough money to put a new roof on the church and adjusting the differences between the soprano and the alto, the contemplation of the starry firmament and the vast interstellar spaces has an incredibly soothing effect upon overworked brains and frazzled nerves.

Large photograph: Showing a Goodyear Solid Tire after three years' service on a five-ton truck owned by City Fuel Company, Boston. Inset: Part of 12-truck fleet, entirely Goodyear-equipped, in Neponset Yard

Copyright 1919, by The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co

GOODYEAR
AKRON

WHEN AUGUST THE SECOND WAS APRIL THE FIRST

(Continued from Page 11)

for hours upon his veranda, the grave courtesy of the ceremony, in which a white man differently constituted might have taken joy, merely bored him unutterably. As for the native women, they had as little sex appeal for him as he had for them—which was saying a good deal now, because he was short and of a meager shape, and the love of the Polynesian girl for a little man was measureless. The girls of Good Friday Island called him by a name which sounded like "Pooh-pooh."

Among an English-speaking people it would have been a hard-enough lot to be pooh-poohed through life by every personable female one met. Here the coupled syllables carried an added sting of contemptuousness. In the language of the country they meant runty, mean-figured, undersized. A graceful girl, her naked limbs gleaming with coconut oil, a necklet of flowers about her throat and a hibiscus blossom pasted to her cheek like a beauty spot, meeting him in the road would give him a derisive smile over her shoulder and with the unconscious cruelty of primitive youth would softly puff out "Pooh-pooh" through her pursed lips as she passed him by. And it hurt. Certain of the white residents called him Pooh-pooh, too, which hurt him deeply.

Now he hated the whole thing—the dampness which mildewed his shoes and rusted out his nettings; the day heat which kept him bathed in clamminess; the pestiferous insects; the forest with its voices like sobbings and hammerings and demoniac chatterings; the food he had to eat; the company he had to keep; the chiefs who bowed him; the girls who derided him; the beachcombers who nauseated him; the white sands, the blue waters, the smells, the sounds, the routine of existence with one day precisely like another—the whole thing of it. We may picture him as a humid duck-legged little man, most terribly homesick, most tremendously lonely, most distressingly alien. We may go further and picture him as a sort of combination of Job with his afflictions, Robinson Crusoe with Caliban Friday to cheer him in his solitude, and Peter the Hermit with no dream of a crusade to uplift him. In these four years his hair had turned almost white, yet he was still under forty.

To all about him, white people and brown people alike, the coming of the steamer was an event of supremest importance. For the islanders it meant a short season of excitement, most agreeable to their natures. For the whites it meant a fleeting but none the less delectable contact with the world outside, with lands beyond, upon which all of them, for this reason or that, had turned their backs, and to which some of them dared never return.

In his case the world did not mean the world at large but merely the small circumscribed world of South New Medford, which was his world. To him South New Medford comprehended and summed up all that was really worth while. He welcomed the steamer not because it brought news of wars and rumors of wars nor tales of great events on this continent or in that archipelago, but because it brought to him a sheaf of letters, all addressed in the same prim handwriting and bearing the same postmark; and a sheaf of copies of the South New Medford Daily Republican. The letters he read at once greedily, but with the newspapers he had a different way. He shucked them out of their wrappers, arranged them in proper chronological order with those bearing the later dates at the bottom and those bearing the older dates upon the top of the heap, then stacked them on a shelf in his living room. And each morning he read a paper.

In the beginning of his sojourn on Good Friday Island he had made a grievous mistake. Following the arrival of the first steamer after he took over his duties as resident manager for the British Great Eastern he had indulged himself in a perfect orgy of reading. He had read all his Daily Republicans in two days' time, gorging himself on home news, on mention of familiar names and on visions of familiar scenes. Then had ensued sixty-odd days of emptiness until the steamer brought another batch of papers to him.

From that time on he read one paper a day and one only. Reading it he lived the life of the town and became one of its citizens; a sharer at long distance in its joys, its sorrows and its small thrills. But never now did he read more than one paper in a single day; the lesson of those two months had sunk in. No temptation, howsoever strong—the desire to know how the divorce trial of the H. K. Peabodys turned out, the itch of yearning to learn whether the body of the man found drowned in Exeter Pond was identified—proved potent enough to pull him away from his rule. That the news he read was anywhere from ten weeks to four months old when it reached him did not matter; in fact, he very soon forgot that such was the case. For two precious hours a day he was translated back to the day and date that the rumpled sheet in his hands carried on its first page. Afterward he reverted quite naturally and without conscious jar to the proper time of the year as advertised by the calendar.

His routine would be like this: He would rise early, before the heat of the day was upon Good Friday Island to make it steam and sweat and give off smells. He would shave himself and bathe and put on clean loose garments, all white except where the stains of the wild yellow berries had blotched them. His breakfast he prepared himself, afterward washing the dishes. Then he would light his pipe or his cigar and take from the shelf the uppermost copy of the pile of Daily Republicans there. With the love for tidiness and kemptness that was a part of him he would smooth out its creases, then sit down on his veranda to read it. Immediately he became detached from all his surroundings. By his concentration he was isolated from and insulated against all external influences. He was not in Good Friday Island then; he was in South New Medford.

Each morning he read his paper through from the top line of the first column of the first page to the bottom line of the last column of the fourth, or last, page. He read it all—news matter, local items, clippings, advertisements, want notices, church notices, lodge notices, patent insides of boiler plate, fashion department, household hints, farm hints, reprint, weddings, funerals and deaths; syndicate stuff, rural correspondence—no line of its contents did he skip. With his eyes shut he could put his finger upon those advertisements which ran without change and occupied set places on this page or that; such, for instance, as the two-column display of J. Wesley Paxon, Livery Barn, Horses Kept and Baited, Vehicles at All Hours, Funeral Attendance a Specialty; and the two-inch notice of the American Pantorium and Pressing Club, Membership $1.00 per Month, Garments Called For and Delivered, Phone No. 41, M. Pincus, Prop. He was like a miser with a loaf; no crumb, however tiny, got away from him. To him there was more of absorbing interest in the appearance of the seventeen-year locust in Chittenden County than in a Balkan outbreak; less of interest in the failing state of health of the Czar than in the prospects for the hay crop in the Otter Creek valley.

When he had read on through to the last ink-smudged line he would reread the accounts of those matters which particularly attracted him on their first reading. Then reluctantly and still in his state of absorption, he would put the paper aside and going inside to a small desk would write his daily chapter in a bulky letter, the whole to be posted on the next steamer day. It was characteristic of the man that in his letter writing he customarily dealt in comment upon the minor affairs of South New Medford as they had passed in review before him in the printed columns, rather than in observations regarding witnessed occurrences in Good Friday Island. This writing stunt done, his day was done. The rest was dullness. Unutterable, grinding dullness—the monotony of dealing out wares to customers, of keeping his accounts, of posting his records to date, of performing his domestic chores.

From this dullness, though, there was sometimes an escape. To relieve the monotony of his cheerless grind of duties and obligations there came to him visions. And these visions, we may be very sure, mainly were induced by what he had that day read and that day written. By virtue of a special conjury residing in these waking dreams of his, the little man peering nearsightedly at the shimmering white beach saw instead of a beach the first heavy fall of snow upon the withers of the Green Mountains; saw not unchanging stretches of sand but a blanket of purest fleece, frilled and flounced and scrolled after the drift wind had billowed it up in low places but otherwise smooth and fair except where it had been rutted by sleigh runners and packed by the snow-boltered hoofs of bay Dobbins and sorrel Dollies, the get of Morgan stock.

In the insane forest voices he heard the contented cacklings of fat hens scratching for provender beneath the gnarled limbs of ancient apple trees whose trunks all were so neatly whitewashed up to the lowermost boughs. Looking upon the settlement where he lived, set as it was like a white-and-green jewel in a ring of lush barbaric beauty, his fancy showed him the vista of a spinsterish-looking Main Street lined by dooryards having fences of pointed painted pickets, and behind the pickets peonies and hollyhocks encroaching upon prim flagged walks which led back to the white-paneled doors of small houses buried almost to their eaves in lilac bushes and golden glow.

(Concluded on Page 104)

A Roaring and a Crashing Filled His Ears. For This He Had Endured What Had Been Well-Nigh Unendurable—Loneliness, Homesickness, Isolation, Discomfort

Monito SOCKS

It would be evading the plain truth not to admit that there are several brands of fine socks other than MONITO which give unusually long wear. On the other hand it would be unduly modest not to assert that MONITO Socks possess perhaps far more style than is usual. And that their fit comes as a welcome surprise. As a pleasant means of introduction to the goodness of the MONITO family we recommend the purchase of Style 522—pure silk.

Moorhead Knitting Co., INC.

MAKERS OF MEN'S SOCKS AND WOMEN'S STOCKINGS

Harrisburg, Pa.

Sales offices in the principal American Cities

NOT EVEN in America have men been able to equal the humble artistry of the little silk worms of China and Japan. Until something better is discovered Monito Silk Socks will continue to be made from the only real silk we know of—silk originated by silk worms. Mark the natural softness and lustre of such silk in your Monito Socks.

Monito
SOCKS

© 1919
M. K. Co. Inc.

(Concluded from Page 101)

The magic of it made all things to match in with the image: Thus, for example, the tall palms with their feather-duster tops, bending seaward, turned into broad elms standing in regular double rank, like Yankee militiamen on a muster day. And night times, when through his windows there came floating in the soft vowelsome voices of native fishermen paddling their canoes upon the lagoon and singing as they paddled, he felt himself translated many thousands of miles away to Wednesday evening prayer meeting in a squat, brick church with a wooden belfry rearing above its steep slated roof.

But in this last conjuring-up of a beloved scene there lay at the back of the trick more of reminiscence than imagination, since the airs the fishermen chanted were based, nearly all, upon Christian songs that the earlier missionaries had brought hither; the words might be Polynesian but the cadence that carried the words was likely to be the cadence of some pioneer hymnster.

And ever and always the vision had a certain delectable climax; a definite consummation most devoutly wished for. For its final upshot would be that Ethan Pratt would behold himself growing old in the peaceful, safe harbor of South New Medford, anchored fast by his heartstrings to a small white cottage, all furbished and plenished within, all flowers and shrubs roundabout, with a kitchen garden at its back, and on beyond an orchard of whitewashed trees where buff cochins clucked beneath the ripening fruit, and on beyond in turn a hay meadow stretching away toward rising foothills.

He saw himself working in the flowers and tilling the vegetable garden. He watched himself quitting this haven to walk a sedate way to worship of a Sunday morning. With his mind's eye he followed his own course in a buggy along a country road in the fall of the year when the maples had turned and the goldenrod spread its carpet of tawny glory across the fields. And invariably his companion in these simple homely comfortable employments was a little woman who wore gold-rimmed glasses and starchy print frocks.

Into the picture no third figure ever obtruded. With her alone he conceived of himself as walking side by side through all the remaining days of his life. For this mousy methodical little man had his great romance. Unsuspected and undetected, inside the commonplace cover of his body it burned with a clear and a steady flame. It had burned there, never flickering, never wavering, through all the days of his faring into far and foreign parts. Since childhood the two of them had been engaged. It was she who wrote him the letters that came, a fat sheaf of them, by every steamer; it was to her that he wrote in reply. It was for the sake of her and in the intention of making a home for her that through four years he had endured this imprisonment or this martyrdom or this whatever you may be pleased to call it, away off here on the opposite side of the world from her. She was saving and he was saving, both for a common purpose. Back here at home it cost her little to live, and out here it cost him less. In fact, it cost him almost nothing. Ninety per cent of his pay went into his share of the pool.

Within another year the requisite sum which this pair of canny prudent souls had set as their modest goal would be reached; and he then could bid an everlasting farewell to these hated islands and go sailing home—home to South New Medford and to Miss Hetty Stowe. And then she would surrender the place she had held for so long as the teacher of District School Number Four, to become Mrs. Ethan Allen Pratt, a wife honored, a helpmate well-beloved.

So to him the coming of the steamer meant more than an orgy of drunken beachcombers and a bustle of life and activity upon the beach; it meant more than a thin-strained taste of contact with a distant world of white men and white men's ways; meant more, even, than letters and papers. To him it was a renewal of the nearing prospect of an eternal departure out of these lands. By the steamer's movements he marked off into spaced intervals the remaining period of his exile; he thought of the passage of time not in terms of days or weeks but in terms of two-month stretches. Six visits more of the ship, or possibly seven, and this drear life would come to an end and another life, the one of his hopes and plans, would begin.

For its next time of coming the boat was due on or about August the first. She failed to come on the first, but on the second, early in the morning, she came nosing into the lagoon. In a canoe with a brown man to paddle him Pratt put off for her. He was alongside by the time her anchor chains had rattled out, and the skipper with his own hands passed down to him a mail bag. He brought it ashore and from it took out his packet of letters and his sheaf of Daily Republicans. These he carried to his quarters.

First he read the letters, finding them many fewer in number than was usual. By his private system of chronological accounting there should have been one letter for every day from the eighteenth of March well on into May. But here were but a scant dozen instead of the expected fifty-odd. On the other hand there seemed to be a fairly complete file of the papers, except that about ten or twelve of the earlier-dated numbers were missing. By some freakishness in the handling of the post at this port or that a batch of the older papers and a larger batch of the newer letters had failed of ultimate delivery to the steamer; so he figured it. This thing had happened before, causing a vexatious break in his routine. Plainly it had happened again. Well, away out here off the beat of travel such upsettings must be endured.

He arranged the papers upon their proper shelf and in their proper order; then, as was his wont, he turned to the letters and read them one by one. To another they might have seemed stiff and precise in their language; almost formal, faintly breathing as they did the restrained affections of a woman no longer young and coming of a breed of women who almost from the cradle are by precept and example taught how to cloak the deeper and the more constant emotions beneath the ice skim of a ladylike reserve. But they satisfied their reader; they were as they always had been and as they always would be. His only complaint, mentally registered, was that the last one should bear the date of March twenty-ninth.

Having read them all he filed them away in a safe place, then brought the topmost copy of his just-received file of newspapers out upon the veranda and sat himself down to read it.

The first column always contained local news. He read of the wand drill given by the graduating class of the South New Medford Girls' High School; of a demonstration of Wheat-Sweet Breakfast Food in the show window of Cody's drug store; of a fire from unknown causes in Lawyer Horace Bartlett's offices upstairs over G.A.R. Hall, damage eighty dollars; of the death of Aunt Priscilla Lyon, aged ninety-two; of a bouncing, ten-pound boy born to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Purdy, mother and child doing well—all names familiar to him. He came to the department devoted to weddings. There was but one notice beneath the single-line head; it made a single paragraph.

He read it, and as he read the words of it burned into his brain like a fiery acid. He read it, and it ran like this:

"We are informed that a surprise marriage took place this morning at Rutland. In that city Miss Hetty Stowe, of near this place, was united in the holy bonds of wedlock to Mr. Gabriel Eno, of Vergennes. We did not get the name of the officiating minister. The bride is an estimable lady who for years past has taught District School Number Four in the county. We have not the pleasure of the happy bridegroom's acquaintance but assume he is in every way worthy of the lady he has won for a wife. Ye Editor extends congratulations to the happy pair and will print further details when secured."

He read it through again, to the last blurred word. And as he reread a roaring and a crashing filled his ears. It was the castle of his hopes crashing down in ruins. So this, then, was why the sequence of letters had been so abruptly broken off. She had lacked the courage to tell him of her faithlessness; she had chosen the course of silence, leaving him to learn of the treachery through other sources. It was cruelty piled upon cruelty compounded.

For such a sorry ending he had cut four years out of his life. For this reward of all his constancy he had endured what had been well-nigh unendurable—loneliness, homesickness, isolation, discomfort. For this he had kept his body clean and his soul clean where all about him was sloth and slackness. He thought backward upon that which he had undergone; he thought forward upon the dreary purposeless prospect that stretched unendingly before him. Never now could he bring himself to go back to the spot of his shattered dreams. And to him that was the one place in all the world worth going back to.

He put his face down upon his crossed arms, and presently there began to escape from him strangled sobs sounding most grotesquely like some strange mimicry of the name the native girls had for him—"Pooh-pooh, pooh-pooh, pooh-pooh," over and over again repeated. Beyond his doorstep the life of the station hummed and throbbed, quickened into joyous activity by the coming of the steamer. He was not conscious of it. That roaring still was in his ears.

Now between his racking sobs he began to pray aloud a broken prayer. He did not pray for divine forgiveness of the thing he meant to do. By the narrow tenets of his faith his soul, through the deliberate act of his hands, would go forth from the body, doomed to everlasting torment. It did not appear feasible to him that God might understand. The God he believed in was a stern God of punishments, sitting in strict judgment upon mortal transgressions. So he prayed not for mercy but for strength to carry him through that which faced him.

In a cupboard in the inner room was a single-barreled, muzzle-loading fowling piece made at Liège, in Belgium, many years before. His predecessor in the station had left it behind him and Pratt had succeeded to possession of it. He knew how to load and fire and clean it. Occasionally he had used it in shooting at wood pigeons. He went inside and took it from its place and charged it with black powder from an old-fashioned metal powder flask and with heavy shot from a worn shot pouch. For wadding he tore apart the front page of the uppermost copy of the pile of Daily Republicans lying upon t shelf where he had placed them less th half an hour before.

He rammed the charge home, with wa ding between powder and shot, with mo wadding on top of the shot. He withdr the ramrod and cast it aside; he broug the hammer back to full cock and fixed cap upon the nipple. He stood the g upright upon the floor and leaned forwa the muzzle against his upper chest, t stock braced against the edge of a crack the planking.

With the great toe of his bare right fo he pressed the trigger.

Two natives, passing, heard the boomi report and ran in to see what had caused They quickly ran out again and broug white men. After the body had be moved from where it had fallen but befo the scanty personal belongings of the de man had been sealed up and before t store had been put under lock and key, t white men made search about the pla for any farewell message, or lacking th any physical evidence that might furni a possible explanation for the cause of t suicide. They found neither message n clew. In searching about, one of them ca upon a tattered scrap of newspaper. burnt edges and its general singed con tion proved that it had been used for wa ding. The force of the discharge h blown it out, almost intact, to flutter into a corner.

Moved by a curiosity natural under t circumstances the finder deciphered t smudged and blackened reading that found upon the two surfaces of the fra ment. On one side appeared part of advertisement of a merchant tailor; on t other side he made out this, which he re with a casual interest only:

"The Editor regrets exceedingly that yesterday's issue he was victimized a imposed upon to the extent of printing erroneous and entirely incorrect item, f which mistake we now hasten to ma prompt correction and due amends. Son person unknown, taking advantage of t fact that yesterday was April the first, All Fools' Day, telephoned to our sanctu the information that Miss Hetty Stow the well-known teacher, of near here, h been married yesterday morning at Ru land to a Mr. Gabriel Eno, of Vergenn Accepting the report in good faith, th paper printed it in good faith, as an item news. We now learn that the entire sto was untrue, being, not to mince words, a manufactured out of the whole cloth. W learn that Miss Stowe knows the gent man whose name was given as bridegroo but very slightly, having met him but one as we are now reliably informed. In fa nothing could be farther from her though than marriage with the gentleman in que tion, he being considerably her junior years. The cruelty of the hoax thus pe petrated is increased by the fact that f the past several days Miss Stowe has be confined to the bed of illness, suffering fro a sudden and violent attack of fever, whi illness has naturally been enhanced by t embarrassing position in which she h been placed through the act of an anon mous practical joker. Such jokes are e tirely out of place and cannot be t strongly reprehended. In correcting th falsehood the Daily Republican wishes state that the perpetrator of the same deserving of severe ——"

Here the fragment was torn across.

To the tale there is no moral, unless it an indirect moral to be derived from co templation of a strange contradiction in o modern life, to wit: That practical bu glary is by law sternly discouraged and pra tical joking is not.

THE SKY'S THE LIMIT

(Continued from Page 16)

ley were afraid to make the attempt, but ey would never say so.
"That's perfectly true," she said. "I ven't a particle of fear myself, but I have ply no curiosity about it."
She believed herself too. But I did not.
Now I am not brave. I have a sort of ane curiosity about things that gets me o a lot of difficult situations, from which requently have to be extricated; a sur-val of the instinct which made me in earlier cys once make a pair of eyebrows out tar—removed with a razor by an in-iated family; or try an old-fashioned h-wheeled bicycle and have to be sued.
I am not only not brave; I am a craven ward about a number of things. But I obsessed with the desire to show other ople I am not afraid. I don't fool my-f for a moment, but I get away with it w and then with other people. There-e the more I fear a thing the more ely I am to do it. And that is how I me to fly. It happened like this: I had n those aëroplanes a number of times.
ley stood right beside the road, three them in a row—one red and two yel-w ones. Early in the morning they re taken out of their hangars and lished and generally groomed, and as I nt by I would see a group of young iators laughing and smoking cigarettes d apparently oblivious to the fact that ey couldn't get life insurance at any ice. They didn't look like men with e foot in the grave.
The things obsessed me. They looked ribly small. But every morning I unted them, and there were still three.
d the aviators did not seem to diminish numbers. Once I saw a pilot starting t, and if he kissed anyone good-by I d not notice it. He tucked a bathing it into the machine, put on a helmet d a pair of goggles, said he was going the beach for a swim, and got in. I s dazzled by his aplomb. I sat in the curity of my automobile and faced the cts. I was afraid to go up. I had done good many rash things in my life, but I s afraid. A good many people thought was a brave woman, but they did not ow that I was afraid of cows. To the rld at large I was a dauntless woman, ithout nerves.

In for a Flight

I would have to fly, not at once, but metime. Next month. Or next year.
I remember coming home from the rly months of the great war, with what now the commonplace story of shells d No Man's Land. Partly by accident, rtly by not wanting to show the white ather, I had had rather a thrilling me. I had, before I went abroad, been arning to drive a car. I hold the record the only woman in my town who ever ounted a curbstone in a machine, ran it ong the pavement inside two trees and telegraph post, and out again onto the reet without mishap—but also without tention. On my return, therefore, it be-oved me to back that car out of the arage, giving it a twist to avoid the flower arden and another twist to avoid taking f a fender. I waited until I was alone.
hen taking my courage in my hands I pproached the monster. I was very unasy in my mind, but the gardener was here, so I commenced operations with the ang-froid of a woman who had been to ar and had a reputation to uphold. I arted the thing, gripped the wheel, went nto reverse, let in the clutch and shot for-ard as if I had been fired out of a gun.
smashed the gardener's potting bench, all ne spring tomato plants, ruined a bicycle nd narrowly escaped going through the ear wall.
"Got into the wrong gear," I observed o the gardener with a sickly smile. "All ght now."
I then got into reverse, backed out, rumpled a mud guard, took a six-inch anel off the door and fetched up in a bed
f early peonies.
But I conquered that car in the end.
ow here was something else. Heavens, fe was just one thing after another! By he time I'd learned to like flying probably arachuting would come in and we would ave natty little parachute bags to carry ound, and I would have to prove my courage by slipping off into space to make an afternoon call. It is really a dreadful time in which to live.

The way that aviator went off to take a swim impressed me, however. I began to play with the thought of how I should look debonairly stepping into one of the death traps. I dramatized myself doing it with a sort of daredevil nonchalance. Hands in pockets I would saunter up to the thing, cast a professional eye over it, leap in and be gone. When I came down I would be met by a number of newspaper men, who would ask me if there was anything I was afraid to do; and if so, what?

However, I only dramatized myself getting in and getting out. In between was a dark gulf, a bottomless abyss, where my imagination scared like a frightened pup and crawled under the porch.

One day passing a shop in town I saw some leather aëroplane coats for women. They were selling aëroplane coats for women. Therefore other women flew. Was I going to let other women fly while I remained a craven, earth-rooted?

Yes, I was. I had a family. Not for my sake, but for the family's, I must relinquish the thought of adventure. The family was pretty tired of watching me prove to outsiders how brave I was. The family knew. They knew I turned on all the lights below before I went downstairs at night, and that I consider every cow in a field a steer until proved otherwise. I put it on the family for several days. I would probably be doing it yet, but one day I met a man who was a part owner of that aviation field and its deadly trio.

And he said: "You've done all sorts of things, so I suppose you've been up too?"

"No," I replied, "I haven't. It's odd, isn't it? I've had one or two arrangements made at various times, but something always happened."

I did not know about his owning stock in that company or I would have made a different reply. I might have mentioned heart trouble.

"Well!" he said, "we'll just fix that. How about going up to-morrow morning?"

I broke into a clammy sweat.

"Fine," I replied. "I'm perfectly mad to do it! At what time?"

Now I am going to say this about that man. He owned stock in the company, and he was a thoroughly nice person, but I learned later on that he had never been up himself. I got even with him. Before a large crowd on a Sunday afternoon I urged him to try it. And because he hated to seem afraid and didn't think of having a heart lesion, he had to do it. He said when he came down that it was the most wonderful experience of his life, but he hasn't been up since.

You see, there is no halfway about flying. Either you love it or you hate it.

I was awake very early the next morning. I wakened with a half-conscious sense of something wrong, and after a time I remembered. My riding clothes, neatly laid out on a chair, reminded me. Somewhere the wretched youth who was going to take me up was probably splashing in a shower bath and singing, and equally calm and cheerful mechanics were eating ham and eggs, preparatory to putting gas and oil into the aëroplane for what might be its last flight. I rang for coffee and lay back trying to remember exactly what the Secretary of War told me was the low percentage of casualties counted by flying hours.

But I had a moment of hope too. It was foggy. I considered that no aviator in his senses would go up in that fog. I lay back and read the morning paper. Half of the first column dealt with an aëroplane crash the day before.

When the Japanese boy brought in the coffee I said hopefully: "I'm afraid it's going to be a bad day."

He replied with the calmness of a people which commits hari-kari as complacently as we have our tonsils out. "It clear up all right," he said. "Fine day. Forgot spoon. Come back soon."

He then departed, and left the world to sadness and to me. Shortly after that the field called up and said the fog would lift soon and to come right along. We would hop off at nine o'clock.

PHOTO BY BLACK-D PHOTO SERVICE, LOS ANGELES

"This Smile is Pure Camouflage"

I dressed very carefully. If anything happened I felt it only due to my reputation to pass out with all my buttons on, and in my best silk stockings. I had a shampoo and a manicure. I meant to be a tidy corpse.

Everyone at the field was very cheery. They held out a little book for me to sign, however, exonerating them from all responsibility in case of trouble. They said it was a mere formality, because they had never had any trouble and didn't expect any. But as I now had an audience I signed it as casually as I would a club check.

Here is a curious thing about courage. It comes quite often by pretending one has it. It is a sort of acting in which one gets very thoroughly into the part. And the calmness of my pilot cheered me. He was a blithe young man who gave no evidence of having made his last will and testament. He did not seem to be saying farewell to life. He pointed out the fine lines of the machine and patted it a bit, as if he liked it.

"Fine little ship," he said. "Going to have a great ride. Mind the fog?"

"Not a bit," I observed in a brave loud voice.

"All right," he said. "Get in yourself—or need help?"

I was now smiling, but the smile was slightly set—see picture.

"No help, thank you."

Hopping Off

I then watched him get in and made an attempt to follow. But he was twenty-three and I am—see picture again. I needed help. Afterward I learned the trick of it, and I can now get in with quite a professional swing. I feel rather like Douglas Fairbanks when I do it. Indeed I do it so well—especially if there is a crowd round—that I quite give the impression, in case of the pilot swooning, of being able to crawl over and—you know: "The daring woman, seeing death below, crept forward, inch by inch, until the precious lever was within her grasp. With a quick jerk ——"

I was now in and tightly strapped. The pilot was saying "Contact" ever and anon, and somebody was cranking the propeller. There was a terrific noise and wind. We were moving. Farewell, earth. Farewell, sweet life. Farewell, family. Ah, if only they knew that while they still slept peacefully I was bound on this desperate enterprise!

Off the earth! Actually off the earth! Not very far off, but off. Heavens, will we miss those trees? We do. Well, this isn't so bad. One might live through it.

The pilot looks back at me and points a hand below; I am to look down. I don't want to look down. I might upset the thing. Anyhow, I can't turn my head. Every muscle is rigid. The pilot looks back again. Great Scott, why doesn't the boy watch where he is going? He points up this time. There is a hole in the clouds, and we are making for it, exactly like hitting a hole in shrubbery or a gate in a fence. I would rather look up than down, so I watch that.

That is enough of the present tense. It makes hard reading.

We struck the hole and went through. Another machine had followed us up. It contained a man with a camera, behind the pilot. And therewith hangs a tale.

I began to relax, bit by bit. The white ocean of clouds below shut off the earth, and I now released my frenzied grasp of the fuselage and found I could turn my head. I wasn't enjoying it yet but I was enduring it, and I was still alive. The other car was now very close, and the camera was focused on us! I waved to show how easy I felt, but cautiously, because I didn't want to overbalance anything.

Now one thing I had always known: So long as the engine runs one is safe. It is when it stops that one dies. I had therefore a vision of, the moment the roaring ceased, crashing to earth and being the aforesaid tidy remains. The engine stopped.

Farewell, clouds. Farewell, sweet life. Farewell ——

"Great up here, isn't it?" said the pilot.

Merciful powers! He had shut off the engine for a bit of conversation!

"Fine!" I said with stiff lips.

(Continued on Page 110)

Champion

Avoid substitutes by making sure the name CHAMPION is on the Insulator and the world trade-mark on the box.

pion Dependable Spark Plugs

Champion Dependability Has No Substitute

THERE is no need of experimenting with spark plugs. The reputation f Champion Spark Plugs is your pro- ection.

The experience of over 260 man- facturers who equip their products at heir factories with Champion Spark 'lugs together with the experience of millions of owners of all types of cars, furnish you the safest guide when purchasing.

The great resisting power of our famous No. "3450" Insulator, together with our patented copper-asbestos gasket construction, and coupled with extreme care in manufacture, close inspection and rigid production tests, enable Champion Spark Plugs to stand up and keep going better and longer.

There is a Champion Spark Plug specially designed for every type of engine. Ask your dealer. He can supply you.

These Manufacturers Equip Their Products at Their Factories with Champion Spark Plugs

PASSENGER CARS
All American Auburn
Begs
Bel
Bidle
Briloe
Cliber
Colmbia
Cro-Elkhart
Cuningham
Dix Flyer
Dois
Doglas
Elc
Elgi
Fo
Gainer
Genimo
Glie
Golan (Australia)
Grat
Hason
Haoun
Hcler Jason
Jos
Joan Ki
Kle Kar
Lexington
McFarlan
Maibohm
Maxwell
Mercer
Metz
Monitor Monroe
Moon
Moore
Norwalk
Olympian
Overland
Phoenix
Revere (England)
Roamer
Spaulding
Stephens Sayers
Studebaker
Stutz
Templar
Tulsa
Velie
White Willys-Knight
Winton

COMMERCIAL CARS
Acason
All-American
Apex
Atterbury
Autocar
Bolte
Bessemer
Better-Bilt
Buckeye
Clyde
Collier
Columbia
Commerce
Corbitt
Cunningham
Dart
Day-Elder Defiance
Dearborn
Denby
Dependable
Dorris Duplex
Fageol Famous
Ford
Forschler
Fulton
Garford
Gary Gersix
Giant
Hahn
Hall
Huffman Independent International Harvester
Indiana
Jumbo
Kelly-Springfield
Kimball
Larrabee-Deyo
Luverne
Marwin
Meteor
Napoleon
Nelson & LeMoon
Noble
O. K.
Oneida Oshkosh
Overland
Parker
Rainier Republic
Riddle
S & S Schacht
Seagrave
Selden
Service Signal
Standard
Studebaker
Superior
Schwartz
Tiffin
Traffic Transport Triangle
Union
United States
Walker-Johnson
White
Wichita
Wilcox Trux
Wilson
Winther
Wolverine

TRACTORS
Allis-Chalmers
All-Work
Avery
Aultman-Taylor
Autohorse
Bailor
Bates Steel Mule
Beeman Garden
Buckeye Traction Ditcher
Bull
Chase Cletrac
Dill
Dunning & Erich
Eagle
Elgin
Emerson-Brantingham
Farm Horse
Flour City
Fordson
Frick
Gray
Illinois
Keck-Gonnerman
Lapeer
Lauson
Linn
Lightfoot
Midwest
Minneapolis
Moline-Universal National Neverslip
Parrett
Pawling & Harnischfeger
Pioneer
Plowman
R & P Russell
Star
Square Turn Tracklayer
Topp Stewart
Turner Simplicity
Twin City
Velie
Wallis Cub Waterloo Boy
Wisconsin

ENGINES
Arrow
Baker
Beaver
Brennen
C. H. & E.
Caille Challenge Climax
Cook
Cushman Domestic Doman
Elco
Elgin Gas
Erd
Evinrude
Fairbanks-Morse
Fairfield Falls
Fate
Fay & Bowen
Foos
Fuller & Johnson
Gade
Gibbs
Golden, Belknap & Swartz
Hawley
Hettinger
Hinkley
Holland
Ideal
Kermath
Kewanee
Koban
Lathrop
Le Roi
Loane-Trask
Macheck
Massey-Harris
Matthews
Midwest
Miller
Miller Improved
Municipal
New Way
Niagara Northwestern
Novo
Owen
Peninsular Phelps
Red Wing
Reliance
Root & Vandervoort
Sanderson
Schramm
Standardseparator
Sterling
Sypher
Termaat & Monahan
Tierson
Toro Unilectric Universal
Van Blerck
Waterloo
Waukesha Western Wisconsin
Willys-Light
Witte
Wolverine

MOTORCYCLES
Cyclemotor
Excelsior
Harley-Davidson
Henderson
Schickel
Thor

Champion Spark Plug Company, Toledo, Ohio

Champion Spark Plug Company, of Canada, Limited, Windsor, Ontario

(Continued from Page 107)

He started the engine again.

The other plane kept hanging round, for pictures. At times the wings almost touched. But I was growing calm. I had bethought me of the clever idea of writing a note or two while in the air, subsequently mailing them to admiring friends. I now did so, for my consummate desire to pose as calm under trying circumstances still obsessed me. I should like to see those notes sometime. Once at the Front in France I undertook to make a record of events during an air bombardment. I felt very cool, but the next day this is what I read:

"Town is now being bombarding by sixteen aëroplanes. Sixty sick bombs have already fallen."

The pilot shut off his engine again and turned. But by that time I was deaf with the altitude and the noise. I was enjoying it, so I nodded a vigorous "Yes."

What he really asked was if I would like to do some stunts!

When I realized it I was too late. He waved an arm to the camera man, and speeded up his engine, stopped it and—horrors, we were turning over! We turned clear over, and I said the shortest and briefest prayer of my life.

You would think that that was enough—but no, not at all. We turned entirely over the other way. Then for fear the camera man hadn't got it we did it again. Both ways. Then we did a few other trifles, such as a tail spin and so on. That pilot didn't have any inner ears to set spinning. He ate it up. His very back said: "Watch this!"

The camera man said later it made him dizzy to watch us. Well, he hadn't anything on me.

When we were level once more the pilot turned again.

"Want to do some more?" he asked.

Stunts in the Bean Field

I was doing some quick lip reading by that time, and I said "No." I said I had loved it, it was the greatest experience of my life. I didn't see how people got through life without it. But I wasn't any pig about it. I'd get along as it was. I'd manage somehow.

He seemed disappointed. He still had a few tricks up his sleeve, and he hated to waste a perfectly good camera man. But to be serious for a moment, air stunts, though alarming to the novice and spectacular to see, are surprisingly easy as to physical sensation. There is no sense of jerk or strain. The machine rolls over quietly and smoothly. One moment the earth is above instead of the sky, and that is all. But it is a strange moment.

After that cataclysm straight flying was so simple and felt so safe that I enjoyed it. The California summer landscape, brown meadows, with green oases where the faithful garden sprinkler had labored, the moving-picture studios, where during weekdays I was struggling to learn the technic of a new art, the palatial residences of those moving-picture actors who were later on to condescend to leave their happy homes for me and to spend a brief time daily trying to show in six reels what it had taken me a year to write—all these were below me.

I had looked up at those stars in their canvas firmament until my neck ached. Now I looked down.

PHOTO. BY BLACK-D PHOTO SERVICE, LOS ANGELES

"Off Guard. This is the Way I Really Felt"

But the pilot wasn't through. Dear me, no! We were now going to see how low we could go without hitting a fence. Until that time we had not seemed to be going fast, but now ——

Some time later after I had made a safe landing and gone back to the hotel, stopping ever and anon on the verandas to state modestly that I had been flying, the family came in from riding. I did not tell them at once. I waited, as a child will with a piece of candy. I felt patronizing, benevolent and slightly headachy.

"Well," they said, "d'you know what happened just now? We met a surveyor in the road, and what d'you think? A couple of darned fools in an aëroplane nearly took off his head in a bean field, and his horse ran away. He's still hunting it."

Never until now have I acknowledged my complicity.

The moment the novice gets his feet on solid earth he is willing to go up again. He feels so awfully safe then, and he forgets his fright, like a toothache. This condition lasts for about two hours. So it was that in that two hours I agreed to go up the next day. Overnight reflection rather altered this, but I had said I would. And I did.

It was at this time that I got in my revenge on the gentleman who owned stock in the company. It was a Sunday, and a large, interested but determinedly earth-bound crowd was on the field. Partly curiosity. Partly to see Charlie Chaplin go up.

Now Mr. Chaplin is a great artist—a real artist—and a charming young man. But he is about as fond of flying as he is of cholera morbus. He flies a great deal. But he is like all great artists, including myself! He has imagination. He likes it when he is up, but he hates the start. Or if he doesn't he pretends to. The crowd was divided between pride and anxiety when he got in. He is a sort of national good-cheer asset, and they didn't want to lose him.

PHOTO. BY BLACK-D PHOTO SERVICE, LOS ANGELES

"Even Charlie Chaplin's Million-Dollar Smile is Slightly Set"

In the accompanying picture we a sumably watching an aëroplane. The no aëroplane there. This reveals h camera lies. I have, for instance, a graph of myself and pilot in a ship, from above. I am industriously writ prove how calm I am. But the ship the ground and the photographer on ladder.

Mr. Chaplin went up, and the gent who had urged me to my first fligh still on the ground. Before the crow and there, I urged on him the beau the upper air, the sense of moving bird through the blue empyrean, and And the crowd waited and grinned.

His eyes took on a hunted look, last he said: "Oh, all right. Get helmet, somebody."

Another Invitation

He got in, after ferociously signi name in the antiresponsibility book before he moved off he said someth me.

"Look here," he said. "I've had a of wisdom teeth to be pulled for abo months. D'you mind taking me to th tist's to-morrow?"

I had by now got that swing of the leg which clears the back of the pi gives a truly professional touch. done stunts. I had nearly killed a sur and made a horse run away. What wa Had I had my last thrill? Was there ing further? There was.

About to leave the field I mention intention of motoring the next da miles to a more southern city.

"Motor?" they said. "Why don' fly down?"

Good heavens, were these people i able? Wasn't enough enough? But something entered my mind. By a distance flight I would have it all c certain member of my family who hac looped the loop. Besides, I was by time beginning to like flying. Also was a crowd round. Also I had tha culiar sense of safety that comes al flight, with one's feet planted solidly ground.

Of course I would do it. And I woul me one of those aëroplane coats in the window—instead of the coat belongi the large pilot with an eighteen neck had been wearing—and get some rea tures. I did not tion photograph course. I trust the field's put instinct. And right. They ha number of still tographers on th the next mor And a camera with a movie ca and I had the cc held up the fligh iron determin until I got that I was prepar break the news gently to those j members of the ily who had West with me. to my surprise showed no an whatever.

They were, o contrary, ra peevish about i "Do you me say," they exclai "that you are to fly there, an us go in a pok automobile?"

"Wh-what d mean?" I asked

Well, they w to fly too. wanted another Failing that would sit on wings. They'd on somehow. I balked. They young. They a their lives to liv had lived cons ably longer. Sh refer to the pi again? I wouldn it. But to this they have not quite forgiven me for the stiff ecks they got at the other end of the tigl watching for mother to shoot out of sna and land at their feet.

(Concluded Page 113)

(Concluded from Page 110)

I as extremely calm that day. I sat all oing on the veranda of the hotel and id for the coat and listened to a charm- g oung man who had bought a ship of s vn and was learning to pilot it. He lone about the various ways of crashing d bout interesting things that had hap- nl to men he knew in aëroplanes. I o a look at myself at a quarter to twelve, and was wearing a sort of fixed grin, with my yes sunk deep in my head. I had by a time decided that the propeller would o bly drop off. It was the worst thing ld think of, so I fixed on that.

To ease my mind I ordered a luncheon to t loft. There was, I think, a sort of re- ct int admiration in the hotel clerk's eyes w I gave the order. I ordered plenty. ut forgot it entirely when the time came , and I finally went up with a sandwich a banana, the luncheon of one of the e anics at the field.

The head of my moving-picture company hacome to see me. He shook hands three tim with me and observed that I was a bra woman. I immediately became a bra woman and indicated that the whole thir was a mere bagatelle. Then I signed the book again, and some businesslike per- sonn the crowd asked if I had taken out an insurance lately, as some of the recent pol ies have an antiflying clause. I then dis vered that if this trip was successful it ould inaugurate a passenger-carrying sch lule. If?

Now I've undertaken to be honest. At the end of three or four hours in the air I looked at my watch. It had been seven minutes. I held like mad to my luncheon, because it might fall out and get caught in something and cause all sorts of damage. Just the sandwich slipped, and my heart almost stopped.

The propeller ahead obsessed me. Sup- pose it flew off! There were defects in steel every now and then. And how about catching fire? Hot gusts from the engine came back occasionally. Where was the gasoline tank? The pilot was in front of me and kept looking over the edge. Why? Was anything wrong?

No Place for Olive Stones

But after a half hour or so I began to relax. We were following the coast line, and I tried to find us on the map. The sun was hot and far below and very small our shadow moved over the landscape, up hill and down, across plowed fields and dry river beds. The coast line was brown, the sea were blue and outlined with white station- ary lines, which was the surf. The roar of the engine through the heavy helmet was soothing. The propeller seemed inclined to stay with us. My leaning over to look down did not seem to endanger our equilibrium. I felt hungry and a little drowsy.

Heavens, what was that? The ship shook, tilted one way and then the other, and dropped. It picked up, dropped again, trembled. Air holes. The pilot, whom I had suspected of napping, showed vigilance in the very back of his head. We rode through, and he turned round, smiled and pointed below. We were going over a range of bare precipitous hills and the air currents were uncertain.

I sat back again, and my mind wandered to those boys in France who had known this loneliness of the upper air and who had gone out like knights of old, to solitary combat. What did they think of as, with every cloud a possible lurking place for an enemy, they raced through those lonely spaces, eternally vigilant, eternally facing death? And I wonder- ded then, and I wonder now, as I look over this great country, if we are quite worth the sacrifices they made.

I looked below and tried to imagine that peaceful terrain crumbled with bombard- ment, traced with trenches, filthy, sodden with blood, and buried in it those blind heroic souls for whom the air man was the eyes; and again I wondered.

After a time, everything seeming calm and the pilot still unexcited, I decided to eat. There were two olives stuck in the top of the sandwich, and I began on them. Almost immediately I was faced with the problem of what to do with the pits. Throw them overboard? But what if they stuck in something? Wasn't even a small flying bird apt to wreak havoc with a propeller? And what if some law of suction, of which I knew nothing, drew them into the engine? I debated, but it was no time to take chances. I put them in my pocket.

Then I ate the banana, because I was tired of holding onto it. But here I faced the problem of garbage disposal. Suppose, for instance, that this thing became common, and aëroplanes overhead were as frequent as flivvers on a Sunday afternoon. And suppose they all took lunches and threw overboard the empty pop bottles and the tin cans and the wooden platters and a broken cup or two and emptied out the coffee grounds from above. No; I was a pioneer; I must set a good example. I put the banana skin in my pocket.

The remains of the sandwich, which was horrible, I held firmly to the end.

Towns Seen From the Air

Feeling by that time extremely profes- sional I decided to make a few notes on the landscape for Post readers. I wanted to work in a paragraph or two on the delight- ful aspect of things from above. But I discovered what every pilot knows—that the earth from above is, as to all points near enough for observation, a plane of two di- mensions only, length and width. The aëro- plane seemed to represent the only excursion into the third dimension. After a time one learns to see things beneath, but at first all the old standards fail. I don't know to this moment whether certain moving specks were cows or chickens, whether certain boats were gasoline launches or battleships. If I had been at the Front and seen a tank lumbering forward I would probably have thought it was a turtle.

Towns are hideous from the air. We shall have to have a new type of architecture if we are to impress the air tourist and induce him to come down and spend his money in our midst; and this must comprise decora- tive roofs. No one but Santa Claus ever enjoyed looking down into a chimney. And we shall have to change a lot of other things. Of course the limousine body to the aëro- plane will be used for going to dinners and balls, and for going to the theater on those occasions when we have evening clothes. But what about those nights when we de- cide to hop into the little open bus to fly to the movies or take in a vaudeville? The answer, so far as women are concerned, is either a total change in the present little bus—or breeches. As for hats—well, I look for an improvement in the present leather helmet. It would make a movie queen look plain. Perhaps something on the order of the boudoir cap, at present so popular for motoring with a certain fixed percentage of the population, will be adopted. It will have to have ear muffs, however, and the vogue for sewing false curls into the lace border should be abandoned.

This dress question is an important one. Even the small detail of the handkerchief should not be overlooked. An aviator showed me a natty little trick of tying mine by a corner to a buttonhole of my coat. This was splendid, as the handkerchief could not get away. It was, however, too small to reach my nose, and when I finally untied it it was whipped away. When I last saw it it was heading for the Hawaiian Islands, at an altitude of something over a mile. The aviation handkerchief of the fu- ture, then, will probably have a loop at one corner to hang it over a button, and a lead weight at another. It might also have the owner's name and address stamped on it, and a two-cent stamp for its return.

But the most fatal thing of all at the present time to the popularity of flying is its unsociability. The pilot may have the profile of a Greek god, but if every time he turns it to speak it is necessary to shut off the engine, and one's heart stops too, it is difficult to think of a witty response. And mostly he does not turn it. All one has for company is the upper two-thirds of the back of a leather helmet. As a match-making proposition the aëroplane is a failure. And as for descending to some flowery meadow and there saying all the things he has been thinking up while in the air, I can only say personally that after two hours of flying I was stone deaf, and I wouldn't have known whether he was telling me he adored me or was asking me if I wanted a drink of water.

I was quite deaf for some time. We landed at an army aviation field before a lot of ground mechanics and flyers, and if I ex- pected that the removal of my goggles and discovery of my sex was going to make any sensation I was disappointed. D'you think they ran up and shook me by the hand and observed that I was a brave woman?

They did not. A man in overalls came up and I gathered by lip reading and his gestures that we weren't wanted where we were, and to move on down the field and park somewhere else. No newspaper men, no excitement, no cameras. Was this thing to be lost to the world?

I went to the hotel in full aviation garb. Now usually at that hour the verandas of that hotel are thronged with people. There were two elderly men sitting there alone, and they didn't look up. The hotel clerk shook hands with me and asked me if I had had a pleasant trip. The last time I had entered that hotel I was in riding clothes, worn very thin in certain places, with a 30-30 rifle hung to me, a bad case of sun- burn from the Mexican sun, and a rolled- up deerskin under my arm. I hadn't shot the deer. This time I was in a complete department-store aëroplane outfit. D'you think he showed any surprise? He did not.

Two Great Uses

I am going in there sometime in a full diver's outfit, including the helmet, carry- ing a dead fish by the tail, to see if I can rouse him from his calm. But he will prob- ably only slap a key down on the desk and mention that there will be moving pictures in the ballroom at eight o'clock.

I have since those first days done con- siderable flying, and I realize that my early terrors were absurd. There is no danger about straight flying. It does not even give a sensation of danger, after the first strange- ness has worn off. But stunt flying is dif- ferent.

There are two kinds of motorists: There is the sort that considers thirty miles an hour fast enough, and likes to take the family out into the country on Sunday afternoons and fry some bacon and open a can of baked beans and cut a chocolate cake, and then jogs along home at the chil- dren's bedtime. And there is the sort that buys a car by the speedometer, and after getting it likes to step on the accelerator and see it travel. It is the difference be- tween transportation and sport.

The aëroplane likewise has two uses. Used as a means of getting from one place to another or for straight flying for pleasure it is, figures show, safer than earth-bound vehicles. It is the joy-rider, the stunt flyer, who meets mishap. There will be, I ven- ture to say, less and less stunt flying as time goes on. Almost all our aviators to-day are army-trained, and stunt flying was neces- sary as a part of their training. It was in- tended and it served to help them out of tight places in the war, and it taught them control of their machines.

A young man I know bought an aëro- plane the other day. He intends to use it to get to the railroad from his Arizona ranch.

"I hope," I said earnestly, in view of my recent experience, "that you don't intend to do any stunts with it."

"But of course I do," he replied. "It isn't any fun if you don't."

By "fun" he means looping the loop and the Immerman turn and the tail spin and the falling leaf, and a few other air acro- batics which leave the novice with a feeling that most of his important organs, such as liver and stomach, have deserted him and remained above in the ether.

Needed Improvements

Oh, flying is here all right. But it needs a lot of improvement. A muffler on the engine, for one thing, and a real windshield instead of ten inches of mica, which does not keep the wind off but does prevent the passenger from poking the back of the pilot's head with anything he has handy to ask if the engine is going all right.

I am, you understand, referring to the present type of aëroplanes being sold to the general public. I do not refer to those floating palaces with glass-inclosed bodies and patent cigarette lighters and a tele- phone to the pilot and a wireless to the earth and a set of bottles in a rack to use when one gets above the three-mile limit and prohibition.

It is here. And nowadays it is as safe, outside of stunt flying, as the automobile; safer, probably. But it went through its period of terrible danger. I look at the present-day ship, with its stability, its light reliable engine, its ability to glide to the ground right side up, in case of that engine's failing. And I remember the aëroplanes I saw in France in the early days of the great war, ships that aviators shudder to re- member.

And I wonder about those boys, over there and here, who went up alone for their first solo flights. They put a brave face on it. They went up smiling. They were eager to prove to themselves and to the men below the stuff that was in them. But I wonder if a good many of them did not feel, hidden deep in their boyish souls, that they would come down right or they wouldn't; and if there was not, never to be revealed afterward, a moment of panic somewhere in those lonely blue reaches above the clouds. How about the first loop the loop, alone? Some of the school planes were frankly un- reliable. Every field had its crashes. Did any memory of them flash through his mind?

We shall never know. He will never tell us. When he came down he unhooked the belt, got out, and merely observed prob- ably that everything was all right, and was chow ready. Then he lighted a cigarette and went in search of food, being very care- ful not to strut on the way.

But he had it, I think—that moment of panic. Just the first time he looped the loop. He had it surely if he had imagina- tion, that mingled blessing and curse of the adventurous.

I had it, and I didn't have to keep my head. I didn't, as a matter of fact. Yet I was in the care of a pilot who turned over in the air as casually as turning over in bed. A cool young pilot, with a wife and baby somewhere below, and every intention of getting home by lunch time.

Yes, flying is here. Stop in and buy your aëroplane coat. Tie your handkerchief to your buttonhole, take a last look at the good old solid old earth, wave your hand to show how happy and care-free you are—and go up.

The Car of Tomorrow —what will it weigh?

If there is anything about the coming car that is certain, it is this—that it will be built to new light-weight standards, stripped of every excess pound, freed of every hampering ounce.

Some leading automotive engineers put the weight of the car of the near future at not over one thousand pounds, others at fifteen hundred. Whether these figures be high or low, it is unquestionable that weight-economy is one of the outstanding aims of the far-seeing automobile builder today.

Why? Because weight that is not useful is worse than useless, a drag upon the engine—a tax on gasoline and tires—a foe to long life—

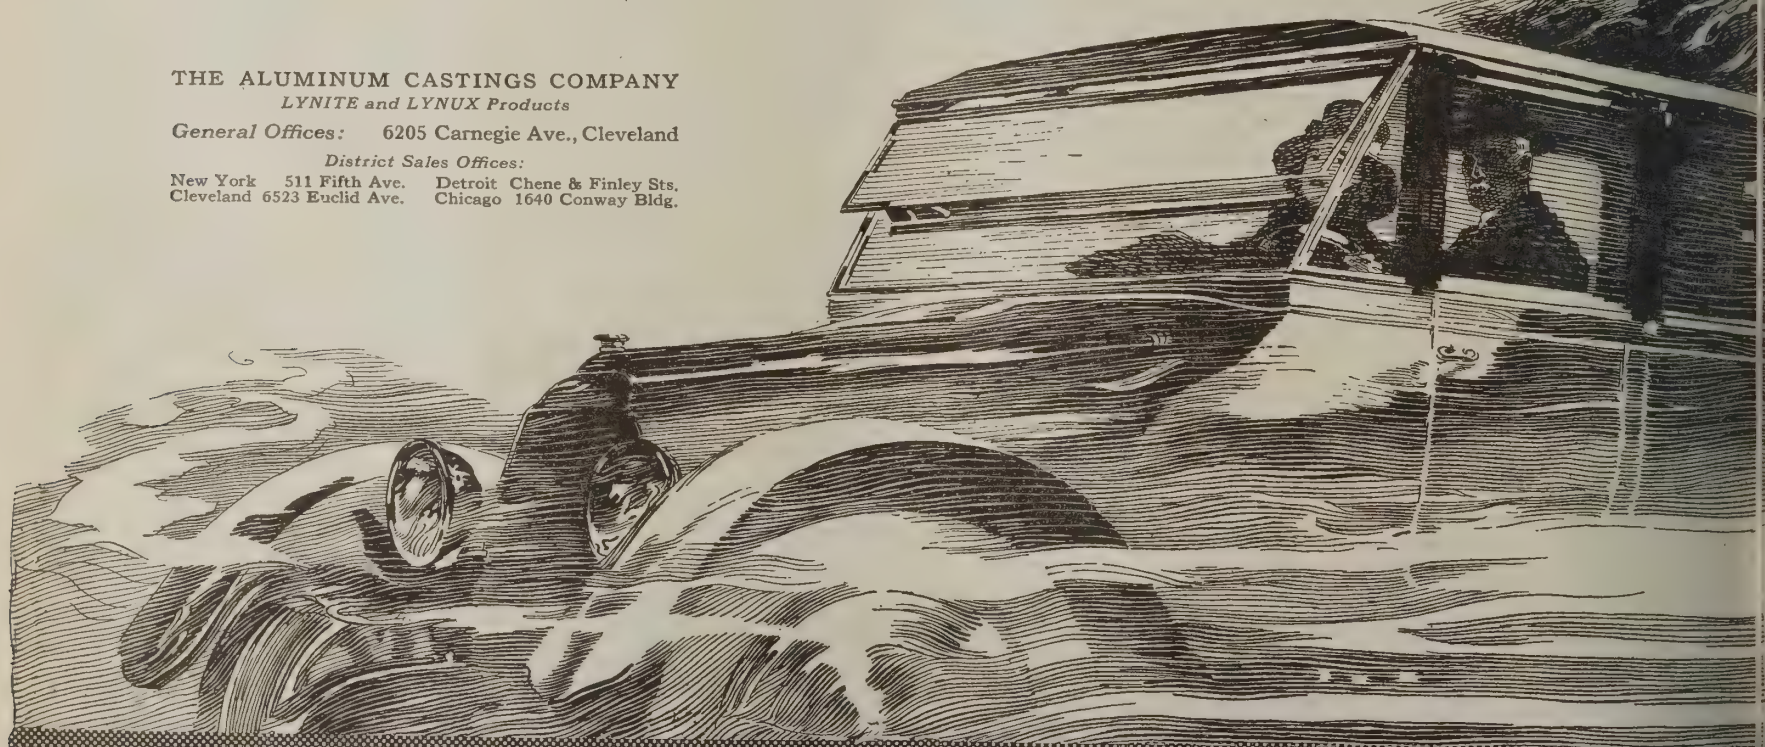
Because better cars with lower cost of upkeep and longer life mean many more owners.

Because Lynite now provides the means to build such cars, while for the automobile of tomorrow, Lynite Laboratories promise many new and important achievements.

The car manufacturer knows that motorists will not continue to haul three pounds of cast-iron when one of Lynite would suffice, nor to pay the freight on all the surplus weight it takes to support and balance heavy iron parts.

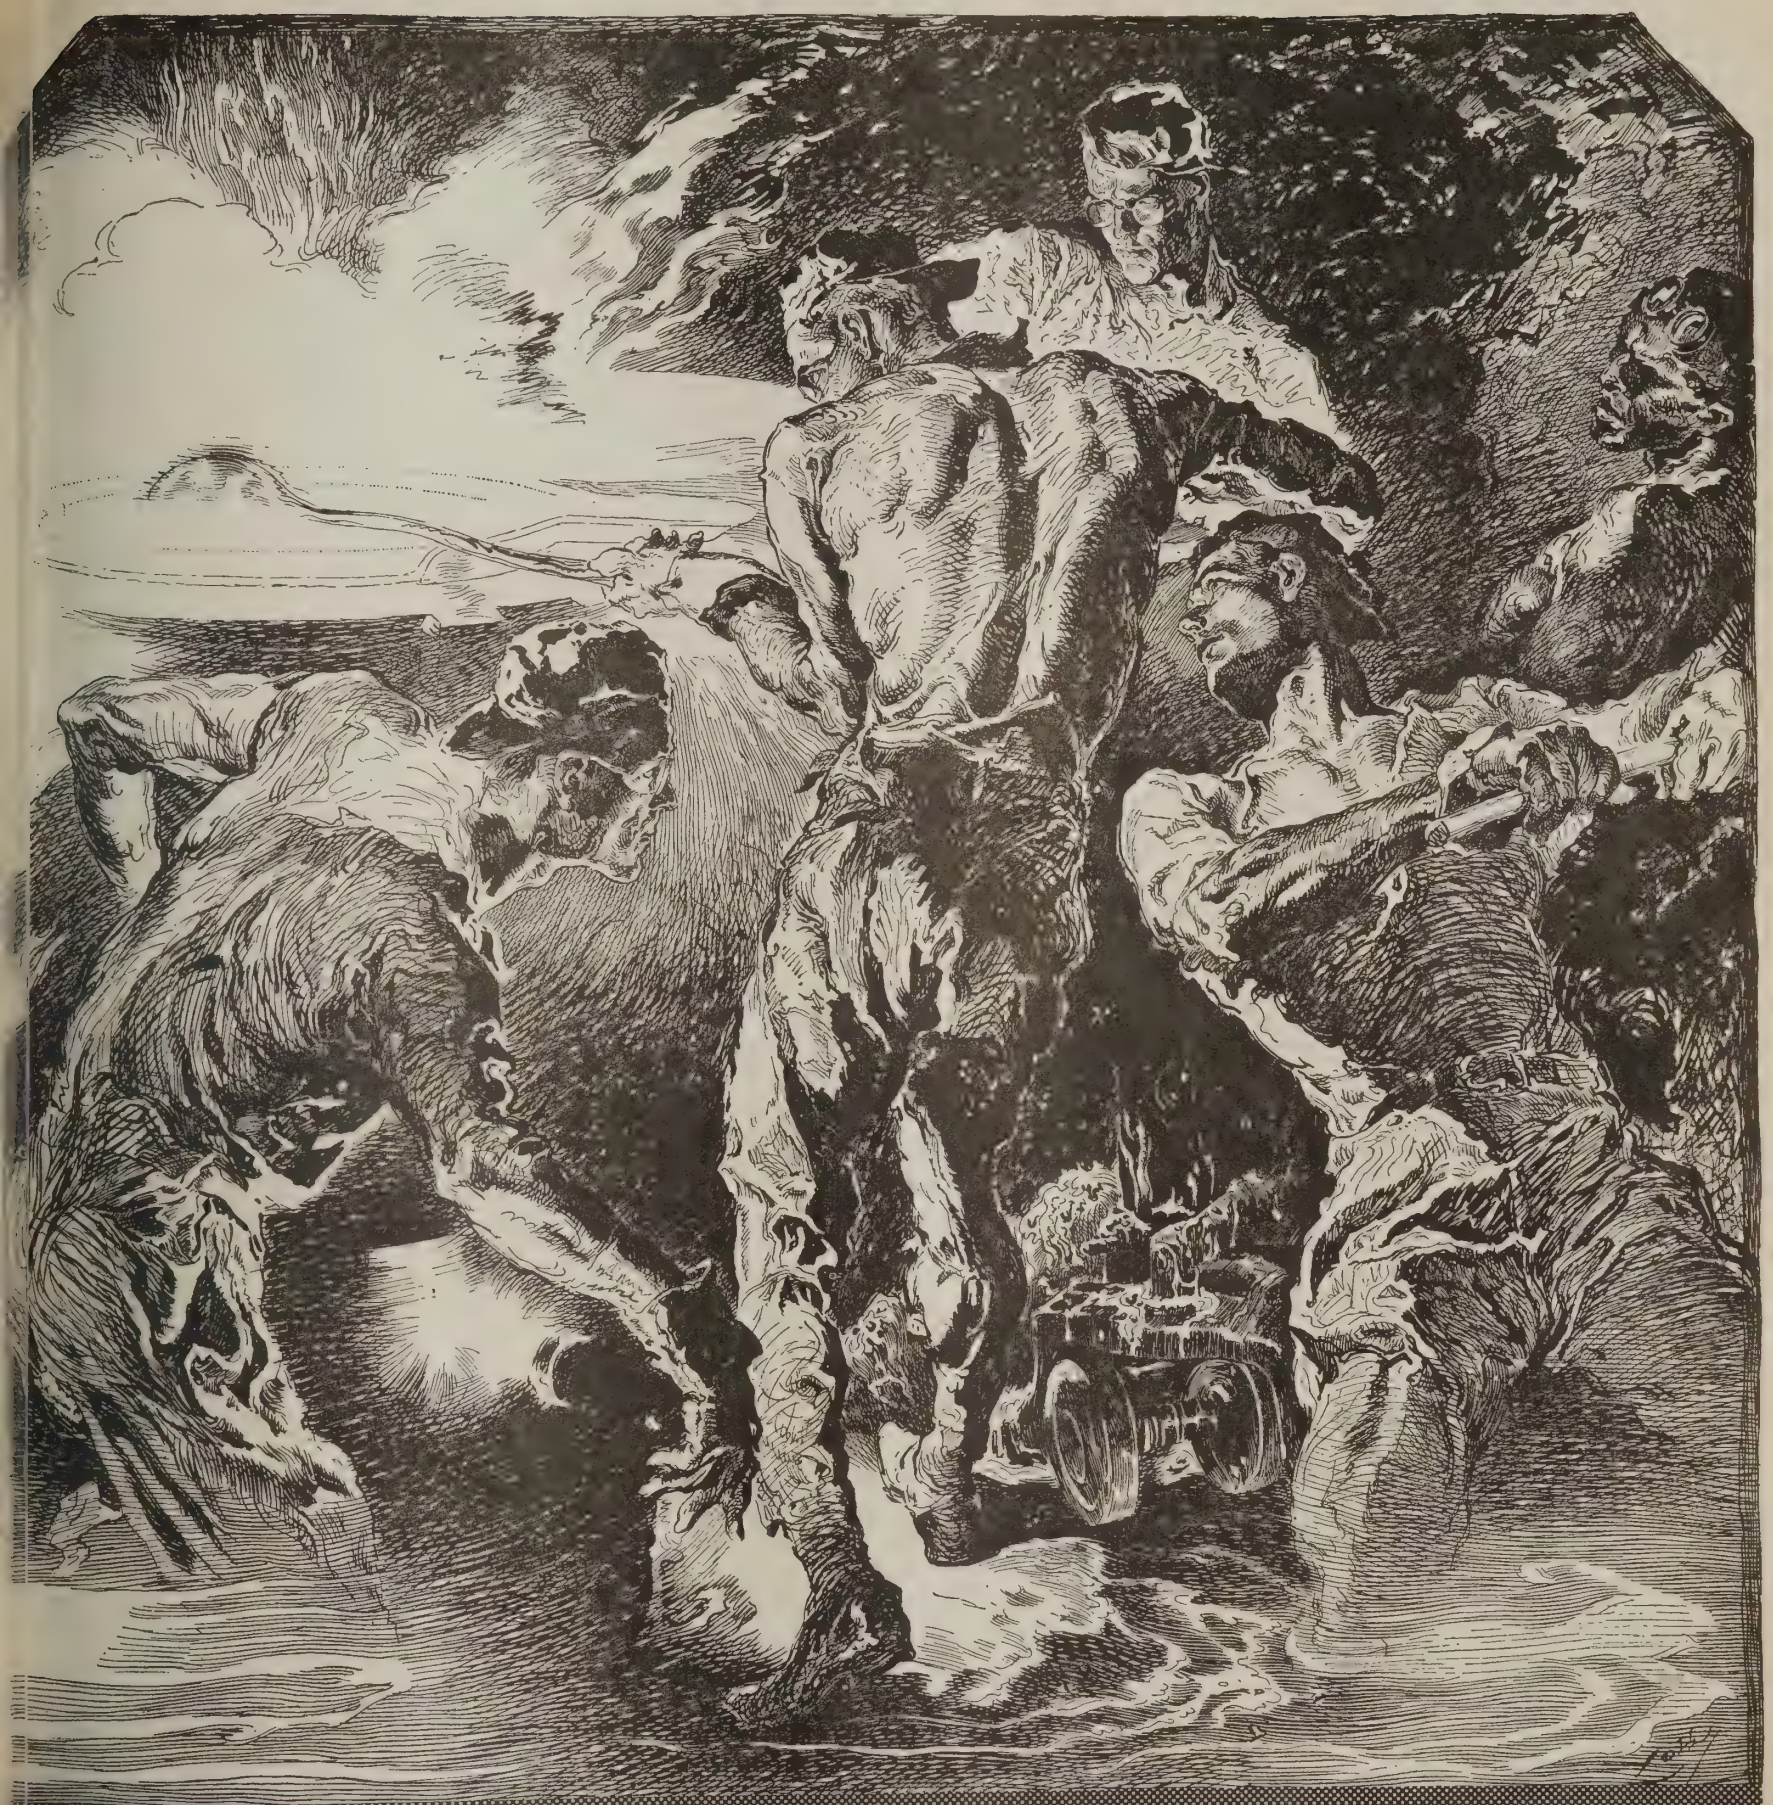
How well he appreciates this is indicated by the fact that already it requires eleven plants to supply the millions of pounds of Lynite which today go into the making of more than seventy different parts for cars and trucks—and the use of Lynite is only well begun.

The development of a new Lynite alloy which effects important savings in weight below the springs—in axle housings, differential carriers and other parts—is an example of what is to be expected as Lynite scientists and foundry experts pursue their researches to the end that the car of tomorrow shall carry not a single pound without a purpose.



THE ALUMINUM CASTINGS COMPANY
LYNITE and LYNUX Products
General Offices: 6205 Carnegie Ave., Cleveland
District Sales Offices:
New York 511 Fifth Ave. Detroit Chene & Finley Sts.
Cleveland 6523 Euclid Ave. Chicago 1640 Conway Bldg.

LYNITE



LYNITE

MRS. FIFTY-FIFTY

(Continued from Page 7)

strangely, did not seem in the least to have affected her appetite.

At half past nine Nelly rose. A half hour later she was downstairs, fully dressed, her manner, for once, briskly businesslike. Hannah emerging from the pantry found her mistress in the dining room down on her hands and knees peering under the sideboard.

"Get a broom, Hannah," directed Nelly. "Sweep under here, and under the china closet also. When you've finished that go into the parlor and sweep under the cabinet, the piano and the bookcase. After that dust off everything in sight; and if you dust it so I can't find any dust when I get back I'll raise your wages this month. I'm going out now, and when two scrubwomen get here you set them to work scrubbing the woodwork upstairs, after which they can polish the hardwood floors. There'll be a man, besides, to beat all the rugs; let him start on the dining room first, then take the parlor rugs. And, Hannah, if you can get your sister here by this afternoon I'll start her at the same wages I pay you. Use our telephone; you can charge the call to me. And let those scrubwomen, when they come, begin on Mr. Dunbar's room; and when they've finished with that they can take his sitting room next. You needn't bother about my bedroom; I've put that in order myself. But if you find time I wish you'd tidy up my bureau drawers; those as well as the drawers in the clothes closet. That's all, Hannah. I'm going now, but I'll try to get back by four or five this afternoon. Don't forget now—you and the scrubwomen begin on Mr. Dunbar's bedroom and sitting room first of all!"

The maid had no chance to reply. The next instant her mistress was out the front door, hurrying down the street.

It would have been curious, that day, to have followed Nelly Dunbar in her peregrinations. Her first stop was at the local bank, where she and Dunbar had a joint account. Pausing at the window marked "A to F Accounts" she inquired the amount of the Dunbar balance. It proved to be quite substantial, several thousands of dollars, in fact; and going to a desk Nelly wrote out a counter check. This in hand she went to the rear of the bank, where the bank officials had their offices.

"Is Mr. Reynolds busy?" she inquired.

Mr. Reynolds was the president. He was not so busy that he couldn't see Mrs. Dunbar; she and Dunbar were among the bank's heaviest depositors; and he came out instantly, smiling and deferent.

"If you please," said Nelly, "could you give me the address of some good broker in the city? A Wall Street broker?"

"Making a little investment?" inquired the president pleasantly.

"I wish to open an account," she replied.

The president looked at her abruptly over his glasses. Then he murmured, "H'm!" However, it was not his business to inquire into a client's affairs; the chief difficulty was to name a broker who would take a woman's account. First-class houses usually have a prejudice against such business; but after talking it over with the cashier Mr. Reynolds gave Nelly the required information. The brokerage house of Rooker, Burke & Co., New Street, kept an uptown office where they made a specialty of women's accounts.

After thanking him Nelly handed the president the check she'd drawn. "I'd like to have this check certified," she remarked with a brisk confidence curious in a woman who knew nothing of business details.

The president himself attended to the certification. It gave him the opportunity, for one thing, to learn just how much of a balance the Dunbars would have left once the check had been deducted. Nelly, it appeared, had put a dent in the account. She had drawn out all but two hundred and fifty dollars.

While the president was certifying the check she consulted a time-table in her pocket. Riverdale boasted frequent trains to the city; and having assured herself of the trains available she replaced the time-table in her hand bag, then thanked the president for his courtesy. Taking the check she left the bank and again hurried up the street.

In spite, however, of her interest in the trains bound cityward Nelly did not make her way to the railroad station. A few minutes later, hastening along a thoroughfare lined with tree-shaded lawns, she turned in at a house set back from the street.

The house was one of the largest, the most pretentious in Riverdale. A wide expanse of lawn fronted it. At the center of the lawn was a large copper beech that glinted metallically in the heat of the summer sunshine; and round its base was a large luxurious bed of pansies, geraniums and marigolds intermixed. On the porch stood a number of cactus plants and rubber trees in tubs; but aside from this array of exotic floral species what would have been observed was the order and immaculate spotlessness of the surroundings.

The veranda had been scrubbed till it shone. Each chair stood with its back to the wall in what inevitably must have been its ordained particular position. Each cushion had been laid precisely in its place. A shop's show window in fact could not by design have been arranged in more meticulous order.

Nelly, however, gave it hardly a glance. Her air anxious, she twitched the shiny polished bell pull.

A maid presently appeared.

"Is your mistress at home?" inquired the visitor.

The mistress was, and Nelly was ushered into the drawing-room. The shades were drawn, the room was vague in its dustless dimness; and seating herself she peered through the gloom, absorbed in the surroundings. At it was on the porch, so it was in the drawing-room. Each chair, each table, lounge and stand stood as precisely placed as an elder at a church meeting. There were the ornaments too; they had been spaced as regularly on the mantel, the tables and the stands as if set there by a surveying squad.

"Heavens above!" murmured Nelly, though not impiously.

Then hastily she rose from the swollen upholstery on whose edge she had perched, waiting to greet the woman she had come to see.

"Well, my dear," cried Nelly gayly, "here I am!"

Mrs. Fawcett was perturbed. She had just been dusting her husband's sitting room, being unwilling to trust the task to any servant; and as she was still decked in a Canton-flannel wrapper, just as she had breakfasted; and as she had a pair of old gloves on her hands and her hair tied up in a towel, she sought to utter an apology.

Nelly didn't wait to hear it.

"I've taken you at your word, you see," she chattered eagerly. "I've come to learn how you keep house so wonderfully! Then I want you to show me too all your pretty dresses; you know you offered last night to let me look at them. My husband is just crazy about your clothes, my dear; the garnet silk with the cut beads especially! Shall we go up now, and see them all?"

Mrs. Fawcett was left little choice. Ere she knew it she found herself half led, half pushed up the stairs into the hallowed upper precincts of what she would have called "the home." What is more, nearly a full hour of her valuable time had passed before she could rid herself of the unexpected visitor and resume once more her happy morning routine of dusting, sweeping, scrubbing.

As the door, however, closed and Mrs. Fawcett found herself alone she might have been astonished had she been in earshot of the departing caller. Again Nelly gave vent to an exclamation. Again, too, it was curious, the exclamation was that same not impious expletive she had let fall before.

"Heavens above!" uttered Nelly with sincerity.

Then glancing at her watch she hurried faster. It was toward the station she hastened now.

To those who have never indulged in it Wall Street trading—call it that—must seem a lamentably dull, dismal occupation. Outwardly it lacks any semblance of interest.

Those who trade either buy or sell the securities they trade in. If they buy it means literally they bet the price will go up. If they sell it means, conversely, they bet the price will go down. In short, success depends largely on the trader's ability to guess which way the stock will go.

Simple as it sounds, though, very few win at the game. Though a stock can move only two ways—up or down—few win even half the time. The few who ever win are those equipped with inside information. This means, in so many words, they are in the confidence of those who dictate whether a stock shall go up or go down.

Fawcett no doubt had this information. At any rate Dunbar's friend had been dealing for years in brokerage shops. He seemed also to have some vague connection with the same shop. What it was Fawcett had not mentioned to Dunbar; nor Dunbar heard of it. However, it was the fact that Fawcett had dealt so many years in the market that impressed his new associate. Without inside information few last long in Wall Street.

The first day's venture went far to confirm Dunbar's confidence. Rocket that afternoon closed ¾ above the opening. The turn netted the two nearly $150 profits for the day; and at Fawcett's suggestion they converted the profits into additional stock. Then at Fawcett's further suggestion they went to a place up the street to talk it over. It was late that evening—much later, in fact, than usual—when Dunbar got home.

Late as he was, though, Nelly had beaten him in by a very narrow margin. Hurrying from room to room she barely had time to see what the two scrubwomen and the rug man had done in her absence before she heard her husband's key in the latch. Without going to greet him, though, as had been her habit, she flitted hastily up the stairs to her room; then she locked the door behind her.

The bed was piled high with paper parcels and pasteboard boxes. Helter-skelter, in her usual haphazard way, she flung these into her closet. She was still at it when she heard her husband at the door.

"In just a minute, Walter!" she called.

His footfalls she heard retreating; and a moment later she had disposed of the last of the parcels. When this was done Nelly stole to the door and laying an ear against the panel stood there for a moment intently listening. Then, as if satisfied no one was outside, she snatched up a workbasket from a table near the window and hurried to her bed. There, hurriedly, she stripped the coverings from one side of the mattress.

It would have been curious to anyone who had seen her. Once she had laid the ticking bare, with scissors she ripped the ticking along a seam. This accomplished, Nelly darted toward her dressing table.

Her hat and her light summer jacket she already had removed; now with the same feverish activity she began stripping off her waist. A moment later she stood before the glass, her arms and shoulders bare, gleaming in their girlish prettiness.

Protruding from her corsets was a packet. Its dimensions were by no means small, and it must have been with difficulty she had inserted it there. However, returning to the bed Nelly perched herself on its edge and hurriedly stripped the paper wrappings from the packet.

It was filled with stiff crinkly papers. The papers were bonds, securities; and there were dozens of them. They were of all sorts too—rails, industrials, Governments—the variety ranging in denomination from bonds of $50 to some of $1000.

How Nelly was in possession of so much wealth is explicable. A full twenty-five per cent of all Dunbar made she had ruled they must convert into savings. It is curious perhaps that being so ignorant of business she had been intrusted with its keeping; but such had been the case. This was in fact the major part of their savings, Dunbar retaining the remainder as working capital.

So far so good; but what Nelly now was doing with that wealth is not so easily explained. Heretofore it had lain in a safe-deposit vault in the city. Perhaps that had been the object of her visit to town—to get possession of the bonds. But why she had wished possession of them; why, too, she was now secreting them in the mattress of her bed, had yet to be made clear. Another thing—if Nelly had become suddenly metamorphosed into a squirrel or a jackdaw, bent on hiding whatever she could get, what had become of the certified check she had taken to town that morning? It was not visible among the papers.

You may guess as you please about it. So far Nelly had taken no one into her confidence.

Stuffing the bonds inside the mattress she sewed the rent together, remade the bed, then hurriedly dressed herself tripped down the stairs to dinner.

"Hello!" Dunbar cried.

Nelly, her air radiant, had decked he in a dress that gave her the look of a just out of her teens.

"Gad!" he exclaimed. "That dres yours is a wonder!"

"This old rag?" she laughed.

Dunbar protested she never had lo prettier, and Nelly laughed again.

"You wait, Walter. I'll show you s thing in a day or so!" She didn't say she meant to show him; but going ov Dunbar she nestled closely to him.

"I'm sorry, Walter, about this morr To-morrow I'll have the house fixed the way you like it."

"It's all right now," he protested. had in fact congratulated himself on result of his morning's effort. "To-n it's fine! Just the way I've always liked

She shook her head energetically.

"No, it isn't, dear! I did only wh could to-day. This morning, thoug spent an hour with Mrs. Fawcett; and morrow she's coming in to help me put whole place to rights. Then it'll be just way you want it!"

A light dawned on Dunbar. As he himself he had Mrs. Fawcett to thank this surprising reform in Nelly.

The dinner too was unusually g Nelly's table, in spite of her domestic sl ness otherwise, always had been excell to-night it was exceptional. Hann sister, summoned in haste, had arrived times; so that now with her labors li ened Hannah was able to give time attention to the task of serving the re Dunbar was still more grateful to Fawcett.

Nelly gave a little laugh, its note de catory.

"Gracious! This isn't the way Mrs. F cett serves dinner! She's going to show that too," she said; and Dunbar nodde approval. He suggested that they have Fawcetts dine with them soon.

Nelly had already thought of that. P ably she would have the house in orde Saturday, so she had invited the Fawc for that evening.

The topic was dropped then. It was referred to again until they were abou rise from the table.

"How did you and Fawcett get on day?" asked Nelly.

She smiled brightly as she spoke, nothing in her voice or manner eviden in the least her former unreasoning dis of the man. Again Dunbar congratul himself on the success of the morning's t

"We did splendidly," he replied.

Having cleared $150 for the day t were now carrying 300 shares of Roc and Fawcett had suggested they sho take on 200 more.

"Are you buying or selling?" inqui Nelly.

"Buying of course," he replied, his t indulgent. Had she known anything ab business matters, Wall Street matters pecially, she would have divined that course.

"Will you have some more coffee?" asked.

Dunbar took another cup. Afterward lit a cigar and lounged into the living ro where he ensconced himself behind an ning paper. The paper he opened at financial page; and ere he had finished room was blue with smoke, the floor c ered with ashes.

Nelly had gone upstairs. She had so sewing to do, she said. At eleven o'clo however, she came down to say good nig As Mrs. Fawcett was coming early to h put the house in order she was going to b

At the door she paused momentarily.

"Mrs. Fawcett is awfully nice, Walt so friendly, so appreciative. They deeply in debt, I understand; and sh quite grateful for the money they've l from you already."

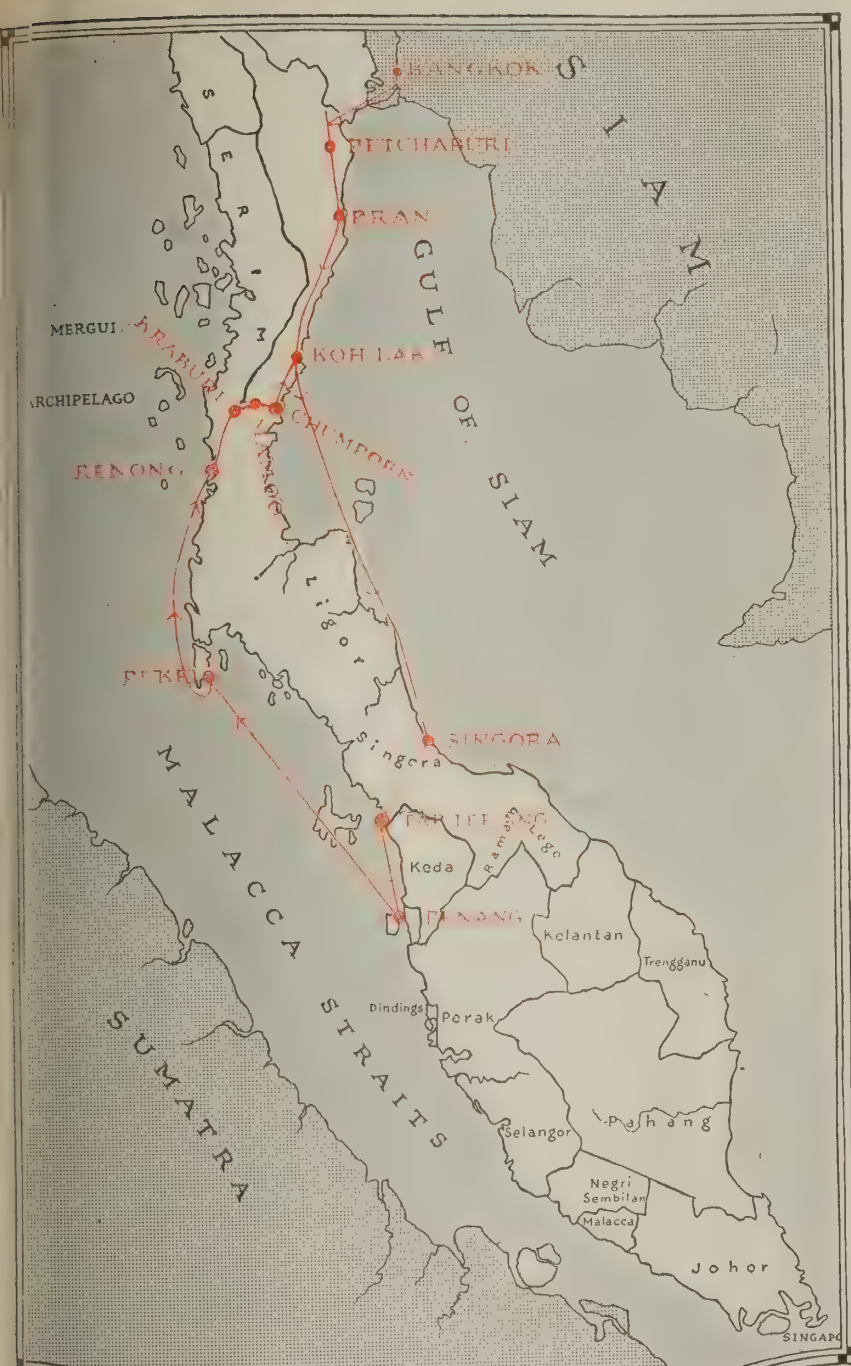
Dunbar looked up abruptly. Mor from him?

"The commissions he gets," murmu Nelly. "His wife tells me, you know, gets paid a commission on all the busin he brings into the brokerage office."

Dunbar was staring at her intent Nelly, however, did not seem to see look.

"Well, I guess I'll be going to bed," said.

(Continued on Page 118)



Vacuum Oil Company Warehouse at Bangkok, Siam.

American Oils for Siam

Carrying Correct Lubrication to the Land of the White Elephant

THE following extracts are from the report of a representative of our Bangkok office after a trip he made to sell Gargoyle Lubricants in the wilds of Southwestern Siam, on the Malay Peninsula. His story gives some idea of the perils and hardships of his long journey through this wild untraveled country.

"One morning I determined to go inland to Gnow. Rode 8 miles on bicycle, by a jungle foot path under the blaze of a 160 degree sun . . . Came to in a tent with some one fanning and throwing water on me."

"At Petchaburi two rice mills secured us an order for one barrel Gargoyle Marine Motor Oil. The engineer, a Malay, expressed surprise at the little he has consumed. The Ban Pan Palace promised orders for two barrels for the traction engine and pump . . . "

"At Singora the proprietors of two mills adopted Gargoyle H. H. Engine Oil and Gargoyle S. W. Cylinder Oil. The motor cars here all use our Gargoyle Mobiloils."

"Wednesday . . . harbor of Puket . . . Tan Chen Hor, an educated Chinese, was quite pleased to get our agency."

"Thirty oil engines employing castor oil lubrication were clogged with a mass of black deposit. Put in our Gargoyle Etna Engine Oil."

"At Renong . . . a plant run by Australians . . . use 1500 barrels Gargoyle Lubricants annually."

" . . . with four men as rowers, we started up the 40 mile passage of Packchan River . . . squall . . . arrived Mamoo . . . encamped in a Chinese house to secure elephants for the next two days' travel. Only one for baggage . . . 42 miles on foot . . . leeches . . . tumbling streams . . . tigers . . . leopards . . . the priest in his yellow robe."

* * *

In the map shown here, the red line indicates the course of the trip.

This representative was told by the authorities that he was probably the first white man to walk across the Isthmus of Kra.

Wherever machinery goes, scientific lubrication must follow. The work must go on.

GARGOYLE

Lubricants

A grade for each type of service

VACUUM OIL COMPANY Specialists in the manufacture of high-grade lubricants for every class of machinery. Obtainable everywhere in the world NEW YORK, U.S.A.

(Continued from Page 116)

The days that followed this long will be remembered in the Dunbar household. They long will be remembered by Dunbar especially. Aside from the fact that the week marked a long-awaited movement in Rocket, the stock he and Fawcett had bought, the week was momentous. The next day, in fact, began these happenings.

Bright and early Nelly was up and doing. At half past six she rose, and at seven she was dressed. In the brief half hour, besides, she found time to put her room in apple-pie order. At half past seven she was at the breakfast table, waiting to pour her husband's coffee.

"Hello!" Dunbar exclaimed abruptly.

Nelly as he entered was already filling his cup. But it was not her early morning devotion, neither was it her air of busy capable briskness that wrung from him his exclamation.

"What's that you have on?" he inquired, frowning.

"The wrapper, you mean?" she asked. Her manner hurried, she added sugar and cream to his coffee, then shoved the cup toward him. "Mrs. Fawcett gave me the pattern. It's the sort she wears at her housework."

The wrapper was of Canton flannel, gray with light-green stripes. Pouring a cup of coffee for herself she gulped it hastily. "If you want another cup of coffee, Walter, call me; I'll be in the sitting room," she said.

She rose as she spoke, and readjusting the towel she had wrapped round her hair she slipped on a pair of large cotton gloves she produced from a pocket of the wrapper. Then she went to the pantry door.

"Hannah! I say, Hannah!" she called. Hannah appeared instantly. "We'll begin on the sitting room," said Nelly. "Get your sister."

The sitting room adjoined the dining room. The opening between the two was draped with hangings; and at Nelly's direction the two maids removed them from their rod. In the same businesslike way she directed them to hang the draperies from the dining-room window, where the air and sunlight could get at them.

"Now the rugs," ordered Nelly. Evidently she meant to make the housecleaning thorough.

When the rugs too had been disposed of the maids began removing the furniture.

"I say," said Dunbar irritably, "you might wait till I get out!"

Nelly paused in astonishment.

"But, Walter," she protested, "Mrs. Fawcett will be here any moment!"

Dunbar said no more.

Having finished his breakfast he retreated to his room upstairs. He had hardly settled himself, however, his paper opened at the financial page, when Nelly and the two maids hove into view.

"I'm sorry, Walter," she announced, "but we've got to begin on this now." Then she suggested, "Why don't you go down on the porch?"

Dunbar lounged down the stairs. The porch, however, seemed little more comfortable than elsewhere. All the chairs had been stacked in a pile; and in the middle of it a scrubwoman was down on her hands and knees vigorously attacking the paint. Dunbar's irritation voiced itself in a grunt. Snatching up a chair he dragged it round to the back of the house. There he sat down to finish his paper.

It was nine o'clock when he departed. Usually he left for the city much earlier, but as Fawcett always took the later train Dunbar waited to meet him. Nelly heard the screen door bang as he went out; and instantly her absorbed interest in the housecleaning seemed to depart. Dropping the carpet sweeper she was vigorously propelling to and fro she rattled down the stairs.

At the end of the hall was a telephone. "Get me Rooker, Burke & Co., New Street, New York," she directed the operator hurriedly.

The firm was the brokerage concern whose name the bank had supplied the day before. In a few minutes she had the connection; and she asked for the firm manager. Then, when that person was on the wire, Nelly gave him a series of explicit directions. Dunbar, had he heard her, might have been surprised. For one so unfamiliar with business Nelly seemed to express herself most clearly. But, more surprising, perhaps, to Dunbar would have been the directions she gave.

The business took only a few minutes' conversation. Hanging up the receiver she rose and for a moment regarded herself in a mirror hanging on the wall. It was the wrapper she had on that seemed to hold her attention.

"Ugh!" she remarked.

Then her eyes traveling to the towel that adorned her head again she uttered "Ugh!" Afterward the gloves came in for the same comment; and she had just uttered this when the doorbell rang.

"Ugh!" exclaimed Nelly with added emphasis.

Hurrying along the hall she paused long enough to wring her face into a smile, then she opened the door.

"Come right in, my dear!" exclaimed Nelly warmly.

Mrs. Fawcett was studying the veranda with an appraising eye.

"You'd ought to have a few plants out here," she remarked; "a couple o' rubber plants or a cactus in tubs 'ud make it look real swell."

"I know," rejoined Nelly; "I've already ordered them!"

As has been said, Rocket was the stock Dunbar had bought. That his faith in Fawcett's inside information was justified the events of the day again did much to prove. Rocket that afternoon closed a point and a quarter above the opening. Dunbar, in other words, again had cleared a profit. The day, however, was not eventful to him alone. In an indirect way Nelly too seemed to share in the general happenings.

At half past three the telephone rang. Excusing herself to Mrs. Fawcett, who was still supervising Nelly's housecleaning, she went to answer the call.

The call was a New York call, it seemed; and some minutes later when Nelly reëntered the parlor Mrs. Fawcett gave a little exclamation:

"Heavens! No bad news, I hope?"

Nelly seemed not to hear her. "Let's finish with the ornaments," she remarked. She had brought in from a top shelf in the store closet a bronze statue of Siegfried Mrs. Fawcett had seen and admired; and with Mrs. Fawcett's help she lifted it from the floor to the mantel. The figure had massive handsome limbs and a curly beard; and in the middle of its waist the artist had inserted a clock. The statue had been a wedding present, but heretofore Nelly had not found a place for it.

Now, however, as she placed it at Mrs. Fawcett's direction in the exact center of the mantel Nelly inquired casually, "What do you know about Rocket, Ida?"

It had been at Mrs. Fawcett's suggestion that they were now calling each other by their given names.

"Rocket? It's a stock, ain't it?" remarked Mrs. Fawcett. She reflected briefly. "Yeh; that's the stock Jim tipped off Mr. Larkin the other evening to sell. The Larkinses was dining with us, you know. You don't know them, do you? They're real exclusive."

Nelly, curiously, caught her breath.

"Tipped him to sell?" she echoed.

"Yeh," nodded Mrs. Fawcett; adding: "Hitch that over a couple o' inches. It ain't in the middle yet."

"You mean, don't you," questioned Nelly as she moved the bronze, "that he tipped Mr. Larkin to buy?" Though she didn't say so it was to buy that Fawcett had tipped Walter.

No. Jim had tipped Mr. Larkin to sell. If Larkin won he was to give Jim, too, a percentage of his winnings.

"That mantel looks real elegant now," commented Mrs. Fawcett, standing back to admire it.

Nelly's face somehow did not display the same admiration. She was not even looking at the statue. Her eyes thoughtful, she was gazing covertly at her visitor.

At five Mrs. Fawcett took her departure. The house under her capable direction was now thoroughly in order; and on the veranda, after Mrs. Fawcett had expressed her approval of that too, Nelly said earnestly: "I can't tell you how much I'm indebted to you!"

"Don't mention it," replied Mrs. Fawcett. Any time Nelly needed it she would be glad to give again the benefit of her experience in housekeeping.

"Oh, but I don't mean just that!" was Nelly's cryptic response. Giving the visitor no chance to reply she added:

"Don't forget now; Saturday night you're to wear your garnet silk with the cut beads. You know Walter just adores that dress!"

Her earnestness and cordiality would have pleased Dunbar could he have heard her. No one in fact could have mistaken now Nelly's determination to omit nothing that would defer to her husband's tastes and wishes. As he himself would have seen, that talk the day before seemed to have impressed her effectually. Dunbar certainly could have no further complaint against Nelly's fealty and devotion.

It was again late, that evening, when he came home from the city; but in spite of the day's success he felt fatigued and restless. Perhaps it was the excitement. By the rise in Rocket he and Fawcett were several hundred dollars to the good. However, instead of converting the paper profit into cash, at Fawcett's suggestion they had again used their winnings to buy more stock.

"What's the use, anyway, of piking?" Fawcett had exclaimed. If he—as he said also—was in Dunbar's place with all the loose money Dunbar had he'd never be satisfied with a measly 300 shares or so; he'd carry double that; three or four times as much, maybe. Rocket, as he'd been told on the inside, was slated for a big rise; thirty or forty points.

It was a golden opportunity, Dunbar saw that. Fawcett's information was sure-fire stuff, and he might make a killing, a fortune. The trouble was, though, that Dunbar had been too long a slow, plodding investor to leap offhand at the chance. He wanted time to think it over. Rather than that even, he would give much to talk it over. But to talk it over was inexpedient. Having asserted his authority, his ability to manage his own affairs, he could hardly be weak enough to fall back on his former ways. Perhaps he might find some way round it. Absorbed in thought he trudged up the walk to his door. He was halfway to the veranda when he paused abruptly.

For an instant the vague impression that he had turned in at the wrong house struck Dunbar. The veranda was not the same veranda. Banked across half its width was a triple row of cactus and rubber plants in tubs; and he stared at them in astonishment. Then, when, still wondering, he had let himself into the house, he was conscious of other changes. The hall was too dim to determine them definitely; but never before having had a cactus or a rubber plant on the premises he went back to the door to take another look at them.

"Nelly! I say, Nelly!" he called. When Nelly, upstairs, replied "Yes, dear," Dunbar exclaimed abruptly, "What's all that damned truck on the veranda?"

The question was echoed by an exclamation; and Nelly appeared at the head of the stairs. She was still in the gray, green-striped flannel wrapper, and her face registered wonder.

"You don't mean all our new plants, do you?" she asked. "Why, I thought you'd like them!"

"Like them!" he repeated. "You must think this place is a beer garden!"

Her face fell; and she looked disappointed and hurt, the tears gathering in her eyes.

"Why, they're just like the Fawcetts have!" she answered; and her look more distressed she withdrew slowly.

Dunbar instantly regretted his impatience. It was only natural, though, worried as he was over what decision he should make in his stock deal, that he should be out of sorts. Hanging up his hat he walked into the living room.

Upstairs Nelly had retreated to her bedroom. Closing the door she also locked it. Half an hour later, though, dressed for dinner, she came down the stairs, her face as usual serene. Evidently in her light easy-going way she had already forgotten her momentary hurt about the plants.

Dunbar had left the sitting room. He was in the parlor, so humming lightly to herself a little snatch of melody Nelly joined him.

"I say!" he said abruptly.

He was gazing about him, his face queer; and at once Nelly gave a happy exclamation.

"Isn't it wonderful, Walter! It took all day to make it the way you like, but I didn't stop till it was finished!" She cuddled up to him then, linking her arm affectionately in his. "There's the Siegfried, Walter!" Her voice softened, its note fond. "It was one of our wedding presents, you remember, dear. You've seen it, haven't you?"

It would have been difficult not to see it. He had seen too the other changes she had effected, not only here but in the sitt room. But though Nelly clinging fon to his arm gazed at him anxiously his f somehow did not disclose the appreciat she evidently expected. That too in sp of all her toil that day!

And that it had cost toil, hard phys labor, in fact, was more truth than me phor. Each object in the room had b moved, not once but a dozen times, en had satisfied Mrs. Fawcett's critical ta The chairs—they had either been set against the wall or spaced here and th with minute regularity—had thus b arranged only by constant change rechange.

So it was with the tables, the stands every individual ornament.

With difficulty Dunbar rid his face its look. Frankly the room somehow g him the impression of an installme furniture flat; but in spite of that he touched. She had struggled so hard, saw, to please him that to express anyth but pleasure would be boorish. He m be kind, gentle—yes; at the same ti though, he must be firm.

"It's all right of course; very nice," said approvingly; "but if you don't mi you'd better change it back the way it w Nelly."

"Oh, I can't do that!" Nelly cried stantly.

"You can't?" he echoed.

He had been quick to catch her to In it again he detected—or thought did—the note he had heard the morn before. "Do you mean you won't?" ag he inquired painfully.

Nelly withdrew her arm from his. O more she looked hurt, distressed; and stantly, gentle as he'd been, Dunbar gretted he had spoken. But at the sa time he must be firm.

"Why not, Nelly?" he questioned.

With an effort she answered:

"Mrs. Fawcett arranged it, Walt She spent the whole day doing it, and thought you'd be so pleased! We ca insult her by changing it back, can we she inquired.

Whatever he thought Dunbar did not press himself.

"Come along, Walter," said Nel "Dinner's ready."

His face thoughtful, Dunbar follow her into the hall. The hall was light brightly; and as he followed Nelly along he was conscious for the first time t Nelly wore a new dress. Its fabric w a garnet silk that rustled richly as s walked, its folds trimmed with fringes glistening, tinkling cut beads.

Somewhere Dunbar recalled dimly ha ing seen a similar dress. But where he h seen it was not just the cause of the que scrutinizing look he gave it. The dress w cut extremely low at the shoulders and t skirt was equally brief. But already ha ing twice hurt Nelly with his criticisms was chary about uttering another. T dress in his opinion gave her the look of overdressed hoydenish schoolgirl.

As they sat themselves, however, at t table, Dunbar ventured a cautious co ment.

"I see you have on a new dress," he r marked.

Nelly nodded indifferently. "Yes, i like that one of Mrs. Fawcett's you a mired. I got it at the shop where she bu hers." The beads tinkling, the garnet si rustling like the leaves of Vallombrosa, s drew up her chair to the table. "He yourself to the butter, Walter," she c rected.

Dunbar's face as he did so grew mo thoughtful.

The dinner that night was unusual. was so, at any rate, compared with the usual evening repast. Instead of servi each course separately Hannah placed t entire meal on the table at once, then wit drew, to be seen no more. But this Nel explained. As Hannah had been doi housework all day she had been excuse from waiting at the table.

Dunbar busied himself with his plate.

"Is this the way Mrs. Fawcett does? he asked.

"No," said Nelly, absorbed in shovin the vegetables within his reach; "whe they have company she has each cours served singly. They hire a waitress t come in."

Dunbar glanced at the table piled hig with dishes. It was evident he had anothe question to ask, but ere he could ask Nelly spoke again.

(Continued on Page 121)

(Continued from Page 118)

That reminds me, Walter: I've asked M and Mrs. Larkin to dine with us Saturday. The Fawcetts are coming, you now."

Those people!" exclaimed Dunbar. 'Jow in the world did you ever meet hn?"

arkin was a poultry dealer in the city. I called on her to-day, Walter. They're ery exclusive, you know. Besides, Mr. arkin's interested in business with Fawe; and I thought you'd like to meet him. ave more of the turnip, dear?"

unbar said, "Thanks; no." He had eaten what turnip he had.

uring the meal, when she wasn't reachin for the vegetables or shoving the dishes ard him, Nelly chatted brightly. She filled visibly by her newly awakened inest in housekeeping. But Dunbar hardly emed. Without talking it over it was ficult to decide how heavily he should plunge on Rocket.

e ate little, the table with its dishes ped over it everywhere filling him with distaste. Refusing the pie Nelly nudged ard him he rose and dawdled into the ing room. There he lit a cigar, and dging his easy-chair from a corner back ts accustomed place he sat down to his spaper. But though the newspaper opened at the financial page Dunbar dly looked at it. When Nelly entered found him staring at the ceiling.

he gave a little cry. Darting out bluptly she presently appeared with a stpan and a brush.

Look here," said Dunbar heavily. "I nt to talk with you!"

Yes, Walter," said Nelly. Bending over began vigorously to sweep up the cigar es on the floor.

t was about the Rocket deal he wished talk. After reflection he saw no reason y he shouldn't. That didn't mean he uld defer to anything she said.

It's this way, Nelly; I know Fawcett's rmation is inside stuff, but I can't make my mind how much stock to buy."

f he put much more cash into the deal would have to sell some of his securities. extra 500 shares was the amount he sidered buying.

e was just debating what securities d sell when Nelly gave another exclamaon. In his anxiety Dunbar had again cked the ashes from his cigar; and ting down on her knees Nelly swept m up anew. Dunbar waited till she ished.

'I might sell some of those Government s," he remarked; "or there are my chison firsts. How do they strike you?"

f they struck her at all she didn't say so. ce more he had knocked the ashes from cigar, and once more Nelly with her stpan and brush darted at the carpet.

'Stop it!" snapped Dunbar.

Nelly stared at him in astonishment, but oving back his chair Dunbar lumbered to feet. "I asked you a question," he said rply. "Are you going to answer it?"

'What about?" she questioned bevderedly.

'About those Atchison bonds. Shall I l them or not?"

Her eyes widened. "Why, don't ask me, lter; ask Mr. Fawcett. I don't know ything about business," she replied.

Then, dustpan in hand, Nelly hurried ct.

Dunbar did not see her again that night. could hear her, however, out in the ntry helping Hannah wash the dishes; d resentful, angry and outraged, an hour er he stamped up the stairs to bed. But e next morning, as on the morning before, lly was at the breakfast table when he peared. Again too she had donned the nnel wrapper and tied up her hair in a vel.

Dunbar said nothing, but his jaw set lf grimly. In silence he consumed his ffee, his toast and his eggs. In the same ence he rose heavily when he had finhed, and strode into the sitting room. lly, already at her housekeeping, seemed o absorbed to pay any attention. Humng lightly she went from one task to other. Then, at nine o'clock, Dunbar ode to the front door.

Dropping the carpet sweeper she was elding noisily Nelly darted after him.

"Walter!" she called hastily.

"Well?" he inquired, his air icy.

"Are you going to buy those 500 extra ares?" she asked.

It was on the tip of his tongue to tell her was no concern of hers, but instead he smiled amusedly. A smile would be more convincing of his disdain.

"I am," he answered.

"All right, Walter," said Nelly, her eyes hardening, "but I warn you, no matter whether you buy or sell, you won't make anything!"

"What!" he exclaimed.

"Never mind!" replied Nelly.

He could get nothing more out of her. All that day, however, Dunbar puzzled over her curious remark. Not make anything? Had he kept watch on her a few minutes he might have divined, however.

The instant he left, Nelly hurried to the telephone. Once more over the wire she talked with the manager of Rooker, Burke & Co., the New Street brokerage firm. The conversation, as before, took only a minute or so.

"Yes, that's what I said; 500 shares. I'll be in myself with the check!"

Hanging up the receiver she hurried to her bedroom. There, armed with a pair of scissors, Nelly attacked the mattress on her bed. Half an hour later, still in the same haste, she came down the stairs. She was fully attired, and hurrying out of the house she headed for the railroad station. It was to the city she departed, and she did not return until late. Late as it was, though, she was in time to greet Dunbar at the dinner table.

As before, Hannah set the dishes on the table and departed. Waiting till she was gone Dunbar turned to Nelly. The day evidently had not improved his mood.

Rocket had not advanced, it seemed. Instead, after he had bought his 500 shares, the stock had fallen nearly a point; and as he seated himself he glanced at Nelly.

"I see you have on that same dress," he remarked.

Yes, Nelly again had donned the garnet silk and cut beads; and his lip curling Dunbar said: "It makes you look like a chorus girl!"

Nelly seemed to start. Never before had Dunbar uttered an affront like that. But controlling herself she replied quietly: "You mustn't criticize my clothes, Walter. You may criticize me if you like; but don't forget, this dress is like Mrs. Fawcett's!"

Dunbar attacked his soup furiously.

"Damn Mrs. Fawcett!" he snapped.

"Reach me the bread, please," requested Nelly.

The day following was Saturday.

That evening, it will be recalled, the Fawcetts, the Larkins as well, were to dine with Dunbar and Nelly. This event, merely social in character, however, was but one of the day's occurrences.

On Saturday the long-expected movement in Rocket—the real movement—took place. During it the white-goods house where Dunbar was head buyer saw nothing of him. Most of his time now he was spending at the brokerage office to which Fawcett had introduced him.

At half past ten Nelly's telephone rang. Nelly went to it, but though it was Rooker, Burke & Co.'s manager who called and his voice was impressive Nelly seemed to take things as a matter of course.

"All right," she responded casually. "Let me know if it goes the other way."

Then she hung up the receiver and went into the kitchen to supervise the dinner she'd ordered for the evening.

All the morning she pottered about the house. The furniture and ornaments in some of the rooms had become disarranged, and with deliberate care she replaced them in the exact order they had been so artistically arranged by Mrs. Fawcett. At noon the telephone rang again; but it was merely the manager, who reported things had gone on the same way without change.

At one o'clock Nelly lunched. Then she went to her room and sewed up the rent in her mattress. Afterward Nelly lay down for a little nap. Her strenuous housekeeping the last few days seemed to have tired her. She may have been merely indolent, however.

At half past two the telephone rang again. But this time it was not the brokerage office.

Hannah, answering the call, plodded up the stairs.

"New York wants you on the phone, ma'am. It's Mr. Dunbar, I think."

"Say I'm out," directed Nelly.

Then she resumed her nap.

At three the telephone rang again. Again plodding up the stairs Hannah received the same instructions. Twenty minutes later it rang anew. Then, at fifteen-minute intervals, New York kept on calling till five o'clock. To each call the New York operator received the same report: "The party's out." At five the calls ceased; and her eye on the clock, at a quarter of six Nelly donned the gray, green-striped wrapper, and binding her hair in a towel sauntered down the stairs. She seemed concerned in making sure the parlor and sitting room were still exactly as Mrs. Fawcett had arranged them.

The clock imbedded in Siegfried's bowels had just clanged the hour of six when the front door was flung open. Startled at the sound Nelly glanced into the hall.

Dunbar had returned. His face was moist. It was, as she saw too, drawn and feverish; and omitting the preliminary of a greeting he strode toward her.

"What have you done with those bonds?" he demanded thickly.

Nelly made no attempt to evade the question.

"I took them out of the safe-deposit box," she replied; and though he shook Dunbar by an effort controlled himself.

"I want them," he said brusquely. "Where are they?"

"What do you want them for?" inquired Nelly; and Dunbar blinked abruptly.

"Never mind what I want them for! Tell me where they are!"

"Not till you tell me why you want them," she replied.

But Dunbar had no intention of doing that. His wrath, however, righteous as it might be, seemed to flow off Nelly as so much water flows off the proverbial duck's back. Then all at once his voice broke.

"You don't know what you're doing, Nelly! Do you wish your obstinacy to ruin us? Before it's too late tell me where they are, won't you?" he pleaded.

"You'd better go dress for dinner, Walter," she returned with aggravating calmness. "The Fawcetts may be here at any moment."

Dunbar consigned the Fawcetts to perdition.

"Are you going to tell me?" he demanded.

This time she answered the question. "They're where you won't get them, Walter!"

Dunbar gaped at her as if tongue-tied. It was the calm assurance of it that took his breath away. Outraged, he could only stammer, and he was still stammering when Nelly went toward the door. At the door she turned.

She was smiling, her air as calmly self-assured as ever. "You don't need to tell me, Walter, why you want those bonds. Your friend Fawcett's tip was like any tipster's. Rocket fell eleven points today. You've been wiped out; and your brokers have called you for more margins. I warned you, Walter, it would happen; but as you wouldn't listen that's why I've put the bonds where they'll be safe!"

Dunbar gasped, then he stared at her agape.

"You'll never get them, Walter," said Nelly; and smiling she went up the stairs to dress.

The dinner was at half past six. Ordinarily the Dunbars dined at seven-thirty; but as the Fawcetts dined at the earlier hour in order that Mrs. Fawcett might find time to tidy up the house before retiring Nelly had changed to that hour also. Promptly at the moment she was down in the parlor waiting to receive the guests. Dunbar was still upstairs in his room.

It was as Nelly had said. Rocket had dropped eleven points, and his brokers had called him for more margins. That was why he'd gone to the safety deposit for the bonds. He had been convinced that if he held on he could recoup his losses. The drop in Rocket, he felt sure, was only momentary. It was just the insiders shaking out the small fry; and though he too had been shaken he had not lost confidence in Fawcett. It was Fawcett in fact who had assured him the loss was only momentary. What staggered him the most was Nelly's knowledge of everything. How had she found out Rocket had tumbled? How had she learned he had been cleaned out? Perhaps Fawcett had talked, and that fool wife of his had babbled!

Unjust as the suspicion was Dunbar was in no mood to reason. The mere thought of Mrs. Fawcett filled him with savage distaste. He meant to let her know sometime what he thought of the way she'd meddled in his household!

Then downstairs the doorbell rang.

It was the Larkins, the first to arrive. In spite of their exclusiveness, the social distinction Mrs. Fawcett attributed to the couple, Mrs. Larkin seemed somewhat uncomfortable. Perhaps it was due to the gown she wore. Early in the day she had telephoned Nelly, inquiring whether, as she expressed it, "high" or "low" would be worn. Having donned low she now was certain high would have been more re-fined. She had the appearance of being about to tumble out of her corsage. Mr. Larkin, a short squarely built person, wore evening clothes with a black silk handkerchief folded neatly across his shirt front.

Nelly was not wearing the garnet and cut beads. She had put on another dress for the occasion; and moving toward her Mrs. Larkin was murmuring admiringly, "Swell rig you got on," when the doorbell again rang. At the same instant Dunbar entered. "Cost much?" inquired Mrs. Larkin.

Evading the question Nelly presented her husband to the guests.

"Mr. Dunbar, Mrs. Larkin." When Mrs. Larkin uttered, "Pleased to make your acquaintance," Nelly turned to Larkin. "You know my husband, I think. You are both friends of Mr. Fawcett."

Mr. Larkin abruptly stuck out his chin.

"Him?" he said.

Nelly was glancing at Dunbar. "Why, yes," she said; "he gave you both the information to buy Rocket."

"Say!" said Mr. Larkin explosively.

But Nelly already was flitting out. Ordinarily she received her guests in the parlor, but hearing Mrs. Fawcett outside she had gone to greet her.

"Looka here!" directed Larkin. He was speaking to Dunbar, and his jaw had grown belligerent. "Did that fellow tell you to buy Rocket?"

"He told you too, didn't he?" inquired Dunbar.

Mr. Larkin found it difficult, apparently, to command himself.

"He told me to sell, he did! He had inside information, he said, and when I sold the damned stock went up! Inside information, eh? Inside your grandmother!" Mr. Larkin vociferated.

It was at this instant the Fawcetts entered. Mrs. Fawcett came first, and she had on the garnet and cut beads. As Dunbar saw too, in the effort to make herself more beguiling Mrs. Fawcett had taken a tuck in the skirt, at the same time cutting the bodice still lower. However, he gave it hardly a glance. Fawcett after telling him to buy had gone and told Larkin to sell, thereby making sure to get a percentage, his profit, whether Rocket went up or down. The man was nothing more than a crook!

Had Dunbar not been the host and Fawcett a guest in his house he would have taxed him to his face with his dishonesty. But though he didn't Mr. Larkin had no such compunction.

The entrance of Fawcett had its instant effect on the poultry gentleman. He was observed to swell visibly, his cheeks and chest expanding, while there spread over his countenance a series of blotches as though Mr. Larkin had eaten something that hadn't agreed with him. Mr. Fawcett's sleek manner as he saw him underwent a sudden change. He appeared somewhat startled to find himself in Larkin's presence, but instantly recovering himself he essayed a jovial greeting:

"Hello, Larky, old top! Didn't expect to see you here!"

"You bet you didn't!" said Mr. Larkin. His jaw in close proximity to Fawcett's nose he jerked a thumb toward Dunbar. "Say, you," he demanded, "did you tell him to buy Rocket?"

"Why—why, what's this?" stammered Mr. Fawcett.

"You heard me!" retorted Mr. Larkin, and he added: "You told me to sell Rocket, you crook!"

Mr. Fawcett backed hastily away. As Mrs. Larkin was just behind him Mr. Fawcett backed into her; and Mrs. Larkin, her face dangerously apoplectic, gave him an energetic shove.

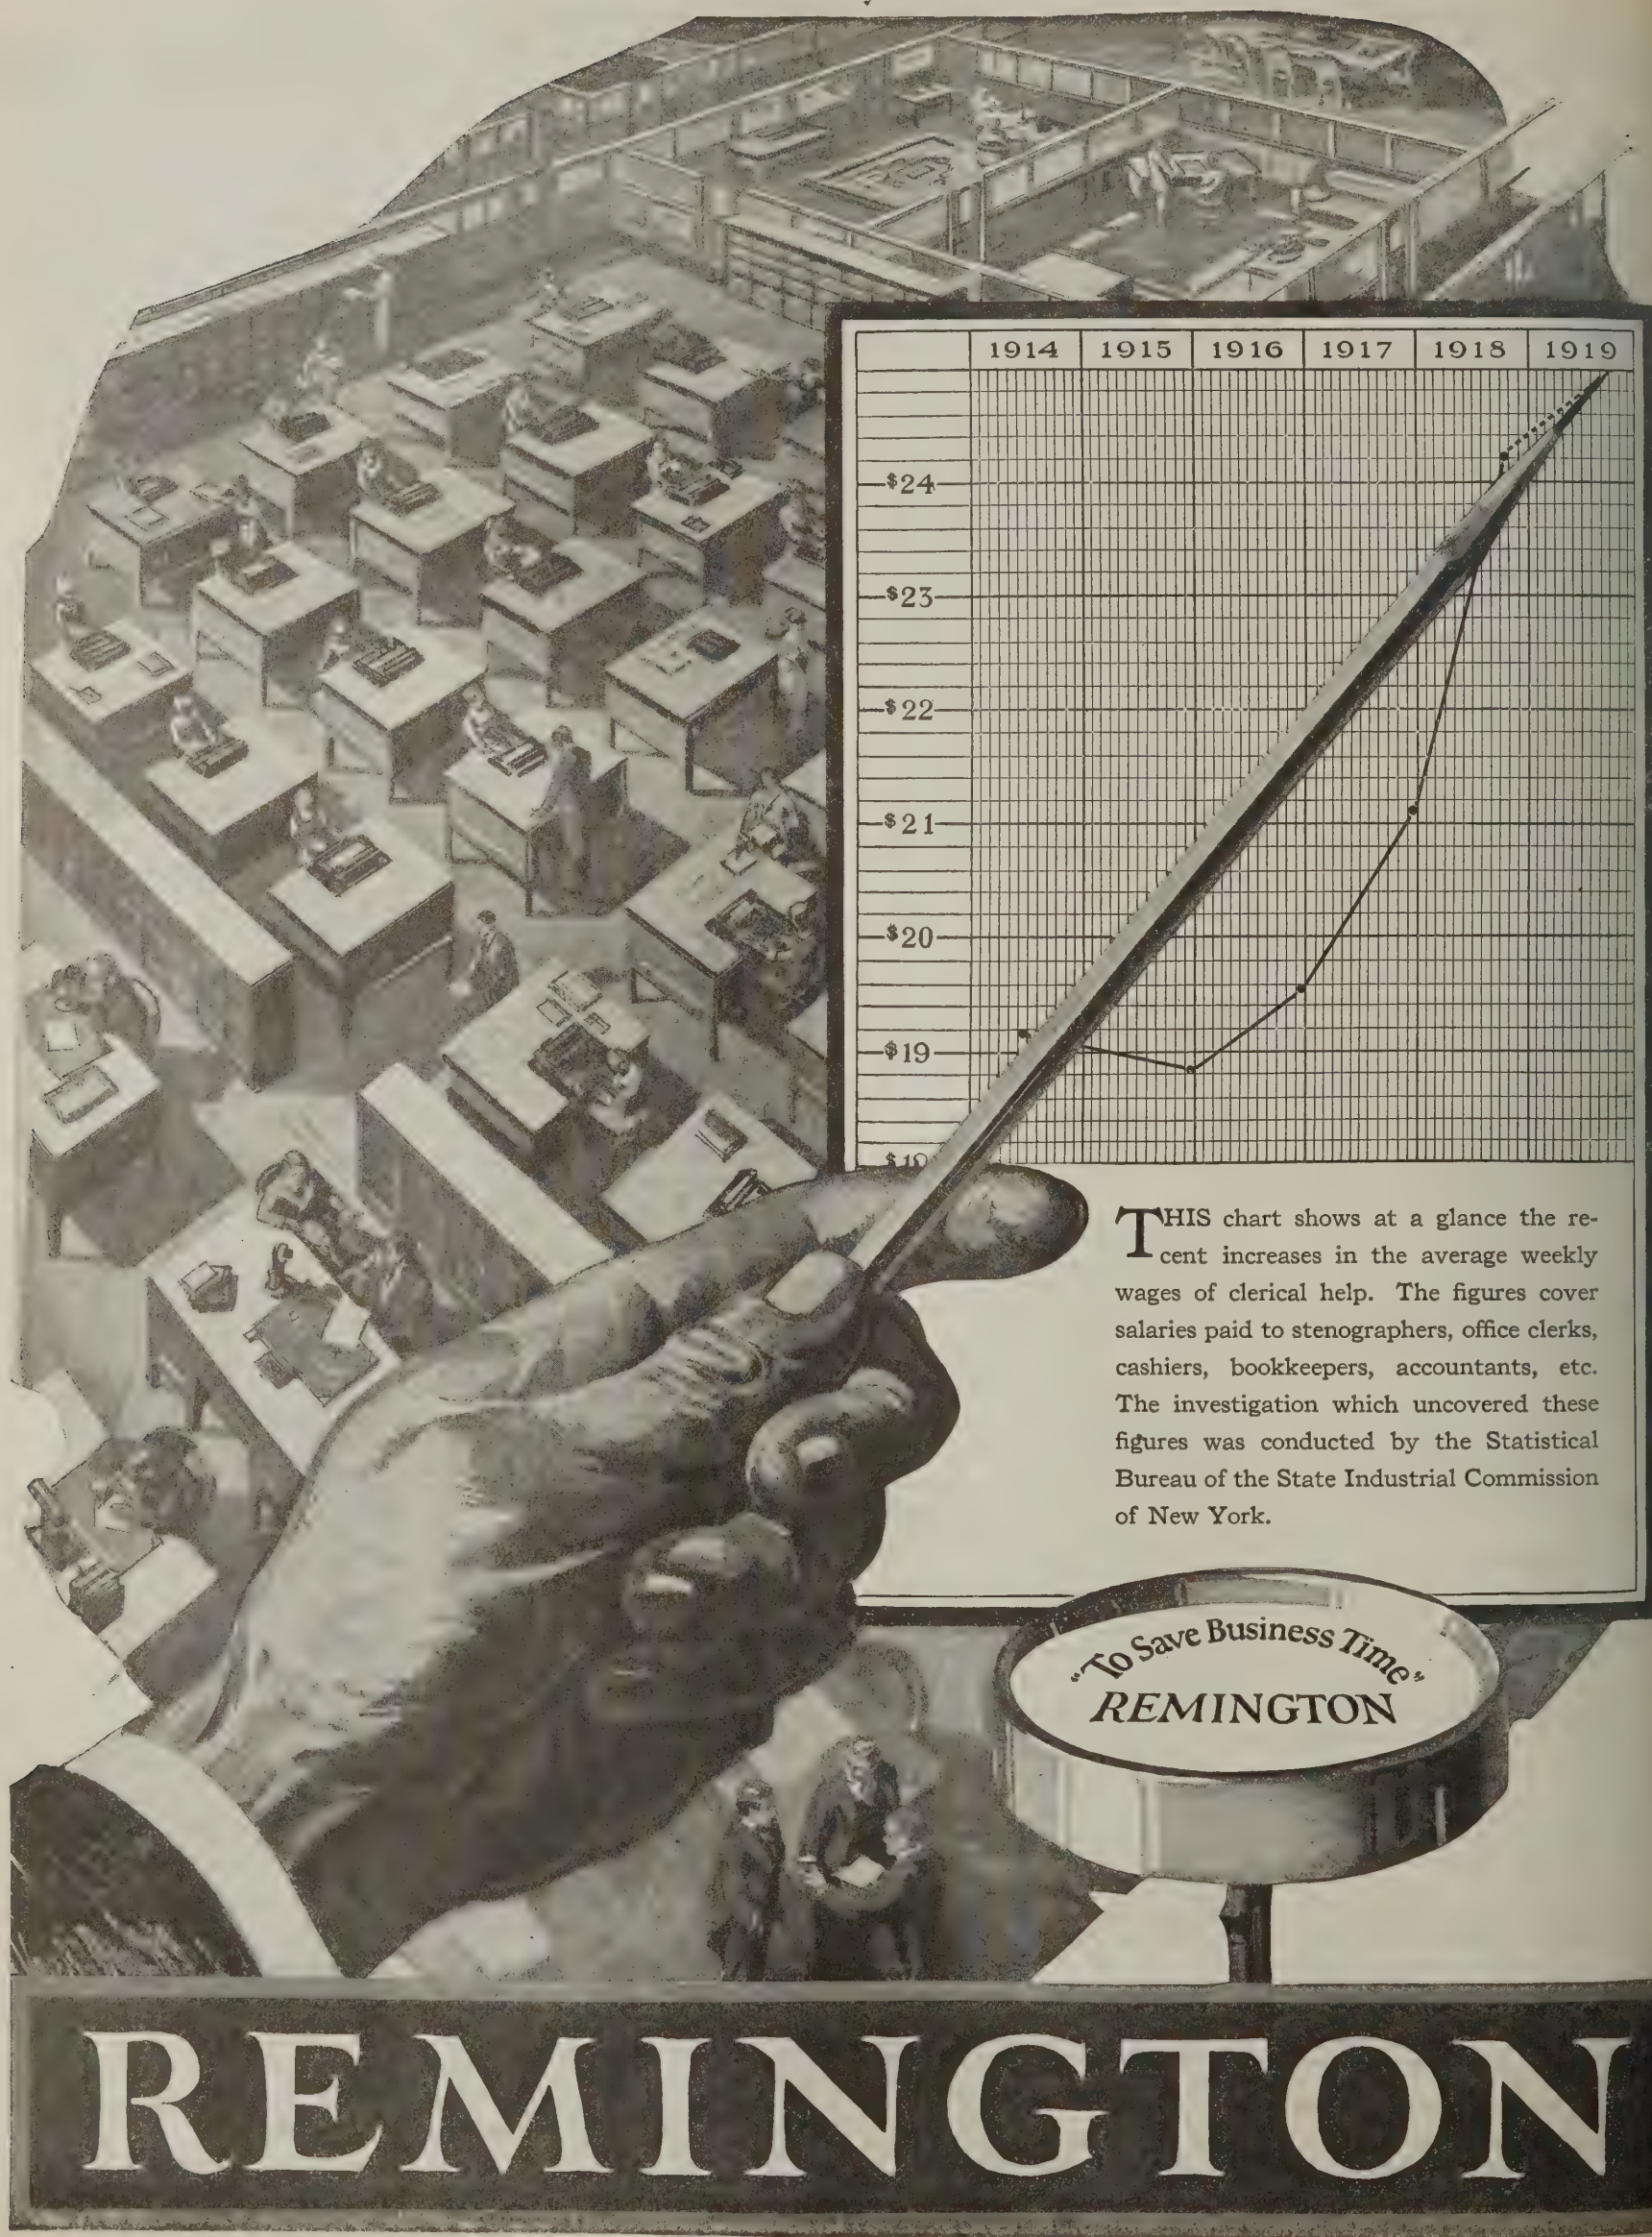
"Get off my dress, you bunco steerer!" she directed.

"Why, Mrs. Larkin!" exclaimed Mrs. Fawcett. "That's no way for a lady to talk!"

Mr. Fawcett was bristling indignantly.

"See here, Dunbar," he cried, "I didn't come here to get insulted!"

(Concluded on Page 124)



THIS chart shows at a glance the recent increases in the average weekly wages of clerical help. The figures cover salaries paid to stenographers, office clerks, cashiers, bookkeepers, accountants, etc. The investigation which uncovered these figures was conducted by the Statistical Bureau of the State Industrial Commission of New York.

REMINGTON

Office Costs are Climbing

But the Remington Salesman can bring you help

BIGGER SALARIES! Bigger salaries! Bigger salaries! Executives are now scratching their heads and saying, "I want to be fair to my employees. But I've got to show a profit. What shall I do?"

They know that, starting back in 1916, paymasters began to buy bigger satchels in which to bring the payroll back from the bank. They know that office salaries in particular began to take wings early in 1917. Ever since it has been a case of mount, mount, mount!

What's the answer?

Longheaded men agree that it is—"Eliminate time-waste." But how? If machines can do the work that clerks are now doing you will save money—won't you? Machines don't get on the salary list! But the right kind of machines does add to the profit total.

But what machines?

Both big business and small business are daily discovering this: The Remington Salesman can point the way to welcome cuts in the cost of clerical office work.

Of course the Remington Salesman cannot come in and put your office on a pre-war basis. Nobody can! But he can recommend machines and measures which will effect real economies of business time and money!

Perhaps you say—"Be definite. Tell me how Remington service can save time and money in my office. What Remingtons? How do they work? Where do I use them?" We reply, "A Remington Salesman will gladly hold a time-saving consultation with you—at your office and at your convenience."

But wait! We'll give you here a few quick hints about Remington time-savings. It would be surprising if they did not make you want to hear from the Remington Salesman himself about the following Remingtons and other Remingtons especially fitted to your business needs.

3 Machines which prove Remington Cost-saving

Remington Accounting Machine

(WAHL MECHANISM)

This is the machine which covers all the bookkeeping tasks of your office. Or, yes, any office. The auditor of the White Sewing Machine Company would give you a strong recommendation of it. Read what he writes! "One girl now does the work previously requiring two clerks working the greater part of the time." One girl's salary versus two clerks' salary! Sharpen your pencil! Figure the saving.

Another! The Buffalo General Electric Company tells us, "We would need at least one more clerk were it not for the Remington Typewriter with the Wahl Mechanism, and this of course means a monetary saving of over $1000 a year." Don't you want to see a machine that pays for itself twice over in far less than a year? The Remington Salesman is waiting to tell you! He'll give you all the details. He can point to an impressive list of big users—houses that never buy until they're shown. Houses that want error-proof bookkeeping and ready-made trial balances. Here's another money-saver.

The Remington Adding and Subtracting Typewriter

(WAHL MECHANISM)

Here's a versatile business helper for you! Saves time all day. Looks simple and is simple. Simplifies complicated tasks. Tabulates any kind of business form. "Quick changes" from one form to another. Adds! Does it fast and can be fitted to total as many columns as you wish. Proves the totals, too. Further, it subtracts! But that's not all. This Remington writes plain letters. And it does all of these things singly. Or all together. Obeys your orders. Doesn't the full story of such a time-saver deserve a few minutes of your time? Phone the Remington Salesman!

The Self-Starting Remington

In carefully conducted tests this machine has shown an actual time-saving of 48 seconds for each average letter. Yes. We admit it may be less on some letters, but 48 seconds is the average. 48 seconds! 48 seconds! 48 seconds! 48 seconds! 48 seconds! 48 seconds! How many letters do you send out in a day? In a month? In a year? Time is money. Time saved is money saved. Would you lock the door against a money-saver which does more work for you and yet makes your typist feel: "This machine does everything I want it to do and doesn't give me that 5 o'clock tired-out feeling"? Then leave word—"Show the Remington Salesman in!"

AS you read this message your profits are being nibbled, nibbled, nibbled. "Time lost" is doing it. "Time leaks" are dripping golden dollars. Dripping! Dripping! Of course you want to stop it. In 177 American cities the Remington Salesman is ready and waiting to help you. A phone call brings him to your desk. It costs nothing. It may save much.

REMINGTON TYPEWRITER COMPANY - INCORPORATED

374 Broadway, New York (Branches Everywhere)

TYPEWRITERS

(Concluded from Page 121)

But disgusted, shamed, Dunbar said nothing. It was Mr. Larkin again who took up the cudgels.

"Insult you? You couldn't!" said Mr. Larkin. That was not all he said, however, though it is not necessary to repeat it. When he had finished it he turned to Mrs. Larkin.

"Get your duds, ma! You and me ain't going to sit down to any meal with any robber like him! Pleased to have met you, Mrs. Dunbar. Pleased to have met you, Mr. Dunbar. Come along, ma!" directed Mr. Larkin.

Nelly gazed at the two, abashed. The Larkins she made no effort to detain. The ruse she had played to get Larkin and Fawcett together so that Dunbar could learn just what sort of man he was dealing with had succeeded beyond her wildest anticipations, but when she glanced at Dunbar her heart fell. He had seated himself, and his face more shocked, more shamed, he was staring dumbly at the carpet. The Larkins, Mr. Larkin's salient chin stuck out more belligerently than ever, stamped out of the room; and when the door slammed behind them Nelly turned to the Fawcetts.

"You'd better go too," she suggested quietly.

"You're right; we're going!" said Mr. Fawcett aggressively.

Mrs. Fawcett, her self-confidence reviving now that the Larkins had departed, chimed in also. Her chin over her shoulder at Nelly and her skirts looking shorter than ever she seemed as if she was about to put out her tongue too like an impudent schoolgirl.

But she didn't. At that instant Hannah appeared at the door and announced "Dinner is served, madam!" and Mrs. Fawcett gave a sniff.

"I guess if she cooks the way she keeps house," said Mrs. Fawcett, "we don't want to eat any meal of hers!"

"Yeah; let's go, Ida," said Mr. Fawcett; and they went.

Nelly, as the door slammed on them too, gave one look at Dunbar, then she went out into the dining room. "Take the dinner away, Hannah," she directed briefly; and ignoring the maid's gaping wonder she returned to the parlor, where Dunbar still stared at the carpet.

"If it's the money, Walter," she said quietly, "I wouldn't worry over it if I were you!"

Dunbar looked up at her, his face haggard.

"I've lost eleven thousand dollars," he replied doggedly.

Nelly wet her lips as if to tell him something; then as if at a sudden thought she checked the impulse.

"I don't want to hurt you," she said slowly, "but there's something I'd like to say. You've told me a good many times lately what the trouble with women is, so I'll take the same liberty and tell you what's the trouble with men. One of the troubles is that as they never have to do housekeeping they never realize that it is a drudgery, a bore. All they think about is whether the house suits them or not; and that again is another trouble. They see their homes and what is going on in them, but women don't see their husbands' offices and what is happening there. That being so it is perfectly possible for a man to criticize his wife without his wife being able to criticize him. How is she to know he does any better at his business than she does in her house? And that's what you've been doing, Walter! You criticized me cruelly because my house was not what you thought it should be. It wasn't, either, because I'd worried myself ill over your business; and that's why I got back at you, Walter—put up that game of running things the way they're run by that woman you admired! That doll! That vulgar, pretentious, overdressed hoyden! Well, Walter," said Nelly, for the moment letting her indignation run away with

"you've had enough of that woma think! You've had enough too of the she runs that house of hers!"

"Yes," Dunbar said heavily, "I've enough!" And at that Nelly's w seemed suddenly to subside. The harc all at once died out of her eyes, her mouth, her lips; and Nelly uttered a gasp.

The next instant she had flung arms about him, and drawing his hea her she was patting his shoulder, his his cheek.

"Oh, my poor, poor, silly boy!"
Nelly. "You haven't lost that el thousand dollars, the silly money y worrying about!"

Dunbar looked at her agape. Her were shining, filled with tears.

"No, Walter! That's what I m when I said you wouldn't make a cen matter if you bought or sold! When bought I went to another broker's sold. I coppered you—that's what call it, isn't it? While you were losing eleven thousand of yours I was ma eleven thousand. We're just where started from!"

But in her heart she knew better.
and Dunbar were much farther along they had ever been before.

MOONSHINE

(Continued from Page 13)

chair and pretended to be interested in a stale copy of the New York Times.

Toward noon, when the upstairs riot had subsided into the silence of sleep, Maggie came out upon the porch and after inspecting him with that grim regard which concealed a wealth of kindness inquired, "How high's yer temperchoor now, Mr. Pipling?"

"Pretty bad, Maggie." He smothered a groan.

"I got some loose quinine," she suggested.

"I can't take quinine. It gives me a rash and drives me wild. But I was talking to Doctor Dilk over at the station. He said that if people would only take whisky—regular doses for a day or so—they could check influenza in the early stages."

"He said that, did he?" inquired Maggie. "Well, there's no law to keep him from writin' a perscription."

"To tell you the truth, Maggie"—Pipling saw it was now or never—"I told him we had a bottle of Bourbon in the house and he needn't mind. He said it would take about a quart to set me up ——"

"There's a docthor behind every gravestone," announced Maggie, shutting her small jaw down tight.

"Be that as it may," Pipling conceded, "a doctor's advice is all we have to go by in cases of sickness—unless we resort to Christian Science."

"Bad luck to ut!" sniffed Maggie.

"And I seem to be getting worse all the time."

This last avowal seemed to make the desired impression. Maggie moved irresolutely toward the door, never relieving him of her melancholy Celtic gaze.

"After all," he added, "that bottle of Bourbon's mine, you know."

This was perhaps an unfortunate remark, for it caused her to stiffen perceptibly.

"Mrs. Pipling told me it was to be used for nawthin' but seeryus sickness."

"This is just as serious as I know how to make it," he assured her quite truthfully.

Whereupon she glided into the cottage, closing the screen door carefully to avoid waking the babies. Pipling squeezed himself with a grin of sly triumph. Once the Bourbon was produced he had no intention of letting go of it until it was divided among his cronies on the hotel veranda. Maggie might complain, but after all she had been given free rein too long. It was high time that she was taught her place, the proper relation between employer and employee.

He could hear her rummaging among the upstairs rooms. Finally he was aware of a key clicking against a lock, rusty hinges turning. The little trunk in the hall! Just as he had suspected.

Presently her little feet came pattering down the stairs. Pipling shifted his watchful air to one of enduring invalidism; when she opened the screen door he had folded his hands and closed his eyes. She stood over him so long that at last he raised his lids a crack's width in order to see whether she had brought the full bottle or merely a dose. Then his eyes came wide open with the significance of what he beheld in Maggie's dutiful right hand.

A clinical thermometer!

"Put this between yer teeth, Mr. Pipling," she commanded in a not unkindly tone as she took out the glassy tube and presented it point first. "An' now we'll see what's ailin' ye."

It was too late now to shift the pivot of attack. Solemnly, obediently he opened his mouth and permitted the cold point to be thrust under his astonished tongue. He sat glaring, gagged, indignant while Maggie, a white-clad figure of accusing conscience, stood inflexibly over him. Earnestly he prayed that the wrath now boiling in his veins would increase his temperature even so much as a degree.

Finally she drew the telltale tube from his lips, scrutinized it with her keen eyes and permitted herself the ghost of a smile.

"Ninety-eight," she announced, and proceeded to wipe the tube on a fragment of gauze she carried.

"It's probably out of order," he snarled. "Those things are always getting damaged and making false records."

"I have another wan upstairs," declared Maggie smoothly. "If ye'll wait but a minnut ——"

Poor Pipling had bounded to his feet and was charging along the footpath toward the hotel.

As he approached the veranda he spied his three friends still locked in manly debate, their heads closer together, if possible, than before. The Reverend Mr. Beagle had withdrawn to a remote angle of the building and sat hunched over a writing pad, his delicate spiritual face intensely preoccupied. Obviously he was composing a sermon.

Somewhat hesitantly Mr. Pipling approached the intellectual threesome; being a sensitive man he had a natural delicacy about intruding himself into a discussion so apparently self-contained. However, he had learned to value his friends' opinions upon world politics, though he often disagreed with them; and to-day he had a feeling that an intellectual combat would enable him to forget his minor irritations. He saw the diplomat's hands come together and spread apart in a wide comprehensive gesture, and he hoped that Percival was again abusing the League of Nations, because Pipling had just invented a scathing defense of Article Ten. He edged closer, still unheeded, and was about to draw up a chair when a scrap of the diplomat's stirring speech came distinctly to his ears:

". . . You just take a batch of parsnips and do what I say with 'em. That ferments 'em, you see."

"How do you know when they're fermented?" asked Mr. Tweed in an awed tone.

"One has a nose," was the surgeon's opinion.

"What are you talking about?" asked Pipling.

"I found an old book in the hotel library. It was published before the Civil War."

The real-estate man's voice had sunk to a whisper as he looked suspiciously round, then drew a small volume from his pocket. It was entitled The Home Convivial and gave more than a hundred simple recipes for the manufacture of delicious intoxicants in your own kitchen. Pipling opened the book at random and glanced at inconsecutive fragments:

". . . Homemade Wine. Six pounds Catawba grapes . . . after about five months . . ."

". . . Russian Koumiss. Obtain three gallons mare's milk . . ."

"Old Peach Wine. . . . After two quarts of ripe brandy have been added to the peaches . . ."

"It looks simple," agreed Pipling, closing the book with a snap. "All we need is a herd of mares, two quarts of brandy and a five months' vacation. It sounds like a recipe for civilizing Russia."

"That book's no good," declared Percival Lamimoor. "But I've been telling about a brew my Aunt Clara makes every year in Baltimore. Parsnip wine."

"He's told us practically all about it," explained the surgeon in a sarcastic tone, which caused Tweed to turn upon him:

"Look here, doc! If you were any good you could write us a prescription for a quart of rye and stop all this nonsense."

"Nay, nay, my boy!" chuckled Biskoff dryly.

"You're a physician, aren't you?"

"In my own state, yes. In West Virginia, no."

"Has this parsnip wine got any—you know—kick?" asked Pipling.

"Kick? My child!" snorted Percy. "About forty per cent alcohol."

"A scientific discovery!" sneered Biskoff.

"Perhaps Aunt Clara added a little brandy or something," admitted Percy with a slightly crestfallen air. "All we need's a mess of parsnips."

"That sounds easy enough," Pipling reminded the caucus.

A tall white-coated mulatto man came shuffling along the porch making a great to-do of a basket tray containing several milk bottles. This was Shakspere, the handy man of Spouting Springs. His handsome head with its high-bridged nose, yellowish eyes and tightly fitting wool presented the appearance of an intelligent and extremely benevolent ram.

"Hi, Shake!" called Tweed.

"Yassa."

The general factotum shuffled nearer and stood at attention.

"Do you reckon there are parsnips in the garden over yonder?"

"Nossa, Mist' Tweed. Didn't grow no pahsnips this summa."

"All right, Shake," admitted Tweed in a tone of dismissal.

Shakspere shuffled a few shuffles, then said earnestly: "Ah reckon the Guvmunt don' 'low no mo' pahsnips nowheres, T Tweed."

When Shakspere had gone about his errand of distributing milk to the young of the colony the author broke silence:

"There's a perfectly whopping veget store down in the village."

"Do you think they keep parsni asked Tweed hopefully.

"I don't know. I saw at least a to beets ——"

The surgeon emitted a series of cackles.

"What are you wheezing about?"
manded Pipling in an unfriendly tone.

"Beets!"

Apparently Doctor Biskoff was relis some joke which could only be expresse a chemical formula.

After the heavy midday Southern di Tweed stopped Pipling in his pro toward the cottages and whispered ir ear, "Want to join us?"

"Where?"

"I've ordered a jitney and we're all g down to the village to get the—know ——"

"Parsnips?"

"Yeah. And other materials."

The author was led to the porch, w
Doctor Biskoff and Percival Lamir were lingering in the shadow of a post

"Of course we'll have to be pretty ful about this sort of thing," Percy is the warning. "There's a lot of spying g on, I hear."

"Better keep it under our hats," chi in Pipling, a little proud of his prescie
The jitney which Tweed had so thou fully engaged came whiffling between gate posts. Its appearance, outwa weak and harmless, startled Pipling to point where he all but fled and abande his comrades to their several fates.
glaring amiably through the dusty shield he beheld the face of Mr. Hig B thinly disguised revenue agent.

"Look here, Tweed," whispered Pipl struggling to be calm, "we can't go that man."

"Why not?" Tweed's broad pugnac face reflected alarm.

"Hig Botts—he's in the governn service—he was one of the agents broke up the still at Pine Pole."

"Gosh!" said Tweed; then a cur light came into his keen gray eyes.
bet he knows all about it."

"About what?" Pipling asked vai for the real-estate man was already hust his criminal gang into the tonneau.

They roared away and Pipling sat in depressed silence. He didn't like look of it. He thought of his wife and dren. What would Angy say when came back and found that her author, author upon whom she based all her sta ards of conduct, had moved his typewr to the somewhat primitive local jail? i blood congealed frightfully when he

(Continued on Page 127)

(Continued from Page 124)

ature of Tweed, an engaging smile on his lij, leaning far over and addressing the potential vengeance on the front seat.

Are you the Mr. Botts who arrested all tlse moonshiners at Pine Pole?"

Yes, seh," acknowledged the driver, ony too willing to take all the credit unto himself.

A physical shock seemed to jostle the gaty passengers. Possibly it was a bump in the road.

You got a good deal of whisky, didn't yu?" pursued the audacious one.

Yes, seh. Right smaht of it."

'Pretty good stuff?"

'It would o' been bettah if they'd a biled it mo'."

Mr. Botts was now driving by the touch system, his body twisted round, his eyes on his audience, only his good right hand doing its duty by the tortuous road.

'I reckon you know all there is to be known about making that moonshiner stiff," suggested Mr. Tweed.

'I reckon there's nobody kin learn me much 'bout that," agreed the conversational acrobat.

'Takes a good deal of skill, doesn't it?"

'Shucks! A baby could make cawn wisky if he only knowed the trick."

Mr. Botts diverted his attention momentarily in order to scrape past a frightened nigro on a mule.

'Gentlemen," he resumed, a certain light of enthusiasm having illumed his glassy eyes, "they ain't nawthing to it."

'They use corn some way, don't they?" asked the diplomat in a hollow tone.

'Yes, seh. Cawn don't do no harm. All yuneed's a still to boil it in."

'Is a still hard to make, Mr. Botts?" inquired the man from Norfolk.

'Shucks, Misteh Tweed! I reckon most everybody knows how to make a still. Then you jest boil it."

'Boil what?" Pipling shot the question nervously.

'The sour mash, Misteh Pipling."

Like the mare's milk and the two quarts cripe brandy it sounded easy, but was it?

'Of course there might be a certain ethyl vapor precipitation," said Doctor Biskoff thoughtfully.

'What's that?" asked Mr. Botts.

'He's talking to himself," answered Tweed. "I'm sorry to hear that whisky's so easy to make. It might cause a great deal of trouble."

"Anybody kin do it—if they want to take the resk," said the driver in his smooth curiously high-pitched voice. "In fact lots of 'em do."

"Of course there is risk." Pipling said this quaveringly.

"Ya-as. It's goin' to keep us agents powerful busy, I reckon. But what you goin' to do 'bout it?"

Nobody in the car could suggest any practical remedy.

"Just how do these scoundrels go at it?" persisted Tweed.

"Jest 'bout the same way they make it in the mountains, Misteh Tweed. Rig up a still; nawthin' to it."

Pipling swallowed hard before he spoke. "Nothing more?"

"Git yo' sour mash an' boil it, Misteh Pipling," drawled the gentle Botts.

"And then you get your whisky?"

"An' then yo' git yo' whisky."

Mr. Botts' tone had become a trifle sinister. He turned sadly toward his wheel, for they were now approaching a jumble of vehicles outside the village.

Four potential jailbirds sat and gazed at each other with a wild surmise. If there is anything in telepathy it was here manifest; for the thought went round, plainly proclaiming that Mr. Tweed was going to take whisky on the strength of Botts' very sketchy information.

As they were nearing the village Botts twisted again and inquired, "Where to, gentlemen?"

"The hardware store," commanded Tweed decisively.

A blond clerk who attended them at the hardware store looked mildly interested when the amateur moonshiners asked for copper kettles.

"We haven't any to-day, Mr. Tweed," said the man across the counter. "We have a nice line of agateware."

"What's happened to all the copper ones?" inquired Tweed. "You used to have a lot of them."

"Sold out," said the clerk. "There's been quite a run on them lately. Everybody seems to be making tea nowadays."

He delivered the last opinion in the polite inflectionless tone of the perfect clerk.

They decided on agateware and insisted that the goods should be carefully wrapped—to avoid rust, as the diplomat cunningly explained it. While the paper and string were being applied Pipling and his gang stood apart discussing in whispers.

"We mustn't do anything raw," Percy cautioned them.

"We ought to give the corn time to ferment anyhow," Tweed decided, having gleaned that much from Mr. Botts' learned lecture.

The surgeon stood apart, doing nothing to help. He was driftwood and Pipling was already sorry that he had been admitted into the secret circle.

Outside they found Mr. Botts doubled up behind the wheel, a seven-cent cigar at a worldly angle between his thin lips. At the sight of his passengers he rubbed the burning brand against his wind shield, dropped the stump in his pocket and asked sweetishly, "Where to now, gentlemen?"

"The grocery," commanded Tweed; and in a loud strained tone, "I mustn't forget those oranges for Helen."

No sooner said than done. Tactfully the others permitted Tweed to enter the grocery alone. They plunged into an animated discussion of the railroad situation, with never a thought apparently for the felonious errand which seemed to keep their friend far too long.

At last he reappeared, struggling with a heavy package which he carried under his arm.

"I'll take that in front, Mr. Tweed," suggested Mr. Botts, helpfully leaning forth.

"No, thank you," said Tweed. His clutch upon the package had become hysterical.

"You're right crowded back there," suggested the driver, still holding out his long arms.

Tweed snatched the parcel hastily to his breast, and as he did so the base of the heavy bag jammed so smartly against the open door as to rip a hole, an insignificant but guilty hole, through the thick coating of paper. A tiny river of some yellowish sandy substance rilled smoothly down upon the running board.

"Anythin' else?" asked Mr. Botts obligingly as soon as Mr. Tweed had stopped the leak and got himself into the car.

"No. We'll go back now."

"I reckon you forgot them oranges, Mr. Tweed."

"Damn it! So I did."

There befell then another interminable wait during which poor Tweed made his hypocritical purchase, dumped it testily into the car and sank back among the dusty cushions.

II

"TYLKA CONNINGMERE had become ineffably precious to Leighton Sedgewick; the sweetness of her pulsed through his brain like rare wine, quickening his whole being, filling his heart with languorous memories of that swift rosy promise under the ancient ilex grove."

So typewrote Robert Burns Pipling, apparently unaffected by the poor ventilation of his somewhat stuffy workroom. It was nearing noon of the third day after the conspiratorial trip in Mr. Botts' jitney and our author was in the thrall of what he felt more than usually certain was to be his masterpiece. But at this instant he looked up, his eyes filled with dreams; his subconscious mind warned him of a presence, but his conscious mind was on his job. Therefore he resumed his romantic clicking:

"It was not her physical beauty alone which Leighton adored. She was to him an intangible influence, something as delicate as the breath of early May blowing over a moonlit field of jasmine. The girlish sweetness of her, the subtle perfume of her hair—lingered wonderfully in his memory."

Pipling came impatiently to his feet, snatched rudely away from Tylka's aromatic hair. What the devil was it, anyhow, which tainted his room with that vile sour odor? Then he remembered, and smiled a smile of gentle forgiveness. The sour mash, of course!

He walked over to a table by a sunny window and peered into the depths of a large white slop jar wherein for three days the mixture of corn meal and other ingredients had oozed, swelled, bubbled, soured and worked itself into that disgusting state of mind so much admired by our leading pathologists under the name of fermentation. Now fermentation is a hard thing for the layman to admire. It suggests the unhappy dough which rises Bolshevikly in the pan and sours before the baking; more unpleasantly, it suggests neglected garbage.

Yet such is the force of idealism that Robert Burns Pipling was able to lower his nose almost to a level with the mess and sniff appreciatively. The corn meal as if disgusted with the unholy war below had risen to the top and lay in a hard cake with a crack across its surface. Neglecting the impassioned scene in his impending novel Mr. Pipling again lowered his nose and sniffed. Sour it was indeed! He didn't mind the smell, he fooled himself into believing; no Bulgarian distiller of attar of roses could have worn a more triumphant expression upon the eve of success.

The stuff was ready for the still! Pipling was sure of it though he wished that Doctor Biskoff hadn't gone to White Sulphur to attend a medical conference. Biskoff's nose was perhaps more attuned to fermentation than was Pipling's idealistic member.

The experiment thus far had gone smoothly, but not too smoothly. In the first place there had been Maggie. Pipling knew too well her prejudice against alcohol in even the mildest form, and he had been aware of the inquisitiveness with which she had followed his actions. His door was, of course, the only one in the cottage that wouldn't lock. Once he had found a towel neatly laid over the top of the slop jar; and though he dared not question her he knew that Maggie was to be thanked for this unscientific act of housewifery.

She had been silent and grim and had only once become expansive. If only the gintlemen would be afther employin' their foine minds with somethin' besides roisterin' an' boozin' there would be no sin and sorrow annywhere. Quite true. She had only tasted wine or liquor once in her otherwise blameless life. That had been thirty years ago and it had given her a headache. What could Pipling do but sympathize with Maggie's point of view, guard his secret, and keep his sour mash exposed to fermentation as many hours as possible out of the twenty-four?

Then there had been little Willie. On the second day of fermentation he had come leaping out of his father's workroom, a bright vision of childhood under a cornmeal poultice.

"Willie make pancake!" he had shrilled through his disguise, and stood rubbing the mash into his hair, poking quantities of it down his Fauntleroy collar.

Maggie, who had just then finished dressing him for a children's party, had been displeased with his appearance, and this had so astonished Willie as to bring on a fit of weeping, causing rivers of tears to plow their way through the corn-meal dressing, which he wore like a hideous mask.

Oh, well, one must suffer to gain merit! And on this noon of the third day Pipling smiled ecstatically as he stood whiffing the delicious frightfulness.

Footsteps on the veranda! Pipling started guiltily and was about to pull down the shade when he beheld the solid figure of the real-estate man coming toward the outer door. Tweed's figure, always generous, looked bulkier than usual. He held his coat kimono-fashion across his swelling front and under that same garment in the rear dangled six inches of a tail-like something which gave him the appearance of one warming a serpent in his bosom and trying hard to conceal his generosity.

Tweed whistled thrice. Pipling leaped to the door and pulled his partner into the obscurity of his workroom.

"Well, I got it!" grinned the real-estate man, opening his coat and revealing something which looked like a tangle of telephone wire.

"What are you going to do with that?" was the author's very natural question.

"It's copper pipe," explained Tweed.

Pipling examined one end of the tangle. Sure enough, there was a cunning hole drilled through the length of it.

"Rather small isn't it?"

"What do you expect?" grumbled Tweed. "I almost got myself arrested as it was. I went to the hardware store and the plumber's. You ought to have seen the way they looked at me. Everybody in the place gathered round and asked what I wanted to do with copper pipe. I told them I was trying to mend a patent washing machine. What a snicker! At last I thought of the village garage. I found what I wanted the first crack out of the box. A mechanic was taking a leaky feed pipe out of a car and I bought it for a dollar."

"Rather steep, wasn't it?"

"Not when you consider what everything costs nowadays."

"Good. Hadn't we better rig the still right away?"

Pipling was impatient.

"How's the mash?" asked Tweed, smelling the mysterious combination in the jar. "Pretty good, what? I tell you what let's do. I've got a full program on to-day. I don't believe we can boil that mush—maybe it ought to be strained or something. Why don't you fix it up so that we can begin serious operations to-morrow morning?"

This seemed fair enough to Pipling. Therefore toward midafternoon, when he had taken his heroine through her first soul agonies, he locked up his portable typewriter, stole a yard of gauze out of the nursery and set to work methodically straining out the prodigious results of fermention. He used a two-gallon pitcher to catch the milky juice which dripped grudgingly through the texture of the little bag as he squeezed and squeezed it to the bursting point. And when the bag was squeezed until it would drip no more he shook hard yellowish dough balls upon a yard of Sunday supplement which he had spread for that purpose.

The hours sped painfully, because the author's hands, unmuscled to such a milking process, grew sore and stiff. His back ached. The pile of dough balls grew and grew, the sour corn milk in the pitcher curdled higher and higher. Hypnotized by the monotonous labor Pipling thought of many things. He composed a sonnet to a blonde whom he had once loved and seen married comfortably to a cotton broker; he designed a scathing article, intent to scathe Maximalism both at home and in Russia; he thought of a ghost story with an original ghost walking through it.

At last the straining was over, the strain having settled in the small of Pipling's back. He felt a slight touch of mal de mer.

What to do with that pile of dough balls, now that he had acquired them? Save them and bury them in the dark of night? Spies, he knew, might be watching his every movement. Burn them? The latter plan looked more practicable.

He found a can of kerosene in a little closet near the back door. Piling the dough balls pyramidally in the fireplace he covered them with wood, excelsior and paper wads before anointing them liberally from the can. He lit a match. The pyre burned splendidly, engendering an infernal heat. Pipling opened first his door, then his collar. The blaze died down and several dough balls rolled out, slightly scorched, on the floor.

"Tut, tut, tut!"

The animate clucking sound caused the author to look up nervously. Maggie Dempsey, gaunt, prim and wiry, stood at the door.

"I thought the house was gone this time, Mr. Pipling," she explained, her melancholy eyes glued on the waning conflagration. "The house is full of ut, an' the baby's fair chokin' blue."

"I have just burned some old manuscripts," he informed her briskly, meanwhile contemplating an ejection by force.

"I see."

Maggie picked up a dough ball which had rolled halfway across the matting. It was hot apparently, for she dropped it like a soggy bomb, and it exploded noiselessly, scattering corn meal.

Pipling made a poor pretense of mending the fire with fragments of charred wood, but Maggie still lingered. He dared not look her in the eye. When at last he ventured a sidelong glance he found her leaning over the slop jar, genuine concern written all over her kind peppery face.

"Mr. Pipling," she said severely, "ye gintlemen ain't goin' to dhrink thim suds, ar-r-re ye?"

"Oh, no. No." He grinned insanely. "It's just a little foolish experiment, Maggie."

"It's foolish all right," she conceded. "What d'ye put in ut to make ut smell like that?"

"Corn meal," confessed Pipling, now realizing that there was no keeping anything from Maggie.

"In Ireland they make ut out o' potaties," she volunteered. "Ut don't look like that, and ut don't smell like that.

(Continued on Page 130)

Most Miles per Dollar

Actual size illustration of a 5-inch Firestone Cord Tire with the new Non-Skid Tread, built to the largest standard of this size established by the industry.

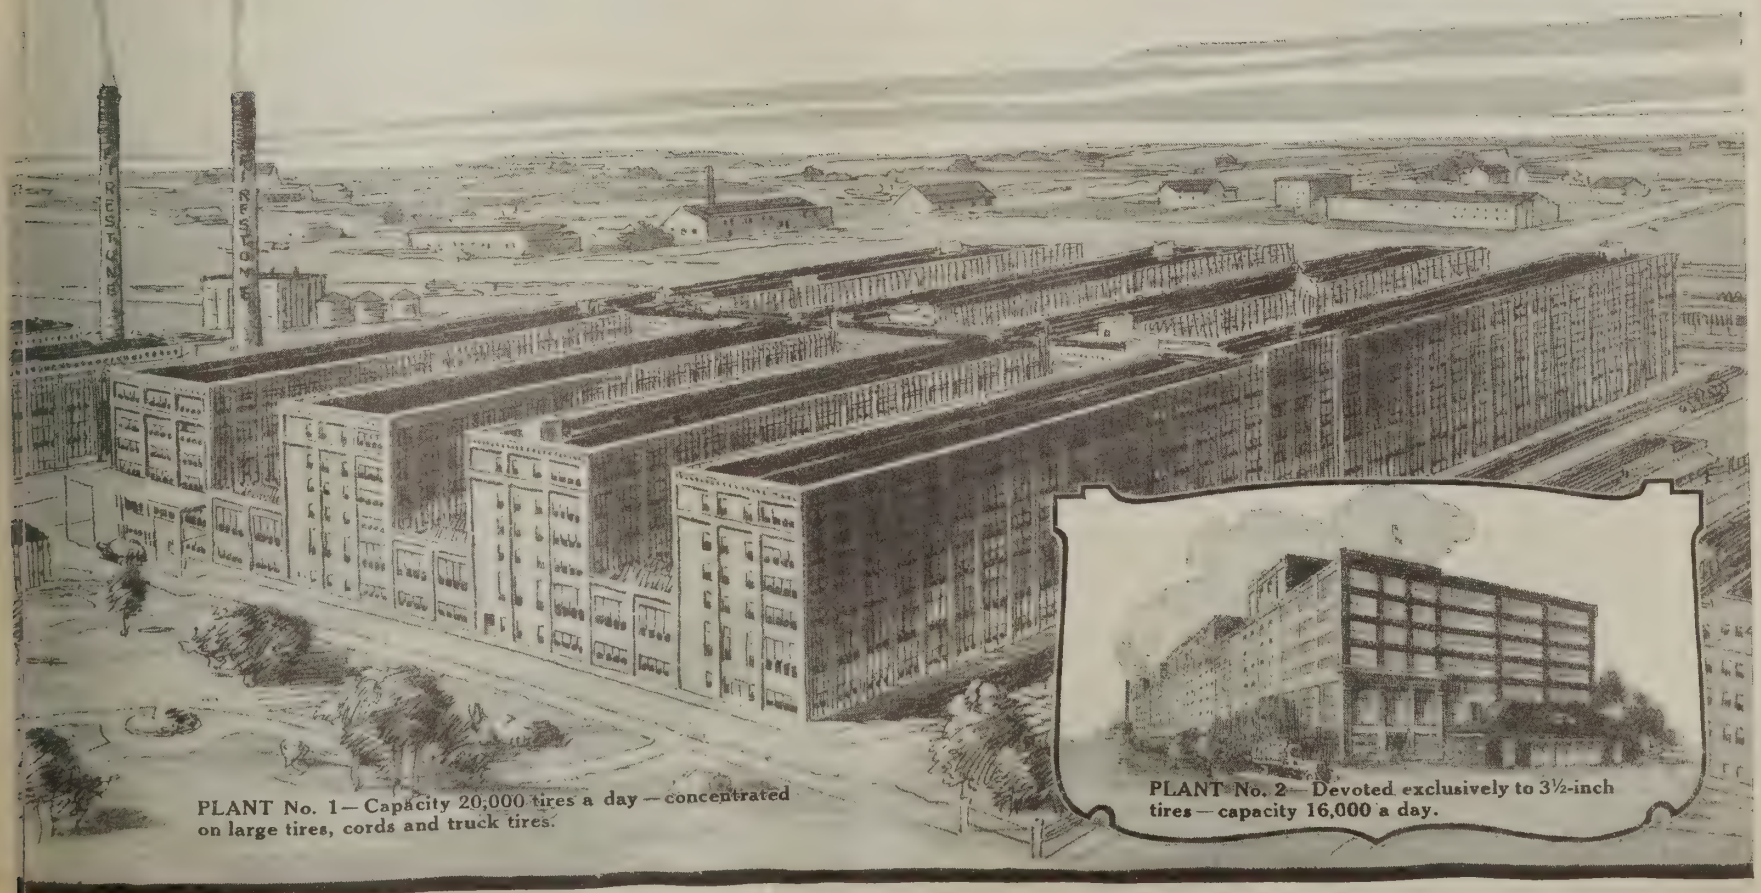
THIS Firestone Cord Tire—first of the new standard oversize adopted by the industry—has much greater air capacity than the average, contains much more material and delivers extra mileage in proportion.

The thicker, heavier non-skid tread gives sure traction, firm road hold against skid or slide, yet is smooth running and fast.

The main Firestone plant is now enabled to concentrate on the production of this Cord Tire. For Firestone has built a separate $7,000,000 factory, Plant No. 2, equipped with special machinery, for the production of 3½-inch tires—allowing Plant No. 1 to devote its entire effort to the manufacture of larger sizes.

42,000 dealers, served by Firestone Branches in sixty-three principal cities, are ready to equip your car with Firestones of your size and type.

Firestone



PLANT No. 1—Capacity 20,000 tires a day—concentrated on large tires, cords and truck tires.

PLANT No. 2—Devoted exclusively to 3½-inch tires—capacity 16,000 a day.

(Continued from Page 127)

There's no good to ut, however it's made. But there's no har-rum in doin' annythin' right."

Whereupon she picked up the pitcher of mash and walked briskly away with it. Pipling was of a mind to call after her, to command her to mind her own affairs, to keep her place. But would she keep her place? There was the rub! Maggie was but an item in the prevailing servant problem, treasure though she might be. Suppose he should tempt her to resign and leave him stranded in Virginia with two squalling children on his hands?

But Maggie Dempsey was no quitter. Presently she came back, carrying another pitcher, blue this time. And when she set it down he beheld his darling mash swimming in the cleanly depths.

"Ye'll gain nawthin' be usin' dirthy utinsils," she informed him. "Mrs. Pipling gave me stric' instructions to watch yer health. And I want no sick gintlemen on me hands—they're twicet the trouble of babies, an' more obstinate. Would ye be wantin' some clean bottles, Mr. Pipling?"

"I should be ever so much obliged," cried the author, breathless at this sudden turn of events. "And do you think you could find me something to cook this stuff on?"

"I have a coil oil burner for the baby's milk," she admitted, but retreated as though fearful of relenting too far.

Femina semper mutabilis! according to the Latin poet, and Donna e mobile as the Italian tenor so sweetly sings it.

"Isn't that just like a woman?" was Pipling's sketchy translation as he stood brushing away the cold sweat of anxiety.

Experiment One was conducted in secrecy and a bathtub shortly before midnight of the same day. The chemist, who had returned from a conventional dinner party, arrayed himself in a qualified laboratory costume consisting of a dress shirt, knickerbockers and morocco slippers, then he proceeded to assemble his ill-gotten materials. To complicate matters one of his teakettles had disappeared—he had a suspicion that Maggie had chosen it for a cereal boiler in her nursery cuisine upstairs. Finally he discovered in a closet under the stairs a thick square bottle which, its label glaringly announced, had once contained Old Tom gin. He felt sure that this would do just as well as a teakettle. Therefore he spent two crowded hours rigging up a distilling machine according to his memory of what Messrs. Botts and Tweed had told him. He wasn't at all sure that he had got it right, though the homemade apparatus looked sufficiently ingenious when he poured a quart of sour mash into the kettle and lit the oil stove.

He drew up a chair beside the bathtub and awaited results, inspired by the hope that a beautiful clear elixir would presently begin flowing into the thick square bottle.

Finally he shut the bathroom door, because an acrid fog was beginning to rise from the loose lid of the boiling kettle. There was no sense in announcing his nefarious trade, he thought, even to the dead of night.

After an eternity of waiting Pipling tiptoed forth to his workroom and from his small summer library chose a heavy volume which dealt with the self-determination of two or three states he had never before heard mention of, even in the covenant. He found his reading glasses and tiptoed back to the bathroom. The oil stove was beginning to smoke. He turned it down and took a narrow look at the gin bottle, which remained as dry inside as its label announced.

Patience! He seated himself comfortably and opened his book at a promising chapter, a solid thing touching upon Rumania and her right to expand toward the Ægean without hurting anybody's feelings. The kettle began puffing frightfully, the lid rising with every puff. Volumes of tainted steam fogged the room and mingled with noxious gases from the smoky oil stove. Pipling rose dizzily and again turned down the wick. He wondered if there wasn't some way of holding down the kettle lid. He scalded his fingers and decided there wasn't.

Finally he laid a broom handle over the spluttering, steaming, bouncing lid, sighed deeply and resumed his reading. . . .

"Fire!"

Pipling shouted this out of a dream, for he had fallen asleep and imagined that he had died of a broken heart and that his spirit rising gently from its carnal shell had begun its floating voyage toward Spiritland, only to be caught in a terrific gas barrage directly over a garbage crematory. His waking sense apprised him of the true situation. The kettle had boiled down and its deposit of corn meal, subjected to long heat, had caught fire! With the aid of a handy washbowl he drenched the flames, and after calm had once more prevailed he disconnected the gin bottle and held it up to the light. Something evidently had happened during his spiritual absence, because a glance at his wrist watch assured him that it was now a quarter after two.

The bottle was not empty—not entirely. By tilting it close to the electric bulb he could see, glistening in one corner, a tablespoonful of crystal-clear liquid. Success! Nothing to brag about, perhaps; but were not Wilbur and Orville Wright prouder of their few yards of flight over Killdevil dunes than of their later sky-aspiring triumphs? Pipling had done nothing in the way of quantity production, but he had demonstrated a principle.

As he undressed sleepily he made up his mind to save the tiny sample and show it to his friends in the morning. But as soon as he had got himself into his pyjamas it occurred to him that Tweed might smile at the paucity of results. It would be better, thought Pipling, to drink the results of Experiment One. He had never tasted the famous moonshine whisky, and this small dose would teach him what to expect.

His last act before turning out the lights was to tilt the neck of the bottle against his teeth, permitting a tiny rill to trickle along his tongue. Delicious! More than delicious, indeed, for it was perfect beyond his wildest dreams—biting, aromatic, rich in alcohol.

"Great!" chuckled the experimenter as he clicked off the light, leaped into bed and pulled the covers to his chin. The taste lingered pleasantly, giving promise of pleasures to come. Why did people call moonshine whisky a crude and savage drink? This little sip had been wonderful. And he had found the secret. It was remarkable, too, how much like good gin it tasted.

A sudden midnight suspicion caused him to sit up in bed and grapple for the light chain. As soon as he could see he reached for the square bottle, which he had set on the table beside his bed. He smelled long and tenderly and emptied the few remaining drops upon his tongue.

"Rats!" he grunted, and again turned out the light. It was gin. Some wasteful idiot had left a spoonful of good liquor in the bottle ere casting it aside.

III

WE WILL spin hastily through Experiments Two and Three in order to linger among the scientific grandeurs of Experiment Four.

Experiment Two was a dry one and entirely concerned with mechanics. Tweed came smiling in next morning with several metallic objects which he had stolen from a garage. They had everything necessary for a perfect still, but they were baffled by the simple fact that everything refused to fit into or be joined to anything else. Pipling's workroom took on the appearance of a badly managed machine shop; the lusty clangor of hammer upon brass was mingled warlike with manly oaths. Tweed mashed his finger and kicked a kettle across the room. They would have been at it yet perhaps had not Pipling ended the experiment dramatically by an abrupt backward step which upset the pitcher of sour mash. A milky lake spread and spread across the matting.

"Mop it up!" shouted the real-estate man, himself having rescued the pitcher and a considerable quantity of the fluid.

Pipling glared round the room and saw many hooks laden with expensive summer apparel. On the bureau he spied a pair of woolen socks—clean ones—and with these novel sop rags he mopped the floor and wrung the escaping mash back into its pitcher.

"It's full of germs," he confessed sorrowfully, gazing into the jar.

"Who cares?" asked Tweed. "There's no germ that walks that can live in a still."

"We've got nearly a gallon left," sighed Pipling, not without regret.

That afternoon the diplomat came in with a handsome Sheffield teakettle suspended on an elaborate crane.

"I borrowed it from a cousin of mine over at Bubbling Springs," he explained. "I told her we were giving a tea party and she was crazy to be invited. Of course you'll have to clean it all up when you're through—and be careful not to dent it. It's a sort of museum piece, and Sarah's a crank about curios."

A creative light beamed in Tweed's eyes as he snatched the object of art, and sans explanation joined the silver aristocrat, spout to spout, with the graniteware bourgeois.

"Steam-tight and perfect!" he jubilated. "Pour a pint of that mash into the curio, will you? And light the lamp underneath. And fetch a pan o' water."

Three men held the kettles at practical angles, three men were scalded this time, and three men swore. That was the total of the afternoon's work.

"Hell!" snorted Tweed, squinting at the nauseating fluid which trickled stingily from the graniteware spout.

"That little dinky museum piece has been boiling over and we've got the same old mash—hot."

They went up to supper, Percival carrying his cousin's priceless teapot under his elbow.

"It looks like an antique, all right," Tweed tried to console him.

"She'll throw a fit," grumbled the embryo ambassador; and he studied a row of interesting dents in the beautifully designed spout.

It was Sunday morning right after breakfast when the amateur moonshiners held a full caucus; indeed it was an overflowing caucus, because the Reverend Mr. Beagle strolled down to the Pipling cottage and invited himself in, with the explanation that there was nothing in the New Testament touching upon the rules of wartime prohibition. Indeed, what the boys were doing might be interpreted as an act of necessity and mercy, therefore no Sabbath breaking, strictly speaking. It was plain to see that Mr. Beagle's curiosity had got the better of his scruples.

Doctor Biskoff, who had returned from White Sulphur, came in with a pair of murderous surgical shears and a spool of adhesive plaster.

"I can stop either blood or steam," he explained, "according to the operation indicated."

Pipling didn't like his tone, which was light and suggested little faith. A naturally silent man, Biskoff merely smelled the mash, squinting and smiling; and over the wild apparatus which Tweed had constructed he passed his owlish eyeglasses and smiled again.

"What's the matter with you?" asked the real-estate man impatiently.

"I am no diagnostician," grinned Biskoff. "What's that kettle doing floating in a cut-glass bowl of water?"

"I should think you would know—you're a scientist," said Tweed cuttingly.

"There are a few things beyond us," declared Biskoff, walking round and round the bureau, upon which Tweed had installed his marvelous still.

They had moved their operations from the bathroom to Pipling's studio, the tub being at that moment occupied by the Pipling baby. Percy the diplomat had brought in a small alcohol burner, and above its sprightly flame the boiler was beginning to sing.

"A little of this adhesive," explained the surgeon, tearing off a strip daintily and in his best operating-room manner, "will stop the escaping steam. There are about a hundred leaks, I should say."

"Somebody bale cold water over the condenser!" bawled Tweed. "Keep 'er cool and stop arguing."

"I can smell alcohol!" muttered Pipling hopefully.

"It's from the burner," replied Percy in a tone of lamentation.

Meanwhile the minister remained aloof. It was none of his doings, and this was no time for a sermon.

"Well, I must be going to church," he spoke finally into the tense silence. "And when I get back I hope you'll have done nothing you'll regret."

"We'll get a quart at least at this rate," mumbled Tweed; for he had just looked into the kettle which, weighted from within, was sinking deeper and deeper into the watery depths of the cut-glass punch bowl. Doctor Biskoff, looking every inch the scientist that he was, stood gumming adhesive plaster over the leaky lid of the boiling kettle.

Mr. Hig Botts drove the Reverend Mr. Beagle to church. This had been Mr. Botts' prerogative all summer, and to-day he was dressed in a severe black coat and a collar he had not worn since last Sunday. they bumped along Mr. Beagle thou indulgently of the four conspirators in steam-reeking cottage. Certainly they not doing any harm, thought he; but ought to be at church.

It was after the first bend in the that Mr. Botts permitted the jitne think for itself, as it were, and twi round to his conversational angle.

"How's the boilin' gettin' on, Beagle?" he asked in the courteous befitting one addressing a clergyman.

"Boiling?" Though a mountaineer Mr. Beagle did not at first recognize term.

"I understand the gentlemen are ma right smaht o' liquor up to the Springs

"Oh, yes."

Being an absent-minded man, pur life and in no wise suspicious, Mr. Be was quite ready with his information.

"They seem to be having some fun some spoiled corn and a lot of cheap h ware. There's certainly no harm in i far as I can see. It's the best cure for drinking habit that I've encountered y

"That mout be, Mr. Parson. That be," agreed Hig Botts thoughtfully a turned again to the wheel and sho no further curiosity during their tort trip to the little red church, where a gregation was already gathered awai the words of the visiting pastor.

Now Mr. Botts was not a churchly himself, and being inured to a life of ac the two-hour wait till the conclusio services irked him sore. He drew a tively new cigar from his Sunday coa and smoked with innumerable impa puffs.

Then wantonly he threw it away semidestroyed condition, cranked his and headed rapidly back over the roa Spouting Springs.

In the Pipling cottage things had gressed, as the author expressed it, a dream." The homely kettle in the glass bowl had grown heavier and hea while the amateur moonshiners worke they had never worked before, baling w ish water out of the basin, baling cold w in a constant fount over the lid of the terious teakettle, which the surgeon now dressed so conscientiously in sur tape that to lift the lid and look inside entirely out of the question. The high sion was felt by all save the surgeon, remained satirically calm, gumming gumming. As he gummed he compos pathological ditty to the tune of Our H is Haunted:

Fermentation,
Fermentation
Has ruined many and many a happy h
'Twas Fermentation
And Cultivation
That caused the fall of ancient Rome.

Tweed's good nature had returned the prospect of brilliant results.

"Colonel John B. Corn!" he cried moment of ecstasy. "No matter how you bury him, he'll rise again and give all the hoss laugh."

"He's the greatest leader of men world has ever known," declared the di mat, who had just rushed in with a f basin of cold water.

"Bless the old colonel!" jubilated ling, asweat with constant boiling. never fails to pull a party together."

"A little more adhesive over that joi grumbled the eminent surgeon, perform the operation skillfully.

"I think she's about simmered d now," declared Tweed, his ear to the boi kettle.

Indeed there was a spluttering ra from within, indicating danger.

"Wow!"

Pipling lifted this Mohawk syllable a raised the crude condenser an inch fron watery grave.

"Man born! The thing's chock-full.

"Per Bacco!" swore the diplomat, pr of his meager Italian. "What's the us Amendment Eighteen now?"

What indeed?

"Get a clean pitcher," comman Tweed, "and we'll pour out the stuff."

While the diplomat was turning down light the author was running for a suffic container and the surgeon's cunning fin were removing the surgical dressing. D ling brought in a two-quart pitcher of standard hotel variety and four heads v grouped in a tight cluster as Tweed ra the agateware kettle and proceeded to pr

(Continued on Page 133)

(Continued from Page 130)

Assemble, all ye bacchantes, to witness hv he poured! Out of the generous muzzle o:he large kettle cascaded such a flood of c stal-clear liquor as Falstaff never dreamed o Tantalus never thirsted for. Pint after p t of it rilled down with a satisfying gurgle, u il the pitcher was full to the brim and Teed was shouting for another reservoir. Pling snatched a two-quart bottle, which Aggie had been so thoughtful as to wash a l set on the mantelshelf. Still the tea-k tle poured tirelessly as if fed from some inexhaustible spring.

The bottle was two-thirds full when the p ring ceased and Tweed set down the k tle amidst a tremendous silence.

"I'll tell you what let's do," said the diplomat, his social nature the first to re-ve. "We'll make a tremendous julep and ve a party to the Springs."

"It might be a little crude at first," Tweed temporized, apparently too proud t boast. "But holee hickoree, ain't it easy ven you know how!"

Pipling, a practical man in spite of his ethereal calling, had poured out a full glass of the magic elixir and was holding it up to t light.

"Who deserves the first swig?" he asked.

"Tweed's done most of the work," was Percy's diplomatic reply.

"I'm not claiming all the honors," Tweed protested with a modest blush. "But since you insist, here's how!"

He measured the glass off with his fingers, allowed a just quarter of its contents, smacked his lips, and passed the loving cup to Pipling, whom he had chosen as next in importance to himself.

"How is it?" asked the author, the glass already tilted toward his lips.

"Fine!" said Tweed cheerfully.

Whereupon Pipling dashed off his apportioned quarter, smacked his lips in turn, and gave the glass to Percy, who being overeager all but finished it.

The surgeon merely smelled the potion when it came his turn. There beamed a clever analytic look behind the owlish spectacles as he revolved the glass round and round under his birdlike beak.

"What's the matter with it?" asked Tweed.

"Well, what is?" counterquestioned the scientific gentleman.

"It has a certain—glow."

Tweed said this, but without unnecessary enthusiasm.

"To tell you the truth," volunteered Percy in a weak voice, "it seems to hit one rather hard about here."

He laid his fingers delicately across his lips.

"I think there's alcohol in it," declared Pipling. "But it tastes a lot like rain water that has been left out in a whisky barrel."

"And allowed to sour," supplied Tweed, jetting suddenly and wrapping his chubby arms round himself.

During the ensuing depression Doctor Biskoff, who had touched not, tasted not, passed again among the items of apparatus, making a minute examination. Finally he lifted the lid of the kettle that had poured so luxuriantly, and after his forefinger had run itself two or three times round the little knob on top he smiled his dry, wrinkled smile.

"Quite a large hole here," he said, "and you've been baling water into the kettle as fast as the steam could condense. A great deal faster, I should say."

The four of them sat huddled in chairs. Doctor Biskoff had been thoughtful enough to open a window.

"Well," said Percy at last, "there's enough of something in it to make me pretty sick."

"No doubt," agreed the surgeon. "But it isn't alcohol."

"Well, what the devil is it?" snarled Tweed. "If you're so thundering educated, why don't you tell us something?"

Biskoff mentioned a long list of chemical things which sounded a degree less deadly than the present results. His eye passed over the limp group with a look of purely professional interest. Every face was beamed with agony; green was the prevailing shade.

"I think a little ——"

His diagnosis was interrupted by a loud rapping upon the frame of the screen door, followed by a tart inquiry from Miss Maggie Dempsey.

"I want to see Misteh Pipling, ma'am, if you please."

"Mr. Pipling's a-holdin' a conference. Who's it a-wantin' him?"

"Botts," declared the sweetish voice. "Mr. Hig Botts, on impawtant business."

"Well, Botts ye may be, but he'll not be seein' ye now. Gowan an' set yourself under a tree till he's through ——"

"I'm sorry, ma'am," came the kindly drawl.

There were sounds of scrambling by the screen door, a smothered scream including an invitation to git out ye lazy burglar, and before the stricken Pipling could move a muscle Mr. Hig Botts came smiling into their midst.

"Mawnin', gentlemen," he began in the best manner of our motion-picture sheriffs. "Sorry to interrupt, but I heah they's been some boilin' down this way."

"Good afternoon, Mr. Botts," smiled the diplomat, shaking off his pain and showing an equality to the occasion which if applied among nations will bring him to the front of his profession. "Glad you dropped in on our little experiment."

"I've dropped in on heaps of 'em befo'," declared the secret agent, his chinless chin folding itself resolutely.

"Not like this, I assure you, Mr. Botts," said the diplomat. "We've been experimenting in artificial ice. Doctor Biskoff here has invented a process whereby it can be produced cheaply without the use of ammonia ——"

The surgeon lifted his eyebrows, and in the pause Mr. Botts spoke harshly.

"I know what you-all are up to. Artificial ice is all right in its place, and feed cawn is all right in its place. But you-all have been distillin' without a license. If you-all got an ice plant tell that to the judge. But I'm 'bliged to put you-all undeh arrest for makin' whisky."

In a long silence he permitted his words to sink in.

"Look here, Botts," said Tweed, coming out of his coma, "what makes you think we've been making whisky?"

"Tha's the evidence, seh, scattered all oveh the flo'. I'm right sorry, Misteh Tweed."

"Well, before you make any arrests don't you need a little evidence in the form of whisky to prove something on us?"

"I reckon I do, Misteh Tweed. What you-all got in yon bottle?"

With nervous promptitude Mr. Tweed poured out a half glass of the sparkling liquid. Mr. Botts crooked his elbow and tossed it off at a gulp.

"Do you call that whisky?" asked Tweed in a voice which gained power.

Mr. Botts smacked his lips as the others had done. Carefully he set down his glass ere a pained expression crossed his prickly countenance and he slid into the same chair that he had but now used to barricade the door.

"I don't know what you-all been makin'," he pronounced deliberately, "but it shore ain't whisky."

"I reckon we're innocent," decreed the real-estate man, who had taken over the case.

"Innocent is right!" agreed Botts, then was still.

Doctor Biskoff, the one abstemious person in the conspiracy, took another look at the havoc, the human wreckage, the greenish cheeks and white lips on his miserable companions. Then he stepped briskly into the hall and encountered Maggie lingering by the screen door.

"Nurse," he asked in his commanding hospital voice, "have we a little whisky in the house?"

"Annybody seeryusly sick?" she queried unbendingly.

"Mr. Pipling and Mr. Tweed seem to be a little upset."

"I thought they would be," she announced, not without a certain hint of satisfaction.

She stepped to the door and took one long, sad look at the emergency ward ere she spoke again.

"There's a bottle of the devvil's stuff in the house, and it's me that's thinkin' they'll be needin' it now."

"Get it at once, will you?"

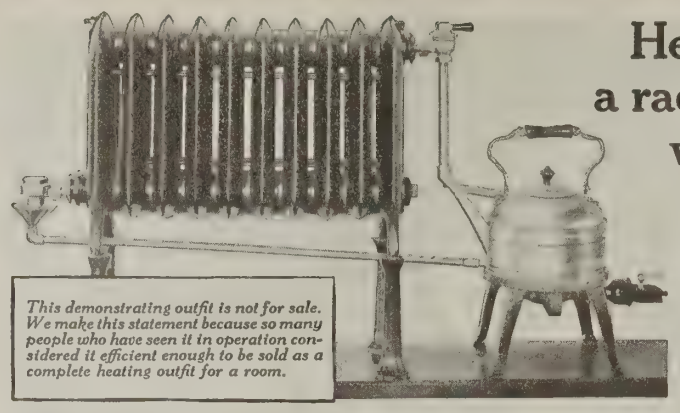
"Docthor's orders," said Maggie.

Without another word she stepped into the room of misery and, mounting a chair, produced a full quart of Bourbon from a shelf less than three feet above Mr. Pipling's bowed head.

"I thought he wouldn't be a-lookin' for ut there," she explained. "How manny glasses, docthor?"

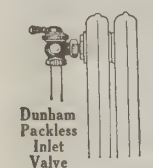
"Five," commanded Biskoff decisively.

Sunday dinner was set for half past two, and it lacked a quarter hour of that time



Heating a radiator with a tea-kettle

This demonstrating outfit is not for sale. We make this statement because so many people who have seen it in operation considered it efficient enough to be sold as a complete heating outfit for a room.



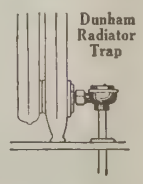
Dunham Packless Inlet Valve

If you want more hours of heating comfort per ton of coal, write at once for booklet "The Story of Dunham Heating."

It can be done: it was done at the Ottawa Technical School before a group of engineers who were amazed at the demonstration. The radiator was fitted with a Dunham Radiator Trap—a simple little device that automatically removes the air and water from each radiator so that the steam can circulate freely. Free circulation of the steam is absolutely necessary. Until you get it you can shovel in the coal until you are blue in the face; the radiators will get noisy and leaky; but they won't get as hot as they should.

The DUNHAM HEATING SERVICE

The Dunham Radiator Trap, as used for sixteen years in prominent buildings, including the Woolworth Building, is only one part of the Dunham Heating Service. The complete service revamps existing steam heating systems, designs new ones for homes, apartments, office buildings, industrial plants, etc.—all in close coöperation with the architect, the heating and ventilating engineer and the heating contractor.



Dunham Radiator Trap

Reputable steam heating contractors in towns of less than 100,000 population will find the Dunham Service Station Plan a practical business-getter. Write for details now—it is not too late to profit yet this winter.

C. A. Dunham Co., Fisher Building, Chicago

Branches in 36 cities in United States and Canada

London: 64 Regent House, Regent Street, W. 1.

Paris: Establts. Munzing & Cie, 47, Rue de la Fontaine-au-Roi

Ask your dealer at once for Sani-Flush. If he is unable to supply you immediately, send us 25c (stamps or coin) for a full size can postpaid. (Canadian price 35 cents; foreign price 50 cents.)

Sani-Flush

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

THE stains, rust marks and incrustations that you used to scour out of your closet bowl with so much effort vanish quickly when you use Sani-Flush.

All you have to do is to sprinkle a little Sani-Flush into the closet-bowl, follow directions on the can and flush.

That's all. No scouring or scrubbing or dipping out of water is necessary. Get a can of Sani-Flush today.

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.

1111 Walnut Avenue Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents: HAROLD F. RITCHIE & CO., Ltd., Toronto

Miss Elfaire Patrick of Florida.

She earns her Christmas money the Curtis way.

Extra Christmas Money

Perhaps you have planned more giving than your purse will permit? Most gifts are expensive this year and the dollars that once sent seasonal tokens to all the relatives and friends are now spent before they have half accomplished the duty you have set for them. But you can still get the extra money that will enable you to complete your buying or enlarge your plans, easily and quickly.

It's not too late to get it

The ideal gift for this year, when we must give freely to show our good will on this first new Peace Christmas, and when we must give wisely to show that we have learned the war-time lesson of thrift, is a subscription to The Saturday Evening Post, The Ladies' Home Journal or The Country Gentleman. Thousands of sensible Christmas buyers will realize this truth. You can easily secure the gift orders for your town or your neighborhood. And for this easy, pleasant work we will pay you well, both in commissions and salaries. To learn all about this spare-time, money-making opportunity, without placing yourself under any obligation, write now to The Curtis Publishing Company, 474 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

when five jolly roisterers sat together in the Pipling cottage round a half-finished bottle of Bourbon. The Reverend Mr. Beagle might be still waiting at the church for aught Mr. Botts cared.

"Ther ain't no law aginst it bein' used like we're usin' it now, fer medishnal pu'poses," he lectured on and on, himself having taken most of the medicine. "But, gentlemen, believe me fair and honest, it cain't be did to home the way you-alls' been doin' ut. If you-all must drink—and it's a crime, gentlemen, but human—they's no reason why you shouldn't git it the way the moonshiners sell it, twice distilled off the stump."

"Off the which?" asked Percival, hanging on his lips.

"Off the stump. I reckon they's about a hundred stumps marked with a gob o' white paint between heah and Bubblin' Springs. It's like pickin' a turkey—y'only need to know how."

"Well—how?" asked four accorded voices.

"Git a gallon jug and a five-dollah bill. Find a stump with a white mark awn it. Put the bill awn the stump and the jug awn the bill. Then 'bout dawn next mawnin' go git the jug and see what's in it."

"Isn't it against the law?" asked Pipling, who had had his scare for the day.

"I don't say it's strictly in accawdance with juice-prudence." Mr. Botts winked wickedly and helped himself to more medicinal Bourbon. "But they ain't no hawm in tryin'—and see what's in it."

A few minutes later Mr. Botts and his car went swaying away toward church, blithe in the assurance that Mr. Beagle was either there or wasn't.

All that afternoon and evening the undiscouraged conspirators collected jugs out of the hotel cellar and five-dollar bills out of the hotel safe.

Well after dark that night four mysterious figures might have been faintly discerned, each figure moving slowly under a weight of jugs. Any spy, had he been possessed of more ambition than is native to the Blue Ridge, might have followed to see eight jugs, properly baited with currency, set upon eight whitish stumps between Spouting Springs and the more pretentious resort down the road.

Our hypothetical spy might also have waited till dawn to see what happened then. Out of the mist four city-bred gentlemen, who should have known better, passed furtively along the forest marge to gather in their illicit spoils. The stumps were still there, the jugs were still there. The jugs were uniformly empty, but an equally uniform absence of five-dollar bills indicated that the stumps had not be unvisited.

"Bunked again!" was Percival's origin discovery as soon as he had visited t eighth stump.

"Well," observed Pipling, his eye pee ing down the neck of the vacant crocker "Botts merely told us to look into the ju and see what was there."

"Gentlemen," cried Tweed specul tively, seating himself on the bare stum "if dandelions were only in season I cou give you a recipe that would ——"

"Another word"—Pipling lifted the ju menacingly—"and you're a dead man!"

The Cabin

A SPREADING stain through forest lan
A haze in cabin clearing;
The cricket's knell from hearth and dell
For summer disappearing;
And ragged nests where, stranger guests,
The snowbirds house unfearing.

My ferny nook for dream and book
Is but a den of thistle;
Like skeletons 'neath ghostly suns
The stark old beeches bristle,
Their deep veins cold their green wreat mold,
Their song a mourner's whistle.

But who in grief at fade of leaf
Can long resist the fall?
The gleams and rains which haunt the pan
Have a mysterious call,
And musings dread attend his tread
Around the cabin wall.

Are these wild noons among the dunes
Less loved of Pan, I wonder, Than flower-frilled lawn with nymph an faun
Dancing the warm stars under?
These skies of dun with sand-blown sun
And thrilled with ocean's thunder?

What of the din when ducks blow in
On squalls of dusk December,
And torn flocks take the sheltered lake
Beneath a snow moon's ember—
Shall I repine and old dog whine
Or Redbreast's song remember?

Oh, we hear hails from Arctic trails
Whose Valkyries choose our prey.
And heap the hearth with Viking mirth
When ducks blow down our way;
And as gun glint and feather tint
Across the firelight play
The setter gnaws his folded paws
And plans the dawn's foray.

—Calvin Johnston.

A POST-MORTEM ON COCK ROBIN

(Continued from Page 17)

"It is the same thing in boys' clothes. I was going on thirty years old before I paid more than $20 for a suit of clothes, and when I took my sixteen-year-old boy down last week to buy him a school suit they didn't have anything in the store for less than $35, and most of them were $45 and $50. They didn't begin to compare with the suits we used to get for $18. What is a man now going to do?

"And shoes! My Lord! I used to have to be talked into paying $5 for a pair of shoes. And yesterday for my kid I had to pay $14.40 for a pair of low-quartered tan shoes made out of leather. He would kick a pair of those $8 shoes all to pieces inside of a month. I don't need to tell you about food—you know about that. I work just as hard as I ever did. I get more pay than I ever did. I don't waste my money. I don't buy anything I don't have to buy; I just about break even. It costs me twice as much to live as it used to and I don't get as much for it. What is the answer? Is somebody gouging me? I think so. I am trying to find out who it is.

"I went down street the other day to buy some shirts, the kind I always buy—a white soft shirt, with soft cuffs. They used to be $1, and then they went to $1.50, then $1.65, and then $2. Now they are $2.20.

"I said to Henry, the clerk, meaning to be sarcastic: 'I think they are almost as good as the dollar shirts used to be.'

"'Yes,' he says, 'I think they are, but they aren't made quite as well. I don't sell as many of 'em as I used to. Most of the boys is buying these silk shirts. We have got some nice ones, $6.50 to $10.00.'

"'Who is buying 'em?' I asked him.

"'Why, most of the fellows,' he told me. 'The crowd that comes in here Saturday night, the railroad boys, and most of that crowd workin' down there buildin' old man Jeup's warehouse. They are all getting good pay. The unions have put wages up.'

"'Yes,' I says to him, 'and it seems to me I am paying a good part of 'em.'

"'Well, join a union, then,' says Henry."

Big Production and High Prices

And there you are. I don't blame these fellows for trying to get as much pay as they can. I am glad to see them prosper. But the more they get the higher prices go and the more they take out of me. I have just come to the end of my row. I have got a right to live too. We can't all be railroad men and belong to unions; or be bricklayers or carpenters or plumbers or steamfitters. I am earning all I am worth and all I can earn. I work hard, don't dissipate, and I try to live within my means. I don't buy anything I don't have to buy, and yet they've got me on the run. We will have to have a showdown pretty soon, because I am not getting anywhere with all my trying.

On the very hottest day of last July I came out of the dining car of a train just then leaving Wilmington, Delaware, where I had paid $185 for a railroad administration luncheon, and walked into a lodge meeting of ultimate consumers who were pronouncing the high, the low and the middle cause on the cost of living. All of them, it developed, were salaried men. The greater number were apparently traveling salesmen. One of them was reading aloud from a morning newspaper.

"Listen to this," he said. "It is official, from the Department of Agriculture, and says there is no longer need for meat conservation, and that patriotic citizens may freely disregard the meat-saving placards which are still displayed at many eating places. Now listen:

"'With meat prices to the consumer so high that he is denying himself, and with prices for livestock, especially beef and lamb, so low to the producer that he is actually losing money, the nation is confronted with a grave problem which requires solution if we are not to suffer a decline in the livestock industry.'

"And here's another bit: 'Beef producers and lamb producers who sell their produce at this time are confronted with the danger of heavy financial losses, which would tend to restrict production and cause a serious shortage in future.

"'In 1918, for the first time in many years, the production of meat animals gained ground in the losing race with growth of population. This was made possible by the earnest and patriotic efforts of our livestock producers, and unless beef and lamb consumption is now increased to its potential maximum, without needless waste, we are in danger of throwing away the advance we have made under war pressure.

"'We have in prospect the greatest wheat crop in our history; we had in 1918 by far the largest production of pork we ever had, as well as a great increase in our beef, lamb and dairy production. . . . "Save Food" signs should now be disregarded. Consumers are unconsciously working harm to themselves and to livestock producers by now restricting their consumption of meat.

"'The department is aware that much of the reason for the hesitation of the average housewife to increase the amount of beef in the family diet is the excessive retail prices which now prevail. These prices are not justified by the wholesale quotations.'

"Can you beat it? Can you even tie it? Here is meat at a price where we can't afford to eat it. Did you notice the prices on the bill of fare? And in the face of this we are being told that if we don't eat steaks and chops and roast beef as we used to the beef producer will be put out of business and the supply will be cut down. Here we are told officially by the Government that we are producing more meat than we have ever produced before; that the livestock raiser is threatened with ruin because of the low prices he is receiving; and yet that the consumers are called upon to pay an absolutely preposterous price per pound for all that we buy to eat. Three years ago bacon was twenty-five cents a pound. Now in the face of the increased supply it is seventy cents a pound. More beef and lamb and pork than ever before, and yet prices so high that we can't afford to buy it. Will somebody tell me the answer?"

I should advise whoever is responsible for this sort of thing to pay some attention to these little experience meetings that are going on everywhere I have been this summer. The present distracted state of mind of the ultimate consumer reminds me of nothing so much as the little boy who has been told who Santa Claus is. He has been stripped of a dear illusion and is beginning to inquire into a great number of things and persons that he has rather taken for granted.

You may have noticed that the qualities and capacities of men in high places are not being taken for granted any more. The present public attitude toward all those who sit in high places or positions of authority is one of scrutiny and criticism. It has been widely remarked that the war produced no hero in the Army, no idolized generals. And the same is true in civil life here at home. Who is there whom you can think of, in public life or out of it, at this juncture, who is an idealized and idolized leader? Nobody. I mean popular heroes and popular leaders followed blindly and worshipfully by millions, and whose opinions and outgivings are instantly and enthusiastically adopted by their followers, without thought and without reservation.

Congress in Low Esteem

Do you remember the blind adoration of the Roosevelt followers and the Bryan followers? And before that, the men who thought James G. Blaine was the greatest man in the world? Those mass followings are dissipated. The state of mind and the attitude toward public men and leaders that brought them into existence and held them together have completely disappeared. Only the other day the President, in probably the most lucid, clear, intelligent, sound state paper he has ever written, asked the railway shopmen not to strike but to postpone action until the whole situation with respect to wages and the cost of living could be readjusted. He might have been the bookkeeper for a gravel-roofing concern, for all the weight his words commanded.

I venture to say, from my observations while wandering about in the past two months talking to people, that men in public life, in office and in Congress, were never in less repute and less esteem than they are just now. My own observations are borne out by the yelps of approval that have greeted Mr. Wilson on his Western speech-making tour every time he has taken a shot at the Senate. One of the things that an itinerant analyst hears oftenest is, "We are onto Congress. They'll never pull us out of the hole we are in."

There doesn't seem to me to be much justice in this attitude. But there it is, and it must be reckoned with. Congress is in the same plight as the people out in the country. It knows that something is wrong, but it doesn't know exactly what it is nor how to set about curing it. It knows that the League of Nations won't give everybody forty acres and a mule and bring about automatically peace on earth, good will to men, and a full larder at a reasonable price. So does the country. If I have read correctly the signs in my own adventures into the hinterland the folks at home are rather bored with all this talk about the League of Nations. They want to get it out of the way and behind them. If it proves a good thing, all right; and if it does not prove a good thing, we'll try something else. President Wilson tells us that the League will reduce the cost of living and put business on a normal basis again. "All right," they say; "let us

COPYRIGHT BY UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD, NEW YORK CITY

A Loyal Policeman, One of the Remaining Few When the Boston Force Went On Strike, Guarding a Wrecked Store, the Result of Mob Rule Which Followed the Walkout are an assurance of comfort. It's the patented double crown roller (concealed in the back) that prevents that annoying pulling and binding. It's never idle—adjusts the suspenders to every movement of the body and keeps the trousers hanging just right. Quality webbing. All colors and sizes. At leading stores—75c and $1.00.

Kady Suspenders

Avoid imitations. See that the buckle carries the name,

"KADY"

Kady Concealed Suspenders (Patented)

are invisible. Worn under the shirt. Easily fastened. Hold the shirt down. Wear them with a belt if you like, and wear the belt loose—tight belts are unhealthful. Patented double crown roller means Kady comfort. Many men will wear no other suspenders. You, too, will be partial to them. Fine quality white webbing. Ask for Kady Concealed—75c.

OHIO SUSPENDER CO., Mansfield, O.

A Unique $1.00 Gift

Pair Mahogany Candle Sticks, 4 inches high, containing Genuine Bayberry Candles. Mailed attractively with Hand Colored Gift Card. Pin a dollar bill to your request for catalog. Money back if requested.
We've collected hundreds of distinctive gifts, rich in charm and sentiment, and pictured them in a Beautiful Catalog from which you can choose your gifts. There's something for everybody. Your list of names and our Big Free Gift Book is all you need. It's a Great Big Help.
THE HOLMES CO
778 Elmwood, Providence, R.I.

PLAYS For amateurs; Monologs, Recitations, Drills, Minstrel and Vaudeville Jokes and Sketches; ideas for all kinds of entertainments. Send for free catalog.
DRAMATIC PUBLISHING CO., 542 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

Could You Get $2.00 For 52 of These?

Or 52 of These?

For they are one and the same. The copy of The Saturday Evening Post that you are now reading contains as much literary matter as the average $1.50 novel. Yet it is only one of 52 such novel-size issues that you could offer to deliver for $2.00! Could you sell these?—52 of them—a whole library—for only $2.00? Could you?

Others Do! Why Not You?

If you like The Post, read it, believe in it, you can. Hundreds of our representatives all over the United States are being paid thousands of dollars for doing precisely that. You can do as well. In spare hours alone you can easily earn $10.00 to $25.00 a week extra, and for full time work we pay good salesmen as much as

$5000 a Year

If you can use more money, clip the coupon now!

The Curtis Publishing Company
470 Independence Square, Phila., Pa.

Gentlemen:—

52 Posts look like a good $2.00 worth. I think I can sell them—I'll try.

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____

State _____

see if it will. That is what we want. Go to it."

What we all want, of course, is to get back where we were before the war, and know where we are. This restless groping for stability is not confined to this country. People everywhere are seeking to evolve and declare the faith that is in them. The other day a company described as "fifty-four leaders of French thought" met in Paris to make a declaration of faith. Here is a rough translation of a paragraph from their address:

"If we feel the need of a philosophical, moral and political thought which shall organize our experiences; if we aim to oppose to liberal and anarchical disorder, to the revolt of instinct, an intellectual method which discriminates — hierarchise — and classifies; if, in a word, we know what we want and what we do not want, we do not intend, on the other hand, to remain mere doctrinaires and critics. The methods to which we adhere require us to understand and engage us to act; they are essentially creative. But there exists a thought which blocks the way of thought, an art which is the end of art, a politics which destroys politics; it is these alone that we are determined to proscribe. In this hour of unspeakable confusion, when the future of civilization is at stake, our safety is in the spirit. By combining against all the powers that oppose the spirit we shall achieve victory. The human race will share the profits with us."

Waste in Distribution

A certain shrewd man whom I know in the Middle West thinks that when we have evolved a national system of distribution of necessary commodities we shall have solved our problem. He says: "Here we have a country packed with richness, food for all and to spare, forests, streams, minerals, wool and cotton for clothing, meat and grains and fruit to eat, land a-plenty, and a young virile people. We know where all this stuff is and how to get it out. We have solved the problem of production. We know how to increase production. We proved this up to the hilt when the war came on. We can produce in quantity and in any quantity, and when not under war pressure we can produce economically. All that we thoroughly understand.

"But we have never set our minds to distribution, to a fair sharing of what we produce. There are too many people between the man who produces food and the man who ultimately buys it for consumption. There are too many people between the man who grows wool or cotton and the man who buys clothing. Food marketing is grotesque in its appalling waste. Here in our town there are two markets. All the dealers have separate stalls. In the market nearest my home I buy butter and eggs from one man, green vegetables from another, fruit from another, fresh meats from another, and staples from a fifth. It happens day after day that five wagons drawn by five horses, and each one carrying a man to drive and a boy to deliver, come to my house from these market stalls that are not 300 feet apart.

"Each stall owner maintains his own delivery system. I and the other consumers pay for it. One delivery system for the entire market would save money for all of us. That is only a minor detail.

"A friend of mine has a muck farm up here in the northern part of the state. He grows nothing but onions. He sells them to an agent by the carload. I have known a carload of onions to be sold three times and make three profits before they reached their final destination and were sold to retailers. The food producer, I think on the whole, is not getting more than a fair price for what he raises, but a lot of parasites fatten themselves on it before it gets to the consumer, and he pays for it. Everybody seems to know this, but nothing is done about it."

One of the singular and amazing aspects of this new-thought politics and hot and hasty social and economic reorganization that is finding temporary lodgment in various parts of the country, especially in the Northwest, is being watched by my friend the ultimate consumer with rather mixed feelings. Apparently he is not being considered at all in the arrangement, and he doesn't understand how any system of society can endure that doesn't provide for his beneficent activities. Producers who don't take consumers into account are a new phenomenon in an imperfect world, already so full of strange and inexplicable spectacles. A news story in a Chicago paper a little while ago told of the offer of the Non-Partisan League to coöperate with the Independent Labor Party of Illinois in the coming municipal election in Chicago. Not long after the story was printed Governor Frazier, the Non-Partisan League Executive of North Dakota, met a group of labor men in Chicago and made plans for uniting the farmers and city workingmen for political purposes. At the same time there was published an interview with "one of the men high in authority in the Non-Partisan League, who is understood to be the incarnation of the league's inward spirit." He was quoted as saying:

"We must have an entirely new system, a system based not on politics but on industry. The producers on the farm and in the shops must unite in one great political union. . . . This new party, composed of producers, will take all the machinery of government, production and distribution in the interests of the people. . . .

"There are six million farmers and millions of workmen. These constitute the vast majority of the United States. It is the purpose of the Non-Partisan League to bring these two great bodies together; then we can dictate terms to the balance of the country. . . . It will be an adaptation of the Russian idea of government of the producers, for the producers, and by the producers, to American habits of thought."

One clear, definite, fixed idea I find in the minds of virtually all the tolerant, kindly average human beings whom I group for present purposes of classification as the ultimate consumer is that we are all in this thing together and that we must pull ourselves out of it together. He dislikes and resents and has not much faith in any group theory. It strikes him as a European importation that is just about as useful as the English sparrow or German carp. He doesn't take to the idea of getting out of a tight corner by trampling on somebody else. I have had the case put to me a dozen times something like this:

"The truth is our nerves are pretty well on edge. What with one thing and another we are tired and harassed and irritable. It is hard to get a civil word out of people. We are all worried about something. Mostly it is about how to make a living. You will hardly meet anybody nowadays who is satisfied with his job or thinks the work that he is doing is worth doing well. Taking it by and large, folks aren't as neighborly as they used to be. Before they do anything they want to know how much they are going to get out of it. I suppose that is natural, because with everything costing so much a man has just naturally to get as much as he can. But with everybody feeling that way nobody is contented.

"Then there is another thing: There has always been a lot of bunk in this country and we are just getting wise to it. I suppose the war is responsible for that. We have had to come down to cases; right down to realities. I don't think we will ever hear any more of the blah-blah boys who used to call us the uncrowned kings of the grandest, greatest, richest country on God's green footstool, and all that sort of thing. We have been pretty well shaken up in the last three or four years. That old patter does not satisfy us any more. You will hear a lot of people saying that we will never get started right again until we have a good old-fashioned smash in the way of hard times and a fresh start on a bed-rock base. As it is now, you do not know where you stand. People who never had anything before, or what they deserved, are now getting more than they ever dreamed of having. In the flush of it they are having a g time. Other folks are pinched to pay fo and the bulk of us in between are j making buckle and tongue meet. We know there is enough for all of us and spare. The butter needs to be spread m evenly."

Raising an army of 4,000,000 men sending 2,000,000 of them abroad and sh ing 2,000,000 from one camp to anothe this country have wrought a tremend change in the outlook and viewpoint of the obscure unknown people who in the make public opinion in this country and cide its destinies and rate of progress. change is easily discoverable now. Fou five years ago you would not have expe to find, and you would not have found towns of four, five, eight, ten, twelve th sand persons, decided views and opini on the personnel, efficiency, managem and value of the Regular Army; or qualities of diplomats and their funeti and how well they performed them.

Marks of Distinction

A little while ago the people at la didn't know anything about such thi They took the Army and the diplom service for granted. They were aloof f the popular understanding or the popu interest. At this present moment in history of civilization it is easy enough find a negative vote and the reasons fo based on more or less personal experie and observation of both services. The lows who have come in contact with Regular-Army officer and have now g home do not like him. They say that he harsh and uncivil; that he was out of c tact and did not understand his own co trymen and their habits of thought and things they hold dear; and above all, t he was pathetically lacking in intellige about his own profession. I do not to here upon the justice of this indictm but I do report that the sentiment ex and is widespread.

I got one evening from a young fel as vivid an account of the Peace Confere and the personalities of the American sion as could be wished for. He had b a private in the Army, and had been duty about the Hotel Crillon at Paris. had not been impressed a little bit. thought the diplomats were funny and gularly unfitted for diplomacy. He scribed them as "these young birds w black coats and checked pants who sh the papers from one basket to anoth Of course he didn't know what was g on at Paris. But who did? He told n story that I liked:

It appears that two sentries were po at the door of the Crillon to serve as gua Of course they saluted the officers passed them, and sometimes it was n they saluted civilians. One of the fessors in the tail of Colonel House, was serving as a specialist with our pe delegation, observed that on some days sentries at the door saluted him sma and on other days they would let him unnoticed. One day he stopped and m inquiry.

"Of course," he said, "I know that have to salute officers in uniform, bu notice that sometimes you salute civili Some days you salute me and some d you do not. What are your orders?"

"We are ordered to salute all officers all distinguished civilians."

"How do you tell whether a civilia distinguished or not?"

"They told us that the distinguished o was the ones that wore these jim-swin coats with long tails to 'em. We can't 'em apart, but if they got long coat t they gets a salute. The officer said it as good a way as any."

In sum: All of which, as Mr. T. Car observed, is very singular to contempl

They wend. Undoubtedly they wen

Now that you have come with me far down to this quiet corner I will tell a secret: The ultimate consumer ki Cock Robin.

He got too cocky.

THE DOOR TO FREEDOM

(Continued from Page 4)

ligt of wind-tossed lilacs in their steadfast ey, with untainted cheeks aflame to the fr air of heaven alone, with lips molded to able murmurings and brows placid be- fo established ways, with the lilt of clean ood in all their swift goings and comings, ar possessed of the enduring glow of the le and hidden heart.

.e drew a full breath and at its escape it rved a rending sigh. Not with such had he his many contacts, but with the un- nored women who go their unaccom- panied ways in ships, women to whom oor is so heavy a bit of furniture that it's ager left behind.

lurt dragged his mind from distant hours ong some of which it would fain have ered, as though he too were at least ched by the curse upon those who go den the road of many tastings, their eyes fixed on high visionings, their feet deep and deeper in the slough! Of what avail was reminiscence? What need had he for pale hands that drew him back when he had the sloper's gnarled finger to point him for- ward? If the little thing he needed was a new woman he would find her.

In midafternoon he landed, dumped his baggage at a vast hotel, passed its peacock alys in quick review, and hastened out into the open and cleaner air. He followed the throng along Forty-second Street and turned up the Avenue. Never before had he felt so vibrant with stored energies, so clear of eye and purpose, so humble before the fairest handiworks of God as exemplified by certain of his countrywomen, so wide- eyed and indignant before certain others, who with powder and paint had tried to go the Almighty one better.

He stared; not rudely, for variety assailed him from every angle of vision. No sooner had his gaze gripped a passing face than another slipped into demanding view, seiz- ing his attention for an equally brief tenure. Fre and there grave eyes or a serene brow or a tender mouth quirked entrancingly, as though in the midst of turmoil it could dream apart, held forth a promise of the secret door, seen only to be snatched away.

He felt the deceptive nearness to the pass- ing throng which fools every newcomer until the sudden evaporation of illusion plunges him into a loneliness poignant beyond the solitudes of the wilderness; only with Blurt the seeming communion with the hearts about him lasted longer, because some men and many women let their eyes dwell frankly upon him, held not by any outlandishness in his costume, but by the clean aura which clings for a time to him who is given up by the sea fresh from distant scenes, far places and the eternally broad horizon of one to whom the world is as a marble in the palm of his hand.

Such being the case, disillusionment and the realization that he was a stranger in the strangest of all lands, totally alone even though amid his own, came to Mr. Blurt with an added shock; day turned to night, the solid land of his forefathers to a billow- ing ocean in restless movement. To escape its tossing, incessantly slipping waves he climbed the steps of a church and turned on the slight eminence to regain a lost perspec- tive. Here they were, women of all types— orchids hothoused in limousines, many braids out with dogs and a few with chil- dren, shoppers intent and shoppers idle, striking garment workers whose jaws worked on, hurrying midinettes and loitering mani- kins, ladies fat and ladies thin; but once in a while, following her starry eyes like a giant arrow, with easy poise, light step and individual surge, a goddess passed. So breathlessly near to the cave man in him; so immeasurably bechasmed from his imme- diate purpose by eons of convention and the top on the corner!

"Dod blast it all!" groaned Mr. Blurt to himself. "Rivers of soul floating by, and here I am dying of thirst!" He realized with sudden depression that every man is damned to the limited circle of his individ- ual acquaintance like a squirrel in a cage, doomed to look through bars at the tan- talizing mirage of a wider, freer world. Only another illusion, for all these beings, even the goddess, must know the same imprison- ment.

That was what made it so annoying; they were just as thirsty as he was, and yet, though they might sense the clear cool spring of emotions still untainted within him and ready to burst forth at the faintest touch, they dared not drink.

It was indeed a black world, but across its gloom now struck a diverting ray. Mr. Blurt perceived approaching an extraor- dinary apparition, a figure six feet four in its shabby footwear, cloaked in the rusty clouds of a vast Inverness cape and hatted with floppy black felt. It was not these casual adjuncts, however, that caught the ob- server's eye and breath, but such a fluffy silken mane of hair and beard as gave the impression of Asiatic and European Russia peacefully out for a walk together through a startled world. At first sight one would have said that the sensation produced was beyond heightening by any incident of fea- ture; consequently Mr. Blurt's delight may be imagined but not measured at perceiv- ing behind the outrageous ambush a finely chiseled, half-frightened face, peeping out as incongruously as might some shy thing of the forest suddenly confronted with a burst of Broadway lights.

"Gee!" murmured Mr. Blurt with a cal- culating side glance at the cop on the corner, "you could wring its neck and it would never squeak!" He advanced on the Gila monster.

"Pardon me," he asked, "are you an artist?"

A spasm of terror shot through the man's pale eyes, his small mouth opened nervously and he answered, "No," in a voice that was like the rumble of a deeply buried subway train.

"Good Lord!" exclaimed Mr. Blurt, writhing with satisfaction at this comple- tion of all possible contradictions. "Excuse me," he added hurriedly, "I—I didn't think you were." He paused, contemplat- ing the advisability of asking permission to accompany the giant in his walk, but de- cided not to bother; besides, he had already heard him say "No."

"We are going the same way," he de- clared, and fell in step.

For a moment they walked in silence, but not in willing acquiescence on the part of the giant. His shy eyes glanced fearfully this way and that, his hands, bare of gloves, clasped and unclasped themselves nerv- ously. Midway of the block, striking an oasis of comparative solitude, he stopped.

"Which way are you going?" he rumbled.

"I know why you asked that," said Mr. Blurt with his most reassuring smile. "Whichever way I'm going, you think you'll go the other. Forget it; we're going together."

"No," said the tower of weakness, shak- ing his head in spasmodic denial.

"You said that before," remarked Mr. Blurt. "Now, just to persuade you that I'm your genuine friend in adversity and no con man, I'm going to take you to a tailor, a hatmaker and a shoe shop and have you refitted throughout, but in the same fugue. Why should I do this? Because the mere sight of you saved me from a pool of depression that it would have taken a sea lead to fathom. I'm willing to blow a hun- dred, two hundred, on you as a card of introduction."

"I'd rather have a quarter."

"You would!" said Mr. Blurt, laughing into the unsmiling eyes of the stranger and grasping his elbow in a firm and guiding grip. "All right, you shall have that too."

There was no question of ready-to-wears for the giant; he had to be measured for every item of apparel. It took two hours to complete the outfitting to Mr. Blurt's satisfaction, but even that period of time was not sufficient to elicit from the benefi- ciary his home address; everything was paid for and left to be held until called for.

Throughout the operation the stranger gave the impression not so much of one in a trance as of a fallen Spanish-mossed mon- arch of the forest caught and carried on the placid bosom of a wide flood. Where the strong waters carried him, there he went, heavily quiescent, never actively consent- ing. The same mood saw him delivered at a small window table in Cherry's.

Mr. Blurt joyed in the way the mere presence of the mighty beard and cloud of flossy hair had smothered remonstrance on the part of the guardians of precedence, floating himself and his companion to the much-coveted location. He realized that alone the stranger would never have pene- trated even to the lobby, but that with a watchful and insistent pilot fish before it that beard could go anywhere, moving through a vacuum of temporary paralyza- tion induced by awe.

"Gold Bond" Clothes

are "insured"

as to

Fabric
Tailoring Style and Service

—by the "Gold Bond" guarantee in the pocket of each garment.

Especially fashioned along style's latest ideas for particular

Young Men and High School Chaps and Popularly Priced

Dealers: Write for attractive, special, exclusive proposition in your territory.

The Milton Oehs Company Cincinnati

REDMANOL

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

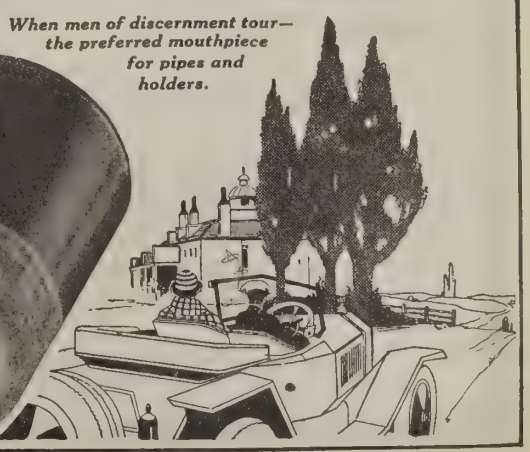
The Perfect Mouthpiece

A MAN never had a friendlier pipe between his teeth than those with bits of Redmanol. It has all the beauty of amber, but with added strength. It is odor- less, tasteless, non-inflammable —a triumph of modern chem- istry. In an endless variety of craftsman-cut shapes. Ask us if your dealer hasn't it.

Redmanol Chemical Products Co.
Chicago Dept. 17 ILLINOIS

Pipes, $1 to $25. Holders, 35c to $10.

When men of discernment tour— the preferred mouthpiece for pipes and holders.



The First Offering of Such a Lamp for $10.75 in U.S.A. (except west of Rockies $11.75)

MILLER LIBRARY LAMP

22 in. High

Shade 16 in. diam.

Pat. May 19, 1919

Co-operative buying by public service companies makes possible this splendid lamp at so low a price.

Here is a Christmas idea for people of culture and thrift.

See this Lamp at any display room or order it by mail from nearest company who will send it express collect.

Brooklyn Edison Co.	Brooklyn, N. Y.	Philadelphia Electric Co.	Philadelphia, Pa.
Commonwealth Edison Co.	Chicago, Ill.	Potomac Electric Power Co.	Washington, D. C.
Consolidated Gas, Electric Light and Power Co.	Baltimore, Md.	Public Service Electric Co.	In various cities in New Jersey
Subsidiaries of Henry L. Doherty & Co.	In various cities	Public Service Co.	In various cities in Northern Illinois
Eastern Shore Gas and Electric Co.	In various cities	Sioux City Gas and Electric Co.	Sioux City, Iowa
Edison Electric and Illuminating Co. of Boston	Boston, Mass.	Utah Power and Light Co.	Salt Lake City
The Electric Shop	Providence, R. I.	Union Electric Light & Power Co.	St. Louis, Mo.
The Hartford Electric Light Co.	Hartford, Conn.	United Electric Light and Power Co.	New York City
Indianapolis Light & Heat Co.	Indianapolis, Ind.
Kansas City Light and Power Co.	Kansas City, Mo.
Nashville Railway & Light Co.	Nashville, Tenn.
Nebraska Power Co.	Omaha, Neb.
Penn. Central Light & Power Co.	In various cities

And Electric light companies in other cities in the United States

CANADIAN DISTRIBUTORS

Canadian General Electric Co., Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

MILLER LAMPS Edward Miller & Company MERIDEN CONNECTICUT MILLER LAMPS

GILBERT

Outdoor Wheel Toy

This new toy of mine rings the bell of boy happiness. With these outfits any boy, with only a screw driver and a wrench, can build strong, swift, finely finished wagons, gliders, coasters, racers, trucks and many other toys. Outfits contain extra strong steel disc wheels, axles, plates and all other parts.

The crackerjack $10 set ($15 in Canada) contains gears and pinions and extra parts with which a real geared speedster can be built. Then there's a $6 set ($9 in Canada) and a big $15 set ($22.50 in Canada).

Big Prize Contest—Boys' Magazine Free

Free toy building contest for boys and girls, with buckboard automobile or Shetland pony as first prize and a hundred other fine prizes. Write for full particulars, copy of my boys' magazine and complete catalog of Gilbert Toys. All sent free.

A. C. Gilbert, President

The A. C. Gilbert Company, 119 Blatchley Ave., New Haven, Conn.

In Canada: The A. C. Gilbert Menzies Limited, Toronto

In England: The A. C. Gilbert Co., 17 Sherborne Lane, London E. C. 4

He was not, however, entirely happy. Rudely staring eyes from neighboring tables disturbed him not at all, but he was oppressed by a sense of failure in his efforts to crack the apparently paper shell of his captive's personality. He felt that he was no nearer the intimate soul, if there was one, behind the sea of hair than when first he had discovered the peeping face that now defied him.

"Sutey," he remarked, using a nickname that came to his mind automatically by nebulous deduction from the word "hirsute," "where do you live? I don't mean street and number; I mean, what are you? What do you do? If you think, what do you think about?"

A vindictive gleam shone in the giant's eyes as though here, at last, he had found a means of thwarting his triumphant persecutor; he would answer none of those questions, he need only keep his mouth shut.

Mr. Blurt thought for a moment and then called hopefully for a wine card.

"Speaking of cocktails," he remarked, "what about a Jacque Rose, slightly feminine, pink-eyed and sweet?" He glanced up shrewdly and immediately tried again. "Kiss of Dawn—that's a pick-me-up; Clover Club, a form of breakfast egg food; Martini, half and half straddled by ice water; Bronx, a suburb of true booze; Perfection, a lot of muck round one drop of blessed absinth."

The stranger's thin nostrils suddenly quivered.

"Ah, friend," continued Mr. Blurt, "how stupid I have been!" He ordered absinth and its immemorial fixings.

From that moment set in a thaw as of springtime. Food came, carefully chosen as to quality and generous in quantity; libations in orderly procession followed the initial draught. Glancing nervously to right and left Sutey unbent himself and spoke, though in a whisper.

"I don't live anywhere," he said. "I'll never wear those new things you bought for me. I'm a model."

At the first of these three assertions Mr. Blurt nodded and murmured he had feared so; at the second he shrugged his eyebrows; at the third he frowned in sudden concentration. Visions of models paraded before his inner view; not mountainous men in lowering clouds of hair, but women—dainty women, women with and lacking missions, painted and unpainted, earnest and frivolous, all beautiful without, some within, character parts every one, as is all humanity once it can be divided down to the integral and put under the microscope of individual contact.

Mr. Blurt was conscious of a great illumination, still blurred in its outlines, but blindingly bright. If artists could get models for mere physical depiction at so much an hour, only the degree of cash divided him from employing goddesses to a nobler end. He gazed thoughtfully at Sutey and decided he could not let the source of his inspiration go.

"If you are indeed a model by profession," he said solemnly, "what's your rate by the month?"

"By the month?" whispered Sutey dubiously. A crafty light dawned slowly in his pale eyes. "One hundred dollars."

"Make it two," said Mr. Blurt promptly. "I may need you night or day."

"What for?" asked the model, thin lips working tremulously before this last of a long onslaught of matters demanding solution from his cringing indecision.

Mr. Blurt fingered a wineglass and brought back his gaze from idling.

"Sutey," he said, "there's a wonder about you and any day of great gloom or joy I may need it. The moment may come when I'll want you by, when I'll give you a thousand dollars to lie down and let me roll in your beard."

"Ha! ha! ha!" roared the giant, and at the rumble of his laugh rafters trembled, forks paused halfway to open mouths and hearts stood still. Oblivious of the ominous cessation of commotion Blurt reached out a hand as though in haste to seal friendship and the bargain before the echo and its impulse died.

"Let us go," he said hurriedly. "I'm sure they won't allow you to laugh in here again."

II

MR. BLURT lost no time in discovering the fact that Sutey, the giant, was a classified directory of every studio location in town. He knew them all; from the palatial cave dwellings in the Fifties, where wealthy dilettantes and many others w good sense and much money joy in noble space of a single mighty room s rounded by the necessary cubby-ho down to the humblest renovated third-fl back in Hobohemia, he knew them all.

"What do you want to paint?" he as over the cozy breakfast table and a mi glass of absinth in Blurt's private sitt room.

"Paint?" repeated Blurt, looking at questioner a little blankly. "Oh, yes." lit a cigar in frowning deliberation settled back into a deep chair.

"Sutey," he continued, "in spite of fact that I consider you scarcely hun we're going to have a long frank talk. N what's your real name?"

"Sutey," replied the giant. "Alexan Sutey; S-u-t-e-y."

Blurt stared at him in puzzled ama ment. "Are you joking?" he asked.

"I never joke," replied Mr. Sutey.

Blurt's eyes grew rounder and roun "Didn't it occur to you," he asked fina "that there was something strange in happening casually on your by no me ordinary name?" His face suddenly h dened. "Don't you lie to me, don't d lie to me, you old turkey cock in bushes!"

"I'm not curious and I never lie," repl Mr. Sutey calmly, carefully steering a l spoonful of egg through the hairy clo before his face. In Blurt's accustomed pr ence he had already lost his habitual air cringing fear and substituted for it one elemental apathy.

"Well, I'll be damned!" commented M Blurt after a long pause of considerati He pushed a cigar across the table, dr thoughtfully on his own for a silent m ment and then went on. "Leaving mirac of telepathy aside for the present," he sa "let's return to the matter in hand. I not and have no intention of becomin painter; not with pigments at least. I a however, the possessor of a new idea."

A faint look of sneering incredul dawned in Mr. Sutey's eyes at the l statement, but, unheeding, Mr. Blurt c tinued. "I take it that an artist of dreams a certain woman into a picture a then advertises, searches and otherw looks for the model that will fit his requi ments?"

Mr. Sutey nodded in reluctant assent.

"Well," said Mr. Blurt, "I'm out more than flesh, a lot more. I've dream a woman into the picture of life. She m be straight, inside and out; level-ey deep-bosomed, broad in outlook as she constrained in license; she must be m tured, not accidental, a woman bred that unconscious nobility which recogni the eternal verities of honor, steadfastn and charity, not as things you read abo and forget, but as the living sources the resurgent illusion of man's happine Sounds funny that—something like a cr between tinkling cymbals and a b drum—but I'm thinking of the only p sible happiness as a sort of continuing r urrection. We all die, Sutey, a thousa times; that isn't what matters. It's t revivifying force that is in or round us th counts."

During this exposition Mr. Sutey's sm mouth and pale eyes had taken the form round holes of wonder. As soon as the was a pause he exploded.

"You're demented! Where have y been since you grew up? Ha! You ask me where I lived. Where do you liv Listen to Sutey. Women!"

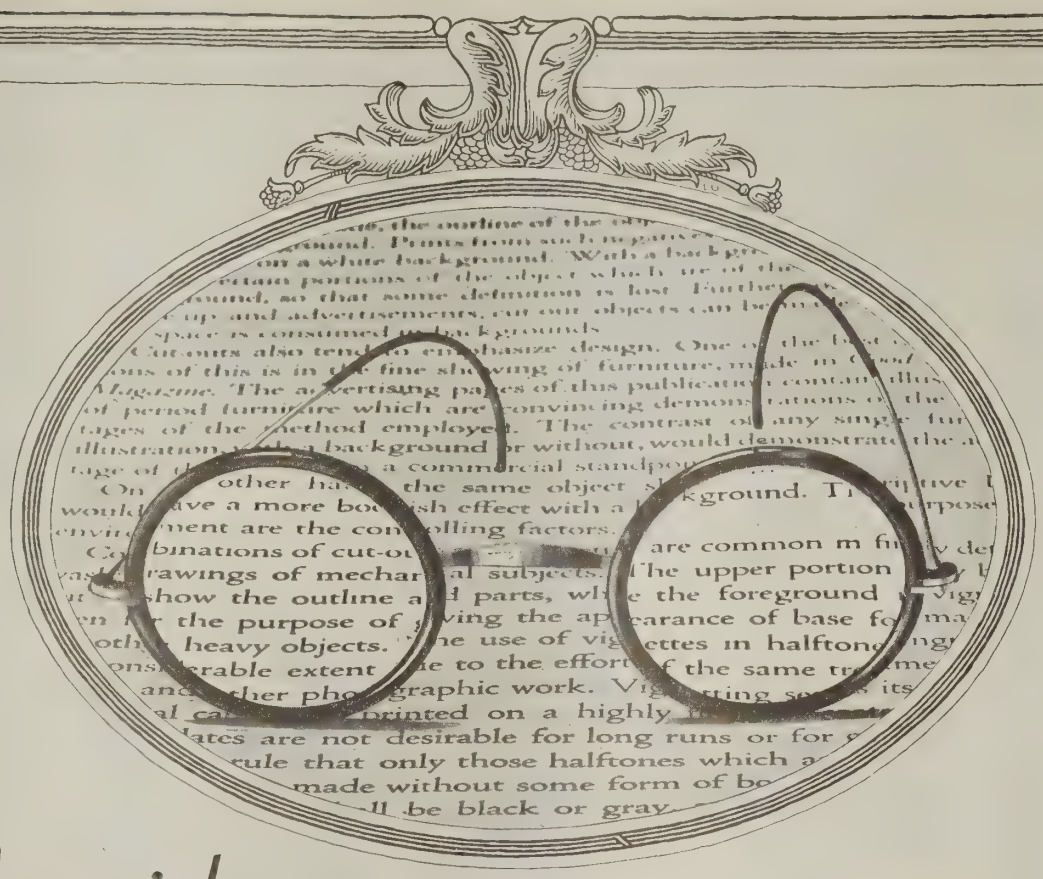
He made a gesture with one hand th implied an endless lengthening of the sm apartment.

"Women," he continued, "are like cloc on a wall, every kind of clock, but all clock Some go 'tick, tick, tick,' and some go 'tuc tuck, tuck,' but they've all got the san faces, the same numerals and the san wheels inside. But cheap or dear, it's t hand that turns the key that makes the go. Tick, tick tick; tuck, tuck, tuc Pah!"

Mr. Blurt drew a deep breath and let out undisguisedly as a sigh. "There's a l in what you say," he acknowledged, "an I'm not going to argue with you about i You admit that some are better than othe and I'll surrender perfection straight awa and say that I'll be content with the ver best at present on the market. The thin is to find it."

To this disarming concession Sutey r plied with a dissatisfied grunt as thoug having been trapped into an admission tha

(Continued on Page 144)



Consider A Pair of Spectacles

HUMAN vision is one of the most delicate things in the world. Two out of five adults wear spectacles at least part of the time, to improve their power to read print and see pictures. As a minute fraction of an inch in lens grinding can make or mar the vision, so can a minute graduation in printing act either to improve or hamper clear seeing.

The effect of poor paper is precisely the same to the reader as diminished eyesight. In a booklet it means poor display of your goods.

In the interests of better printing, the S. D. Warren Company years ago turned their enormous paper-making facilities to the manufacture of a dozen standardized printing papers, one for each of the important book-paper printing needs. These standardized papers are known as the Warren Standard Printing Papers.

In an impressive 108-page book, fittingly called Warren's Paper Buyer's Guide, various sections are devoted to the uses and possibilities of each of the Warren Standard Papers, with data as to the kind of engraving and inks that assisted in producing the different effects.

Briefly classified, the Warren Standard Printing Papers are

Warren's Cameo
Dull surface coated book for soft half-tone printing effects.

Warren's Lustro
The last word in glossy-coated paper for extremely fine screen half-tones.

Warren's Warrentown Coated Book
Aglossy-coated, white book paper especially adapted for color plates and process inks.

Warren's Cumberland Coated Book
For printing details in either color or black and white. One of the best known, if not the best known, coated papers devoted to commercial use.

Warren's Silkote
A non-lustrous coated book paper—semi-dull finish renowned for the ease with which it prints difficult subjects.

Warren's Printone
A paper for medium screen half-tones. Less expensive than coated, reliable in results.

Warren's Britannica India
For thin editions.

Warren's Library Text
A superior English finish paper, with restful reading surface and unusual durability. Popular with publishers.

Warren's Olde Style
For type. An antique watermarked paper for use where beauty of line and legibility are paramount.

Warren's Cumberland Super Book
A super-calendered stock of standard quality, for rapid presswork and uniform results.

Warren's Cumberland Machine Book
A low priced machine finished book paper. Hand sorted. For half-tones of 120-line screen.

Warren's Artogravure
Developed for high-grade offset printing.

S. D. WARREN COMPANY, BOSTON, MASS.

BETTER PAPER — Warren's STANDARD — BETTER PRINTING

Printing Papers

(Continued from Page 142)

anything at all existed, he might be called upon to prove it. Mr. Blurt relieved him of his fears.

"This is my new idea," he proceeded. "Just as an artist establishes himself for the entertainment of fleshly models on a profit-sharing basis I intend to open a studio for the ostensible depiction of character. I shall announce myself as a novelist and advertise for models in character. You don't have to say whether you think the scheme will work or not; all you have to do is to get me the best of all locations for the purpose, absolutely regardless of cost."

During the moments that followed, Mr. Blurt for the first time beheld Sutey in the act of thinking. His eyes closed like those of a somnolent yet watchful cat, his mouth pursed to the size of a pencil, and through the narrowed orifice his faint breath stirred flossy beard and hair to and fro in the semblance of the movement of a gray and foggy sea. No sight could have been more ridiculous; no ensuing judgment on the feminine matter in hand more impartial.

"The island of Manhattan," finally declared the oracle, "is like a sirloin steak; cut it either way and you'll strike crust, fat, gristle, meat, blood and bone. Take Forty-eighth Street from the East River, a block to a step."

He closed his eyes tightly. "First comes a scow, the smell of garbage, livery stables and manure; next, houses without bathrooms and people without baths; Second Avenue to Third, the lingerie of the rich streaming from the balconies of the poor; then respectability hiding her face for shame in dirty petticoats; then the hole in the ground with San Francisco at the other end; then apartments at a thousand dollars a month; then hats, gowns and objets d'art at a little less; then the Avenue, God and Mammon hobnobbing, diamonds in the shadow of a church; then doctors, bachelors, a little Rialto, a long shadow, beyond it the North River and as we were."

"Good," exclaimed Blurt. "That's good, Sutey. I can see the steak and I can see the city—bone, brisket and bleeding flesh."

"Cut it the other way," continued the oracle, unmoved by praise as he would have been by condemnation, "and you add just one thing, the habitations of the crowds. Do you think the crowd in New York is all one?"

He opened his pale eyes and waved his beard from side to side. "No, sir. It's divided by hours and bounded by streets. At four o'clock in the afternoon Times Square is suburban, rural; when the lights come out, it's Broadway. Sixth Avenue in the afternoon is theatrical, at night it's a boarding-house alley. The faces on Forty-second Street going east are pinched, hurried and hard up until they get across from the library, and then something happens to 'em; they fade into the Fifth Avenue look. Once you turn that corner uptown you've got a new world. Everything else in the city can be ticketed, tucked into compartments, measured in terms of Yid, Dago or Dutch, urban or suburban, but Fifth Avenue has the attributes of an essence. It's New York, an amalgam of near-gold, heavy and sticky with alloy, but you can pan it and find color."

His bleary eyes actually attained to a look of fixed and distant vision. He sat erect, laid his hands on the table before him; his long wagging beard just brushed their knuckles. "Along that wall," he rumbled, "there's every grade of clock that God ever made. Women! Can't you hear their heels? Tick! tick! tuck! tuck! Catch the Avenue night or morning when all the traffic is buzzing one way and you'll see strange shapes; colored wenches, charwomen, janitors and nervous people who are forever dropping their keys. Half an hour later in the morning, half an hour earlier at night, there's the dead hum of the working swarm into and out of the hive. But at four o'clock of a November afternoon — tick, tick; tuck, tuck — there's women, all women, every woman, clicking their lives away."

"Yes, Sutey," said Blurt quite earnestly. "That's where I saw them, and once in a while a goddess."

"Goddess!" grunted Sutey and sneered. "Well, if that's where you saw them, then it's no place for the studio."

"Why?" asked Blurt.

"Because," declared the seer, "the kind of woman you think you want may make up her mind to go to hell if it's far enough off, but she'd never mix it casually with her shopping."

Blurt drummed on the arm of his chair in impatient interruption. "That's one of the wisest things ever said," he remarked after a pause. "I don't believe you had brains enough to say it; it must be that you have a keen scent like a dog."

He watched Sutey's face closely to see if it would betray offense, but it did not. The man continued absolutely unmoved. "The woman you want, you want because she's the most difficult to get. A stray dog will win her smile; a strange man, never. Her eyes are far-flung above the heads of the throng; they marry a little cloud beating it across the city sky. The smell of hyacinths bursting from a florist's door will make her clutch her breast, because there's something there that leaps to mate with fragrance. Her lips, her eyes, her hair, her glowing cheeks say 'tuck, tuck'; never 'tick, tick'; she can't giggle."

"Poet!" exclaimed Blurt. "Sutey, you've drawn her picture with a master brush. Catch her alive and I'll give you a thousand—ten thousand."

"Nine times out of ten," continued Mr. Sutey apathetically, "she loves a scoundrel and that which is within her dies young; for such women, Mr. Blurt, are mostly wrecked on their own reflection."

The two sat in silence for several minutes, not actively thinking, but held in that absolute suspension, seldom felt, never quite defined, which grips the heart of man when bruised between the contact of what is against what might be. But Mr. Blurt's nature, however, was not one to wilt under reverie without a struggle.

"Well," he said, "where are we to have the studio?"

"In East Twentieth," replied Sutey promptly.

Blurt drew a wad of banknotes from his pocket. "Go down and get the first floor up. If there are any tenants buy their leases."

"The whole floor!" exclaimed Mr. Sutey, showing mild surprise for the first time; then the vision of himself condemned to a definite course of action overwhelmed him. "I couldn't," he stammered. "Couldn't do it."

Blurt stared at him. "I believe you," he said finally. "Sutey, you are the personification of the supernal negative, the mean between two hemispheres, the passive equilibrium between the north and south poles. Anyhow, you can walk along and keep the wind off me."

Within six hours Mr. Alexander Sutey was the lessee of the entire floor in question; in twenty-four more, contracts had been signed for refitting and interior decoration; in two weeks, thanks to Mr. Blurt's instant pocketbook, the job was completed down to the last desk, veiled light, Persian runner, box couch, pot, pan and candlestick; and the extraordinary studio was declared ready to operate.

Never before had the mind of man conceived just such a conglomeration of effect; indeed so violent were the collisions between the different rooms that rather than spend the rest of his life explaining what and why he wanted, Mr. Blurt had been forced to employ a separate firm of decorators for each and every compartment.

For the benefit of those who failed to grasp the lurid descriptions which lately appeared in the metropolitan press it may be stated briefly that Mr. Blurt's studio had seven main divisions—a long hall which one entered directly from the single flight of stairs, and six concreted atmospheres, all opening upon it through doors that were solidly paneled as well as heavily curtained.

These atmospheres in the order of their appearance on the stage were as follows: Business office, lounge, formal drawing-room, boudoir, bedroom and kitchen. Each had been fitted and decorated by the best specialized talent in all Manhattan to handle its individual needs, and the result was an incongruous collection of exquisitely lapidated jewels, perfection the predominating note.

With the exception of the man who, before the decorators arrived, installed the six periscopes in the walls of the six rooms, each to command a complete outlook on the long hall, no single person aside from Mr. Blurt and his apathetic satellite had seen the premises in their entirety. The hall alone, however, was sufficient to rouse curiosity in the most dormant. It was paneled in rosewood, richly carpeted in a tint to match, and lighted by twelve hooded lamps, half of which veiled the outlets of the periscopes. Along the outer side, unbroken by doors, stood twenty chairs numbered by pale bronze plates inlaid on the wainscoting above and almost unnoticeable.

So That Was It; the Girl Had Got Her Walking Papers

"Well, Sutey," said Mr. Blurt, casting a last glance back along this part of his domain, "we're about set. What do you think of it?"

The giant was chewing gum; his silken beard waved softly on his breast like the plume of a thousand-dollar goldfish, stirred by vague tremors. He fixed his pale shifting eyes for a single moment on Mr. Blurt's glowing face and asked cryptically, "Have you ever been in jail?"

Mr. Blurt laughed boyishly and slapped his companion on the back. "You've taken the wrong turning," he remarked. "This is the road to heaven. Run along now and soak up some absinth; when you're mellow come round to the hotel and let what's human in you judge my advertisement."

Alone in his room Mr. Blurt sat down to pen the call of a lonely male to his hidden mate. He had thought that this part of the job would be easy, but gradually, after many twistings and turnings, false starts and nervous perambulations, he realized that the things nearest to a man's heart are hardest said. All messages are misread by contacts variously measured; he knew that. But all he asked was the power to bury a single potent seed amid the fluff he was determined to set afloat through the smudged medium of the city's morning papers.

At the end of an hour he grew desperate; every line he had written reeked of the cheap personalities of the agony column. Dod blast it all! Had every sincere straightforward term in the lexicon of man's noble desires been tainted and distorted to salacious or vapid uses? He strode to and down the room in a consuming rage; he finally stopped to snap up the shade and lay his tormented and fevered brow against the coolness of a window glass.

The action brought his eyes level with the uncurtained casement across the narrow street. Within it and in profile was seated the severest, trimmest, most business-like typist he had ever seen. The line of her face was that of a cameo cut in unmelting ice, her brown hair was carried back in a tight unrelieved sweep to a loose roll at the nape of her neck, she was dressed in sheer silk poplin of butternut brown and at her wrists and neck were fitted cuffs and collar of coarse but indubitably clean lace. She was efficiency carried to some power far beyond the reach of his mathematics.

"Gee!" groaned Mr. Blurt. "She'll write this thing while an automat is serving the soup!"

His eyes watched wistfully her flying fingers and then studied all that was visible of her person. Some instinct told him that he was in danger of being caught staring; the girl was of the kind whose gaze did not easily wander. Suddenly, however, she did a surprising thing; she gripped her desk with both hands and dropped her forehead straight down into the keyboard.

Mr. Blurt was astounded and surrendering to an old impulse of the big-game hunter to look at every little thing within the range of vision to explain the abnormal, he soon discovered something to grip attention in the firm name chastely lettered across the uncurtained plate glass: M Miller & Millikin. Where had he seen that name before, since never but this once had he bothered to look from his side window. It wasn't a name one would forget. Hard

He dived for the wastepaper basket, drew out a discarded paper and turned its leaves rapidly until he came to the financial section. There was the name, heading a column. A single glance was sufficient to tell him that the news item contained one long chronicle of mismanagement and disaster. So that was it; the girl had got her walking papers.

There is no more spontaneously generous type of man on earth than that of the successful contractor. There is something about the life that roughens fists and softens hearts. Never had Blurt's old boss, Mike O'Callohan, whose motto was "Shift your cud thrice before you speak," appeared completely ridiculous as in his haste to respond to a touch, to answer an unquestioned hard-luck story with cash and plenty of it for the special need. Once he had caught Blurt all but laughing at him and instead of flying into a rage had made the confession, "Lad, wid me it's either count up the money or knock them down; beda I'll have no wan sayin' they seen me cry

This self-same impulse which had on seemed ludicrous now seized upon Mr. Blurt to the exclusion of all other thought. With astounding rapidity of action he snatched the wrapping paper from his laundry, just arrived, bound his shaving brush with an elastic, dipped it into the inkwell and printed in two-inch letters the following message:

"JOB WAITING FOR YOU AT BLANK BUILDING, E. 20; FIFTY WEEKLY IF YOU KNOW YOUR WORK. SEE MR. BLURT."

He glanced across and saw that the girl still sat with bowed head, only now her fingers were pressed to her eyes. He knew that she was not crying, for there was no movement of her shoulders, but somehow that fact of quick deduction only made his own eyes smart the more. With two pins he fastened his placard of hope in place flat against the windowpane, drew the curtain and calmly jabbed a peephole through

(Continued on Page 147)

(Continued from Page 144)

t wh the point of a pencil. It never ccued to him to wave or throw a shoe to ttrst the girl's attention; he knew that n ery game worth playing Fate must vets share.

Fifteen long minutes he watched, and nvas rewarded, but with a tantalizing ilration which almost drove him mad. e irl rose, laid her finished work to one de overed the machine, took a last look to ach drawer of her desk, disappeared, ued simply hatted and cloaked, nd round vaguely, came straight to ne indow to take a half-wilted flower n glass of water on the sill, and then—okl up and out.

He could see her straight body grow rigid, es wide. He waited for a moment and hey with finger and thumb jerked the plarc so that it fell slithering to the floor. The oor opened behind him and he turned o fe Sutey.

Te giant's shifting glance fell on the udy printed sign; he canted his head ideays and studied it wonderingly. Gradlla supercilious sneer expressive beyond ny hitherto attained twisted his lips. "Jc waiting for you," he read in a vain ttempt at a simper, "at fifty weekly if ou now your work. See Mr. Blurt." He aisl his skimmed-blue eyes and stared at is nployer in scorn and commiseration.

"wo hours," he rumbled, "and you ared me to soak up my humanity with bs th to pass judgment on that!"

Eurt stared at him nonplused for a nent, and then burst into a loud guffaw. "Tat's not my ad, fat head. It's—'s—"

"Vell, what is it?" asked Mr. Sutey.

Mr. Blurt's face, which had actually eaied the verge of embarrassment, suddenly cleared. "Oh, nothing, nothing at ll. Just a little psychological experiment o jove you were a liar when you said you ve a stranger to curiosity."

He kicked the placard aside and began to ater up hurriedly the many slips of paper oraining his false starts toward an adversement which should strike exactly the ig note of appeal.

Sutey leaned shamelessly over his shoulleand read aloud such of the efforts as he cord glimpse. "Ladies Only!" began one; hi came others: "Are you the Woman?" "Anew idea and high pay: Character ncels wanted." "In the life of each of iss a novel; sell yours now for cash." "Smewhere she is to-day, the One Woman; aryou she?"

With every vapid word the sneer on Mr. Suey's face deepened until it threatened to ecome a fixture for life. "The one on thfloor," he said finally, "is the best of the lot I can't understand how I thought it ws so rotten."

Mr. Blurt said nothing; he dropped the scbblings into the wastebasket and passed a hand slowly through his crisp hair. "I thught it would be easy," he murmured.

"Easy!" repeated Sutey. "Why, ever sice the printing press was invented men hae been trying to write those come-on ads, an what does the world do? It takes one lok and arrests them. You ought to be arested now and shot. Intentions! Pah! Lok what you did. That's what counts." He pointed a gnarled and trembling forefiger at the basket.

"Well," said Mr. Blurt with hanging hd, "what are we going to do about it?"

"We might live in the studio," replied Sutey gloomily. "That would save something."

"Live in the studio!" cried Mr. Blurt. "Look here, you old haystack, do you think I'm going to give up? Never! I'm going to find that woman if I have to go to jail a dozen times. By the way, you don't look to me as if you had had any absinth."

"No," said Sutey.

"I thought so," said Mr. Blurt. "Why not?"

"You forgot to give me the money."

"Money!" exclaimed Blurt. "Why, your ragged pockets are full of money."

"I know," said Sutey meekly. "But I didn't feel like taking absinth on my own account. It was too early."

Mr. Blurt rang for a waiter. In half an hour Sutey's personality had undergone a complete metamorphosis; he sat erect in chair, laid his finger tips on the edge of the table, closed his eyes and signaled his companion to write from his dictation. When the rapid screed was finished Blurt read it over three times, each with growing confidence and unspoken admiration.

"You see?" said Sutey. "No mention of money, no sickening personalities, no cold facts. Your own words too. It's a nuance, a message between the lines to those only who can read it. I'm hungry now."

The next morning, bulging with suppressed excitement, Mr. Blurt accompanied by his very sulky associate proceeded at the early hour of eight to the studio. On the way he bought the six metropolitan sheets to which his advertisement had been supplied, but he curbed his impatience and opened none of them until he was comfortably ensconced behind the broad mahogany desk in his luxuriously appointed business office. He had barely ascertained that the call had appeared according to contract as to space and without a single misprint when Sutey announced a first visitor.

"Good Lord!" exclaimed Blurt, looking hastily at his watch. "It's only half past eight." He was seized suddenly by such a wave of stage fright as eclipsed his most vivid recollection of buck fever. "What—what shall I say to her?"

"Say to her?" repeated Sutey. "How do I know? If you're afraid I'll just tell her to get out."

"You tell her to get out?" queried Blurt unbelievingly. "You haven't the nerve."

"I'll show you," said Mr. Sutey, and turned with such alacrity that Mr. Blurt was not one instant too soon in divining the extraordinary fact that Sutey was one of the weak type that cringes before men, but steps unhesitatingly on women.

"Here!" he cried. "Just one minute."

He remembered the inspiration of the periscopes, which at the time it had occurred to him he had recognized as nothing less than a brain wave. Protected by the thick wall, unseen, he glanced into the hall and beheld the typist of yesterday, tapping her foot, biting her under lip, glancing at the stairway and showing several other signs of imminent departure.

Blurt leaped back to his desk. "Show her in," he commanded.

The girl entered. Her eyes flew from one familiar fixture to another, and from each seemed to gather a grain of reassurance. Last of all, her cold gaze settled on Mr. Blurt and inspected his countenance, highly colored at the moment, feature by feature, line by line.

"You are Mr. Blurt?" she asked in clear-cut impersonal tones.

Blurt rose and bowed. "Wo-won't you sit down, please?"

He turned a chair at the side of his desk toward her and after a noticeable pause she seated herself on its edge, folded her hands in her lap and waited. Blurt frowned as he endeavored by concentration to transport himself back in spirit to the days when he had taken comfortable pride in his ability to dictate to a stenographer over each shoulder at one and the same time. Had he blushed then? No. Now he felt like a schoolboy, and looked it.

"What is your name, please?" he finally murmured.

"Phyllis Joy Livingston," said the girl promptly. "What exactly is the work you require, please? But—never mind answering. I don't think I wish to stay."

She started to rise, but Blurt stopped her with an imploring gesture. "In the name of mercy," he cried, "don't go! Can't you see I'm worried enough already without you taking me for some kind of a slimy spider?"

His indignation was too genuine to admit of misconstruction; however, the girl's face did not soften.

"I'm tired of working for worried people," she stated, but settled back in her chair as though relieved from tension.

Her words had an extraordinary effect on Blurt. "Do you know," he said, his face breaking suddenly into the most friendly and disarming smile Miss Livingston had ever witnessed, "I'm tired of worrying, and, by codfish, I've quit! I'm not a bit surprised, Miss Livingston, at your finding this place a bit of a shock. Did it look like a trap to you?"

"Yes," replied the girl.

"I'm sorry it looks that way," said Blurt, tipping back in his swivel chair to a precarious angle and twice saving himself from a fall by hooking the tip of his toe under a half-open drawer. "Because"—he smiled again—"that's what it is."

"A trap for what?" asked the girl, fastening her eyes on his frank visage as though before leaving and for her personal satisfaction she would like to solve the connection between such a countenance and a stacked deck.

"For the one woman," said Blurt gravely. "I wonder," he continued, "if you realize what a humanizing asset you have in your profession. It takes you out of a fixed small orbit, bumps you up against life and gives you a chance for actual contacts. I had a profession too, but it threw me only against men, men in the rough and by the gross. Now I've chucked it. I'm out looking for the one woman, and I'm going to find her. This place," he concluded, waving his hand toward the depths of the building, "is just a laboratory for microscopic examination."

"And you think she'll come here, your one woman?" asked Miss Livingston, a suspicion of pity in her tone and faint commiseration for the overgrown boy before her in her unwinking eyes.

"Sure," he answered, "by the dozen. Haven't you seen our ad?"

"No," said the girl.

Blurt touched a button and Sutey presently appeared. "Miss Livingston, this is my associate, Mr. Alexander Sutey. Take Miss Livingston's hat and coat, Sutey. She is our stenographer."

Miss Livingston did not move; she stared at Mr. Blurt and he stared back, his jaw as set as the keystone of an arch. With sudden decision the girl rose, slipped from her cloak, took off her hat, and handed the discarded articles of apparel to the waiting Sutey. She stood revealed in the self-same neat brown silk poplin uniform of yesterday, but a single glance proclaimed the coarse lace cuffs and collar to be as fresh as the dawn of a new day.

"I must know my exact duties," she demanded unsmilingly.

"Your first duty," said Mr. Blurt, handing her a folded morning paper, "is to read that and tell me what you think of it."

Miss Livingston read the indicated advertisement once slowly, once hastily and finally once wildly, her extraordinarily well-controlled features doing valiant battle to retain an outer semblance of composure. The ad was as follows:

"HEROINES PLEASE READ

"We require a woman, young, fair to look upon and fearless, to serve as character model for a masterpiece in fiction. In the words of our client, 'she must be straight inside and out; nurtured, not accidental; bred to recognition of the eternal verities of honor, steadfastness and charity as the living sources of man's resurgent illusion of happiness.' We take it our client means a woman who knows it doesn't matter that we all die a thousand times, for it's the revivifying force within or round us that counts. Applications for appointments should be made in person to

"MESSRS. HAROLD, TRING & BLURT,
"Blank Building,
"East 20th Street."

Miss Livingston finally dropped the paper in her lap and from there it slipped to the floor. Her face had gone through a gamut of varying expressions, vacuous misunderstanding, puzzlement, wonder, interest, comprehension. Now it became set in its habitual mask, but her eyes, playing truant for once, wandered to the window and out and beyond as though in pursuit of a fleeing vision.

"Well?" asked Mr. Blurt.

The girl's eyes abandoned the chase and returned to his face. She looked it over searchingly. "It's a clever bit of writing," she said finally.

"Got it, did you?" said Mr. Blurt, seesawing in his chair with satisfaction.

"Yes, I did," replied Miss Livingston, and added, "after three readings. Everybody will read it, few will conceive that it could be genuine."

"That's the beauty of it," exclaimed Blurt. "Those are the ones I want to give the once over. D'you think they'll come?"

"No," said the girl, but at sight of the sudden fall of his enthusiasm an impulse of emotion seemed actually to reach her. She laid her folded hands on the desk, leaned forward. A mothering gleam flickered into her eyes and out again as though repulsed by their long-accustomed impassivity. "Mr. Blurt," she said calmly and steadily, "I advise you to beat it out of here as I am going to do, and lock up behind you."

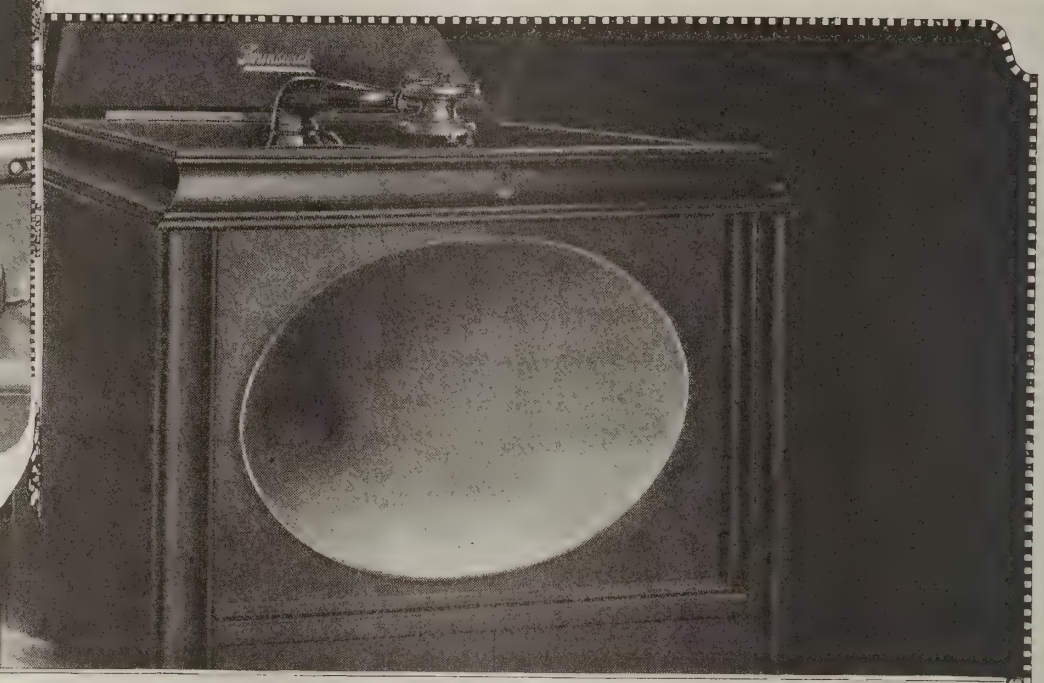
Sutey opened the office door unceremoniously. "Three waiting," he announced.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

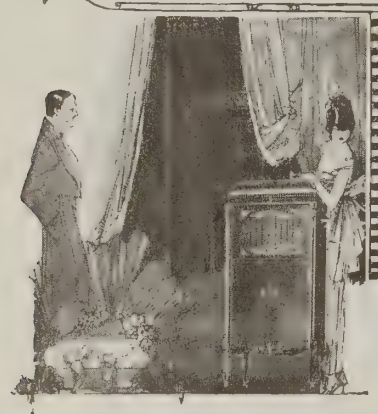
The Brunswick

ALL PHONOGRAPHS IN ONE

The ULTONA



The TONE AMPLIFIER



Music Lovers Choose the BRUNSWICK

MUSIC lovers choose the Brunswick Phonograph to play their favorite records, for it plays all records at their best.

The Brunswick Method of Reproduction makes this possible. It consists of two outstanding, exclusive features—the Brunswick Ultona and the Brunswick Tone Amplifier.

The Ultona

The Ultona is a scientific creation which enables one to play all records with faithful regard for the requirements of each make. It is not in any sense a combination contrivance, but involves a fundamental principle of sound reproduction.

Nor is the Ultona a complex mechanism. By a slight turn of the hand it is adapted to any make record, instantly supplying the correct position on the record, the proper needle and diaphragm and the precise pressure or weight necessary to play that particular record.

The Tone Amplifier

The Brunswick Tone Amplifier is another improvement of fundamental importance. As the name implies, it amplifies the tone, making it richer, sweeter, truer.

This vibrant tone chamber, constructed entirely of moulded hollywood, free from metal, provides the requisite resiliency that unfolds and projects true tone. Like a fine violin or the sounding board of a piano, it complies with the approved laws of acoustics.

Hear The Brunswick Before You Buy

One hearing of this remarkable instrument is enough to convince the most critical music lover that here is the final type phonograph.

THE BRUNSWICK-BALKE-COLLENDER COMPANY

General Offices: 623–633 So. Wabash Ave., CHICAGO

Branch Houses in Principal Cities of United States, Mexico and Canada

Canadian Distributors: Musical Merchandise Sales Co., 819 Yonge St., Toronto

Ask your dealer for a free copy of "What to Look For in Buying a Phonograph." You will want this interesting, instructive booklet before you buy because it is authentic. It was written by Henry Purmort Eames, LL. B., Concert Pianist and Lecturer, Director Pianoforte Dept., Cosmopolitan School of Music, Chicago.

LOOKING BACKWARD

(Continued from Page 21)

Bladensburg the scene, and the refusal of Cilley to recognize James Watson Webb the occasion.

I once had an intimate account of this duel with all the cruel incidents from Henry A. Wise, a party to it, and a blood-curdling narrative it made. They fought with rifles at thirty paces, and Cilley fell on the third fire. It did much to discredit dueling in the South.

The story, however, that Graves was so much affected that thereafter he could never sleep in a darkened chamber had no foundation whatever, a fact which I learned from my associate in the old Louisville Journal and later in The Courier-Journal, Mr. Isham Henderson, who was a brother-in-law of Mr. Graves, his sister, Mrs. Graves, being still alive.

The duello died at length. There was never sufficient reason for its being. It was both a vanity and a fad. In Hopkinson Smith's Col. Carter, of Cartersville, its real character is hit off to the life.

III

WHEN very early, rather too early, I found myself in the saddle, Bennett and Greeley and Raymond, in New York, and Medill and Story, in Chicago, were yet alive and conspicuous figures in the newspaper life of the time. John Bigelow, who had retired from the New York Evening Post, was gone as Minister to France. Halstead was coming on, but, except as a correspondent, Whitelaw Reid had not arrived. The like was true of Joe McCullough, who, in the same character, divided the newspaper reading attention of the country with George Alfred Townsend and Donn Piatt. Joseph Medill was withdrawing from the Chicago Tribune in favor of Horace White, presently to return and die in harness—a man of sterling intellect and character—and Wilbur F. Story, his local rival, was beginning to show signs of the mental malady that, developed into monomania, ultimately ended his life in gloom and despair, wrecking one of the finest newspaper properties outside of New York. William R. Nelson, who was to establish a real great newspaper in Kansas City, was still a citizen of Ft. Wayne.

James Gordon Bennett, the elder, seemed the to me and has always seemed the real founder of the modern newspaper as a vehicle of popular information, and in point of apprehension at least James Gordon Bennett the younger, did not fall behind his father. What was and might have been regarded and dismissed as a trivial slander drove him out of New York and made him the greater part of his life a resident of Paris, where I was wont to meet and forgather with him.

The New York Herald under father and son attained enormous prosperity, prestige and real power. It suffered chiefly from what they call in Ireland absentee landlordism. Its proprietor, for he never deserved himself as its editor, was a man of exquisite sensibilities—professionally a despot of course—whom Nature created for a good citizen, a good husband and the hero of a happy domestic fabric. He should have married the woman of his choice, for he was deeply in love with her and never ceased to love her, forty years later leaving her in his will a handsome legacy.

Crossing the ocean with the "Commodore," as he was called by his familiars, not long after he had taken up his residence abroad, naturally we fell now and again into shop talk.

"What would you do," he once said, "if you owned the Herald?"

"Why," I answered, "I would stay in New York and edit it." And then I proceeded: "But you mean to ask me what I think you ought to do with it?"

"Yes," he replied, "that is about the size of it."

"Well, commodore," I answered, "if I were you, when we get in I would send for John Cockrell and make him managing editor, and for John Young, and put him in charge of the editorial page, and then I would go and lose myself in the wilds of Africa."

He adopted the first two of these suggestions. John A. Cockrell was still under contract with Joseph Pulitzer and could not accept for a year or more. He finally did accept and died in the Bennett service. John Russell Young took the editorial page and was making it hum when a most unaccountable thing happened. I was amazed at receiving an invitation to a dinner he had tendered and was about to give the quondam Virginian and just elected New York justice, Roger A. Pryor.

"Is Young gone mad," I said to myself, "or can he have forgotten that the one man of all the world whom the house of Bennett can never forget or forgive is Roger A. Pryor?"

The Bennett-Pryor quarrel had been a cause célèbre when John Young was night editor of the Philadelphia Press and I was one of its Washington correspondents. Nothing so virulent had ever passed between an editor and a congressman.

The dinner was duly given. But it ended John's connection with the Herald and his friendly relations with the owner of the Herald. The incident might be cited as among The Curiosities of Journalism, if ever a book with that title is written. John's break was so bad that I never had the heart to ask him how he could have perpetrated it.

IV

JOHN WEISS FORNEY was among the most conspicuous men of his time. He was likewise one of the handsomest. By nature and training a journalist he played an active, not to say an equivocal part in public life—at the outset a Democratic and then a Republican leader.

Born in the little town of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, it was his mischance to have attached himself early in life to the fortunes of Mr. Buchanan, whom he long served with fidelity and effect. But when Mr. Buchanan came to the Presidency, Forney, who aspired first to a place in the cabinet, which was denied him, and then to a seat in the Senate, for which he was beaten—through flagrant bribery, the story ran—was left out in the cold. Thereafter he became something of a political adventurer.

The days of the newspaper organ approached their end. Forney's occupation, like Othello's, was gone, for he was nothing if not an organ grinder. Facile with pen and tongue he seemed a born courtier—a veritable Dalgetty, whose loyal devotion to his knight at arms deserved better recognition than the cold and wary Pennsylvania chieftain was willing to give. It is only fair to say that Forney's character furnished reasonable excuse for this neglect and apparent ingratitude.

The row between them, however, was party splitting. As the friend and backer of Douglas, and later along a brilliant journalistic soldier of fortune, Forney did as much as any other man to lay the Democratic party low.

I can speak of him with a certain familiarity and authority, for I was one of his boys. I admired him greatly and loved him dearly. Most of the young newspaper men about Philadelphia and Washington did so. He was an all-round modern journalist of the first class. Both as a newspaper writer and creator and manager he stood upon the front line, rating with Bennett and Greeley and Raymond. He first entertained and then cultivated the thirst for office, which proved the undoing of Greeley and Raymond; and it proved his undoing. He had a passion for politics. He would shine in public life.

If he could not play first fiddle he would take any other instrument. Thus failing of a senatorship, he was glad to get the secretaryship of the Senate, having been clerk of the House.

He was bound to be in the orchestra. In those days newspaper independence was little known. Mr. Greeley was willing to play bottle holder to Mr. Seward, Mr. Prentice to Mr. Clay. James Gordon Bennett, the elder, and later his son, James Gordon Bennett, the younger, challenged this kind of servility. The Herald stood at the outset of its career manfully in the face of unspeakable obloquy against it. The public understood it and rose to it. The time came when the elder Bennett was to attain official as well as popular recognition. Mr. Lincoln offered him the French mission and Mr. Bennett declined it. He was rich and famous, and to another it might have seemed a kind of crowning glory. To him it seemed only a coming down—a badge of servitude—a lowering of the flag of independent journalism under which, and under which alone, he had fought all his life.

Charles A. Dana was not far behind the Bennetts in his independence. He well Goggles for every need—in work, rest or play.

The riveter, the chipper, the grinder, the machinist—the worker in every line, who is exposed to eye danger will find safety and comfort in the new WILLSON ALL PURPOSE INDUSTRIAL GOGGLE. Aluminum eye cups with soft rubber facings conform to the shape of the eye area and fit snugly and comfortably. They are well ventilated and afford an unusually wide vision. Special Willson Safety Flange feature. Any color, weight or kind of glass. All parts can be quickly replaced without tools. Write for literature.

The all-purpose industrial style L31

T. A. WILLSON & CO., Inc.
READING, PA.

Makers of Optical Goods since 1870
Canadian Office:
23 Scott Street, Toronto

Feels Great!

THERE'S nothing like a Bradley for warmth, freedom and style. And it wears like iron—won't sag or bag at wrist or elbow. It's a close friend and a warm friend—and plays the game with you for years.

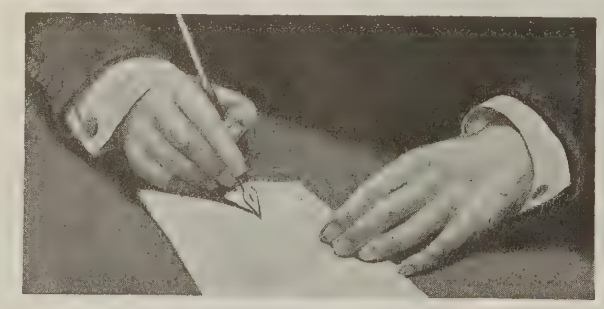
See the many Bradleys at the best shops in town—or write us for our 1920 Style Book.

BRADLEY KNITTING CO.
Delavan, Wisconsin

ARGONNE—THE NEW FORM-FIT

ARROW COLLAR

Cluett, Peabody & Co., Inc., Makers, Troy, N. Y.



SAID TO BE NEW YORK'S BUSIEST MAN

USES AN

Esterbrook No. 788

OVAL BALL POINT

writes smoothly and evenly over either rough or smooth paper. The best pen known for rapid billing, addressing, etc., and where quick free action is needed.

Writing all day with this pen in a light holder will not tire the hand—no strain, no writer's cramp.

Esterbrook Pens are the result of over 60 years' experience in making the best steel pens in the world.

Esterbrook Pens are the standard for excellence and uniformity.

THE ESTERBROOK PEN MFG. CO.
72-100 DELAWARE AVENUE CAMDEN, N. J.

Ask your nearest dealer for samples. 15c a dozen, assorted or of your favorite pen.

CANADIAN AGENTS: BROWN BROS., LTD., TORONTO, CANADA

61st Year

Esterbrook Pens

Ask for them by Name and Number knew what parties and politicians are. The most scholarly and accomplished of American journalists, he made the Sun shine for all, and during the years of his active management a most prosperous property. It happened that while I was penny-a-lining in New York I took a piece of space work—not very common in those days—to the Tribune, of which Mr. Dana was then managing editor, and received a few dollars for it. Ten years later meeting Mr. Dana at dinner I recalled the circumstance, and thenceforward we became the best of friends. Twice indeed we had runabouts together in foreign lands. His house in town, and the island home called Dorsoris, which he had made for himself, might not inaptly be described as very shrines of hospitality and art, the master of the house a virtuoso in music and painting no less than in letters. One might meet under his roof the most diverse people, but always interesting and agreeable people. Perhaps at times he carried his aversions a little too far. But he had reasons for them and, a man of robust temperament and habit, it was not in him to sit down under an injury or fancied injury. I never knew a more efficient journalist. What he did not know about a newspaper was not worth knowing.

V

IN MY day journalism has made great strides. It has become a recognized profession. Schools of special training are springing up here and there. Several of the universities have each its college of journalism. The tendency to discredit these, which was general and pronounced at the start, lowers its tone and grows less confident.

Assuredly there is room for special training toward the making of an editor. Too often the newspaper subaltern obtaining promotion through aptitudes peculiarly his own has failed to acquire even the most rudimentary knowledge of his art. He has been too busy seeking scoops and doing stunts to concern himself about perspectives, principles, causes and effects, probable impressions and consequences; or even to master the technical details which make such a difference in the preparation of matter intended for publication and popular perusal. The school of journalism may not be always able to give him the needful instruction. But it can set him in the right direction and better prepare him to think and act for himself.

The making of an editor is a complex affair. Poets and painters are said to be born. Editors and orators are made. Many essential elements enter into the editorial fabrication; need to be concentrated upon and embodied by a single individual; and even with these environment is left to supply the opportunity and give the final touch.

Aptitude as the first ingredient goes without saying of every line of human endeavor. We have the authority of the adage for the belief that it is not possible to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Yet have I known some unpromising tyros to mature into very capable workmen.

The modern newspaper as we know it may be fairly said to have been the invention of James Gordon Bennett, the elder. Before him there were journals, not newspapers. When he died he had developed the news scheme in kind though not in the degree that we see so elaborate and resplendent in New York and others of the leading centers of population. Mr. Bennett had led a vagrant and varied life when he started the Herald. He had been many things by turns, including a writer of verses and stories, but nothing very successful.

At length he struck a central idea—a really great original idea—the idea of printing the news of the day, comprising the history of yesterday fully and fairly, without fear or favor. He was followed by Greeley and Raymond—making a curious and very dissimilar triumvirate—and at longer range by Prentice and Forney, by Bowles and Dana, Story, Medill and Halstead. All were marked men; Greeley a ·it and propagandist; Raymond a vte declaimer and politician; Prentice w and partisan; Dana a scholar and s o ganizer; Bowles a man both of letter ar affairs. The others were men of all sr writing and fighting their way to the m but possessing the nose for news, usir th Bennett formula and rescript as the as of their serious efforts, and never l sight of it. Forney had been a pr te Medill and Story were caught young b th lure of printers' ink. Bowles was bor ar reared in the office of the Springfiel R publican, founded by his father, and a stead, a cross betwixt a pack horse a i race horse, was broken to harness bef was out of his teens.

Assuming journalism equally with s cine and law to be a profession, it i only one of the three in which versati not a disadvantage. Specialism at th or by the bedside leads to perfectio attains results. The great doctor i great surgeon or the great prescriptior he cannot be great in both—and the lawyer is rarely great, if ever, as cour and advocate.

The great editor is by no means the writer, but he ought to be able to writ must be a judge of writing. The newsp office is a little kingdom. The able e needs to know and does know every i of it between the editorial room, the posing room and the pressroom. He hold well in hand everybody and function, having risen, as it were, ste step from the ground floor to the roof should be level-headed yet impression sympathetic yet self-possessed; able qu to sift, detect and discriminate; of v knowledge, experience and interest; cackle of the adjacent barnyard the no the world to his eager mind and pliant Nothing too small for him to tackle, ing too great, he should keep to the m of the road and well in rear of the mo columns; loving his art—for such it for art's sake; getting his sufficiency, with its independence, in the public proval and patronage, seeking never thing further for himself. Disinterested being the soul of successful journa unselfish devotion to every noble pur in public and private life, he should st preferment as to bribery, "Get behind Satan."

Whitelaw Reid, to take a ready and spicuous example, was a great journa but rather early in life he abandoned nalism for office and became a figur politics and diplomacy so that, as in case of Franklin, whose example and steps in the main he followed, he wi remembered rather as the ambassador as the editor.

More and more must these requirem be fulfilled by the aspiring journa As the world passes from the rule force—force of prowess, force of ha force of convention—to the rule of n bers, the daily journal is destined, survives as a power, to become the teach the very Bible of the people. The pe are already beginning to distinguish tween the wholesome and the meretric in their newspapers. Newspaper ow likewise are beginning to realize the v of character. Instances might be c where the public discerning some sini but unseen power behind its press slowly yet surely withdrawn its confide and support. However impersonal it tends to be, with whatever of myster affects to envelop itself, this public ins upon some visible presence. In many st the law requires it. Thus personal jo nalism cannot be escaped and whether one-man power emanates from the cou ing room or the editorial room, as they called, it must be clear and answerable, sponsive to the common weal, and, ab all, trustworthy.

Editor's Note—This is the twenty-ninth of s ries of articles by Mr. Watterson. The final ar will appear in an early issue.

ABOUT PLAY WRITING

(Continued from Page 5)

raccal mechanics of the stage and of play itii, precisely as you would learn to take w and reassemble an automobile or an -oane if you purposed to qualify as a ur motorist or an ace of the air.

Al in making this suggested study of g mechanics let the embryonic dramsbestow minute and ceaseless attention o he great and generally neglected sub-t f stage lighting. That may at first m seem to be rather the field of the pcer than of the play writer, but it is
t. Light, properly understood and utie is the main modern medium of poetry t theater—poetry truly of the univerhd, which is apprehensible alike by the l ed scholar in the private box and he or untutored newsboy or shopgirl in he op balcony. Therefore if the drama-ist nderstands the possibilities of the use f lit and works with them ever in mind
e vll, I maintain, write better, stronger, nor practical and more effective plays.

F the adequately educated dramatist
f -day—still more, of to-morrow—lecicity, the miracle maker of science, enrs possible effects and achievements n e stage that our predecessors never ve dreamed of; and I speak directly out f ersonal experience when I advise -irs for the stage to study its possi-ili s. Electric light was, I believe, first se for theatrical purposes to illumine a ve rama, in Paris, in 1857. That was gh cast by an arc lamp, then still a de-ice primitive in form though invented no than fifty years before. The first ecided attempt to use electric light on he stage was made at the California
Th ter, in my birthplace, the ever-beloved ity of old San Francisco. That was in 87 week of February 21 to 28. I was he in person present and witnessed the va us experiments made, which were on he whole a failure. In 1882 the Savoy Th ter, London, was lighted throughout, sta and auditorium, by electricity; and to -y such lighting is substantially univer l. The limit of its possibilities is un-kn n. I have zealously studied the ec itic art of electric lighting ever since 18 ; since 1902—when I opened my first th ter—I have maintained and operated,
th rear round, an electric-lighting experi-me al workshop—in which, if I may say so, ome of the best of appliances for stage ig ling have been invented and developed.
An I give it now as my deliberate opinion tha wonderful as are the effects which ma been gained already, they are almost as othing compared with those which the fu re—the near future—will see. With th mystic aid of electricity all the aspects of ature will be imitated in the theater of e future so perfectly as to create the ab lute effect of reality, while aspects of th preternatural will be not merely sug-ge ed but so portrayed as to seem more ve ed yet more vivid than even imaginatic can picture them!

Illusion's Perfect Triumphs

'ith the full development and perfect co rol of this relatively new art will "i sion's perfect triumphs come," and the wl le stage scene of the future will be one ex isite light picture, so that painted sc ery, as it is known to-day, will, I ventu e to prophesy, become a curiosity of m ory. To illustrate: Many years ago w used to indicate a snowstorm in the th ter by letting fall from the flies tiny bi of white paper. My Du Barry—poor de ; I've never got over my weakness for th little French milliner!—drawn on the tu bril, passed to the guillotine through a rry of snow—feathery, moist, clinging, sv ling in the chill air—that seemed as re and palpable as the audience's seats.
Th effect was vivid in my mind as I wr te the scene—and it was created en-ti ly by light. It was beautiful, yes; and I on't try to conceal my pride in it. But it as trivial to what has been done since—an nothing to what will be done soon.

In Shakspere's time a change of board pl cards indicated the change of scene in, fo example, Macbeth, from A Heath Near Fr es to The Palace of King Duncan.
To day we represent that change, accept-ab y at best, by lowering a painted drop—ge erally to the accompaniment of a noisy bu tle of stage hands shifting set pieces, fu niture and props. To-morrow we shall ac ieve that change—and all other changes—silently, instantly and to the perfection of dramatic effect by the use of lights alone. But this subject of stage lighting is inexhaustible, and though it is the immediate jewel of my soul I must not permit myself to dilate further on it here.

Let us return to our play writing. The inexperienced play writer—even after familiarizing himself as recommended with stage mechanism—having conceived a play will usually confront a considerable problem in undertaking to deliver himself of it. He will most readily solve that problem by shaping for himself on paper a clear exact plan of his work. And to my mind—though not all doctors of dramatics will be found to agree with me—the writing of a play is most conveniently to be divided and arranged under five heads, which I place thus:

The idea.

The story—which is to be carefully tested by the requirements of reasonable probability.

The construction—which comprehends the crux of the problem.

The characters—which will be found to originate naturally out of the story, if the fabric be dramatic and not narrative.

The dialogue—which should, and if the story is dramatic will, originate naturally out of the action as it proceeds.

The Framework of the Play

I would here pause a moment to pay my respects to the so frequently extolled unities of time, place and action. After I had written some successful plays and had been in consequence told how bad they were I used to distress myself extremely about the three unities—until I learned better. I do not remember to have read or heard of but one play in which all the unities were perfectly observed. That is a composition described by the poet Byron, written by one Hibernicus, and entitled Turgesius, the Dane. Turgesius is chained by the legs to a pillar during the whole time of the piece and in that helpless position is addressed by King Malachi until at last, unable to endure the rain of words, he stabs himself beneath the fifth rib, and so brings the discourse to a close. Plays on the model of Turgesius would no doubt be wonderfully popular with the exigent audience of the modern theater!

For practical purposes the ancient dictum regarding the drama, "It must present complete unity," should be disregarded, forgotten—an opinion in which I was recently made happy by finding myself to be supported by the Great Sage of Criticism. Doctor Johnson on this subject pithily remarks: "To the unities of time and place Shakspere has shown no regard; and perhaps a nearer view of the principles on which they stand will diminish their value and withdraw from them the veneration which, from the time of Corneille, they have generally received, by discovering that they have given more trouble to the dramatist than ever they gave pleasure to the auditor." To which I say, "They have, indeed!" Let the play writer look well to the internal unity of his dramatic action—and time and place may be pretty freely left to look to themselves.

The first step in the actual writing of a play should be the making of a clear concise scenario of the projected work—which usually can be done within the limit of one thousand or at most fifteen hundred words; it is seldom wise to permit the scenario for any reason to extend much beyond the latter limitation.

Having perfected the scenario the author can perceive the necessary number and sequence of acts and scenes. Here should be noted a sine qua non for utility in the modern theater: The play must be susceptible of representation within a total period—that is, including all intermissions, from the rise of the first curtain to the fall of the last one—of not more than three and one quarter hours; and not more than three hours would be much better. It is no use arguing and discussing this point, as many young beginners do who come to me; it is, practically speaking, impossible to induce the public to sit through a play that requires much more than three hours for its complete performance. This may or may not indicate nineteen different kinds of crass bad taste and lack of artistic feeling on the part of the public—but it is the fact,

TRADE MARK REG. COOPER, WELLS & CO. ST. JOE KNIT SEAMLESS HOSIERY ST. JOSEPH, MICH. U S PAT. OFF.

Iron Clad

Hosiery for the Whole Family

Cotton inside—wool outside!

Here is cotton comfort with wool warmth, in a medium weight sock.

This sock is so knit that the fine soft cotton yarn is thrown inside next to the skin, while the outside is warm, smooth-knit worsted. Isn't that a splendid way to make a winter hose? Color, a rich dark oxford grey. A handsome sock in color, texture and weight; and extra durable. If you don't know of an Iron Clad dealer nearby, send us 75c for each pair wanted (stating size and color desired; grey or black; sizes 9½ to 11½). If you prefer black, order No. 335, same price. We will forward to your address, postage prepaid. Mail an order today to Cooper, Wells & Co.

212 Vine Street
St. Joseph, Mich.

Iron Clad
No. 334-O

Vigorous Circulation Will Keep You Warm

Delightful Warm Shower-Bath

Fits Any Faucet

Shower-Massage Makes the Whole Body Glow

Hot, Warm or Cold Water—any temperature desired—through hundreds of hollow rubber teeth gives you Shower—Shampoo—Massage—Rub-Down—ALL IN ONE.

Revitalize with a Daily Massage-Shower

Fortifies against colds, disease and contagion. Stimulates circulation. Gives cold shower, without shock. Cleanses the impurities from every pore.

Massage of 595 Hollow Rubber "Tubes" Cleanses the Pores.

KNICKERBOCKER SHOWER BATH-BRUSH

Enjoy the delights of a real tonic bath! It clears the mind—animates every nerve cell in your body. You'll start each day renewed, energetic—fit to carry the load of a strenuous day's work. The only sanitary way to bathe. Does not splash. Saves shampoo expense. Better than expensive overhead showers, costs only a fraction as much. Lasts for years.

Five Sizes: $2, $3, $4, $5, De Luxe Set, $6
Syphon Shower-Bath Outfit for Homes Without Running Water, Complete, $4

Don't wait. Get a "Knickerbocker" today at your dealer's or order direct. For sale at all good Drug, Hardware and Department Stores. Wear fully guaranteed.

Send for FREE Booklet.

Interesting booklet free on request. It tells how and when to bathe.

Knickerbocker Mfg. Co.
248 Sigel Street, Chicago
Please send me your free Booklet, "A Knickerbocker Bath."
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

Unequalled for Shampooing

The staunch, flexible rubber "tubes" of the "Knickerbocker" penetrate the heaviest hair, massage the scalp, and clean, running water washes away all soap, dirt and dandruff. Promotes growth—in a natural way.

KNICKERBOCKER MFG. CO.
248 Sigel Street Chicago, Illinois

A Barber Shaves More Men in a Day Than You Shave in a Month

HAVE you noticed that all barbers use just one type of razor—the GENCO type? Two hundred thousand barbers—men who earn their bread, butter and cake by shaving—wouldn't keep right on using this one type of razor if a better had ever been discovered.

Some men deny themselves the use of a regular razor because they imagine that stropping a regular razor is an Art or the trick of a skilled hand.

Barbers aren't stopped by any such notion. They simply buy razors built to strop.

Anybody Can Strop a GENCO Razor

It's built to strop. It has a broad back; its blade is hollow ground; and right behind that thin, keen edge is a slight bevel. Back, hollow-grinding and bevel, all three help to set its edge against the strop at exactly the correct angle. A few light strokes, and you have a perfect shaving edge—the smoothly cutting edge all barbers recognize the need of having.

Save the time and money in shaving that every barber does. A barber shaves hundreds to your one, but—you shave over three hundred times a year.

Drop in on your dealer. Take a GENCO in hand and look for the three features mentioned. Every one of our razors is hand-forged and hand-ground from special steel. That's necessary because of our guarantee—"GENCO Razors must make good or we will."

If your dealer hasn't GENCO Razors, we will supply you

Geneva Cutlery Corporation
230 Gates Avenue Geneva, N. Y.

Largest Exclusive Manufacturers of High-Grade Razors in the World

Note how Genco Razors meet the strop. That slight bulge just behind the edge has two purposes: it insures a perfect edge from the strop; it lends backbone to the edge.

and as such, however annoying, it must be recognized and accepted. I say "must" because the true dramatist writes, or at least rewrites, for the stage of his own time. To all who will hear me I say: Let posterity go hang, as far as your play writing is concerned! Write, write, for the living present! Posterity will do you no good—nor need you, with the highest ideals, trouble yourself further about posterity than to do your best to cheer and encourage and so help and improve the men and women of your own time by your portrayal and interpretation of human life and experience. It may have pleased and comforted old Ben Jonson to have Francis Beaumont write to him

Thou hast squar'd thy rules by what is good
And art three ages, yet, from understood!

But I'll bet a cooky that plays written in the present which are three ages yet from being understood will never get themselves produced—or read, either, for that matter.

The idea round which your play is to be built having been clearly set before your own mind the story by which it is to be illustrated and communicated to the perceptions of others is to be invented and arranged and, that story is to be told from first to last in action. Now, so to tell your story requires that incidents and events must visibly occur, and occur as consequences resulting from definite, clearly revealed causes. Your dramatic skeleton must be perfectly articulated in every joint or it cannot properly move. That vitally requires construction—and, be your native dramatic faculty and technical training what they may, it will tax them hard to avoid making faults and flaws in this essential requisite to success. You can go forward and back and pick up loose ends; you can carry along first one thread of narrative, then another; you can expatiate and explain and readjust, in a novel—but you cannot do so in a play; if you do it ceases to be a play.

It has been perfectly said by the greatest critic of the drama that "For the purposes of a dramatic author human life is to be viewed as a river which, for the greater part, flows underground, only at intervals breaking forth into the light. Every character has a background. Every condition of individualism and of circumstance is consequent on a long line of antecedent facts. The dramatic instinct perceives the points of contact, the moments of upheaval, will conflict, action—and a true dramatist shows human beings and human life as Fate shows them."

Models for Technical Study

This life river of which your play is a revealed segment, or succession of segments, has its source far off—years ago. Different characters turn into it incidents and events until at last at the proper moment—impelled by you—it breaks forth into the light, a confluent, propulsive, dramatic stream. To create this effect not an incident must be shown that is not contributory to the main stream; not a character must be shown that is not implicated; not a word must be spoken that is not relevant—while all essential antecedent facts and postures of circumstance must be directly revealed to the auditors; and this must be done without causing the dramatic characters either to inform each other of matters which it does not concern them to know or concerning which they must in the nature of things already be fully conversant. Though a few fine plays have been rapidly written—that old-time success, The Game of Speculation, in which Charles Mathews gave his famous personation of Sir Affable Hawk, for example, is said to have been completed within eleven hours—it is unusual, and I have known true dramatists, of a high order and finely trained, to work for two years to create the effect specified, and yet fail to do so.

There is no better way—there is no other way so good—by which to discover, comprehend and cultivate the technic of construction than to dissect out the constructive fabrics created by masters, remote or recent, of the art of play writing. For this purpose I would specially recommend to the student for analytical perusal—among the works of the old dramatists—Marlowe's Doctor Faustus and King Edward II; from the works of Shakspere the first act—which dramatically is much the best—of Hamlet, and the whole of Othello, Romeo and Juliet, and Macbeth—though the fourth act of the latter is badly messed up and may well be—as it is—styled by the commentators "corrupt." I would have him examine with care Jonson's pone, or the Fox and Webster's Duch Malfi. I recently heard the study of den recommended, but Dryden is ins icant as a dramatist and only intere and important as a poet. As a mas words he is marvelous—but study works as plays is study thrown awa later dramatists I would specify the di perusal of Vanbrugh's The Relapse; greve's The Way of the World; Farqu The Inconstant; Goldsmith's She S to Conquer—which is the perfecti farce; and Sheridan's School for Sc and The Rivals—particularly the l because of its remarkable double qu with Captain Absolute the connectin between two groups of characters. let him take in order The Long Strike the telegraph scene; The Colleen and Con, the Shaughraun, of Dion B cault; School and Caste, by Rober The Silver King and The Middlema which the second act is absolute perfect by Jones; The Cardinal, by Pa Alabama and The Witching Hour Thomas; The Easiest Way, by Et Walter; and the first act of The Gam by Charles Klein. Should the neophy dramatic authorship deem this really course of technical study onerous—let quit at once and direct his energies other channels; play writing is not for The student with a genuine dramatic will find the analysis of them a deligh

Writing Against Time

Let me here enter a plea in confe and avoidance: I would not be unders to imply that the scheme of study practice in play writing of which I tried to formulate an outline is the have always followed. It is not. It general terms the scheme which exper has taught me it would always have best to follow and which I am satisfie be kindly commended to beginners. I with all my heart somebody had mended it to me when I was begin But I had to learn play writing by sisted study—which by fortunate acci began with the works of Shakspere an an entirely empirical method.

Whatever may be the estimate of rank as a dramatist I think I may wit hesitation name myself as a natural I began without suggestion, advice o struction, to write plays when I was than ten years old. Before I was more twelve I had written one, on the assas tion of Lincoln, entitled The Roll of Drum, which eventually was playe many Western towns; and since then prior to 1882 I have adapted, altered rewritten—often in their entirety—s thing more than two hundred plays, of which were old but many of which new, though in such form that they c not be used. Since 1882 I have wri about thirty major plays in collabora with other authors—not counting n work which it has been my privilege t on many pieces with which my name is usually associated. And likewise in time I have independently written al twenty other plays—of which I am author. In the old days it was compul with me to know how to write plays—was my job—and through many a str of weeks I had to have a new one ready every Monday night. As I look bac those far-off times it seems like lookir indeed, it is—into another world. I rem ber that on one barnstorming tour in smallest mountain towns and camps, w I was acting, among other parts, Har and Robert Macaire, I was also workin six plays at once, including my dram Sylvia's Lovers, on which, years afterw I based the first play of mine that mad unqualified and enduring success in York—May Blossom.

And when at home, in San Francisc led an even busier life, for I worked all directing rehearsals and getting up scen then ran the stage and often played a sr part or two at night—and rewrote made plays in between times. And, by way, I did not get $750 a week for labors. Still—I learned my business. this is a digression.

One of the questions most frequer asked me relative to the writing of play as to what field gives the best opportu ties to the dramatist. That is rather a h question and one that would be answe differently by many experienced jud or my part, I give my voice for the field of mestic life. I concur in general with Haz- t i his doctrine that "Poetry and the ngelo not agree well together"—not, at st the poetry of words and our modern age Prose form and the experiences cisly incident to domestic life will, I indin, in competent hands, yield the t that is, the most suggestive, helpful, c/e dramas.

(Continued on Page 157)

(Continued from Page 154)

re is a cant phrase that bobs up r little while which declares that "All e is the material of dramatic art." I em- atically dissent. There is, first, the con- der ion of what it is proper to show on age. Honest opinions may and do de differ on that point. Nevertheless ere some things concerning the impro- iet of which on the stage there is not and m be any divergence of rational and ce opinion. Then again, the crossing of es the air or the cobbling of old shoes in , and millions of other similar things e part of all life—and assuredly are not tial for dramatic art, because they are t in themselves either interesting or rtic.

W hear much about Nature as the ur of our dramas—and, questionless, e urpose of play writing, as of play act- g, "to hold the mirror up to Nature," ected aspects. But let us constantly mber, as the Great Cham of Litera- reo sensibly remarked, that "mere ob- ou Nature may be exhibited with very tt power of mind." Everyday life is inal of tremendous actual dramas; we el em, hear them, see them round us all e me. But very, very seldom are those ans of actuality available for stage use. Why? Because generally they extend rgh long stretches of time and are inex- icably tangled together with innumerable ificant incidents. It is only an authen- c ramatist of the highest order—and ch only occasionally—who can seize po such natural dramas, perceive the ings of their movement, the vital aspects f ir conflictive yet confluent characters dvents and epitomizing and translating e into terms of the theater, arrange e in a picture of action and, as it were, xp ss out of them the essential living ele- ens of a stage drama.

When Grass Was Green

dramatist, moreover, who confined imself to his own first-hand knowledge of Nature would have material for more than nelay—and he would be precious hard ut o it to provide enough for even one. Veaust all go to the great store of various xperience garnered up for us since first na became a recording animal. And this rings us to the subject of plagiarism—

s bject every modern play writer should nvestigate and understand, and to me a ecliarly sore one, because I have been, I hink, more often and more acrimoniously ccused of that despicable offense than any th dramatist of my time. Par paren- hèse, I would say that I have always ought trial of such charges and that in ery instance where it has been possible orne to bring my aspersers into court I ha disproved their slanderous accusa- ion against my ability as a play writer and my integrity as a man. In only one in- tance in all my experience—the allegations gainst me in re The Case of Becky—was thtrial court's decision in my favor car- ied to appeal; in that instance the Court of ppeals affirmed the finding of the lower co t.

ut to be publicly vilified as a dramatic thief every time I successfully produce a ply is irritating to the temper—and it is no soothing to recollect that I have been forced to spend many thousands of dollars to rotect myself and my associates. It is a fa which ought to be judicially recognized in ustice to all play writers that the bring- in of accusations of plagiarism in connec- tion with notably successful plays is to-day a egular business and that, as things are at present, an honest reputable manager has often, without possibility of redress, to choose between paying blackmail and spending large sums of money as well as precious time and energy in proving that he is ot a thief.

What is plagiarism? The poet Campbell many years ago satirically inscribed in the autograph album of an admiring lady the statement that there "is nothing original nowadays, excepting sin." That substan- tially appears to have been a popular doc- trine from the time when Koheleth wrote Ecclesiastes down to the present day. "Virtue," as remarked by the Bard, "cannot live out of the teeth of emulation," and the teeth of emulation appear to defamation and falsehood, and detraction is so extreme in the present day that it is only necessary to write a success in order to be sure of being called a thief! Doctor Johnson ridicules the absurd statement that the important sentence in Shakspere, "Go before, I follow," is a translation of "I præ sequar." But I actually had to go into court and spend a large sum of money because in my play of Sweet Kitty Bellairs the color of grass is mentioned as green!

Plagiarism is primarily and essentially the appropriation in art of ideas, inventions, thoughts and language which are original with another; artistic theft. But no writer who draws—as all good writers must draw—from the great common stock of fiction and recorded fact is therefore justly to be held or designated a plagiarist; nor is he, unless in utilizing his materials he achieves success. Nobody ever claims your bad plays or your failures; at least nobody has ever claimed mine. I wish they would!

What is Plagiarism and What is Not

All of us, great and small, who are original dramatists and writers, go to real life, as far as it is accessible to us, for our materials. But how little of life would be accessible if we each of us depended exclusively on his own personal experiences! Therefore of necessity we have recourse to scores or hundreds or even thousands of printed sources of information and pictures of human life. In doing so there is no taint of plagiarism—as long as we keep to matters of fact. If, for example, you find in a newspaper, magazine or other source the recorded actual words and deeds of a person in real life and use them in your play, that is not plagiarism. But to take the imagined words, the invented situations, original with another author, that would be plagiarism.

To illustrate: The murder of King Duncan, in Macbeth, is based directly on a passage in Holinshed's Chronicle History of Scotland, describing the assassination of King Duff, an actual monarch who ruled over Scotland for six years—961–67—by one of his followers, named Donwald, who was instigated by his wife. Prince Hal's seizure of the crown of England, in King Henry IV., when mistakenly he supposes the king, his father, is dead, is based on another passage in Holinshed. The finest of Volumnia's speeches, in Coriolanus, is taken by Shakspere from North's translation of Plutarch's Lives. But those are instances not of plagiarism but of rightful use of veritable events and language.

Per contra, Daniel Webster's famous allusion to the British Empire, "A power... whose morning drumbeat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England," is essentially a plagiarism, being a paraphrase of an invented commentary by another writer, namely, James Howell, who, February 1, 1623, wrote from Madrid to Viscount Colchester a letter in which occur these words: "The sun shines all the four and twenty hours of the natural day upon some part of his"—the King of Spain's—"countries." And Tennyson's famous line, "The path of duty was the way to glory" (Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, 1852) is likewise substantially a plagiarism from Lord Macaulay, who, 1831, wrote of Hampden that he "found glory only because glory lay in the plain path of duty."

As to plagiarism of theme—as Sir Walter Scott observed: "Originality consists in the mode of treating a subject more than in the subject itself," and plagiarism of theme is almost impossible. All the subjects of the world are open to all the writers of the world, and old subjects will always be rewelcomed on the stage if they be but treated in new and dramatic ways.

The consideration of timeliness—of which, also, we hear much—is obviously a commercial one and will seldom, I think, sway a genuine play writer in selecting a theme. Support for the contrary opinion might be supplied by citing, for example, the course of Dion Boucicault—especially in such plays as Formosa, The Flying Scud and The Jilt—but I believe that the timeliness of many successful plays is incidental. That is, instead of the dramatist's deliberately looking about to find a subject fitted to the time some subject of innate dramatic

What Polish Does for Good Shoes

REGULAR polishing does more for shoes than simply keeping them neat. Polish is also necessary to replenish the tanning preservatives of leather lost in wearing. Use only the best dressings—such as the Crossett Shoe Dealer will be glad to recommend.

In polishing, avoid excessive friction, as undue heat is not good for any leather.

Wear in a shoe is hidden. Hence the necessity of a brand that means something to you when selecting a shoe. The name CROSSETT on your shoes is a definite guarantee of full value and longer wear.

Ask Crossett Shoe Dealer for Booklet:
"SHOES—THEIR CARE."

Lewis A. Crossett, Inc., North Abington, Mass.

for MEN and WOMEN
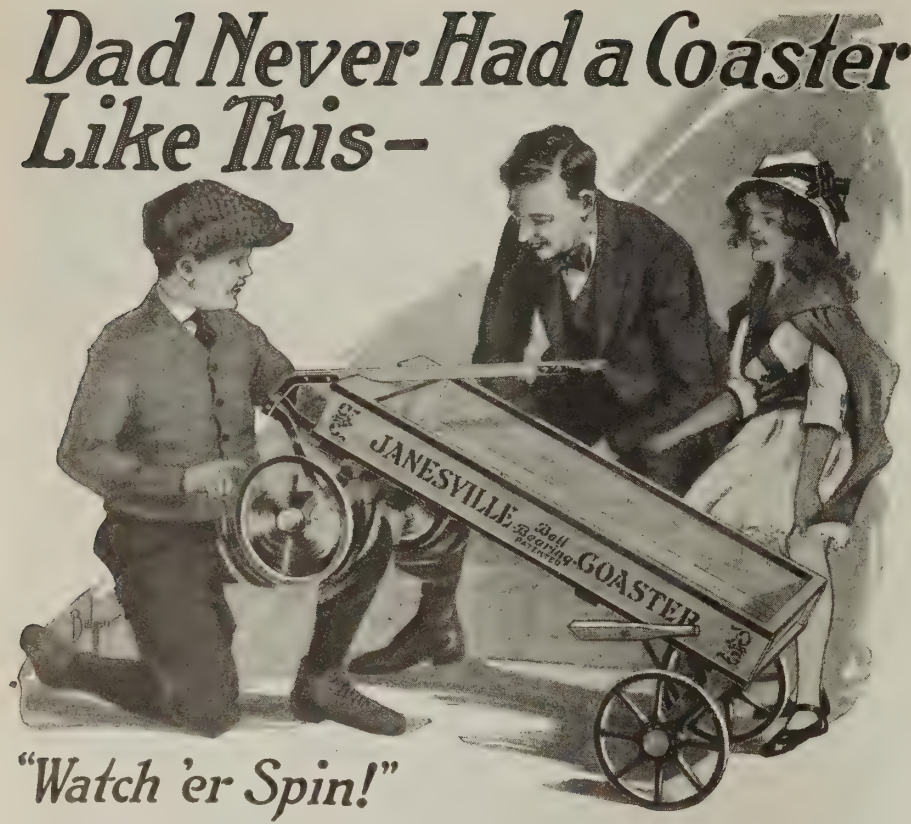
The CROSSETT Shoe
"MAKES LIFE'S WALK EASY"
TRADE MARK

Dad Never Had a Coaster Like This—



"Watch 'er Spin!"

AND dad looks on, as keenly interested as any of the young folks, watching the ball-bearing wheel spin 'round and 'round as if it would never stop. And all the time dad's wishing he could be a boy again. You bet he'd have a Janesville Coaster with ball-bearing, auto-type wheels and nickel-plated dust caps. With this real "speed-wagon" he'd beat all the boys in the block.

Janesville BALL BEARING Coaster

Never before has a coaster wagon been built like this. Has more speed, gives the boys more fun. Keeps them out in the open, builds strong, nimble bodies and quick-acting minds. And for work, no other wagon is in it. Runs so easily it makes play of hauling heavy loads of groceries, coal, wood, ice, milk cans, etc.

Skudder Car
no-dead-center
BALL-BEARING

A power car that provides healthful, fascinating fun for the youngsters. They never tire of it. Operates by shifting the weight from one foot to the other on the tilting board.

Speeds up to 10 or 12 miles an hour. Simple, strong, durable.

The Janesville Line also includes the famous Jiffy Scoot and the Spee Dee Hand Car. Ask your dealer about them.

Built Extra Strong at Every Point

Spokes are tenoned in the rims. Has heavy steel tires set with hydraulic pressure and securely riveted. Axles are ½" cold rolled steel. Bolsters are rigidly braced, front and rear. Body is made of selected white ash, close-grained, strong and tough. Wheels and body are given a fine, durable finish.

In every way the Janesville Ball-Bearing Coaster is an exceptional wagon—extra strong and durable, unusually attractive, the Speed-King of Coasters.

Sold at hardware, department and furniture stores everywhere. If your dealer hasn't it he can quickly get it for you.

Dealers—If your jobber does not handle the Janesville line ask us for the name of the jobber in your territory who does.

Made in U.S.A.

Janesville Products Co., Janesville, Wis.

quality is forced upon his notice by reason of a special general attention then directed to it; its dramatic possibilities are perceived by him; his natural faculty asserts itself—and he writes a timely play.

The vitality and staying power of a play will always depend upon the degree to which its story and characters are representative types of experience and humanity, rather than of eccentric and passing aspects of local and contemporaneous life—and necessarily there seldom will be much that is representative in a theme which is selected because it happens to be a prominent one of the passing hour. It was acutely recognized by Saint Augustine that "we see ourselves upon the stage; we become a secret and unperceived actor in the piece, and there is acted before us our own special passion." Therein lies an invaluable hint to the dramatist: Let him constantly remember that the more vividly and wholly representative a drama is the more certain we are to recognize our various selves in it when we see it acted on the stage—and the more vital and useful it will be.

I earnestly counsel all writers of drama to avoid as a capital crime the effort to make the dialogue of their plays literary in quality. The drama is the most objective of arts—and literature is subjective. The primary purpose in framing dialogue must be to cause it to proceed with apparent inevitability out of the situations of the play, to contribute to its movement and to be strictly appropriate to the characters that speak. This will often compel the use of slang, argot, profanity or technicality of language—which, of course, is diametrically opposed to a pure literary quality of expression. But it is not enough for practical purposes of the stage that the speeches be characteristic; they must be wrought over and over again, until they are not only characteristic of the speakers uttering them but also are expressed in the tersest, clearest, simplest words that would be characteristic.

The Art of Concealing Art

If, for example, one of your characters is a prolix bore you must work—and it will be found hard work—so that he shall cause that effect, yet in fact use the fewest possible words. The problem of the play writer in such a case is analogous to that of the actor who must portray a breathless man—Biondello, for example, in delivering the description of Petruchio's wedding, in The Shrew—who must appear to be breathless but must not be so. Again, if to be in character another of your interlocutors must utter his thoughts in polysyllabic language you must weigh, examine and consider with the nicest care the polysyllables which you cause him to use—always practically remembering that stage dialogue is to be actually spoken, not silently read, and bearing in mind the lingual requirements of words and the lingual abilities of average actors. The supreme felicity of art is to produce the effect of the spontaneous simplicity of Nature; and nothing in art that I know of is so complicated as the process of doing so.

Several of my plays—if I may be permitted a personal allusion—have been by some judges censured upon two main grounds: First, because they are not literary; secondly, because, as alleged, they introduce and depict incidents that are not germane to the central themes.

I demur to censure under the first head not on the ground that the allegation is untrue but on the ground that I maintain as a merit what those judges condemn as a fault. I do not intend or wish to be literary in my plays, and I am gratified to know that I seldom am so. My object is to create and sustain dramatic effect, piling situation on situation with steadily cumulative force until the climax is reached, thus rendering my audiences expectant, tense, excited and emotional and so swaying them as I please.

As to the second complaint which I have cited—I demur to it because it rises from a divergence of opinion concerning th of Nature and as to what is or is r mane to a central theme. Under th I will say only that if the process nical analysis be applied to my plays I believe, surprise many persons cover how generally impossible it is out any incident in them, no matt seemingly trivial or extreme. Y sometimes knock a hole in a hou without doing serious damage—p even to advantage; but when you tamper with the footing of its foun or with the sills upon which it is rea are pretty certain to bring the wh fice down on top of you.

So, I venture to say, is it with my there are mighty few incidents of them—or in those of any con dramatist—which have not been, word goes, "planted" there with del thought and purpose.

The Great American Pla

A request often made of me is opinion concerning the great An play—which many persons appear eagerly intent on writing—and I m end this dissertation on play writin some brief comment thereon. I once upon a time aspired to write it— I should be subjected to the extre torture I am not at all sure that a sion of belief that I have done so co be extracted from me, even now. B of course, in any other way!

The great American play—the itself would make a fine title. But w its requirements? It must be first o tensely and superlatively dramati cannot be great as a play. Then it m written by an American, a nativ American, on a representative An theme; its scene must be laid wh America and its dialogue must be, th out, a characteristically Americanize of the English language.

Many plays start to my mind as on this subject, though I will not v here and now to maintain the claims of them to receive the coveted desig In passing, I will, however, go so fa record my conviction that up to the p moment Mr. Eugene Walter has w the best American drama, namely Easiest Way; and that Mr. La Mitchell has written the best Am comedy, namely, The New York Ide Walter's dialogue in its simplicity, ness and truth is superb; and Mr. ell's is brilliant without effort or any of the obvious stagy smartness of, ample, Oscar Wilde.

If the great American play is to b ten in this period it will, I think, dea some aspect of American life now at quarter of a century old; very po even more remote. In the infancy theater the dramatic fashions came t prescribed by Europeans, and our reflected and echoed to a great exte thought and life and drama of Europ more than a generation past, thoug matic fashions have continued to cro ocean to us, Europeans themselves also been coming to us by the million any picture of American life made exists to-day will almost certainly tinctured by the thought and feelin Europeans that in my judgment i hardly be deemed representatively ican.

But in the coming on of time the conglomerate of American populatio interpenetrate and fuse into one American and all-powerful people, b ing down sectional barriers and wipin foreign colonies within our land. amalgamation has already been well in the white heat of our vast war effort when it is completed there will be a pler opportunity than ever before for great American play. Meantime, o thing I am absolutely certain—that t there is more authentic drama to be f in this country than in any other in a world.

THE YOUNG IDEA

(Continued from Page 20)

te de entrance of the house. A large ern of Irish extraction was at the d a small snub-nosed aristocrat of nine enlightened years was scram- in the seat beside him.

"Now just look at that," Mansfield went with much bitterness, "after I gave Alex al orders about letting John take my ou" John, it developed, was his ge brother. "Every single time John o in that car he brings it back he"

"Is your car?" I asked feebly.

"It was a Christmas present. It's a to. You ought to see her go."

I sat there listening to him expound- on the various remarkable features of ul ide gift my first great lesson as a he began to soak in, and that lesson ist of a simple variant of the ancient ee hat you can lead a horse to water yo can't make him drink. You can th young idea to the burbling or lin fount of knowledge and invite —at as a stern mentor but merely as a ra —to go on a gentle jag with you; ma even douse him in it, but unless of ow free will he takes to the stuff you a well save your precious energy.

an years ago a certain wise teacher th there were no good teachers, only pils. And it is my firmly founded f at that wise musician could have t leading light in any Ananias club wi that one clear gleaming spark of truth have saved his eternal soul a penance for his blackest lies.

nother thing on which I received en- ement during my years of novitiate as eir was the scholarship, or free pupil. ll ducational walks of life, when his etook is lean and limp, the brilliant ler is always given his opportunity by benevolently inclined to develop his ear talent—and nowhere else is such evidence so necessary as in music.

Francis and His Fiddle

t is self-evident fact that our greatest us, our most glorified talents have e om the humblest, the ugliest, poor- pl es in life—for it would seem that er breeds genius—and without the lly helping hand there could be no de- pment of their gifts. And that tender t, he musical talent, must have many rs f patient care and labor expended n to bring it to perfection. But eth r because of the skyrocket flight of chosen few who have been helped to r success or from some obscure reasoning he own there exists a vast throng of dicre talent, who too often—emulat- th lively Bolshevist—demand that the t istruction be laid at their feet gratis; t he patrons of music pour out their d n concerts and advertising to place m efore the public; or even to feed l othe them. In accepting all this, irs s always the attitude of conferring re favor on their benefactors.

n plea at all serves this breed very well a eason for grafting. Johnny has to ve is tonsils removed, so could he have a ol ship? Or Agnes has to have her th straightened this year; because y'e decided to have the house done er the paternal parent has just bought ne nan top for the flivver. In the short al nonth of February last I had all the ov reasons presented to me by would-be pil as adequate excuse for the cutting of ual fee in their favor. Mighty was their ligation when they were refused.

Perhaps the most refreshing thing about s musical Mollusca is how easily they s ay with it. But then, some people ul get away with murder. The most per- t ecimen of this class I ever met was a rta young hopeful whom for the want a etter name we shall call Francis. His mother was endowed with a com- tale but not overwhelming amount of is world's goods and a feverish eye on e ain chance. In this instance the main are proved to be Francis. Some mis- idl individual gave him a tiny violin on s gth birthday and in a foolishly gener- s oment arranged with a certain teacher r term of lessons. Before that term ev to a close Francis' fond mother had sc ered that their unpretentious in- om—hitherto considered a great disad- an ge—could be turned into a veritable on za through Francis and his tiny fiddle.

They made of him a typical infant prodigy, velvet-suited and spindle-legged, and dragged him hither and yon to play for this famous musician, that wealthy patron of music, this club and that entertainment; at every place emphasizing by a thousand ingenious methods their willingness to cut their hearts out for the boy and their utter misery at not being able to give him the advantages his marvelous talent deserved.

Believing firmly that it pays to advertise, after the fashion of mothers of musical Mollusca, she started a Francis propaganda. Wherever she might be, with the high or with the low, with the tin-can millionaire or the humble but necessary milkman, she talked of nothing but the triumphs of Francis. Every casual idle word that might reflect glory on Francis and uttered by anyone who might by the wildest stretch of the imagination be called someone was snatched upon by Francis' family and set to music and chanted in unison to any unfortunate audience they could fasten upon.

For a long while the established musicians viewed the whole proceedings with a hearty disgust, but presently, like all other propaganda, Francis began to take effect. There were certain hangers on, the parrots of the musical world, who—ever attracted by a loud noise—began to flock over to him and add their iterated encomiums to the din. In a brilliant burst one of these hailed him as a genius, and after that not even the most forbearing human could have lived round Francis or his family without becoming addicted to homicide.

It was shortly after this that Francis was sent to Europe. The man who did it said he thought that perhaps if the lad had a chance to get away from his family he might outgrow the blight they had put upon him. But his hopes were soon dashed, for Francis' mother went along. They stayed abroad a year or so and when they returned they brought back a hectic scandal on the foreign shopmen and Francis had learned to kiss the wrinkled hands of foolish rich old women, and some not so old, and to cast cow eyes at any member of the younger feminine contingent whose adoration he thought might prove useful to him.

So at twenty he held the record for having been clothed, fed and taught by the bounty of strangers, and the principal thing it had developed in him was a case of the purest, sweetest and most fatuous self-love that anyone ever witnessed. His personal vanity was supreme and the only fly in his honey was the fact that the really big men of his profession would have none of him. He stormed their indifference with every trick of his kind, but since his was not the great, sincere and unselfish gift he made not the slightest impression.

A Hardy Perennial

But regardless of the setback his vanity received by his being ignored by the great in his world, that hardy plant flourished and grew until there came a time when no mere ordinary mortal would have dared offer the slightest criticism of Francis or his virtuosity without first ensconcing himself carefully behind some large and durable piece of furniture and proffering it with flowers.

So Francis continued on his merry way unmolested, prying into every conversation with the story of his latest success at Podunk, where he had held the audience in the hollow of his hand, and emphasizing carefully the real or imagined fury of the tenor, who doubled the bill with him, at the extra encores Francis had been compelled to give.

Unfortunately we have no means of controlling this misguided philanthropy that takes the ordinarily gifted or the not gifted at all and makes highly developed egotists of them, near-musicians who use their art to exploit their petty personal vanity. It is members of this class who by their bizarre exaggerations have done more to black the eye of the musical profession than anything else. Doubtless if we had a great conservatory in this country, as they have in the various European countries, a school under civic or government control conducted on a system perhaps resembling in some ways that of our public schools, whose teachers were masters in their lines, where the ambitious and impecunious student might go and—provided he passed the entrance examinations—be educated gratis

Makers of the famous Ever-Ready Safety Razor and Ever-Ready Radio Blades

$ $ $

If you need more money, here is an easy way to get it.

★ ★ ★ ★

Wherever you go you find people reading The Saturday Evening Post.

★ ★ ★ ★

And The Ladies' Home Journal—and The Country Gentleman.

★ ★ ★ ★

This universal demand is worth money to you if you will help us to satisfy it.

★ ★ ★ ★

You don't need experience: your profits begin when you start work.

★ ★ ★ ★

For the results you are sure to get we pay you liberal commissions and a generous monthly salary.

★ ★ ★ ★

For spare-time work you can easily earn a dollar or even two dollars an hour.

★ ★ ★ ★

Full-time work brings others as much as one hundred dollars a week. Why not you?

★ ★ ★ ★

This is the beginning of the "magazine season." We need men and women to obtain the hundreds of thousands of renewals, new orders and Christmas gift orders now waiting.

★ ★ ★ ★

If you have even an hour a day to spare, we've an excellent opening for you.

★ ★ ★ ★

Write at once to The Curtis Publishing Company, 469 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

or for a reasonable fee it would help eliminate the Francis type.

But instead of there being such a school the student in America is dependent to a great extent upon a series of large musical factories—schools is a decided misnomer for these institutions—run entirely from the commercial standpoint. This is always a joyful proceeding from the business viewpoint, but from that of education often leaves something to be desired. These schools draw almost their entire clientèle from ambitious dream-eager souls in those small villages that dot America and are known to a certain blasé fraternity as the tall grass. They hold out as a lure the fact that they give as prizes at their annual contests practically everything from pianos and quarts of medals to a house and lot. They make the most florid statements about the instantaneous success of the pupils who come under their altruistic guidance. But perhaps the astute business men, the active heads of these schools, should not be blamed too severely for keeping their eyes on the monetary main chance and wasting little time being idealists. They know full well that being an idealist is seldom remunerative, and so, like certain theatrical managers of girly-girly shows, they calmly turn the most subtle of the arts into a ballyhoo, on the theory that they are giving the well-known public what it wants.

Fired by the Story of Bessie

They have a few excellent teachers, perhaps even one of international fame, but they pin such a fancy price to their instruction that only the plutocratic few can ever reach them. They give out a number of scholarships, but here their chance to do a service to brilliant talent is nullified by the fact that advertising works both ways, for these scholarships generally are allotted to the Francis type of pupil because he clamors the loudest.

Their prevailing type of teacher, after we have excepted their imported models, is the one that furnishes most of the material for those frenzied articles that appear from time to time in various periodicals about Bessie from Junkville, who took the egg-and-butter money she had hoarded for years and went to the great city to learn to sing. And when she got there her much-advertised teacher piled bricks on her chest and held her nose and then defied her to go ahead and make a sound.

Most of these articles, I have always noticed, have to do with the trials of vocalists instead of instrumentalists; I presume because vocalists—being naturally more gabby—are less averse to publishing the sad tales of their gullibility.

Perhaps after all, though, these music asylums are giving the public what it wants. Of course occasionally a quaintly narrow-minded teacher will profanely deny that there is any excuse for their existence when he has to take one of their finished products, all done up in tin medals and labeled "artist" and has to instill into her the first principles of rhythm and intonation. But then, some people are strangely crude—natural-born kickers. And, take it from the particular school he is yipping about, awful liars too!

Naturally this category does not include the few—all too few—splendid schools headed by sincere conscientious men, often not remarkable musicians themselves but honest at least in trying to do the best for their pupils. There is one in particular—but who ever cared about reading about the peaceful activities of good people!

Since we have no school endowed by the Government where our great talents can go and be educated, our patron of art—whether he be one for reasons of social advancement or purely altruistic motives—in succumbing to his desire to have a little genius in his home, and in relying upon his own judgment in choosing said genius, often lights upon a sorry failure or an embryo Francis. But they are good losers, these patrons, and incorrigibly optimistic. Let one of them, after sinking thousands in educating and advertising his protégé, find he has drawn a musical blank and no one will hear him set up a howl about it. Instead he blandly starts looking about him for a new Paderewski. Or if by chance in his gentle pastime of boosting a career he actually succeeds in putting his protégé at the top and is rewarded by that protégé with a temperamental display of conceit and bumptious ingratitude, he adopts the attitude that the greatness of the gift whose development he has made possible enables him to overlook any faults.

The Stodgy Little Girls

He thinks philosophically that as long as he has plucked his rare flower out of the dump heap of poverty and misery for its flash of vivid color and has found that its poisonous thorns and the stench of its environment still cling to it, it would be the act of a pusillanimous ass on his part to demand of it the fragile graces of the hot-house-reared plant. Not that he ever expresses it that way—far from it. Instead he merely sighs regretfully when his protégé begins to strut and air his little temperament, and says it is too bad that success has given the boy the big head.

When he fails in choosing the talent that will make the ultimate great success his judgment is not to be scoffed at, for musical talent is one of the easiest things to be mistaken in and there are as many kinds and degrees of it as there are seeds in the luscious pomegranate.

There is the nice talent belonging mostly to mild stodgy little girls who grow up and marry important pillars of their community and join clubs; who are always excessively in earnest in worshiping art, and in whose hands—regardless of certain professional sniffs at their type of musical intelligence and their careful chaste playing—lies the making or breaking of the aspirant for public favor. For the career of a concert artist depends largely on advertising and propaganda, and the women are the best propagandists he can have. Let them fail to flutter and fuss about some long, lean, ugly individual endowed with more than his share of cynicism and calculating shrewdness; let them fail to flock round him after a concert and hang on his rare pearls of verbal wisdom, fail to speak of his godlike face—and see how long he would have enough box-office value to buy postage stamps.

It is decidedly the women and not the men who have fostered and been responsible for the really remarkable growth of music in America, for how rare is the American man who will go to opera unless his wife drags him!

Along with the nice talent there is the student talent; the talent—and because of its perseverance it is worthy of that name—which studies all its life, going first to this teacher and then to that teacher; always men and women from thirty to fifty who have never had the courage to rely on themselves.

Then there is the great throng of methodical talent which fills the orchestras. Such talent is indispensable to any musical life, for without the stimulus of the orchestra, music—or rather musical literature—would fast descend into the twaddle-twaddle and the tinkle-tinkle of the fish-worms-at-play type of composition.

There is the half-baked playing talent, often capable of more than it ever accomplishes, which infests the lyceums, Chautauquas and small-time concerts. This often includes students driven to earning a living by stern necessity long before they are equipped, and Fate keeps them at it the rest of their lives.

Of the greatest importance on our list is the malleable imitative talent. From this type come our sensational artists. For if an imitative talent falls into the ha master teacher, a master intelligen is absolutely nothing that cannot with it. There is no pinnacle of that one with such a talent, the rig ing and advertising may not achie cause of his blind obedience he will where one with a finer intelligen originality, a more sensitive gift True, such an artist or machine lasts more than a decade. As soon entirely away from the influenc teacher, who has governed his ever when he is dependent upon himse he nearly always fails.

A typical example of this type w tain violinist whose name became hold word some dozen years ago was nothing that could be done wit lin that he could not do. There technical stunt or nuance of tone him. After he had been a number away from the man who had take a boy of five and made him into thi human artistic machine he began performances of which a good c tious student would have been a for the imitative talent, sensation often is, is never original. It neve its inspiration from within itself, b ways dependent upon others.

And last we have that rare mar great natural talent that no hardsh erty or even dissipation can kill a like murder or scandal, will out re of what forces are brought into pla fle it. It is the talent that is worthy much-abused word "genius," whic has been applied to every musical whose press agent had the most imagination. No one has ever been give a satisfactory definition of gen practically everyone can recognize most sophisticated musician, who i at loss to explain exactly how the d artists do it, gives up and joins th laity when a talent of this stamp a The genius does not depend upon te display—though his digital dexterit ways brilliant—or stunt advertis make his success. His is always a ma personality, but his art, though do enhanced by that personality, is no dependent upon it. He may be of the intellectual type, and again he ma

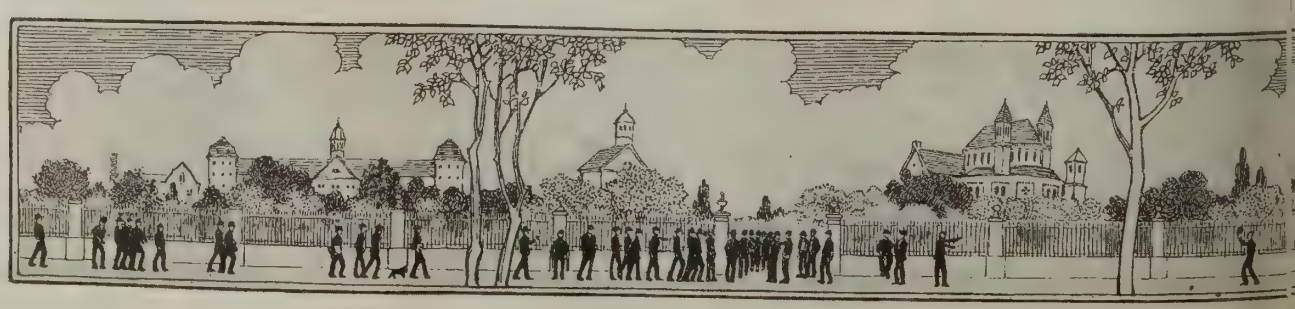
Star-Spangled Artists

A brilliant mind does not nece mean musical genius. On the co some of the brainest men we have in are deadly dull in their playing. Th of artist is permitted to take all ma liberties with his art. He can mak nical mistakes, play or sing a bit off and the one or two in the audience wh be cognizant of his shortcomings wil tion it—if they mention it at all— that they would rather hear him p sing a little off key than to listen to son's sensation never miss a note.

The audience that such an artist is worthy of comment. It is generall posed of that class of people that non would be afraid to meet alone in a alley if we were of a nocturnal dispo They are people who are whol clear-eyed and clean—above all, emphasize that last. On the other the sensation draws from a very dif crowd. They come from the grea washed, mentally and physically, an sensitive soul who insists on attendi of these concerts should fortify himsel a spray of disinfectant and a gas ma

There are a thousand and one degr talent between the sharply defined have mentioned, and strangely e just now the country is being flooded it in all its different stages. It see first glance to the casual onlooker th larger part of the adolescent populat changing into star-spangled artists night. We haven't one Paganini, l

(Continued on Page 165)



(Continued from Page 162)

sce. It leads us to believe that in the co se of time, like the trusty phonograph an the hardy mechanical piano, every fam ly that makes any pretensions at all wi have an artist in its midst.

ich a thing would not be at all impos-il· were it not for one item: The uncon-cius attitude of Americans toward music r ay of the arts as a profession. We have a rt, plenty of it, and I don't doubt that t pinch we could scare up quite an im-ong number of latent geniuses, but for h development of that talent we haven't h right atmosphere—heaven save the rd! We simply won't take art seriously. As nation we have an unconscious con-e pt for musicians. I anticipate the loud h us of protest and repeat that there is c ealed about us as a people a covert n r at the art as effeminate, sissy, the x se the shiftless use to get out of taking g real life's work like farming or some-ng in the mercantile line. Any of us will d it that that is not an attitude that or ds popularity for any enterprise. One ca not expect a live wire of a boy—a regu-ago-getter—to adopt a profession that lis him among his fellows as a tame cat, a lo ge lizard and a mental defective.

o though there is a great wave of talent sw ping the country just now it is not st tly a home product. If we scrutinize it closely we shall find that it bears a for-ig label.

aderewski's suddenly coming to the fore as diplomat and statesman has done a gr t and lasting kindness for the musical pr ession. By his ardent espousing of his co ntry's cause, his work as a fiery patriot, h great musician has put his profession on h plane where it belongs as the work of id listic but sane and earnest people. Per-ps in time the great public will grow to understand that music is as much the work of he-man as conducting a feed store or running a bank, for your true artist is ne er a hysterical freak. He is only a ma y honest everyday man like ourselves, on ly skilled along one line but vitally in-terested in anything and everything from te nis and golf to chemistry, engineering, international politics or aviation. When the public will get away from their hectic idea of him as half god, half devil, will cease to insist on mouthing with gloating delight any choice morsel concerning his alleged eccentricities or bizarre actions that they hasten to excuse on the grounds of his artistic temperament—they will be a deal clo er to the real man than they have ever been before; for if they only knew it this much-mooted artistic temperament at its wiest is nothing but plain cussedness and one of the stock tricks of trade used to en-thrall the gullible laity by certain artists, near-artists and—others.

Interfering Parents

But to get away from the exalted realm of the great artist who has nothing in the world to do but work like the proverbial de to keep from tumbling off his lofty and much envied perch, and to return to the young idea—has anyone ever done jus-tice to the subject of parents? I think not. Ab before many another marvel of Nature, wo ds fail before that.

Personally I have always entertained a great fondness and sympathy for those long-suffering, kind, patient, self-sacrificing, harassed members of the human race who spend their days trying to keep up with the arduous pace set by their high-powered offspring, and their nights worry-ing about that same pace. This inborn love of parents seems to be the failing of most of us unenlightened mortals. We may disobey them, laugh at their foibles, tear down and trample all their precious tradi-tional gods, scoff at their beliefs, run away and dishonor them and break their hearts, but we are always convinced in our secret souls that there have never been any in the long annals of parenthood who could quite equal our own father and mother. And we wouldn't exchange their dear im-perfection for any of the cheap excuses that other people have to put up with for all the good that one man could count in a lifetime.

Yes, personally I have always been in-clined to let parents live. But a number of my colleagues tell me this is a deplorable, and unpardonable weakness on my part.

Now there was one very eminent teacher who always insisted that his idea of heaven was a place where there were no parents. He doubtless if he had published this broadcast he would have been considered extremely narrow in his views. This same teacher also had the eccentric notion that the average parent, far from being a help to his offspring, was more often a positive hindrance to his development, the well-known stone about his neck, in fact.

Regardless of whether or not we feel that this heretical pedagogue should be incar-cerated in some cold, dark, dank, highly uncomfortable dungeon to meditate on his sinful attitude toward an ancient and hon-orable institution, we must admit that when one becomes a parent one's whole at-titude toward life changes. The king can do no wrong, and neither can a parent—in his own estimation. Before we were parents we sometimes felt that occasionally we might make a mistake—of course, it was highly improbable, but then it could hap-pen—but when we became parents we knew that we were infallible.

Children cannot help themselves; so par-ents, who often have never been able to im-press anyone before with their importance or authority, inflict all their seething, pent-up notions on dress, religion, education or what not on their unhappy offspring.

They mean well, of course, but when they endeavor to apply these scintillating ideas to music the result is often disastrous. It is one of the most common occurrences in the life of a music teacher to have a com-placent parent come up and inform him just what she would like to have her em-bryo genius study in the way of musical literature. It would never occur to her to go to his English teacher and dictate what course of reading her child should follow; but with music it is different. She had heard such a pretty piece on the phono-graph and she felt that Claudia Marie just must have that next. And though I am no Philistine when it comes to music, there are some compositions that for the sake of my reputation for sanity I dare not include in my list of teaching material.

Good Taste and Bad

One pupil in particular kept up this per-nicious habit of telling me at every lesson that her mother said she should study such and such a piece until I at last in despera-tion told her that if her mother knew so well how her musical education should be conducted I advised her most heartily to discontinue her work with me and go en-tirely under the tutorage of her mother. Oddly enough that particular parent re-sented my attitude hotly and never got over what she always referred to as my ef-frontery.

I repeat that I have always flattered my-self that I am no Philistine when it comes to music. Barbarous as it is, the jazz of our present day is the entirely legitimate ex-pression of our polyglot race as much as the dance or folk music of other countries, and it is often so skillfully handled from the rhythmic and orchestral standpoint that it evokes admiration for its cleverness from even the most sophisticated devotee of music. As for the trashy songs with the tum-ti-tum accompaniments, let the aver-age pupil trace their melodies back to the masters from which they are stolen and compare the cheap imitation with the glorious original and they will have about as much use for the kiss-me-quick variety of song as they have for the crayon scrawl of a five-year-old when placed alongside the warm, living, colorful painting of an artist. Good taste in anything, whether music or clothes, narrows down after all to a simple matter of education.

Among the other promising types we have always with us is the pupil who views music with a large and lofty condescension.

There was one—one of those human mis-takes with a full wabbly mouth, crammed abnormally with teeth that were held in apparently by the unsightly braces that covered them—who always played a couple of yards off key and who always insisted that so long as he had no intention of doing music as a profession it did not matter how much off key he played.

Then there was the scion of an out-rageously wealthy family who displeased his parents mightily by taking eagerly to music. He hadn't been an especially seri-ous student at first, but he became inter-ested in the student orchestra that came together once a week in my studio and had the time of their young lives doing unspeak-able things to the standard classics, getting on flippantly familiar terms with stately symphonies and dignified overtures. After two or three sessions with that orchestra he took to music like a street urchin to ice

That cool, smooth shave with a fresh blade

You can get 500 such shaves from every dozen blades!

"I wish I could shave with a new blade every morning!"

That's what many men say after a clean, smooth shave with a fresh razor blade. How different that first comfortable shave from all others! Soon after the first shave an unstropped blade begins to dull. Every day your shave is less comfortable.

Why endure this annoyance? A simple, efficient stropping device is built right into the frame of the AutoStrop Razor. It resharpens the blade quickly and easily—renews the fine, smooth edge in a few seconds, without taking the razor apart or removing the blade.

This remarkable feature of the AutoStrop Razor means a shave as clean and smooth as the first shave with a new blade—every day of the week!

You are guaranteed 500 comfortable shaves from every dozen blades.

Begin to-morrow to get the comfort of a fresh, keen edge for every shave. Ask your dealer to-day about the AutoStrop Razor free trial plan.

AutoStrop Razor

—sharpens itself

AUTOSTROP SAFETY RAZOR CO., New York, Toronto, London, Paris

Carey ROOFINGS

"A Roof For Every Building"

Ansley Park, Atlanta, Ga. Home—Roofed with "Carey Asfaltslate Shingles"

DO NOT limit your thought of Carey Roofing to any one or two kinds or types of roofing. Carey makes as many different kinds of roofing as are necessary to meet the most exact and particular requirements of every type of building.

There is no roofing need, from the smallest residence to the finest hotel, that has not been specially looked after in the Carey line.

Take Roll Roofings—there are eleven brands and several choices of weight in each brand ranging from ½ to 5 ply—a total of 33 to select from.

Take Asfaltslate Shingles—there are five styles and two colors in each—ten choices.

Take Built-Up Roofing—eleven different Carey specifications were applied last year.

Yet this long line of fifty Carey Roofs can be economically manufactured and sold at a low price because it is all built on a few basic materials made by Carey's own mills, and manufactured in immense quantities.

St. Regis Hotel Kansas City—Roofed with "Carey Flexible Cement Roofing"

Y.M.C.A. at Cincinnati—Roofed with "Carey Built-Up Roofing"

ASPHALT ASBESTOS MAGNESIA

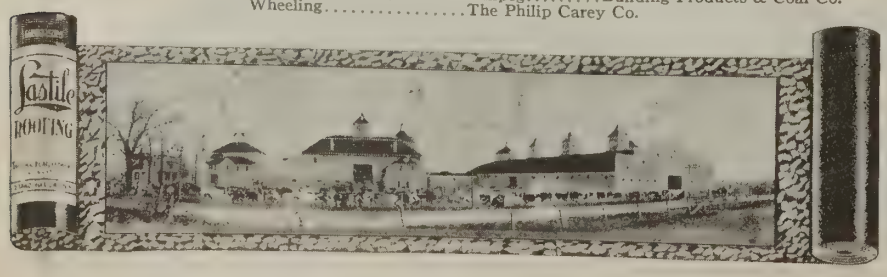
Built-Up Roofs	Wall Board
Asfaltslate Shingles	Pipe Coverings
Roll Roofings	Roof Paints

THE PHILIP CAREY COMPANY
500-520 Wayne Avenue, Lockland
CINCINNATI, OHIO

DISTRIBUTORS

Atlanta	R. O. Campbell Coal Co.	Montreal	Wm. Rutherford & Sons Co.
Baltimore	The Philip Carey Co.	Nashville	T. L. Herbert & Sons
Birmingham	Young & Vann Supply Co.	New Orleans	Woodward, Wight & Co.
Boston	The Philip Carey Co.	New York	Robert A. Keasbey Co.
Buffalo	The Carey Co.	New York (Export)	The Kelric Co.
Charlotte	Charlotte Supply Co.	New York	The Philip Carey Co.
Chattanooga	James Supply Co.	Oklahoma City	A. M. DeBolt
Chicago	The Philip Carey Co.	Omaha	Sunderland Mach'ry & Supply Co.
Cincinnati	The Breese Bros. Co.	Philadelphia	American Insulation Co.
Cincinnati	R. E. Kramig & Co.	Pittsburgh	American Insulation Co.
Cleveland	The Carey Co.	Pittsburgh	The Philip Carey Co.
Dallas	Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.	Portland, Oregon	Pacific Asbestos & Supply Co.
Denver	H. W. Moore & Co.	St. Louis	The Philip Carey Co.
Detroit	The Carey Co.	Salt Lake City	Galigher Mach'ry Co.
Havana	The Kelmah Co.	San Antonio	Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.
Houston	Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.	San Francisco	Western Asbestos Magnesia Co.
Jacksonville	Cameron & Barkley Co.	Seattle	Savage, Scofield Co.
Kansas City	The Philip Carey Co.	Spokane	Nott-Atwater Co.
Knoxville	W. W. Woodruff Hardware Co.	Tacoma	Savage, Scofield Co.
Little Rock	Fischer Lime & Cement Co.	Tampa	Cameron & Barkley Co.
Los Angeles	Warren & Bailey Co.	Toledo	The Carey Co.
Louisville	R. B. Tyler Co.	Toronto	The Philip Carey Co.
Memphis	Fischer Lime & Cement Co.	Vancouver	Taylor Engineering Co., Ltd.
Minneapolis	W. S. Nott Co.	Washington	Asbestos Covering Co.
Miami, Fla.	Cameron & Barkley Co.	Winnipeg	Building Products & Coal Co.
	Wheeling		The Philip Carey Co.



cream and worked for the sheer joy of the thing—which after all is the only kind of work that counts.

He began to putter round putting on musical stunts for the shows that his crowd were always getting up for charity. He even composed a comic opera, all the material lifted bodily out of the classics, but as that is the origin of most of the comic operas that could not be held against him. It wasn't half bad. It would have passed in a crowd anywhere if some kindly individual had given it a shove. But all this activity of his got to be too much for his mother. She came down to see me one day and informed me that her son was discontinuing his work with me; that his family had no desire for him to enter the musical profession; that she was sure that the associations would prove far from beneficial. I felt when she had left as though I had spent my time teaching the lad porch climbing instead of what I had always considered a quite honorable profession.

All of us have had some experience at one time or another with the freak musician who rides that dear old war horse, Temperament, to death; who howls and drips, sways and wiggles as if he were in the throes of some new and horrible pain; who plays to a perpetual audience. We all of us realize, too, if we give the matter due reflection that in his feverish youth that musician was somebody's pupil. There ought to be a law against cruelties to music teachers.

This menace generally comes from a small town, not always but nearly always, and has been in the habit of playing with overwhelming success for the Ladies' Aid Society or the Tuesday Evening Shakspere Club. In a misguided moment an embryo scribe on the Daily Recorder, who has a corner on all the available adjectives, writes a lot of blurb about that gifted young artist, Miss Lucinda Violet Jones, who electrified the audience last evening by her soul-awakening rendition of that marvelous masterpiece of Massenet's, the Meditation from Thaïs.

The Elimination of Lucinda

Well, I had a pupil like that once. Whatever crime I may have committed in some former incarnation was certainly atoned for by the sufferings I underwent at the hands of that girl. Lucinda Violet had a face like a horse, quantities of fuzzy hair cut with a Buster-Brown effect, an ingrowing disposition like a wildcat and a passion for all the isms and so-called broad philosophies of the time. She was addicted to rouge and the lip stick, and from the ghastly hue of untinted portions of her face at times I judged that she took her morning dip in the flour barrel. She resided in an arts club, one of those strange places that foster every thing known to man with the exception of art.

One day apparently out of thin air she descended upon me. I asked her to play something. She did. I remember that it was that lovely old relic, the Mendelssohn Concerto. There was an air of absolute triumph about her when she finished. I could see plainly that I was expected to burst into tears of rapture. I didn't. Often I am very remiss about doing what is expected of me. But I was mild. I have witnesses that I was even gentle. In fact seeing a storm threatening I resorted to some rather tall prevaricating for the sake of peace.

But it seems that as a diplomat I left much to be desired, for late that evening the inmates of the arts club were indulging in some artistic spinach and egg or some other soulful concoction when they were brought to their feet by a piercing scream and a thud of the well-known dull variety in the front hall. Rushing out they found Lucinda Violet Jones flat on her face on the floor beating the imitation Bokhara with her fists and shrieking to heaven that I was the worst brute that ever lived—that I did not understand her sensitive nature—did not appreciate her soul, that—but what's the use?

As soon as it was possible, I have been given to understand, they took her up to her room and applied restoratives. subsequent work with her became sin a series of one tantrum after another. I everything in my power short of poison get rid of her; and if the laws of our s had not been so stringent about such th I probably should have had recours that. At last I succeeded, for there is one thing to do when a pupil of that strays into one's class, and that is to el nate him as quickly and painlessly as sible. He cannot be taught; in fac scorns instruction and he only spr frenzy among his fellows.

Since I entered on my merry caree a purveyor of musical knowledge I learned much, and the process has bee ceedingly painful, about the nobility o art of instructing the young idea. nevertheless I stick at it year after year has a horrible fascination for me, jus golf has for some people. Then, too, I the satisfaction of knowing, even in wildest moments, that for every unta specimen of this same young idea passes through my hands there are a t sand duplicates in the different classe the teachers throughout the country.

Artists of the Future

For some time past there has gone long and horrible wail threatening to de us about the lack of appreciation Americans of American music and arti We don't appreciate some of them an would reflect little credit on our int gence if we did. We are not a necessa sentimental race and why should applaud a fifth-rate artist just because an American. Indiscriminate long-win praise is not the foundation on which great art of any nation is built. And I h never noticed that the great artists am the Americans have ever gone begging appreciation either in this country abroad.

True, the number of highly succes American artists is very small, due in perhaps to that attitude mentioned be of unconscious contempt in which average citizen holds music as a professi partly because as a nation we live too w There is no stinging lash of misery hunger to make of the drudgery of a refuge, a blessed privilege. Then the t of the nation is more toward the strenu than the artistic. There is our nat nervousness and exasperation at havin build tediously and slowly—the way great musical career must be built. last but not least there is our mania for artist who comes to us with the Europ label. There are dozens of reasons why great American artists are in the mino on our concert stages.

We have the talent, the genius, but yet we have not the workshop or the t with which that talent, that genius, achieve the marvelous perfection t similiar talent and genius have alre accomplished in other countries.

But given the workshop and the to given serious encouragement and conside tion, there is no reason why the yo American should not far outdistance European brother. Teach him music as is taught to read, not so that as soon as can play a scale he is expected to be artist, any more than as soon as he read a book he is expected to blossom immediately into an Edgar Allan Poe o Mark Twain. But rather teach him mu so he may hear and be able to understa great music and great artists, just as he been taught to read in order that he mi receive solace and enjoyment from boo

When we have come to such a breadth musical understanding, then out of th mass of musical dilettanti, as out of t great throng of readers have come writers, will come our great American mu cians. Not a forced and feverish produ foreign trained and stupidly unrepresen tive of our glowing vitality, but the r American artist. And just between you a me, there will not be any who can equal hi

Editor's Note—This is the second of two artic by Miss Miller.

PROFITS AND RISKS

(Continued from Page 9)

"ppose we discuss an office building nd he various efforts that go to its erec- n said a manufacturer recently in de- cig the profits of the employing class. "I one who does perhaps the most a g work in connection with such a il ng is the architect. He is anxious to c he owner the largest possible usable a with the best light; to have all its ui nent suitable and to have the building nis d on time.

"he ones who also carry a great burden a he general and subcontractors, who im each in his place, to fill properly his o d task, to have his work go forward i should. Then if the contractor has i ited on the work there is the added c est he lose money, as has so often p ned by his having to pay more in g and for material than he had ex- ti or because other expenses have come n o which he did not count.

"hen the plans have been drawn and he ntracts let, along come the workmen. t ay be the mason. The kind of brick e is o use, the thickness, length and height f alls are planned for him; even the ric and mortar are brought to him. So ith the other workmen—their work is la ed for them. They have no mental a. or care; when their work is done he ease thinking of it till they come to a in; whereas the architect and builder n the care and strain of that building fte far into the night and into the holi- ay till the building is completed."

"hat is all very well," says the objector with socialistic leanings. "But how about he assive investor, who does nothing? I an understand how the farmer or small cter is entitled to profits. He works with his hands and head both. He devotes is me to the business. I can understand ow he architect, the builder or even how he owner-manager of a small factory is nt ed to profit. He unites responsibility nd power. He is most concerned in the ut me and his own work largely deter- nirs that outcome. But how about the bsitee owner?"

A Typical Instance

N one denies that the village blacksmith who works from morning to night at his or is entitled to such profit as he can ar He makes repairs as the demand for he comes along. A forge, a little coal, a ew ools and his good right arm are what e lies upon. If he can earn enough to ay or his tools, steel and coal and have a viz left over it is the combined result of is abor, capital and managerial ability. After a time the blacksmith hires a oule of helpers. His business grows. He en another shop, borrows money from he ank to pay for new materials so that e an open a garage. This grows so big hahe begins to manufacture automobiles. He o longer works at the forge.

he former blacksmith now spends most of is time meeting customers, making new les ns, hiring and directing workmen, buy- ngnaterials and keeping accounts. After a ule he is obliged to turn these duties ov to others. He employs salesmen, en- iners, foremen, superintendents, account- nt, even chemists and a general manager a vice president.

Is it now true that the former blacksmith do no work? Is he no longer a laborer be use he wears a white collar, is well ro sed all the time, does no work with his ha ls and only mental work indoors? The no carrier outside is a laborer all right; so s e artisan who runs the machine inside; so the designer who works all day on new ma hines for the artisan to operate.

But how about the former blacksmith, wh accepts or rejects the designer's plans, wh decides how many new buildings to ere t, who decides how and when to borrow mo ey, who decides how many men to em- plo , who tries to keep all his men em- plo ed continuously, who attempts to make a market for his goods in South America, wh is threatened with ruinous competition by a rival, who must decide how great cr it to extend to customers, and who is puzled whether to spend money in adver- tis g a new product?

It is pretty hard to prove that this man is not entitled to a profit. If his only induce- me t to assume the risk of a great compli- ca d undertaking is four per cent interest wh should he disturb himself at all to manage such a difficult affair? Why not sell out to others and buy government bonds?

But suppose he sells out and takes common stock. Perhaps he is entitled to a much smaller profit, but he has not yet gotten rid of the risk. Nor does he wholly rid himself of it if he takes preferred stock or even bonds.

As the former blacksmith gets farther and farther away from the business he is entitled perhaps to less and less profit. Suppose an outsider who has never had anything to do with the business at all buys some stock. No doubt his claim upon profits is even smaller ethically. All right, let us get down to nothing. Let us compel the investor to pay interest instead of receiving it, merely to be allowed to keep what he has saved. We shall kill the saving instinct and live from hand to mouth.

Unfortunately for such restrictions business enterprise is not the function exclusively of what might be called active capitalist-managers. The active and passive capitalists differ not so much absolutely as in degree. Call the passive capitalists parasites and kept classes if it gives you any satisfaction; but don't forget that the investor cannot be freed from risk.

Don't forget the very fact that passive capitalists—outside investors, so to speak—can become interested in a corporation without actually assuming managerial responsibility is what has made a great part of our business undertakings possible. Without this scattering of risks and losses industry would not exist on its present scale. The investor at large has reduced the initial terrors of business enterprise.

How many billions of dollars are investors pouring into railroad stocks just now, and how many billions into oil stocks? No law has yet been invented that can compel people to save money and put it into investments which they do not regard as having at least a chance of profit. If John D. Rockefeller's fortune, regrettable perhaps in many other ways, has been a stimulus, an inducement for the investment of other people's money in countless oil wells and refineries which are destined to furnish the world with power and light—then who can say that even Rockefeller's fortune was wholly bad?

But are not the profits that go to investors merely taken from the working classes, a form of tribute seized by parasites who prey upon the real workers?

The Fisherman Capitalist

Without the capital that investors have saved, either from their wages or their profits, the world would be a habitation for only miserable brutes. Labor and capital are like the engine and the train. Each needs the other. There would be no jobs without capital and no capital without jobs. The steamer would lie in the harbor until it rotted if there were no seamen, and the seamen would never go to sea if there were no steamer. Labor cannot produce without capital; nor capital without labor.

All industry needs the two elements—the man and the tool, the cobbler and the bench, the plowman and the plow. Unfortunately people think too often of capital as another name for money, as a corpulent gentleman dressed in dollar marks. Capital has a falsely financial sound. It is mostly apparatus—things in ten thousand different forms. For every factory worker in this country there is something like three thousand dollars of plant and machinery.

Capital is not merely Wall Street and dollar marks. Every sane man knows that it runs way down as well as way up the scale. The neediest fisherman who has a string of trout for sale is for the moment a capitalist.

But capital is more than complementary to labor. The fisherman is not only out of a job if the capitalist fails to supply the boat. More than that, the owner of the boat probably guarantees his helper a fixed wage even if no fish are caught that day. Capital, through its representative, the employer, guarantees a fixed wage to the masses of workers. Perhaps it is too small a wage. Perhaps the owners get the lion's share. Perhaps they do not guarantee wages for long enough at a time.

But the fact remains that our whole system of industry is based upon stipulated wages for which capital holds itself responsible. The masses of the people are ill fitted

"Smoother Faces"

"Daddy—such a smooth face!"

Even "Snuggles" knows Daddy has a Smoother Face. Millions of daddies, uncles and big brothers the world round who use the Gem have Smoother Faces. Because

"The Blade is the Razor"

Gem Damaskeene Blades—keen as Damascus steel—have a durable delicacy of edge that actually gives a silken skin, a happy shave, the shave you have always wanted.

Vitality, toughness and long life are bred into these blades. Patented processes add plus to the usual hardening, tempering and grinding methods. Right double inspection and 39 years of "know how" guard your shaving comfort and our good name.

Gem users will tell you that Gem Damaskeene Blades do have a more delicate edge; do last longer; do give Smoother Faces.

And they will tell you that the simplicity of the Gem frame is a vital factor in their shaving comfort. The Gem frame holds the blade against your face at the Universal Angle for shaving. No adjustment is necessary.

Fit a Gem Damaskeene Blade—keen as Damascus steel—in a Gem frame and you will secure the full service you can ask from any razor. You will get a Smoother Face.

GEM DAMASKEENE RAZOR

Do you want a perfect shave *every*day? Send for new folder,

"Smoother Faces and How To Get One."

$1.00 The Standard Gem Set includes frame and handle, stropping device and seven Damaskeene Blades in compact, velvet-lined case. Other Gem Sets up to $10.

GEM SAFETY RAZOR CORP., New York

Canadian Branch: 591 St. Catherine Street, W., Montreal

BRAKES

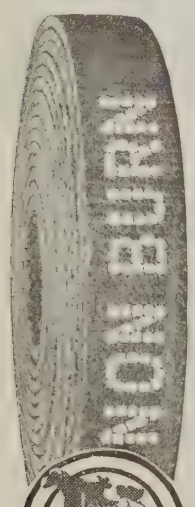
last longer with

JOHNS-MANVILLE
NON-BURN
ASBESTOS BRAKE LINING

EVERY time that warning signal sends your foot to the brake pedal, remember, it isn't the speed or the pressure of your foot that wards off danger but the quality and condition of the lining, back on the brake drum.

Non-Burn Brake Lining lasts the longest because of the quality of its asbestos.

That quality is there because Johns-Manville are not only the largest producers of Asbestos products in the world, but, owning their own asbestos mines, are independent of market conditions and use only the selected fibre best suited to brake-lining purposes.



Long before most present-day brake-lining manufacturers were in existence, Johns-Manville were making safe, long-lasting brakes for heavy industrial machinery, the brake requirements of which were far greater than those of even the heaviest trucks or motor cars.

The garage man will reline either brakes or clutch with Non-Burn if you specify by name.

H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO.
New York City
10 Factories—Branches in 63 Large Cities

To the trade:
Non-Burn is sold only through legitimate trade channels. Ask your jobber for details.

Through—Asbestos
and its allied products
JOHNS-MANVILLE
Serves in Conservation

Heat Insulations, High Temperature Cements, Asbestos Roofings, Packings, Brake Linings, Fire Prevention Products

JOHNS-MANVILLE
AUTOMOTIVE EQUIPMENT

to take the chances, risks and losses of industry. People in the main want as high and regular wages as possible, not occasional windfalls with intervals of total loss.

How many motormen and conductors on the nearly bankrupt railway systems in New York City would be willing at the present moment to assume the risks the stockholders face?

Just as investors naturally divide themselves into two groups, stockholders and bondholders—that is, those willing and those unwilling to assume considerable risks, so do the workers split up. Though most workers are unfitted to assume business responsibilities and could not make the start even if they desired to, there are always many who have the choice of working for themselves or someone else. If they work for another they give up the chance of profits and losses for a certainty; small and temporary it may be, but a certainty none the less.

But just as bonds are no good unless there is stock to guarantee them, so wages are not certain unless there are stockholders represented by an employer to guarantee them. Though there is no such thing as a perfectly safe investment, yet what are commonly called safe investments are always in the form of contracts by which one party assumes and guarantees the other against the risk.

In the same way the employer assumes to pay the laborer. The laborer gets something definite instead of taking chances. The goods which the laborer produces may not be sold for a long time, but the employer advances part of the present value of the future sale. The wage is a form of credit to the worker. The employer pays wages much as a bank discounts a promissory note.

Profits Not Standardized

Wages are more or less standardized in unprofitable as well as profitable concerns. But there is nothing standardized about profits. They are what is left after wages, the cost of materials, interest on bonds and other similar charges are paid.

Now and then the laborer loses his wages and the bondholder his four per cent interest through failure, but under the law not until the stockholder-employer has lost his entire investment. Losses always strike the profit taker first and cannot reach the worker or the mere bondholder until after he has suffered. What is more natural, then, than for the risk and profit takers to demand more than bondholders and laborers?

But perhaps the profit takers get too large a share in the combined product of capital and labor. Unfortunately no one really knows how much each contributes to that product. Robinson Crusoe provided the canoe and a net, and his man Friday provided the muscle. Ten fish were caught, but how many should have gone to Crusoe and how many to Friday no Solomon has ever lived wise enough to tell us.

If we had absolutely frictionless competition, if employer and employee could move and shift with the same rapidity, if each exactly equaled the other in bargaining power, then each might get his exact contribution to the product. If we had Utopia there would be no excess profits or wages.

Profits seem to have fared the better in the past. Wages may fare better in the future. If labor goes too far and smashes up industry it will learn its lesson, just as some employers are learning theirs now. But profits and wages are not to be completely done away with and panacea substitutes adopted overnight.

A prominent labor leader had been telling me about the evils of profiteering and profits when he suddenly stopped and smilingly interjected: "Don't think, however, that we expect to do away immediately with a system that took hundreds of years to build up."

Before the whole profits system is thrown overboard, why not try to purge it of its alloy? I do not like the color of the wall paper in my bathroom or the shape of the front stairs, so I burn down the house and live for several years in rain and storm without a shelter.

For there is no reason why men should be deprived of the spur of profits just because there are excrescences. Are we sure that Mister Multimillionaire needed quite such a large reward for his organizing genius to function? Perhaps the gains that great improvements often bring are more than is needed to stimulate enterprise.

But why worry over the mere si profits until after we have made sure are none due to adulteration and u ranted substitution of products, intii tion and terrorism of competitors, u legislative favors, fraud, extortion, t privileges, monopoly, overcapitaliz and stock watering? The dubious tainted profits are the ones to look o and get rid of first.

The boasted enterprise of our cap of industry has too often meant nothir loss and ruin to other men. Far too energy has been spent in defeating firms, deceiving a credulous public exploiting a natural resource or tr region that would have been bette alone for another generation.

It is easy to see why the great steel n and the inventor and manufacturer low-priced automobile should receive rewards. By their energy, initiative, ing, steadfastness and foresight the creased enormously the production of goods. They were benefactors of man stimulating construction and transp tion. Perhaps they lowered prices, sharing their profits with the public.

But would that justify a group of f ciers and promoters in taking one of wonderful pioneer establishments as nucleus for a fabulously overcapita combination?

An old well-known concern was rec in the market. The owners wished t tire. At first their price was $2,000 but before the deal had been comp the price had risen to $10,000,000. public will probably be asked to buy in a concern with at least that much talization and probably more, and it w the business of the new managers to profits on the new and unwarranted talization just because a few financiers promoters insist on being greedy.

I do not intend to discuss the trust tion; but it is difficult to see just how one can justify profits on watered sto the vicious Wall Street industry of capitalizing everything in sight.

The truth is that there are risks and in industry. The degree of risk v enormously, and capitalist-employers far too inclined to pull the wool ove eyes of the public as to the extent o risk in any particular business. Each must be judged on its own merits.

The Shifting of Risk

A man who is trying to market aëropl among shopgirls may—in due cours time—be engaged in a highly useful w but the first chap that tries it will b suming enough risk to warrant the bi of profits. Is a monopoly taking any risk or entitled to any such profits?

There are far too many cases where imitators as well as innovators and in tors reap large profits. Luck plays su part in business that we are all doubtf times of the advantage of certain insta of profits.

But it is a long step to take to cond profits as a whole because of these ex tions. Nor need we do away with stimulus just because public opinion longer favors what has been called "c talistic sabotage." One of the worst sti this country ever went through was ca by a well-known corporation's reducin wages without also cutting the salarie officers, the rents of the cottages which leased to the workers or the dividends o common stock.

Where the capitalist tries in this wa shift all or most of the risk to the labo and especially where it is a monopoly w does the shifting, profits are about as m justified as highway robbery.

There is something curiously brutal insolently brazen in the way that not a great corporations have thrown much the burden of production upon the sumers and the wage earners and yet h claimed large profits on the ground of risks assumed. Even where the emplo is disposed to be more than just, labor ta no little risk in industry, though many cussions of the subject of profits cons ently ignore this point.

The employer-capitalist rarely has all eggs in one basket. His business may but usually he has some reserve. In old days in England before the rise of la unions it was said that if laborers str they would actually starve before the ployer was compelled through declin income to discharge his butler.

(Continued on Page 173)

(Continued from Page 170)

A bor leader told me that his union had on great victory in its new agreement eca e a clause has been inserted provid- g tit the employer could not introduce w w machinery which displaced skilled rk's without first finding other jobs as nuerative and no more laborious for nn who were thrown out. I remarked t uch an agreement was pretty hard t employer.

t nearly so hard as it is on the man thrown out of a job," was the reply h out almost before I stopped speakorers have a human perishable serv- t offer, work. It is their all, their working capital. But the employer- it ist usually puts only possessions, lmself, upon the market. He who ut himself is certainly at a disad- tle as compared with him who hires out ornodity. Though capital has its own atrate and is subject to innumerable s nd losses it is certainly less fragile uman life. More than that, the capi- istlefinitely plans and very often suc- ds in compensating himself for bad ars y the reserves and surpluses of good rs rtain cotton mill paid dividends this yar of thirty-five per cent, put seventy nt—of its capitalization—into de- ion, had one hundred and forty per of its capitalization—at the end of yr in finished goods for sale, and paid wages sixty-nine per cent. I do not what losses have been sustained in vis years by the stockholders, but if y id have any losses they were mostly a osition to wait for a good year, and y ave had it. But the employees could t ve waited in that way. They would ve starved.

The Lack of Steady Jobs

These facts simply mean that the laborer should be freed from as many risks as possible. The capitalist-employer is entitled to profits on the ground that he assumes risks. Progress is being made steadily in this direction, and it cannot be said that profits are disappearing as a result.

A recent agreement in one of the branches of the clothing industry in New York City provides that the employer shall have full power of discharge over all employees of two weeks' or less standing, but that his workshall be subject to increasing review and inquiry by committees in cases where employees have been working for him for four months, six months and other longer periods.

The employers argued long and hard for full power of discharge in all cases. They were willing to grant any demands as to wages and hours, but said that they might have to quit business if any of the freedom to discharge was taken from them. But in return for their finally giving in on this point they secured an agreement against strikes which ought to add enormously to the steadiness and profitableness of their business.

The curse of the laboring classes has been not so much low wages and long hours as lack of continuous and steady employment, the likelihood of sudden discharge through no fault of the worker.

If the laboring man is to get only a fixed, disputed wage and if the capitalist-employer assumes to take the risks and all the residual profits as payment therefor, why should the laborer take the continual risk of being thrown out just because the employer does not happen to be making so great profits at the moment as he would like?

The logic of this question, which labor is more and more with ever-growing insistence, seems unescapable. It is made all the more ugly and unfair when employers reduce their forces when they not only throw risks of doubtful duration upon the employee but also cut down the production of goods. But profits can be justified only because and when they actually stimulate production.

The problem is to steady production and employment, remove the risks from the back of labor and still leave profits enough to carry on industry.

Certainly the answer is not to be found in merely seizing all profits and dividing up the wealth and income among the entire people. This might be all right if it were not like reaching for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Entirely abolish the business enterpriser, the capitalist-employer, and his profits will probably vanish with him. It has been tried in Russia with anything but satisfactory results.

For though Rockefeller's fortune is swollen, yet he has put most of it back into industry for upkeep, extensions, improvements and the like. He has not spent it upon himself.

If it were divided up among millions of men, would they reinvest as much of it in the oil business as he has done?

H. H. Rogers made a fortune in oil and built a great railroad through the coal fields of the South. It was an immediate failure as far as dividends were concerned, and he lost heavily. Suppose his oil fortune had been divided up among millions of laborers. Would they have invested in a new railroad which was fairly certain to be unprofitable for some time? Yet that railroad opened up a new country and enriched the state incalculably.

Profits and fortunes are not put in a vault or hoarded or in the main spent on luxury and private gratification. It is true that some of the rich spend enough on themselves to make a very painful impression. A world is far from perfect in which one man has more than enough and another insufficient. But we are up against a hard fact, a logical stone wall.

The larger the fortune the smaller is the ratio of expenditure to income. Despite his country houses Mr. Rockefeller undoubtedly spends a smaller proportion of his fortune upon himself than even the poorest laborer. Such is indeed a foregone conclusion, a mathematical certainty. Most of his fortune must be invested in industry. Thus the large fortune, the enormous profits act as a brake upon ruinous national expenditure.

Fortunes are like water, which gathered in lakes or hollows can be saved for further use. But if the water falls upon the ground in innumerable raindrops it is rapidly absorbed and drained away.

"If we were once to break the dam which holds these gathered waters, can we be sure of the result?" asks an Englishman, Cyril E. Robinson, in his brilliant book, New Fallacies of Midas. "No doubt temporary relief would be felt in the parched and sterile places; maybe the immediate harvest would be the richest ever known. But who can say whether in the uncertain future the scattered waters could ever be regathered or the broken dam rebuilt?"

If the total income of this country and England were distributed evenly among the people by some socialistic scheme the yearly addition per family according to the most radical estimate would not exceed one thousand dollars, and according to the majority of reliable estimates it would be only a few hundred dollars. If only the very large incomes were seized upon, and the farmers, small tradesmen, professional men, skilled mechanics and the like allowed to keep what they already have, the addition to the general family income would be a disappointingly small fraction.

The Stress of Work

Of course even a few hundred dollars a year added to the poor man's income would make him more comfortable, but unless he learned to save, unless he could learn to adopt the deliberate financial patience and far-sighted calculations of the capitalist, the distribution would prove only a temporary palliative and the world would soon go to pot.

"The most sweeping social changes would not avail to help us much," says Mr. Robinson. "For the redistribution of the good things of life would be useless unless the good things continue to flow in from field and factory. And if the flow is to continue, so must work also. The truth is that as long as human needs and appetites increase, the stress of work cannot be diminished. For a fact more permanent than private property, more universal than the selfishness of the rich is the inability of human nature to be content with what it has. Mankind is as insatiable as the broken cistern which the Danaïds were forever filling but which was never full.

"We are like children who demand jam when served with bread and butter; and then when given what they ask, immediately call out for cake. Half a century ago we learned to ride on wheels; but no sooner had we done so than we sought some automatic method of propulsion; so we have passed from one invention to another, until what was once considered a miracle of speed now seems a snail's pace. Last of all, having tired of such dull terrestrial motions,

Salt Mackerel

Direct from the fishing boats to you

The Best Fish Meal Ever!

Try this fat, juicy mackerel AT MY EXPENSE

Folks, here's a real treat from Gloucester. A pail of fat, newly-packed mackerel especially selected for their color and flavor. You will surely relish these temptingly-good fish. These Davis' mackerel are yours to try, on request. Send no money—I'll forward the fish on approval and take all the risk myself.

Frank E. Davis.
President

It Takes a Fisherman to Pick Out Good Fish

For generations back my people were fish-folks—the early settlers of Gloucester. I used to go to sea in my father's vessel after the mackerel. Little did I think then that what I learned about fish was ever going to be of real value to my friends or to me in a business way. If I hadn't learned what I did at sea the "Davis Folks" all over America would not write me as they do today: "Mr. Davis, we cannot get mackerel anywhere like yours." I've built up business with 100,000 homes. It's a joy to do business with home folks and to hold their confidence and good-will.

Our Own Home Kind

In those fishing days, father naturally picked out the best mackerel to take home for winter. We picked out the plump ones. I came to know them at a glance. The meat when broiled is very tender and juicy. I sent friends some of my fish. And what they said about them made me realize how hard it is for people away from the seashore to get the right kind of fish. The secret is picking 'em out. The kind of mackerel father taught me to select for our winter's supply are the kind I will send to you. We clean and trim them of heads and tails and send full net weight of clear fish. Whenever you want a good fish meal just take a fish from the pail, freshen it, and it is ready for cooking.

Fall Mackerel—Fat and Tender

Fall mackerel are the best eating fish. They're fat in the Fall, like a Turkey fattened for Thanksgiving. Most of the fish your dealer can buy are caught during the spring and summer when they are spawning and are, therefore, dry and tasteless. I have all I can do to supply my home customers without selling dealers. You can trade with me just as you do with your home grocer or butcher. And everything I send, delivered right to your door, by express or parcel post, is sent subject to your complete satisfaction or you do not pay for it. Is there any squarer way to do business than that? For 34 years this has been my steadfast policy.

Send No Cash—Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Mail the coupon today and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 10 lbs. net weight of the clear fish, each fish weighing from 1¼ lbs. to 1½ lbs. (packed as we send them the fish keep perfectly in your home for weeks), all charges prepaid, east of Kansas, so that your family will have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning. Then, if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense. If you are pleased with them, and I'm sure you will be, send me $4.90. At the same time ask for descriptive list of Davis' fish. Sold only direct—never to dealers. Mail the coupon now, with your business card, letterhead or reference.

Right from the fishing boats to you.

FRANK E. DAVIS CO., 265 Central Wharf,
Gloucester, Mass.

Frank E. Davis Co., 265 Cen'l Wh'f, Gloucester, Mass.

Yes, your mackerel are worth trying, anyhow. Please send me, all charges prepaid, a pail containing ten pounds net weight of Davis' mackerel, from 1¼ to 1½ lbs. each If after trying a fish, I don't care for them, I'll return the rest at your expense and not owe you anything. Otherwise I'll send you $4.90 in 10 days.

Name_____
Street_____
City_____ State_____
Business or reference_____

we have taken to ourselves wings and aspire to navigate the skies.

"By patient industry and forethought the business of wheel-making might become mere child's play and every man might own his cycle; but if the moment that this has been achieved man discovers a need for aëroplanes and motor cars as well he is imposing upon himself a fresh and still more arduous task. His energy and enterprise we cannot but admire, but if he grumbles at the trouble of producing them we must tell him that he has only himself to blame."

In the long run, whether we like it or not, productive efficiency must prove the supreme test, the supreme virtue. Let the workingman drive as good a bargain as he can in his immediate self-interest and then pitch in, and in his more remote interest bend every effort to make the business a success.

"But," say the reformers, "why should he be interested in making profits for other people?" And if you reply that the worker agrees to a fixed wage in his own interest and because he cannot afford to take the risks of enterprise, the reply is that wages are bound to be degrading as long as the worker has no voice in control. It is unnatural, we are told, that any man should work without the zest of having a real share in the outcome of his work.

It is only too true that the work of the masses is often monotonous, a drudgery which is death to the spirit and weariness to the flesh. To a considerable extent great factories have killed the creative impulse and the spirit of workmanship and craftsmanship. The worker must perform a narrow prescribed round of duties, often for stockholders whom he never sees.

He is given a job to do and is rarely consulted as to how it should be done. Nothing is more certain than that a system which runs counter to the grain of human nature, in which workers are merely profitable tools in the employer's hands, must be modified.

But alas, history is strewn with the wrecks of attempts to do away with the capitalist-employer and his profit. The attempt, it is true, has worked apparently in England with consumers' coöperation. The immediate needs of the members are supplied and well supplied. But almost everyone doubts whether coöperation of this kind could be applied to a wider range of industry—to the building of bridges or Atlantic liners.

In the Groove of Routine

Even these British coöperative societies have not wholly solved the question of profits, because there is more or less conflict between the employees of the societies and the members over the division of profits. In other words the problem of profits has only been carried back a stage, from employee to producer and consumer.

Aside from these British—consumers'—coöperative societies most experiments in abolishing the capitalist-employer have failed because efficiency, mobility and adaptability in business come from a singleness of aim. The management of many men on a plane of complete equality means uncertain and indecisive management. It is too slow, unwieldy and mechanical.

Any sort of collectivist or socialistic scheme of industry is bound to fall into a groove of routine and follow rather than create demand. It will not take a chance, for there is no motive for doing so. Unlike the private enterpriser eager for new profits the socialist official will not lead and educate the public by forging audaciously ahead with new devices and experiments and so giving the impetus that is needed for progress.

Besides, how can the man who is working to the utmost of his physical capacity in mining coal or tending a beastly machine be justly held responsible for the losses on the purchase of raw materials, the sale of goods and the fluctuation of prices? For over these he cannot possibly have any control. A man drudging at manual labor cannot do the highest type of mental work.

"Simple enough," reply those who are pushing the nationalization of the coal mines in England and the Plumb plan for the railroads in this country. "If there are losses they will be met from the national treasury, and if there are profits they will be divided among the workers."

These plans do not propose to confiscate capital à la Bolshevism, but they do propose to cut the bowels out of the profits system. Capital will simply be re bought out, pensioned off at a mod rate of interest. That is, the present in ment will be bought out and when capital is needed for extensions and provements it will be taken out o profits, if there are any. But if should be a panic or a crop shortage money were needed at a time when are no profits it would come from t Instead of dividends' being reduce taxpayers would meet the deficit.

This article is not written in any as a criticism of the Plumb plan or o other nationalization or coöperative agement scheme. But the hard fa mains that the Plumb plan does prop make the public pay all the losses r than let the capitalist-employer profi loss maker stand them, as under the pr system.

Perhaps if the employees take ove railroads there will never be any Railroads are pretty well standardize settled. They are not so risky, if effici managed and allowed sufficient rat many other industries. But even wit allowance the reformers themselves se possibility of loss and provide that the lic shall meet it. Has the public m railroad losses in the past? Ask some present stockholders.

An Extraordinary Proposa

It is a question whether the Ame people are ready to experiment with new idea even with railroads, much with coal, steel, oil and the like. Sw profits for the few will be done away but after all are they as bad as the l hood of deficits and bankruptcy fo many?

A different sort of effort to get r profits is contained in the recent ext dinary report of a committee in the B building trades. To prevent unem ment it is proposed that every emp shall pay a small sum into a fund to care of unavoidable unemployment. earnings of the employers above exp are to go into a fund out of which a erate rate of interest is to be paid o capital invested, loans are to be ma employers to extend their business, losses of employers due to causes other bad management are to be made go them.

That private initiative and ente shall be retained it is proposed to pay employers out of the fund salaries bas their demonstrated ability in additi interest on their investment. That a capital, labor and managerial ability be kept regularly employed it is pro that a central committee attempt to larize the demand for building by ac ating new enterprises at the approa slack periods and by urging postpone at times of congestion. The committe undertake road making, afforestation preparation of sites for housing sch and the destruction of unsanitary are improvements.

This scheme may be impractical, ut visionary and in a sense socialistic, b least it aims at the right target, the in of production.

It does away with profits by name attempts to keep their serviceable elem It recognizes that the average man not yet been raised to a high-enough l of business training, education and a to get along without the service o capitalist-employer.

As was said at the beginning of article there is nothing sacred about pr Besides, if they really do stimulate a and initiative the more widely they c distributed the better. But the risks losses that go with profits cannot be th upon the masses of the workers. To the state bear the burden is merely a t socialistic camouflage, a sort of pu yourself up by the bootstraps.

Underneath his apparent disconten workingman knows well enough that capitalist can manage industry better he, especially the larger policies.

Probably he will be willing to leave direction in capital's hands if capital allow him a due share of responsib and trust.

And if both labor and capital reall to work at the problem they can prob find some way by which labor can s more largely in the profits without de ing capital of the reward which it r receive for the risks that it alone can t That at least is the ideal.

BLACK SHEEP

(Continued from Page 36)

room at Luke's Hotel." He glanced at Mo en, who took the knife from his pocket ndaid it on the table in front of him.

"m giving you only a sketch of the ase' McMurtry continued. "There's no ee of going into finer details—now. e ready to arrest Collingwood on a a e of murder immediately—and to o the charge. Of course we know what re you had for wishing Pomeroy out of e ay."

Eh men were watching Dinsmore care- ll; and both of them were sure that it ho Dinsmore's firm nerves. He put a an up to his beard as though he could not elt, and seemed unable to overcome the sc ation of the knife. After an instant e sked:

"ho else is associated with you, c urtry?"

"obody," the lawyer replied promptly. Tey thought Dinsmore's eyes quailed nd is hands moved a little restlessly; but is oice was quite even as he said, "I pro- sto clean this thing up once for all— ne ay or the other. If anybody else is in his ffair with you, or knows what you're oin, I want to know it now."

E paused for an answer, and again Mc- Murry lied smoothly, saying: "Mr. Morden ndayself are the only people concerned. The is nobody else in it."

Al Morden put in aggressively, "We're he hole works. You can do business with s—ight now. Time is short."

Dismore seemed to be getting himself or firmly in hand.

"hy short?" he asked in an almost eal tone.

"ecause I've got a finger on Colling- od now," the detective answered iuly, "and unless I pinch him there's a hace he'll get away. We've got to fish or ut ait right now."

Dismore then studied the detective's ace more leisurely than before—with an ggvating leisureliness in fact—and re- eard, "Well—I propose to clean it up nefor all, one way or the other. I'm oir to be done with it. If I'm to fight at ll I may as well fight now as later."

"ndoubtedly," McMurtry replied with srle.

"m not in the worst position in the or for a fight, you know," Dinsmore em ded him. "William Pomeroy is dead. ha leaves you with nobody to rely on ut ne doctor—Dill."

"nd Peter Sykes," said Morden.

Dismore paused a moment, contemplat- g ne table, and confessed, "It's true—I ft ut Sykes."

" on't forget Peter," said the detective ith a jocular grin.

"[aybe you've left him out," said Dins- or significantly. "You don't know heher Peter Sykes would identify me as ne oung man he saw thirty-one years ago. ou don't know whether he would deny ou doctor's whole story. The whole story st n the doctor now. You can judge how ell e would probably stand the battering 'dget if he charged me with murder. ete Sykes—do you think he would be oxus to say he was engaged in a bank bbry? Of course he'd be accessory to ne murder. Men aren't usually anxious o sk their necks in halters."

" ut it was only robbery, so far as Sykes' te ions were concerned," said the law- er. "He didn't fire the shot. Peter Sykes a ery respectable citizen now—as prob- bly you know. There's no blood on his an except in a technical way. If he arrd state's evidence against the man atlid the actual killing I'd guarantee to et lim off before any jury. Thirty-one ea is a long time."

" long time," Dinsmore repeated. "It ouis as much for me as for him. I'm a ery respectable citizen too. You're sen- ble enough, McMurtry, to know that if a arin my position fights—well, there'll e a eal fight. You're not blackmailing a on n, you know, who's simply terrified nd elpless and will do whatever you say. ou must know that I'll take no punish- en lying down. Suppose you spring ou story. Well, there'll be a lot of money pe and a lot of hard knocks exchanged efo you've got me down—even then."

M Murtry had had various experiences t is general nature. He had seen people err ed and abject and he had heard people agg but he had never before met with this po alculation. It rather threw him off his balance. Lips closed, he warily studied the man opposite him. He wondered if Dinsmore might have an understanding with Peter Sykes. For the conspirators Peter was a sort of exposed flank.

"You spring your story. To support it you've got one Doctor Dill—not the most formidable witness in the world by a long shot. The man Colby dead; the man Pomeroy dead. You've got Doctor Dill." He then looked McMurtry hard in the eye. "You haven't got Peter Sykes—not by a good deal, you haven't."

It was a hard shot, for both McMurtry and Morden were aware that Peter was an uncertain quantity to them—while Dinsmore might have reason to feel sure of him. An instant passed before Morden said:

"We can get him if we need him—you can bank on that."

"But I don't bank on it," Dinsmore replied. "You've got Doctor Dill, who'll probably swear at first that he treated a young man for a gunshot wound the night of that affair in Billingtown, Nebraska. He'll describe the young man—with a peculiar and strongly marked scar on his chin. And he'll swear—at first—that I'm the same man. Alfred Dinsmore, you know—a name that stands for something—known here for many years as such a kind of man. What would a jury say to that?"

Morden, who was not lacking in nerve, leaned forward a little, looking Dinsmore in the eye, and replied, "Probably they'd ask Alfred Dinsmore to shave off his beard."

Dinsmore put a hand up to the appendage mentioned and said, "They might do that."

"They might," said the detective with triumph.

"And Alfred Dinsmore," the bearer of that name resumed, "might retort that a scar on his chin was well known to many people at one time in his life—before he wore a beard. His lawyers might urge that a gang of blackmailers had learned about that scar; that they made up a plot to extort money from him and hired this disreputable old doctor to perjure himself; that they told the doctor about this scar on Dinsmore's chin. And when Peter Sykes denied the whole story—well, it would be a great case you'd have, McMurtry."

The detective turned to his partner, saying ominously, "We may as well have a show-down. I'll go pinch Collingwood right now."

"You see, there's another angle to the case, Dinsmore," McMurtry observed with his bland manner. "The first thing to come on the carpet is the murder of William Pomeroy. That's no thirty-one-year-old thing, you know. The blood is dripping still."

And he experienced a shock when Dinsmore replied promptly, "True! Frankly if it wasn't for that I'd tell you to go to the devil, for I could knock the other affair into a cocked hat with one hand, as I've just shown you."

It shocked McMurtry as an exhibition of chilled-steel nerve. He thought, "Good Lord, this fellow's an ogre!"

"There is one more angle," Dinsmore went on. "Blackmail is a crime that everybody hates—juries included. You're trying to blackmail me. When you spring your story, as a matter of course I spring mine. I have both of you arrested for blackmail and I press the case with all the money and influence I've got. It would be odd if I didn't land you both. Admit that you get me; admit too that I'll get you. Your reputation is bad, McMurtry. This man's is probably worse. I seem to recall something about him; I don't remember just what, but nothing that would do him any good before a jury. If I lose, you lose too. That's flat!"

McMurtry managed to smile.

"We stand to lose a hundred; you stand to lose a million. You say our reputations are bad—no great loss then. But your reputation is good; quite a loss to you. Probably your family would rather you didn't lose it," he added dryly. "And as to the blackmail—of course that's mere bluff. There's nothing criminal in meeting you here in my office. We can tell as good a story as you can."

Dinsmore replied coolly, "All the same the blackmail charge will stick. I have the note you sent me at my office a little while ago—some circumstantial evidence. Then you called at my house. I'd no idea what

New Words New Words

Why not be up to date and know the new words and how to pronounce them correctly? Class yourself with those who know, with those who win success in all lines of activity. Here's a suggestion only of the recent growth of our language.

GREAT WAR Pact of London no man's land camouflage fourth arm Zeebrugge
the Allies calibrate war bride poilu

ELECTRICITY
extensometer decremeter quadrature dinamode pliotron detector inphase

MUNITIONS match bullet nitrostarch black Maria tear shell
Lewis gun brisance rafale

AUTOMOBILE demountable motordrome brougham convertible crank case landaulet cyclecar autobus lorry

NAVY battle cruiser telautomatics dreadnought drifter
S O S.

SPORTS shine ball squeeze play decathlon spit ball sippio

The ONLY dictionary with the new divided page

Type matter is equivalent to that of a fifteen-volume encyclopedia

cabane Aviatik décalage air lane squadron Albatros
backswept empennage bongo ukulele Rotarian jazz band Bergsonian

dactylogram Liberty bond questionnaire

R.F.C. switch sector liaison salient straddle pup tent drumfire
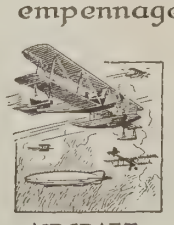
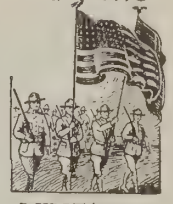
Archibald
escadrille



AIRCRAFT

THE HOME



MILITARY

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

—"The Supreme Authority"—contains answers to questions about these new words and hundreds of thousands of other words.

To-day, FACTS are demanded as never before. Exact information is indispensable. Successful men and women use this wonderful storehouse of knowledge. They dare not risk a mistake. Why not let it serve you? To know is to win.

Over 400,000 Vocabulary Terms, 30,000 Geographical Subjects, 12,000 Biographical Entries, 6000 Illustrations, 2700 Pages.

Here is the PROOF that settles the Matter when it comes to Selecting a dictionary:

The New International is the standard of the Federal and State Courts. The standard of the Government Printing Office. The standard of nearly all the school books. Indorsed by State School Superintendents. Universally recommended by Statesmen, College Presidents, Educators, and Authors. Adhered to as standard by over 99% of the newspapers. All States (32 in number) that have taken official action regarding the adoption of dictionaries recognize the Merriam Series as authoritative.

REGULAR EDITION. Size, 12⅜ x 9¾ x 5 inches. Weight, 14¾ lbs.

INDIA-PAPER EDITION. Size, 12⅜ x 9¾ x 2½ inches. Weight, 7 lbs.
One-half the thickness and weight of the Regular Edition.

Write for specimen pages of both Regular and India-Paper Editions.

FREE—a set of Pocket Maps if you mention The Saturday Evening Post.

G. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY, Springfield, Mass., U. S. A.

Gentlemen: Send specimens of Regular and India-Paper, Illus., Terms, etc., with free maps per Saturday Evening Post.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

A Valspar Varnish test in the clouds—

DAY in and day out the cars and engines of the Pike's Peak Railway make their trips thousands of feet up and down the snow-covered mountain.

They are exposed to rain and snow and hail and mist. They are subject to quick and extreme temperature changes, rising or descending 7600 feet in a few minutes as they do. The sun beats down on them mercilessly, often while they are still wet with the mist from the clouds.

In a recent letter to us Mr. H. J. Holt, President and General Manager of the railway, says:

> "Our Company has been using Valspar for our locomotives and coaches for the past eight years, and we are pleased to state that we find it superior to any other varnish we have ever used. It stands up better under the unusual atmospheric conditions to which our equipment is subjected, during trips on the 'Cog Road' from Manitou (an altitude of 6500 feet) to the Summit of Pike's Peak (an altitude of over 14,100 feet).

Isn't this the kind of varnish you want when you varnish anything around the home?

VALENTINE'S VALSPAR
The Varnish That Won't Turn White

Valspar is easy to apply, it dries over night, and it wears and wears and wears and wears. Use it on your floors, your furniture, your woodwork (indoors and out), and your linoleum. It is worth twice as much as ordinary varnish, yet it costs only a very little more.

VALENTINE & COMPANY, 456 Fourth Ave., New York

Largest Manufacturers of High-grade Varnishes in the World—Established 1832

New York Amsterdam Toronto VALENTINE'S VARNISHES TRADE MARK Boston Chicago London

W. P. FULLER & Co., San Francisco and Principal Pacific Coast Cities

Copyright, 1919, Valentine & Company

Special Offer: Don't be content merely with reading about Valspar—Use it.

For 25c in stamps we will send you enough Valspar to varnish a small table or chair. Or, if you will write your dealer's name on bottom line you need send us only 15c for the sample can.

Your Name _____

Your Address _____

Dealer's Name _____

Sat Eve. Post 11-1-19

you wanted to say to me. It's true, if I had known I should have acted differently. But I knew your bad reputation and didn't trust you. Of course you were entitled to no consideration. It's a fact I had that conversation overheard through the telephone—by a man I can trust absolutely. I give you my word I can make the blackmail charge stick. He will testify if I ask him to."

The statement carried conviction and once more both his hearers felt subtly baffled—as well as irritated. By all the rules this man ought to be abject and in a profound agitation. He ought to be pale and stammering and otherwise acting like a normal being whose good name and family and fortune and liberty and very neck were in imminent danger. On the contrary he looked and acted exactly like a man playing a wary game or transacting a difficult piece of business, with perfect self-command and the coolest assurance. It rather daunted them, and irritated them too.

McMurtry's tone showed it as he retorted aggressively, "And we can make the murder charge stick too. The killing of Pomeroy don't depend on Doctor Dill and Peter Sykes. We can nab Collingwood in half an hour."

"That's the ticket!" said the detective approvingly.

It seemed to impress Dinsmore as much as anything could, yet he merely pondered it with no sign of agitation; and after a moment asked calmly, "What do you want?"

"A million dollars," McMurtry replied instantly. Morden seemed minded to move an amendment, but restrained himself; and for a tense moment both of them held their breaths with their eyes intent on Dinsmore. This was the cast of the die; and they felt an exhilarating relief when Dinsmore merely observed:

"That's a good deal of money."

"Cheap at the price," McMurtry replied.

But if they felt that they had won the stake, Dinsmore rather dashed them again by saying, "As I told you, I'm going to clean this up once for all and make an end of it—pay or fight and have done with it."

"Oh, come now, Dinsmore!" McMurtry urged with a reasonable man's natural annoyance at the repetition of an absurd statement. "You know that's all bunk and you know we know it. We let you talk if you want to; but when you talk of fighting it's just bunk. You simply can't afford it—Alfred Dinsmore with this mess on his head! Two murders and the blackmail you've been paying for years! Fighting is all rot. You can't afford it at any price."

Dinsmore answered quietly, "You're wrong, McMurtry. I can afford it if I make up my mind to. Some situations are so unbearable that a man can afford anything to get out of them. There's one point that maybe you haven't thought of. I can beat you to it. I can dictate a confession as I leave this room—give it to the press and wire it to the governor of Nebraska and take the next train out there to stand trial. You probably know how much that would count for, coming from a man in my position. Thirty-one years is a long time. I don't believe I'd have much to fear from a jury. There are situations in which a man can afford anything. I tell you I'm going to clean this up once for all and be done with it."

Once more they felt daunted; the man's nerve seemed equal to anything.

"A million dollars will clean it up in much pleasanter fashion," McMurtry reminded him. "A million ain't so much to you."

"A million is a good deal of money," Dinsmore replied. "I propose to know exactly what I pay it for. Your case hangs on this doctor. I want to know just what he's prepared to say."

"I've told you," McMurtry said. "He's prepared to swear you're the man he treated in Sykes' house that night."

"I propose to know that," said Dinsmore. "I propose to know that you've got the doctor. You say so, but your say-so is hardly good for a million dollars cash. I told you over the phone that I wouldn't deal with you unless I knew you had the doctor and what he was prepared to swear to. I meant it. Fetch your doctor here, where he can look at me and I can look at him. Let me hear just what he's prepared to swear to. Then we'll go ahead." He gave the lawyer a sarcastic little smile and added dryly: "It's your own office. You're two to one—or better. There's nothing for you to be afraid of—if you've really got man."

Morden rose to the taunt promp saying, "All right! We'll show him to y

Doctor Dill, in fact, was then in the b ing under the capable eye of Mr. Tar for after deliberating on Dinsmore's sage they had decided to have hin hand. As he spoke, Morden rose and the room.

McMurtry found it somewhat em rassing to be thus left alone with Dinsm with nothing to say, and he furti watched the enemy, while the en studied the pattern of the wall paper. most preternaturally composed, the en seemed; his eyes were not restless; his h lay motionless on the edge of the tabl recollection subtly afflicted the law nerves—the recollection of his encou with Dinsmore in the latter's library before last. As though in a poker g they had matched nerves—and McMur were still raw from the collision. Thr four long minutes—of subtle disquie on the lawyer's part—drew thems out. Then Morden returned, accompa by Doctor Dill. As the burly, bellig detective stepped in, McMurtry experie a sense of relief.

They had not thought it worth whi yet to renew the doctor's wardrobe much. He was still wearing the greasy threadbare Prince Albert coat and presented the same general appearan a human derelict picked at random junk heap. His bloodshot eyes were ra filmy and he confronted Dinsmore a the table with a fixed, vacuous smile. I more surmised that he had been giv drug.

"Is that the man, doctor?" Mo asked after the two had confronted other a moment.

Doctor Dill turned the dim eyes slight, vacuous smile to the questioner replied, "Yes, sir, that's the man. doubt about it."

Dinsmore thought, "He's got the le by heart," and said aloud, "You recog me, do you?"

"Yes, sir," the doctor replied prom with no change in facial expression. treated you for a gunshot wound in Sykes' house at Billingtown the night bank was robbed."

"You're prepared to swear to th Dinsmore asked.

The doctor gave a palsied little nod answered at once, "Yes, sir, prepare swear to it anywhere. I remember well."

He kept his dim eyes on Dinsmore spoke, and the merchant realized tha would make a presentable witness.

"Very well," he said, "swear to it n

Not understanding what he meant, yer and detective looked at him ques ingly; and Doctor Dill—as though a had been spoken that was not set dow his part—looked up at Morden, stan beside him, for guidance.

"He says he'll swear to it, but I wa know whether he really will raise his hand and take an oath," Dinsmore plained to McMurtry. "Let him tak oath right now—if he's really as read he says. Take a sheet of paper there draw up an affidavit—you'll know proper form. 'I do solemnly swear th Billingtown, Nebraska, on the nigh September, 1881, when the First Nati Bank was robbed and the cashier kill treated a young man for a gunshot w at the house of Peter Sykes. This man about five feet, ten inches tall and wei about a hundred and sixty pounds. He blue-gray eyes and was smooth sha His chin had been broken and there w strongly marked, irregular scar acros He was known as Tom Wilson. I atte him several days and had a good op tunity to observe him. He is the same who is now known as Alfred Dinsmor am positive of that, so help me God.'

"You know the form. Go ahead; t it out. I suppose you've got a notary lic in the office who can administer the o Let this man raise his right hand and s to that—so help him God. I'll believe really ready to swear to it when I see do that—but not before."

That seemed somewhat childish bot the lawyer and the detective, yet knew there were simple-minded folk whom an oath—that legal form of ra the right hand and repeating "So hel God"—was still a fearsome thing. Per Dinsmore entertained a superstition of nd imself, or perhaps he believed that oct Dill did. At any rate it was easy ou to satisfy him. McMurtry, with s twinkling smile, drew a sheet of paper wa him, took up a pen and wrote pid for sixty seconds. Having glanced er hat he had written, he handed it to e detor, saying, "Read that over and n if it is true."

(Continued on Page 181)

(Continued from Page 178)

Dinmore rather doubted that the doctor ad , but the doctor said "Yes, sir; it's e,' and shakily affixed his signature. ve g the body of the affidavit with a nksheet, McMurtry then called in a ar from the outer office, in whose se e the doctor duly raised his right nd nd took the prescribed oath. The r who was also McMurtry's law s affixed his seal and signature and ew.

"I have seen him swear to it," Mcrt observed to Dinsmore with satisfic.

Dinmore reached his hand for the paper. McMrtry passed it to him and Dinsmore ad over carefully.

"Tat point is settled," he announced fal "I'm satisfied as to Doctor Dill. e'll o ahead. I suppose we needn't de- e doctor longer this morning."

"N," said McMurtry, and Morden led e octor out, returning him to his ar n. Dinsmore was still holding the da t and contemplating it as the detec- e lt the room. When the door closed folded it coolly and put it in his pocket. Th action struck the lawyer unpleasly It occurred to him then that they uld better have kept it in their own nds but, after all, there could probably n charm in Dinsmore's having it, and nsmore was again composedly studying e pattern of the wall paper.

Morden returned and resumed his seat thable expectantly; but for a moment on spoke, and it was the detective who bke the silence impatiently.

"Vell, it's your move."

Dinmore turned gravely to the lawyer. "McMurtry, if I pay you a million dols, ill that settle it? Will you let me solely alone afterward?"

"Ys, sir," said the lawyer promptly, d lorden chimed in cheerfully, "Sure! at settles it forever."

"Of course," Dinsmore explained, "I n't aise a million dollars cash in five nus. It takes some time."

"Gve you till noon," said the detective omtly.

"I will have to be longer than that," nsmore replied. He deliberated a moent and inquired of the lawyer, "Probly ertificates of deposit issued by the nsidated Bank would be acceptable?"

"Crtainly," said McMurtry.

Dinmore considered again and said, Me me there at three o'clock tomrrv."

"Von't do!" Morden growled. "It's t tbe to-day."

"Vhy?" Dinsmore asked.

Morden glowered at him and repeated, Because I've got my mitts on James llingwood now and I don't propose to hi get away."

"Of course you can keep watch of him," nsmore answered. "Men can't disappear fcty-eight hours. Raising a million lla takes some time. Three o'clock mrrow." He made that a sort of irtum.

"No, sir!" the detective flung back. t's got to be to-day."

"Tat's out of the question," Dinsmore plid calmly. "Three o'clock to-morrow thearliest."

"Then I'll pinch James Collingwood in enty minutes," Mordenretorted,scowling. Bu McMurtry felt uneasily that this as matching of nerves over again and t isoothingly, "Two hundred thousand wnnd the balance day after to-morrow."

"Ju've had seventy-five thousand alad," Dinsmore reminded him—and ugt a surprised and ominous glance nic Morden threw at his partner. So he added, "Meet me at three o'clock tomorrow at the Consolidated Bank. Come downstairs to the safe-deposit vaults. I'll have a private room there. Ask the guard for me."

Morden was glowering, and exclaimed angrily, "It won't do! Money down to-day or I'll nab Collingwood."

Dinsmore stood up composedly and replied, "I've said all I have to say. Three o'clock to-morrow afternoon. If you insist on fighting we'll just fight it out. Of course I know you. You want money. Ruining me and getting no money yourselves isn't your game. It's the money you want. A million dollars will not come your way every day. You'll not spill the story—and the money along with it. You're too sensible. Meet me at the bank."

With that he put on his hat and walked out of the room.

Morden glared at his retreating back and when the closed door hid it turned to McMurtry and uttered a good many words, scarcely one of which was printable.

McMurtry shook his head and remarked, "A hard customer! A tough nut to crack, sure's you're alive! His nerve beats me!" But he immediately turned to the more cheering aspect of the matter and said confidently, "Why, let him bluff a little if he wants to! What does it amount to? We've got him and he knows it. He's got to come across. Let him play with the line a little if he wants to. He can't get away."

Morden also contemplated that more satisfactory aspect; but a recollection diverted his attention from it. He glowered at the lawyer and said menacingly, "So you're holding out seventy-five thousand on me, eh?"

McMurtry had hoped that would be forgotten. He really felt embarrassed—at being caught—but tried to hide it with a laugh. "Well, I'm entitled to a little retainer fee, you know," he said.

"Retainer, your grandmother!" the detective replied rudely. "That seventy-five comes out of your share. And a damned good thing," he added still more rudely, "that I was here to-day or you'd double-crossed me again."

"Why, no I wouldn't, Jake," the lawyer replied like virtue maligned. "Pshaw! What's seventy-five thousand? If he comes across for one million he'll come across for another."

"You bet he will!" the detective assented ominously. Recalling Dinsmore's contemptuous treatment of them, he added, "And he'll do it very soon, too, the ——" There followed many more unprintable words.

That was the tack McMurtry wanted to keep on.

"Lord, man, it's a gold mine!" he exclaimed. "Millions! Think of it! We've got a pipe line to the national treasury. It's a bearcat! That's what it is—a bearcat!"

Morden, however, was not to be entirely diverted from a less pleasant train of thought.

"That's always the trouble," he ruminated rather gloomily; "somebody's bound to double-cross. You get the best kind of a scheme going and then somebody plays yellow dog with it."

But insults, open or covert, could not provoke diplomatic McMurtry into a quarrel with his partner then. He repeated, "It's a bearcat! A million to-morrow—and more to follow! It's good enough for anybody!"

The detective yielded so far as to say, "Well, it looks pretty good to me. All the same, I'll keep a finger on Collingwood until the money's paid down."

"A good idea," McMurtry conceded. "But be careful, Jake. Don't start anything. We've got our fingers on the money now. Don't spill it."

"Don't be scared of me—or anybody else," Morden replied; and with that not very complimentary suggestion the partners separated.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

Summit
Town & Country
Leather Coat

Naturally adapts itself to your convenience

and you will never find it in the way when wearing it.

The flexible plaited back takes away all strain from your shoulders and arms.

The soft, pliable leather lining and leather sleeves are light in weight, keep out the cold and break the wind.

The patented Knit-nek and wristlets protect your throat and wrists.

You have the necessary warmth without that "bundled up" feeling.

The Universal Garment for Out o' doors

The leading stores sell them. Write for Style Booklet C-32

GUITERMAN BROS.
SAINT PAUL, U. S. A.

Originators and manufacturers of wind-proof and cold-resisting clothing.

$300 FOR CHRISTMAS! Sell us your spare time. You can easily make each hour bring you an extra dollar. Scores of spare-time subscription representatives of The Saturday Evening Post, The Ladies' Home Journal and The Country Gentleman will earn more than $300.00 this month. Why not you too? You need not invest a single penny to learn all about our plans. Experience is unnecessary. Profits begin at once. Just clip off the coupon and mail it today.

The Curtis Publishing Company, 468 Independence Sq., Philadelphia, Pa.
Gentlemen:—Tell me all about your spare-time money-making plan. I'm interested.
Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____

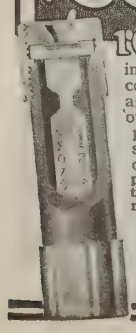
AGENTS—STEADY INCOME Large manufacturer of Handkerchiefs and Dress Goods, etc., wishes representative in each locality. Factory to consumer. Big profits, honest goods. Whole or spare time. Credit given. Send for particulars. Freeport Mfg. Co., 75 Main St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

SALESMEN WANTED resident or travelling, to sell Shinon Products to retailers and jobbers. All trades handle. Consumption big. Low prices, attractive deals. 23-year quality reputation. Big commissions net handsome income. All or part time. Roch. Chem. Co., Rochester, N.Y.

NOT LIKE OTHERS

THE NEW
BENJAMIN AIR RIFLE
Has different principle. Air-pump compresses air to any power desired. One to six strokes sufficient. Penetrates ½ inch hardwood. $4.00.
BENJAMIN CO., 500 Washington Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

5A MOTOR ROBES

ECONOMY renewable FUSES


insure maximum safety and minimum cost in safeguarding electrical circuits against the fire and accident hazards of overloads and short circuits. An inexpensive "Drop Out" Renewal Link restores a blown Economy Fuse to its original efficiency. The Economy is a pioneer renewable fuse. As compared with the use of one-time fuses, it cuts annual fuse maintenance costs approximately 80%.
ECONOMY FUSE & MFG. CO.
Kinzie and Orleans Sts. CHICAGO, U. S. A.
Sole manufacturers of "ARKLESS"—the Non-Renewable Fuse with the 100% Guaranteed Indicator.
Economy Fuses are also made in Canada at Montreal

Most Popular Catholic Prayer-Book Published MY PRAYER-BOOK

HAPPINESS IN GOODNESS
By REV. F. X. LASANCE
702 pages, size 5⅝ x 3¾ inches
A prayer-book containing the best general prayers and devotions, reflections and counsels—a prayer-book teaching happiness in goodness—a prayer-book that is different.
INDIA PAPER, GOLD EDGES
Rutland, fine grain, limp, $2.00
Turkey morocco, limp - - 2.75
Persian seal, limp, silk lining 3.75
Catalogue on request
BENZIGER BROTHERS
NEW YORK 36-38 Barclay St. CINCINNATI 343 Main St. CHICAGO 214 W. Monroe St.

LYDIA LEADS THE WAY

(Continued from Page 15)

"Here's last week's and this week's," she said. When she closed the bag there were but two one-dollar bills left within it.

She went to her own room, and removing her hat, the fur piece and her coat, revealing with the removal of the last a foaming cream-colored chiffon waist, sat down on a gray enameled rocker and started polishing her nails with a buffer mounted in heavily embossed silver. The nails did not have to be polished. But Lydia felt that she must do something. She was terribly afraid that otherwise she might break down, might be tempted to throw herself across the gray-enameled bed with its rose-colored counterpane and there let herself go in a tempest of tears. So she sat in the rocker, polishing her nails with furious energy. Every little while her eyes anxiously visited the little leather-encased traveling clock upon her dressing table.

Suddenly she sat rigid with attention. There was a sound at the front door. There was the patter of slow unenthusiastic footsteps in the hall. Lester entered.

"'Lo, Liz—Lydia," he greeted her.

"Lester, where have you been?"

"Downstairs."

"Downstairs where?"

"Downstairs at Mrs. Sawyer's apartment."

Lydia gave an exasperated cluck of her tongue.

"You've wasted another whole afternoon. I don't see how you can expect us to live unless you do some work. What's the use of my getting out every afternoon so that you'll have perfect quiet and the place to yourself so you can write? What's the use of my doing that, going to concerts and matinées and bridges, spending a lot of money, unless you make use of the time I give you alone? And I don't like the way you run round after these strange women. I don't know Mrs. Sawyer. Who is she? Where did you meet her?"

"Oh, I just met her," said Lester. "She—she sort of knew who I was. One day she bowed to me and told me she couldn't help letting me know how much she liked my Home Folks sketches."

"Those old things!"

"Well, she didn't say anything about my later work, Liz—Lydia, but I got the idea somehow that she'd read it and didn't like it—said nothing about it out of kindness."

"You seem to know her quite well."

"We've just had a couple little chats and the other afternoon she asked me in for tea. I didn't see any harm in going."

"You had your work to do."

"I couldn't work somehow that afternoon, and afterward I was glad. It was so kind of quiet and restful at Mrs. Sawyer's. It did me good. I worked hard all the next afternoon."

Lydia brightened a little at that.

"Well, I'm glad to hear you did, but I don't see why you had to go down to Mrs. Sawyer's again to-day."

"I wanted to read her what I'd written."

The brightness left Lydia's face; it became a trifle hard; there was a pinched look about her nostrils.

"What did you write?" she asked ominously.

"I—I wrote a Peltonville sketch," he said apologetically. "You remember that old fellow who used to spend all his time wandering up and down Elm Creek ——"

Lydia cut him short.

"I don't want to hear about it, Lester. You know there's no money in that Home Folks stuff any more. The public's tired of it. You have that order for a serial for Brisk Tales. Why don't you work on that?"

"Oh, I can't write that," Lester said petulantly.

Lydia said nothing, but she regarded him with despair. With all her efforts for Lester she had failed in some directions. Sometimes she felt that she really couldn't do anything with him. There, for instance, was his appearance. He still looked the mild and insignificant little man he had been in Peltonville. She couldn't get him to look smart. His ten years in New York in this respect had done him no good. Lydia saw that he went to a good tailor, saw that he got his ties at Rudd's, his shirts at Benning's, his shoes at Starling's. She had made earnest inquiries as to the best places. But even if you gave Lester the most perfectly tailored suit in the world he'd wear it one day and the next day it would look like nothing—like nothing at all. And he was always doing the wrong thin wearing the wrong thing. She had to him like a hawk. If she didn't he'd in his cutaway with a red tie or we shoes with his dinner jacket. She Sometimes she wondered what was of all her striving. Lester was—yes, was impossible.

As for Lester, he sat there and ga Lydia with worshipful eyes. To h was marvelous. He realized that a a tremendous transformation had over Lydia. She was so beautif peared so young! Why, she look years younger than when she left ville, instead of the other way about yet she seemed so far removed fro He didn't know how she had so transf herself. He was dazzled by the effect, but he couldn't appreciate t tails. It was marvelous, miracul mystery. He would like to have g her and given her lips one of the sh dabs with his own, but he didn't dar felt dimly that he didn't understand and she didn't understand him. S pulling one way and he was pulli other, and they both tried to preten they were pulling in the same directi sat there gazing at her with his tir bewildered eyes. He certainly show ten-odd years that separated him Peltonville. His hair was very thin. work of tired wrinkles spread out in fan from the corner of each eye and b each eye was a little dark pool of f So they sat in silence appraising each Presently Lizzie said: "Well, I don' how we're going to live." And rising she shrugged her shoulders as if to s game must be carried on despite worries. "Come along, Lester," sh manded. "Tumble into your dinner c It's seven and the Prestons and the will be here at seven-thirty."

"Are we going to have another p asked Lester wearily.

"Yes," said Lydia brusquely. know all about it. I've arranged it fo sake and a pretty dent it's made housekeeping money. Do you kno much mushrooms are? They're three a pound."

"I hate them," said Lester.

"My dear, they're not for you. got to give the Prestons creamed rooms and things like that. And you' to be nice to Preston. We want him cept A Girl of the Woods—if you ever it. If you can't write the serial for Tales you've simply got to finish that And we have to have a publisher don't we? Now, for heaven's sake, I for once in your life, assert yourself as if you were somebody!"

But at dinner that night Lester r to act as if he were somebody. H crumpled up in his chair and frowne disgust at his green turtle soup, his cr mushrooms and his frozen peaches. I thinking, wouldn't it be wonderful food before him should suddenly c into homemade biscuits and steak a bit overdone with the fat crisp and b It was Lydia who after dinner held P at bay in a corner and made him pr he'd seriously consider Lester's new despite the comparative failure of th one.

Three months later Lydia stood i doorway of a small table-d'hôte resta in the West Forties. It was spring no even in this gray by-street the rav breath of spring was making itself felt. light poured its gold along the paven a soft gold glistening as if powdered the window sills of the little restaurant red geraniums already slightly dust pitiful as if they appreciated the lon summer's struggle before them. A organ sent its plaintive last year's me from some far corner.

Lydia, standing pressed back again whitewashed wall of the entrance so the incoming flow of table d'hôters pass her, consulted her tiny hexa diamond-encrusted wrist watch. Wh Lester so late, making her wait here places? Supposing one of her smart fr should see her? Her excuse that she Lester were going in for Bohemia were tired of the big hotels and fashio restaurants, had been worn a little th the telling.

(Continued on Page 185)

(Continued from Page 182)

Sh glanced back at the kitchen through whi one passed before entering the main oor of the restaurant built where once ad been two back yards. Her nose wrirled in distaste. What an awful smell f c king—the cheap, thick smell of spa- het and its invariable red sauce, of soup, v getables too long boiled. How odious at hey, Lester and she, should have to n to this kind of place again. She had ht that they had left it behind them r, and here they were again forced to o at its hospitable doors, simply be- s it cost less to get a meal here than in ny ther way they knew.

T reassure herself she glanced again into he rge dusty mirror that was placed gai t the opposite wall. She looked a t lder, she thought, with a keen stab f se-pity. These last few months of worry ad ld upon her. Nevertheless she still ook l very lovely. Her new spring suit f pest tan was most becoming and her rg hat covered with velvet-petaled red ow s accentuated the luster of her bronze air These new clothes were an extrava- an she told herself, but at least she had o lep up appearances. She couldn't ou upon Lester for that. Sometimes she ht that Lester didn't give a hang bo appearances.

A thinking of Lester, she consulted her wris watch again. Why didn't he come? He as half an hour late. She considered alli up the apartment, but what would e e use? Lester must at least have tar d by now, and it was Estelle's day ut. How fortunate they had been to keep ste. The girl's manner was preposter- us; she kept muttering darkly about the mo they owed her, but still she stayed. nd fter all it was worth keeping her, no ma r what price they had to pay in humil- tio. It was like advertising their bank- upt to the world to let their one maid go.

Wh a little frightened catch in her throat yd wondered when their affairs would hen She tried to keep away from think- ng this. It was too horrible. She just han ed to struggle on from day to day, as wi. Her nerves were going. She didn't ar et herself think too long of the state f thr affairs—owing money to the butcher, he lker, the landlord, everyone! What a eas hat Preston was! He had practically ro ised her he'd take Lester's new novel— nd en he had turned it down. At least e h demanded changes which Lester said re impossible. Not that they seemed im- oss le to her. Anything—anything to get lit ready money. But Lester was be- om g unmanageable. He was irritable, nre onable, sullen.

Wat had come over Lester of late? To yd s surprise she found there were tears h e eyes at the thought of Lester. She ie also to shove this sentimental way of hin ng about Lester away from her. She lso as afraid of this. For she felt some- me that she might collapse before Lester, ir her arms round him and cry out her ear against his. She mustn't do that. he ust be strong. It was Lester who was he eak one and she who was the strong. wi she, always she, who must lead the ay nd furnish the strength.

B where was Lester? A sharp sense of ear, f remorse, of foreboding—a blend of an fears—sickened her, made her feel int It was a full hour after the time he id e would meet her. She moved away fr the restaurant doorway, hoping no ne ould notice how long she had waited her how ignominiously she had been kept wait g. She felt so tired, so let down, that he ould hardly walk. She had an impulse t s mmon a taxicab to carry her home, ut he suppressed that extravagant im- uls And the street cars were jammed ith workers. Wearily she dragged herself loc after block, all the way home.

H hurried flight through the rooms of he partment showed Lydia that it was ese ed. Estelle was not there. Lester as t there. In his grubby little room at he ar it looked as if Lester had been in a iol t rage at something or somebody. He ad orn up sheets and sheets of manu- scri torn them into small bits and tossed her everywhere. The room looked as if om strange snowstorm had swept it. The esk chair was overturned. Two pencils nd pen were broken in halves.

Lydia went to the telephone that stood n a small table beside her bed, and making n effort to control her voice that was not tot ther successful, asked the telephone per or in the gilt cage below if she had ny idea where Mr. Henry was.

The girl's voice came back supercilious and a little mocking: "I suppose he's at Mrs. Sawyer's. He nearly always is. Shall I ring Mrs. Sawyer's apartment?"

"No—no!" said Lydia, and dropped the receiver with a click into the hook and then sat down heavily on the bed. She wanted time to think. But for a moment she was stunned. For a moment she could not think at all.

Then she heard herself saying as if it were another person speaking, "So that's it!" She heard herself repeating over and over, "So that's it!"

She was flooded with alternate waves of cold and of heat, but the waves of heat began to gain dominance. So the thing she had always feared had happened. Lester had left her for another woman. He had left her waiting in the hallway of that odious restaurant while he stayed with this other woman. He had outgrown her as she had realized—oh, years ago—other men of wealth or genius had a habit of outgrowing their first wives. But realizing that, she had always guarded against it. Why, Lester hadn't outstripped her in any way. He had never kept up with her—never! It was she who had led the way in everything. She saw now—or she thought she saw—how the fear of losing Lester had whipped her on. It even seemed to her that she had taken everything he had—his money, his time, his energy—so that he would not have any excess to spend elsewhere on other women. And she saw, too, that for her, Lester himself was the only thing in the world that counted. With him she had everything; without him—nothing.

Suddenly she jumped to her feet. She wasn't going to give Lester up without fighting for him. Not she! With tight lips and a vivid spot of color staining each cheek she descended to Mrs. Sawyer's apartment prepared for melodrama.

A small pleasant woman with a round motherly face, with shrewd eyes peering from behind gold-rimmed spectacles and hair slightly gray, opened the door to Lydia's ring. "I want to see Mrs. Sawyer," demanded Lydia.

"I'm Mrs. Sawyer," said the woman.

"You!"

Lydia could say no more than that; she was too surprised, too overwhelmed with astonishment to say more. She had seen this woman once or twice before in the hallway, in the elevator of the building, and it had never occurred to her that this could be Mrs. Sawyer. This pleasant motherly woman in no way matched her conception of the sort of women who took men away from other women.

"What can I do for you?" asked Mrs. Sawyer presently.

"Is Lester Henry here? I'm his wife."

"Yes, he's here. He's asleep in the sitting room."

"Asleep! But why? Why?" cried Lydia, and there was a hysterical note in her voice. "He was to meet me at half past six for dinner. Now it's half past eight—and he's asleep!"

"He's asleep because he's exhausted," said Mrs. Sawyer. "Before you wake him let us go into my room and have a little talk."

For some obscure reason Lydia felt humble before this pleasant little woman—and yet she wanted to rage, to storm, to demand explanations. But before the other woman's placid gaze her hysteria was shamed into quiescence. She followed Mrs. Sawyer meekly into a bedroom.

The two women sat opposite each other.

"Did you think I was planning to take your husband from you?" asked Mrs. Sawyer at last.

Lydia could not face her kind quizzical eyes, her pleasant slightly humorous smile.

After a pause Mrs. Sawyer continued: "I don't think that I'd do that even if I were, as you expected, a younger and more attractive woman. I'm a little old-fashioned in my ideas, and yet I've been tempted to take Lester Henry away from you and look after him myself. You've made such a bad job of it."

Lydia squirmed in protest.

"Why do you say that?"

Mrs. Sawyer shrugged her shoulders as if to suggest it was unnecessary to explain.

"Lester's such a child, isn't he?" she asked instead of explaining. "It would be such a lark to look after him. You see, I have no one to look after. It's—it's pretty awful when you get to my age and—and have no one."

Lydia did not raise her eyes, but she murmured: "Yes, I realize it would be pretty awful."

Every Boy Wants

a set of

K-C Junior Radio

Has no equal for fun—Sends and receives real messages—
A premier present for Christmas

Thousands of boys already have expressed a desire to own a set of K-C Junior Radio. It apparently is just what they have long wanted. It has no equal for fun. Just think of this sport—sending and receiving real messages! Nearly every boy in many neighborhoods will soon have a set—and you want one too. Tell the folks about K-C Junior Radio. Tell them how we are investing in the boys of America instead of expending larger sums for experimental work—thus selling thoroughly practical apparatus at prices that do not show a normal manufacturing margin. Tell them how badly you need a set—how you can experiment with it and perhaps develop into a great radio man. For among boys of today will come the radio experts of tomorrow—the heroes who will figure in important world events. Nothing else offers equal opportunity for sensational development by boys. In principle K-C Junior Radio is the same as the big commercial sets—must be set up like them. And this, any bright boy can do. No vigorous lad wants to be neglected—not receive a set. If immediate purchase is not possible, he should by all means receive one for Christmas. Delay, however, should not happen unless absolutely necessary. For we can devote only a limited section of our plant to K-C Junior Radio—which means a limited output.

Write for Our Big, Free Catalog

Our handy catalog pictures and prices the different sets. Every boy needs a copy. From it the set desired may be selected. Send for your copy today. Use the coupon.

For Boys to Mail Today

Kilbourne & Clark Mfg. Co.,
1202 K. & C. Bldg.,
Seattle, U. S. A.

Please send me a free copy of your K-C Junior Radio catalog.

Name_____

Address_____

Give name of store you would like to see handle our sets.

_____

To Merchants:
Our proposition on K-C Junior Radio will interest you. Wire or write.

KILBOURNE & CLARK

Kilbourne & Clark Radio

—the Big Word in the Wireless World

WRITE FOR OUR FREE BOOKS ON PATENTS
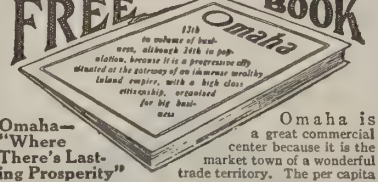
MUNN & CO
620 Woolworth Bldg., NEW YORK
625 F Street, WASHINGTON, D.C.
Tower Building, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

World's Best Poultry Journal
You be the Judge!
4 MONTHS' TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION 15c
SEND U. S. STAMPS
Tells how to keep poultry with greatest profit; 84 to 168 pages; 26th year. Best articles; expert advice; every number profusely illustrated. 1 yr., 60c; 2 yrs., $1.00.
Reliable Poultry Journal Pub. Co., Dept. S, Quincy, Ill.

FREE BOOK



Omaha—"Where There's Lasting Prosperity"

Omaha is a great commercial center because it is the market town of a wonderful trade territory. The per capita wealth of the United States is $1,800; in the Omaha trade territory it is $2,800. The per capita production of crops in the United States the past ten years was $81; in the Omaha trade territory it was $240. Write today. Address Chamber of Commerce, Department 15, Omaha, Neb.

I WANT TO GO HOME!

Send me, with your name and address, to The Curtis Publishing Company, 473 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and I will tell you how to make your spare time bring you $25.00 EXTRA EVERY WEEK.

Takes the Place of a Maid

When help is high and work is plentiful household duties become a drudgery until you install this economical

Caloric

FIRELESS COOK STOVE

Cooks the whole meal without attention, thot or worry. Makes the cheapest cuts of meat tender and delicious, cooks everything thoroly and appetizingly. The Caloric is the first and original fireless cooker. It has the most modern features, the most lasting qualities and is the most necessary labor-saving device for any kitchen. Write for full information on the Caloric way and its many superior features. On sale in 10,000 stores. If your dealer does not handle them send us his name and address.
Stafford-Caloric Co. McClurg Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Live Dealer-Agents Wanted

BOHN

Refrigerators
Satisfaction guaranteed
ST. PAUL MINN.

Writes a Strong, Rich Blue

CARTER INX PRODUCTS

IF you want to remain on friendly terms with your fountain pen, if you want the pen to start right in on high the moment the point touches the paper, and stay there until the job is finished, use Carter's Fountain Pen Ink. First wash the pen thoroughly, preferably let it stay in water overnight. Give the pen a chance to work for you as it should. You will be pleased, too, with the strong, rich Carter blue.

CARTER'S FOUNTAIN PEN INK

like Carter's Writing Fluid, passes nine rigid laboratory tests before it is allowed to leave the factory. You are insured absolute uniformity of product—guaranteed the old pre-war blue, the easy flow, the freedom from sediment and corrosion, the ultimate jet black and unquestioned permanency of record.

THE CARTER'S INK COMPANY
Manufacturing Chemists

BOSTON NEW YORK CHICAGO MONTREAL

9 10 11 12

CARTER INX PRODUCTS

Writing Fluid	9 Cico Paste	12 Carbon Papers	Typewriter Ribbons
10 Fountain Pen Inks	Photolibrary Paste	Copying Inks	VelVet Showcard Colors
11 Red Ink (Carmine)	Cement	Drawing Inks	White and Gold Inks
Realblack Ink	Glue Pencils	Indelible Inks	Violet, Green and Blue Inks
Ink Eraser	Great Stickist Mucilage	Stamping Inks	Numbering Machine Inks

Waltham Movement Prestige Accuracy

The Depollier Waterproof and Dustproof Strap Watch FIELD AND MARINE
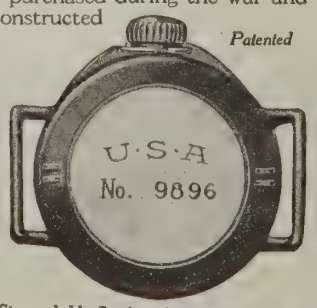
Registered U. S. Pat. Off.

The Depollier Waterproof Case now adopted by the Signal Corps of the United States Army for the saving of watch movements purchased during the war and for future use. Ordinary strap watches were not constructed to withstand the wear and tear of field duty.

A heat-insulated disk protects the delicate movement from the injurious body heat of the arm, which has a tendency to dry or gum up the watch oil.

Patented



Waterproof Oxidized Case with 14-k Solid Gold Disk on Back and 15-J Waltham Movement $45.00

Write for Booklet

JACQUES DEPOLLIER & SON
Manufacturers of High Class Specialties for Waltham Watches 15 Maiden Lane - New York, N. Y.
Dubois Watch Case Company, Established 1877

Stamped U. S. A. only for U. S. Army

"And yet you've almost killed your husband," Mrs. Sawyer said in a tone that was suddenly stinging.

"How can you say that? I've done everything for him."

"Everything that was wrong for him. He's the simplest of men. He wants the simplest of things."

"He's a genius."

Mrs. Sawyer smiled.

"He's a queer ordinary little man who happens to have a talent. The talent is pure gold when he writes about the people he knows and loves. But you've turned him into a hack writer, forcing him to turn out all sorts of strange things, forcing him to write about people and affairs of which he knows nothing so that you could have money enough to live extravagantly in this most extravagant city in the world."

"I did it for his sake."

"Are you sure?" asked Mrs. Sawyer.

They were silent.

After that pregnant silence Mrs. Sawyer said: "He came to me this afternoon in a bewildered state. He looked as if he were going to have some sort of a mental breakdown. He had been in a frenzy upstairs, a rage of self-disgust and self-despair. He'd torn up all his recent work. We had tea and after tea I played to him. He fell asleep—a sleep of exhaustion—and I let him sleep. Of course I did not know he was to meet you. It seemed at the time only the simplest kindness to let him sleep."

"May I go to him now?" asked Lydia.

And then Mrs. Sawyer said a curious thing: "Yes, go to him now, but go on your knees and beg his forgiveness."

The sitting room in which Lester slept was dark, and stumbling in the half light from the hall Lydia found her way across to the couch on which he lay. And there she did indeed fall upon her knees beside him.

After a while he awakened and his eyes—still heavy with sleep—smiled into hers.

"'Lo, Lizzie," he said.

Lydia was crying. Another thing she had feared had happened. She had collapsed before Lester. Her arms were round him, her wet cheek against his.

"What's the matter?" he asked, dazed; and then in a horrified voice: "Oh, I know. What time is it? It's dark. I'm so sorry, Lizzie. I never met you, did I?"

"That isn't it, Lester. That doesn't matter now."

"What is the matter then? Why are you crying, dear?"

Shyly he patted her trembling should

"Lester, would—would you like to back home again?"

"Home? What home?"

"Peltonville."

"Oh, our real home!" he sighed ecst cally. "Why, I'd like it better than a thing in the world, Liz—Lydia."

"Don't call me that, Lester."

"What?"

"Lydia. Call me by my right name.

"I always do in my thoughts, Lizzie.

"You could do good work again in tonville, couldn't you, Lester? You c write again about the people you know the people you love?"

"Yes, I could, Lizzie—I know I co Would we go back to the little yellow h on the East Road?"

"Yes, dear, if you wish it."

They clung together, their cheeks sta with tears as if they had been shipwre on some far shore—shipwrecked, but ha to have escaped the utter oblivion of waters.

Presently Lydia's thoughts took a prising leap. They had been saturated remorse, but now they shook themse free and went blithely flying. The mem of the Sprague place had entered her m She had heard somewhere that old E Sprague was dead, and mentally she composing a telegram to Jackson We the Canton Courier.

"Can you by any possibility arrang rent the Sprague place for us?" the gram read.

Surely Lester could make enough m to afford the Sprague place and pay New York debts as well. There were jewels that could be sold. And they c sublet their apartment furnished at n more than they paid for it, now that r were so outrageous. Peltonville woul be so bad if they could live in the Spr place, the one show place of the vil Lydia saw herself queening it over the munity. How the simple villagers w marvel at her clothes, her dinner partie the Jackson Wests and other cultured ple, and her marcelled bronze hair! was really excited and happy at the thou What a pace she would set for Pelton She would still be leading the way and time outdistance all competitors.

Lester stirred in her arms.

"I'm awfully hungry," he said.

"Well, come along upstairs, Les Lydia cried gayly. "I can get you a pick-up supper in a jiffy."

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
More Than Two Million a Week

Table of Contents
November 1, 1919

SHORT STORIES PAGE

The Door to Freedom (In Three Parts)—George Agnew Chamberlain . . 3
Mrs. Fifty-Fifty—Maximilian Foster 6
When August the Second Was April the First—Irvin S. Cobb 10
Moonshine—Wallace Irwin 12
Lydia Leads the Way—Oscar Graeve 14
The Bean Spiller—Albert Payson Terhune 18
Old Twelve Hundred—Harold Waldo 22
On the Lordsburg Road—Frederick R. Bechdolt 42
The Big Bull of the Shoshone—Hal G. Evarts 46
Fade Out—Frank Condon 54

SERIALS

The Great Accident—Ben Ames Williams 26
Black Sheep—Will Payne 30

ARTICLES

About Play Writing—David Belasco 5
Profits and Risks—Albert W. Atwood 8
The Sky's the Limit—Mary Roberts Rinehart 16
A Post-Mortem on Cock Robin—Edward G. Lowry 17
The Young Idea—Ruth Miller 20
Looking Backward—Henry Watterson 21
Daughters of Russia—Princess Cantacuzène 24
Getting a Reputation—J. R. Sprague 62

DEPARTMENTS

Editorials—By the Editor 28
Everybody's Business—Floyd W. Parsons 38
Mind the Paint—Berton Braley 53
Sense and Nonsense 66
The Poets' Corner 79

...able-DURHAM ...osiery is a product ... industrial Democ-...cy—never of Child ...br. We have no ...ries or lockouts.

DURABLE DURHAM
TRADE MARK
HOSIERY

Full of Warmth and full of Wear

HERE is comfort for cold weather. Durable-DURHAM fleecy-lined hosiery is warm. And because of this it is the sensible hosiery for winter wear.

Every pair has soft, thick, fleecy lining that keeps in the warmth — and keeps out the cold. They have the strength to give long wear — and stay good-looking through many wearings and washings.

Durable-DURHAM Hosiery includes not only Fleecy-lined but other styles for every member of the family — for work, dress or play — for every season of the year. The children's stockings are made doubly strong to stand the hardest wear and tear. Styles for men and women include all fashionable colors and come in all weights from sheer mercerized to the heavy fleecy-lined.

Every pair is extra strongly reinforced at points of hardest wear. Legs are full length; tops wide and elastic; sizes are accurately marked. Soles and toes are smooth, seamless and even. The Durham dyes will not fade.

Ask for Durable-DURHAM Hosiery and look for the trade mark ticket attached to each pair. You should be able to buy it at any dealer's. If you do not find it, please write to our sales department, 88 Leonard Street, New York, giving us the name of your dealer.

DURHAM HOSIERY MILLS, Durham, N. C.
Sales Offices: 88 Leonard Street, New York

DURABLE
DURHAM HOSIERY

For Men, Women and Children—Made Strongest Where the Wear is Hardest

COMMUNITY PLATE

AIR CASTLES

ONEIDA COMMUNITY, LTD.

© 1918 O.C.Co.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

9. Published Weekly at . Entered as Second-November 18, 1879, at at Philadelphia, Under rch 3, 1879.

An Illust ly
Founded A° D Frank

VEMBER 8, 1919

5c. THE COPY
10c. in Canada

George Pattullo — Forrest Crissey — Holworthy Hall — George A. Chamberlain
Octavus Roy Cohen — E. W. Howe — Eleanor Franklin Egan — John Peter Toohey

The Nash Perfected Valve-in-Head Motor

THE NASH SIX

PASSENGER CARS AND TRUCKS

THE Nash Six is an uncommonly good automobile in every particular. Note the design, finish, appointments, comfort and convenience of any one of the six beautiful cars in the Nash line.

Perfected Valve-in-Head Describes the Nash Alone

THAT is generally understood now when perfected valve-in-head is used in relation to automobile motors.

The perfecting of the valve-in-head motor, admittedly a superior type, is a distinct Nash achievement.

That it marks an important advance in motor engineering by furnishing greater power, economy and quietness is being demonstrated by Nash owners everywhere.

Nash Passenger Cars—5-Passenger Car, $1490; 4-Passenger Sport Model, $1595
2-Passenger Roadster, $1490; 7-Passenger Sedan, $2575
4-Passenger Coupé, $2350; 7-Passenger Car, $1640

Above prices F. O. B. Kenosha

In addition to Nash passenger cars there is a full line of Nash trucks, including the famous Nash Quad

The Nash Motors Company, Kenosha, Wisconsin
Manufacturers of Passenger Cars and Trucks, Including the Famous Nash Quad

The Nash Motors Limited, Toronto, Ont., Distributors of Nash Cars and Trucks for the Dominion of Canada

NASH MOTORS

VALUE CARS AT VOLUME PRICES

Published Weekly
The Curtis Publishing Company
Cyrus H. K. Curtis, President
Udington, Vice-President and Treasurer
F. Collins, General Business Manager
Walter D. Fuller, Secretary
William Boyd, Advertising Director
dependence Square, Philadelphia
London: 6, Henrietta Street
Covent Garden, W. C.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A° D° 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1919, by the Curtis Publishing Company in the United States and Great Britain

George Horace Lorimer
EDITOR
Churchill Williams, F. S. Bigelow,
A. W. Neall, Arthur McKeogh,
H. D. Walker, E. Dinsmore,
Associate Editors
Walter H. Dower, Art Editor

Entered as Second-Class Matter, November 18, 1879, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Under the Act of March 3, 1879

Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post-Office Department, Ottawa, Canada

ue 192 | 5c. THE COPY 10c. in Canada | PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 8, 1919 | $2.00 THE YEAR by Subscription | Number 19

WHITE-COLLAR MEN

By Forrest Crissey

CE the red-flannel shirt was the symbol f hard toil, scant pay and a fierce and doubtful fight for the plainest creature omforts. To-day the laundry bag is still able to furnish a true symbol of strug- vitude—but it is no longer the red shirt! That scratchy undergarment has planted by the white collar as a sign of economic distress.

eat and genteel neckband of alleged linen—once commonly accepted as the k of higher earning capacity—is now the emblem of the submerged class, the e under dog, the talisman of that tribe of hard-pushed toilers about whose e traditional wolf howls loudest.

not hit the trail of the H. C. of L. k it a rod without running across te but choking white collar and an d checking account. The ragged of he frayed white collar has recently r a high degree of symbolism; it s with cutting irony the economic millions of its wearers.

nous cartoonist recently caught the this situation with graphic clever- hen he depicted a dazed college r gazing in amazement at a wage e in shirt sleeves driving his high- r ar along the boulevard.

ily a professor in one of the fore- f niversities of America spoke with hig sympathy of the pinch which the in costs of living imposed upon the e orker. A somewhat cynical young h wh a passion for original research, a e for contrasts and a disagreeable it f digging for facts, subjected the esor's attitude to investigation and lys. He turned up these interesting s:

Al ost up to the moment of voicing pi for the plight of the wage worker pfessor had been receiving a salary of 00 year. This had been increased to $3000 just before the sympathetic speech which started the investigation. Having a wife and four children, and being obliged to live on a scale befitting a member of the intellectual aristocracy of a great university, he would have been plunged deeply into debt had he not been provided with an income of $100 a month by an intimate and wealthy friend who was keenly interested in his career and fully determined that he should not be hampered or humiliated by a distressing lack of funds. Even this friendly subsidy was not wholly sufficient to keep the professor's scale of living up to an undiminished standard, under the climbing costs of living. The gap that remained was filled by the proceeds of outside lectures and the sale of a few articles to magazines of the more intellectual sort. From all these sources the professor managed to live according to the demands of his position—but he had no surplus left. He barely escaped a balance in red ink.

On the other hand, the pestiferous young student investigator—who helped to fight the H. C. of L. dragon by doing a few feature articles himself—discovered that the driver who left the milk bottles at the professor's back door and never failed to urge the maid to take on an extra bottle of cream was, to use the driver's own expression, "knocking down an average of $220 a month" in wages and commissions. Just a trifle more than the salary of his distinguished customer before the $500 raise so lifted the spirits of that learned intellectual leader.

But the cynic's researches did not stop with the bottles left at the professor's back door. He pushed his investigation to the grocery on the side street from which the family secured its supply of bread. There he made the acquaintance of the bread-wagon driver who supplied the grocer and controlled the route. This vender of fragrant loaves proudly admitted that he had a snap as soft as a feather bed and that his wages and commissions yielded him a little better than $5000 a year. Under the proddings of the young investigator he disclosed that the big baking company for which he worked not only provided all the equipment but that he didn't have to hitch up or unhitch his team. His whole job was to peddle bread to retailers for eight hours a day. It was good bread and was well advertised, so the selling was easy.

When asked if the company wasn't imposing on the consumer by loading the product with so heavy a distribution cost his answer was substantially this:

"Not on your life! Us drivers have got the company where it can't help itself. The bakers are with us solid and when we hold up the hoop you bet the company hops through. They can't help themselves. All they can do is to pass the buck along to the retailer and consumer."

A "BROTHER" ACT

DRAWN BY GUERNSEY MOORE

The investigator confirmed the driver's statement by going to the president of the baking company—who displayed a financial report indicating that, so far as current net profits were concerned, he might well have changed places with the driver serving the store from which the professor bought his bread. Also, the young man with the hunch for original research learned that there was only one point on which the baking company and the driver agreed—that no housewife can bake her own bread, month in and month out—at a cost so low as she can buy it, even at the present high cost of distribution. Both the bread king and his lowly five-thousand-a-year driver were insistent upon this point.

The point that most interested the investigator, however, was the fact that according to the showing of the regular reports furnished by the various bakery units to the president of the company the management had not been able to pass the buck on to the consumer—with the result that, at least for the present, some bakeries in the organization were showing a small current loss and others an infinitesimal profit. Apparently here is a situation which offers a beautiful field for study on the part of the drivers who are interested in the continuance of their profits. To the innocent bystander it would appear that perhaps they have hung about all the costs on the distribution limb that it will bear without breaking. One very large baking company declares that its wagon men are now averaging $48 a week and that several have made more than $5400 from their routes in the past twelve months.

Pity the Poor Professor

WHEN the results of the student investigator's little research were placed before the professor he took off his spectacles, rubbed his eyes and exclaimed: "Can it be possible!"

Yes, professor, it can be and it is—the young cynic with an appetite for original research certainly found the facts and gave them to you straight—for I've checked his findings from official sources and they are O. K. Incidentally, if you are wearing ready-mades—and I think you are—your self-appointed young research enthusiast might have pushed his inquiry to your apparel with equally interesting results.

For example, it may surprise you to learn that the wage of the workers who made your suit has increased about 140% since 1914. In some lines the increase is 135%, in others 145%. One garment worker in a Chicago shop lately drew $78.38 for his week's work of 45½ hours. If he held that pace throughout the year he would overlap your salary by $1075.76. But, of course, garment making is seasonal work; besides, this man might not hold that gait for all the time he did work. Admitting all this, however, why wouldn't it be a pleasant experiment to put the teaching of English literature or psychology on a piece basis and see if a rate about parallel to that in the garment trade could not be worked out? Are you for it, professor?

Again, you have, if I remember rightly, always been strong for equal rights for women. Well, they come rather near having them when it comes to making your clothes. The other day in a large Chicago garment factory a woman pocket maker lately pocketed $70 for her week's work. Of course these are top-notch earnings, but they are by no means unique. They simply show what deft workers in this trade can do when they want to pull down a big pay check and have all the work they can handle. The average weekly pay check for men in the shop where this score was made was $35.78 for men in June, 1919, and $26.28 for women. Some change from the old sweatshop days, I'll say!

When you pull the chain that flashes on the light for your desk in your study you operate a fixture that stands for quite a little forward movement in workmen's wage scale. If that device was made in a certain factory famous for its fixtures it represents an advance in wages, since 1914, of 115½%. Tool and die makers in that shop have been drawing pay checks of $65 to $72 a week. Those checks above $65 represent a few hours' overtime—but I'll hazard the guess that any active college professor can show an overtime score that will run considerably in excess of that required to reach the $72 weekly wage of the tool makers in question.

But how has the white-collar crowd fared in the employ of this same company? If you leave it to them they'll tell you that the treatment they have received has been as white as their collars when fresh from the laundry. But the books show that their advance in the same period has been 61%. There's quite a difference between 61 and 115½—all of 54½. Besides, the wage worker in the electrical industry had quite a start toward a living wage back in 1914. Even then he wasn't looking with acute envy on the average pay check of the white-collar man—the bookkeeper or the accountant, for example.

Before losing sight of the college professor, who may in all fairness be accepted as a type of the highly trained white-collar man, it may be well to locate him a little more definitely on the economic map. In these days of generous appropriations on the part of legislative bodies, state universities and technical colleges are rather liberally provided for by the commonwealths they serve. Most of these universities have agricultural and technical colleges and vocational schools, and are commonly believed to furnish a more practical brand of education than the universities depending upon endowments and donations. Probably for this reason they find it easier to get appropriations which permit them to pay better salaries to their professors than do the universities devoted to more classical lines of education.

From official information I find that the average maximum salary paid to professors in sixty of these state institutions of learning is $2881.67, and the average minimum salary is $1945.33. An average of the two is $2413.50. Take Wisconsin—one of the most widely known and liberally supported of state universities—as an example. For the first three years a full professor there receives $3000; after that he may be advanced from time to time to $4250. An associate professor starts at $2250 and has the opportunity to climb to $2750. Assistant professors begin at $1750 and have the right of way, if they can make the grade, up to $2000. Instructors—the hard-working top sergeants of the teaching troop—are started at $1000 and have a goal of $1500 to work toward.

How about the haughty intellectual temples of academic learning, the places to which the sons of American millionaires are sent for better or for worse? At Harvard a full professor receives $4000 at the outset, but may be advanced in five-year periods to the princely stipend of $5500. Associate professors there are started at $3500 and may be raised in five years to $4000—but five years seems like a long time to some of them! They freely admit it. Assistant professors at Harvard are started on their joyful journey upward at $2500 and may go to $3000 if they hold on long enough. Instructors begin at $1250 and may attain $1500 if they don't lose their grip. Is it any wonder that Harvard is now making a drive on Multimillionaire Row for some $15,000,000, largely as an endowment f the increase of professors' salaries?

The top notch at Yale for a full professor is $6000—b he has to start at $4000. With slight variations the sal ries of the lower ranks at Yale parallel those of Harva

For the sake of contrast turn to some of the top-notche in overalls. The wage of a skull cracker in a steel pla near Chicago for the week immediately preceding t writing of this article was $111.12. A hammer man in t same plant averaged $107.68 a week for the month August. These scores are not those made under t pressure of war production. They are peace wages.

When questioned as to the qualifications required to a man to earn this wage—which exceeds by far the sala of the average college president in America—an officer the company answered: "As to education there is no requir ment whatever. The man need not speak English or l able to write his own name. But he must have a quick ey a fair amount of physical strength, a rather high degree bodily dexterity and good endurance. Any man with th natural equipment could, with three months' training, g away with the more difficult of these two tasks and hand it proficiently. The less difficult one could be mastered b such a man in a much shorter training period."

The Bank Man's Story

THE skull cracker mashes the skulls of metal left in th huge ladles from which the metal has been poure This is done by the blows of an immense triphammer. Th hammer man is also engaged in crushing various forms scrap for salvage purposes. Both work on a tonnage basi

A certain large company in the Middle West has 300 t 400 white-collar men on its executive staff who are no getting $200 a month. The same corporation has wag workers in large numbers who make $3000 to $4000 year, and a few whose total wage for the past twelve month set the pay roll back to the merry tune of $8000. I'd pain fully dislike to buy the dinners for all the bank president in the country whose salaries are below the wages of thes top-notch toilers.

Going at random in the Chicago financial district entered an imposing bank building and fell into conversa tion with the first attaché I encountered. He refused a invitation to luncheon on the ground of loyalty to his job The bank, he said, had treated him so handsomely that h felt bound to give it the fullest measure of service in him and this implied that he stick on duty from eight-thirty i the morning until five in the afternoon. He had cut ou luncheon altogether, he explained, because he felt he coul be of especial value to the bank and its customers at th time of day when many officials were taking their noonday meal. His especial cause of gratitude to the managemen is based on the fact that his salary has been increased fron $1500 in 1914 to $2400 a year, and that he is probably th best-paid man in his position in any Chicago bank.

He doesn't attempt to explain how those in similar posi tions are able to get past the H. C. of L. wolf on their lowe salaries, but simply admits that he found it impossible t maintain his family on his former stipend. When the cost of necessities began to climb like Rohlf's triplane that out soared all altitude records he faced the fact that he must either get more salary, set his children at work or drop into a calling that did not require the scale of living and appear ance demanded by his present employment. But let him tell the story in his own words—for it is paralleled by the experience of thousands of white-collar men:

"Back in 1914 I felt that I had no reason to complain and that we were well provided for on $1500 a year.

I, confess that I did not indulge in dreams of any tli; advancement. I had happened to land in one of se positions that do not seem to lead naturally to other tio's of higher rank and pay. Perhaps you might call it in alley position. There are thousands of that sort.
re rather out of the direct line of promotion. This is ai'ly true when they are held by men at the threshold idle life, as I am. The very young man may use them e ping-stones, but older men are likely to stick in e—and be thankful to remain undisturbed. It seemed e nat about the best I could count on was the moderease of pay that a high-class management gives as o ition of continued service. Looking at the future i way I was fairly well content when the war broke.
i red—my wife and I—that if we could manage to en and rear and educate our four children on an income basis we would trust to the future to furnish, orm of increased pay, anything to be put aside as us. The idea of saving whatever I might receive e 1500 now seems absurd.
as soon as prices began to advance even slightly to feel the pinch. Our boy was at the age of fifteen three girls were younger. It was soon clear that I ther go in debt or allow the boy to get a job—or But we are not different from millions of parents of e thoughtful sort in that we feel the education of dren to be the most important thing on the parental
r. Therefore we held our son in school as long as —even when obliged to take on a little debt in do so; this on the theory that he could help out ayment by vacation work."

More Pay and Less Comfort with steadily increasing costs for the necessities of e the hopelessness and folly of this policy soon beainfully apparent, and the boy was taken out of o fill a position as office boy at $35 a month. We were ying $26 rent, as against $40 now, and his clothes st $12 to $15 a suit, instead of $30 to $35, their cost. Shoes were then one-half their cost to-day re of better material.

I wouldn't believe how we had to scheme and turn t ist to keep up a respectable appearance and make ds meet—even with our son's wages of $35 a month
f. And we are doing it just as feverishly to-day.
counts go to show that our living costs are now at vice what they were then, all things considered—hat in most respects we are not living in any more ft on my present salary of $2400 than we were in d early 1915 on $1500. If there is any difference we e eater difficulty in keeping within our income than li then.
Phaps I can suggest something of the restraint we ced upon to exercise by saying that I have not taken faily to a movie theater but once in a year—nor have children been furnished the money with which to go nselves. We simply can't do it without falling behind ur bills. If there is a wage worker in Chicago whose dn do not have money to attend the movies more ice a year I'd like to learn his address!
The matter of clothing expense has to be considered ith greater care than ever before. When the war was th boy was a member of the cadet corps and had uiform furnished. That was a decided help—as I realized when it came time to buy him a new civilian suit to take the place of the uniform. To do this I was obliged to sell a Liberty Bond, for the suit cost $35.

"It has been necessary for us to work out a definite purchasing policy, and that is this: It is poor economy to buy inferior quality. In the prewar days it was often possible to find satisfactory quality in goods offered at relatively a low price. In other words, real bargains were then available among low-priced goods. We have found that quality of merchandise has almost universally degenerated as prices have soared. Therefore to-day we do not dare to put our money into anything but goods of known standard quality.

"This applies to foodstuffs as well as to apparel. In 1918, when the pressure was greatest, we attempted to beat the H. C. of L. by hunting meat bargains—buying cheap cuts at cheap places. My wife happens to be an uncommonly good cook. I'm warranted in saying that if anyone can prepare a cheap cut of meat so that it will taste good and deliver all its natural nourishment she can. But our experiment in shopping for meat bargains was a disappointment. The meats secured in this way did not taste right and they didn't seem to be nourishing. This brought us back to buying at a market that did not specialize in bargains and cheap stuff. We paid a higher price per pound, bought less, and felt that we secured more satisfaction and more actual nourishment for our money.

"I'm not suggesting that the more expensive cuts of meat are cheapest. We buy what is technically known as cheap cuts. The point I make is that we get better value in buying where the general quality or grade of meat handled is relatively high, where cheapness is not urged as a means of getting more business.

"The other evening we went over a sheaf of old 1914 and 1915 cash-purchase tickets and compared them with recent ones. The gap between them made us gasp in spite of the fact that we knew it must be wide. Shoes for our girls now cost us more than twice what they did in 1914 and I'm sure the quality of the new ones is a little inferior. Ginghams are costing us three times what they did five years ago. Stockings for the girls were then twenty-five cents a pair. Those supposed to be of the same grade now cost sixty-five cents. Undergarments are now two and a half to three times what they were in 1914.

"I'm ashamed to admit that I'm the best-dressed member of the family. But this is not from choice but necessity. It is a demand of my white-collar position. My work absolutely requires a neat, not to say immaculate, appearance. It is not enough that my clothes be clean and whole; they must also be within reasonable range of the prevailing styles. In a word, the requirement is that I must be well dressed in the strictest sense of the term. My only offset to this expense is to take the most painstaking care of my clothes, hats and shoes. I do not spend a dollar a year for cleaning or pressing or for the polishing of shoes. All that is done at home.

"My wife makes her own dresses and those for the girls. They wear both their house and street clothes for several seasons. Mending in our family is not a hit-and-miss occupation; it's a system. Holes are darned when they first appear and rents and tears are attended to immediately. Planning clothes for a change of season is not delayed to the eleventh hour, but is carefully considered weeks and months in advance.

"Perhaps nothing I could tell you of our struggle to make a salary of $2400 cover the expenses of a white-collar family of six in these days would give quite so intimate a view of how close a game we are playing as would this incident: Until my salary was raised to $2400 and that income had been available long enough to allow us to recover some lost ground it seemed impossible to think of the matter of dental work. We were simply forced to let that go. But the time came a little while ago when in the case of my wife it could not be neglected any longer. Something had to be done at once. She had her teeth examined and learned that to put them in proper condition would demand the expenditure of several hundred dollars. Most of them could be saved, she was told.

"Did she have them filled? No! On her own initiative she had them drawn instead—because that would be much cheaper. A temporary set of false teeth will cost at least $50—but that is far different from $300 for filling. She is paying the price, in the sacrifice of her natural teeth, of being the wife of a white-collar man in these strange days. How many wives of machinists, garment workers, bread-wagon men, milk-wagon drivers or steel workers do you imagine are having their teeth drawn as means of saving the greater expense of filling?

"I can sum up our family situation by saying that until living costs decline all we ask is to be able to keep out of debt and not be forced to take our older girl out of school in order that she may add something to the family income. It is a sharp and constant fight to do this—a much harder struggle than it was to play even, back in 1914, on a salary of $1500."

The Bank Runner's Story

DID you ever chance to notice the neat appearance of the typical bank messenger? Take a look at the next one you happen to meet. If he is delivering more than $10,000 in currency or in securities that are the equivalent of so much money he will be accompanied by one guard; if more than $20,000, by two guards. Such a man attracted my attention the other day. He belonged to the white-collar crowd and so I looked him up. Here is his story:

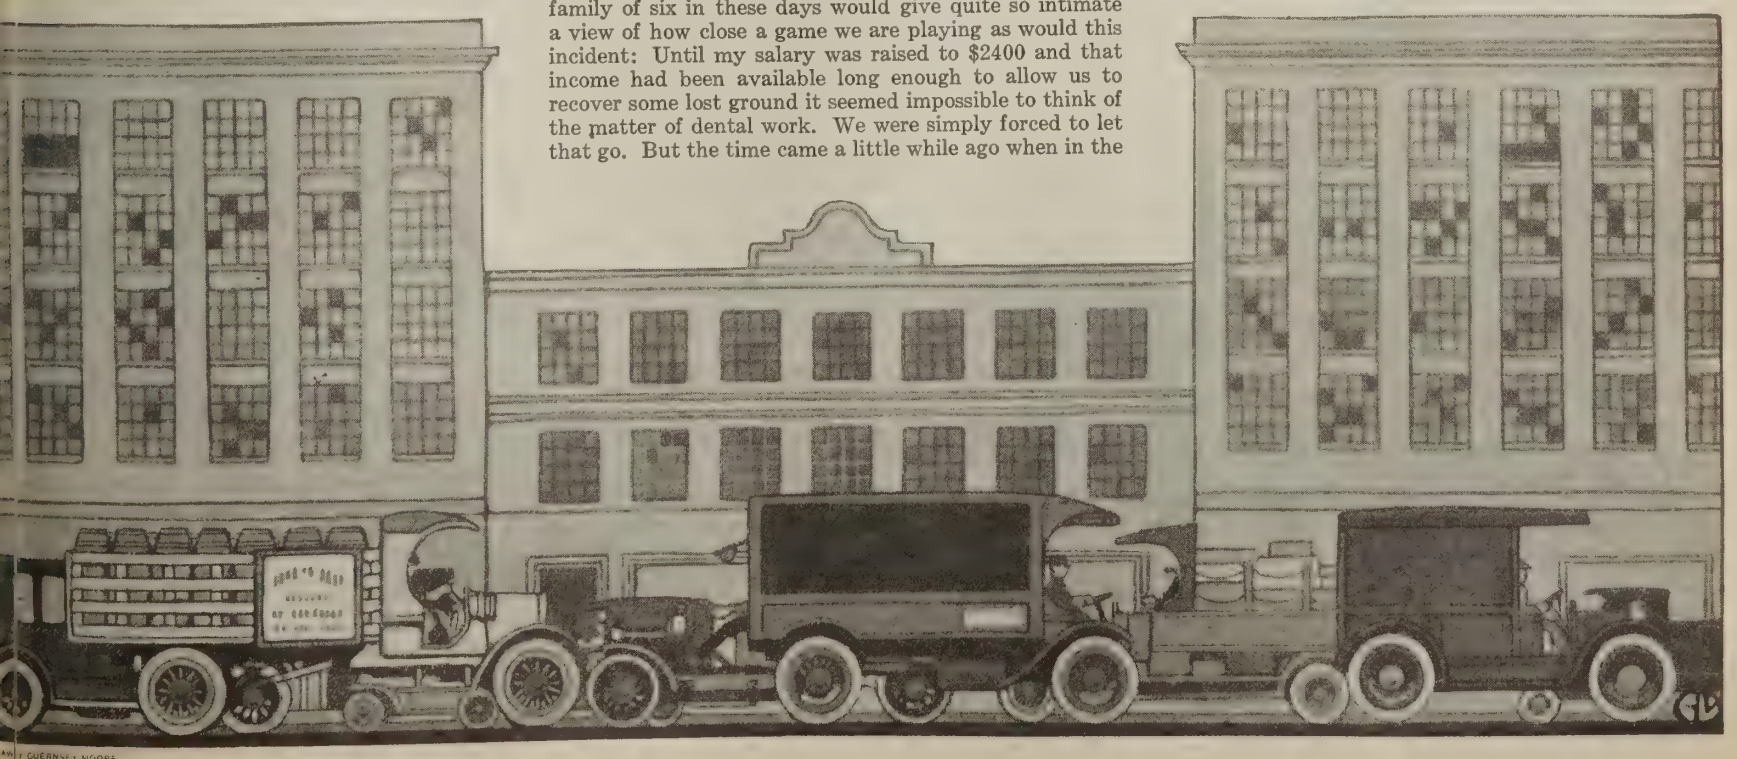
Before he could secure his position he had to pass a character examination to which few ministers of the gospel are subjected before being accepted in new charges. His family tree had to be proved free of taint from root to topmost twig. Besides, he had to carry the proof of intelligence, courage and general high character in his face.

Back in 1914 this man was drawing a salary of about $800—a trifle less, in fact. He is working for a bank that is known to be exceptionally fair and liberal with its employees. Its salary scale is higher than that of several other banks, of equal size in the same city. Since 1914 he has been raised at least twice, and on the initiative of the management. To-day he is drawing $95 a month.

A few weeks ago he went to a minor official of the bank who had shown him especial friendliness and said:

"I've never asked for a raise before, but I guess I've got to this time. I'm up against it hard. Personally I have just thirty cents on which to run until pay day. Five cents a day with seven-cent street-car fares means walking both to and from home. Only the two kids get milk at our house. The wife and I don't get a spoonful of it and we don't know the taste of butter. In fact, butterine is a luxury with us now, and most of the time we take our bread straight. If we have a little meat for Sundays we're in luck. If I can't get a raise I've simply got to quit and hunt a job on a milk wagon or in a shop. I'm quick, strong for my size, and I can outwalk any milk driver that I know. The driver that brings our bottles tells me he averages better than fifty a week and that there are several routes in town fatter than his. We don't take ice, but there's a machinist in our building who does, and his

(Continued on Page 173)



THE LEAGUE OF NOTIONS

By Holworthy Hall

ILLUSTRATED BY CHARLES D. MITCHELL

MR. SAMUEL J. BOWKER—who saw no inconsistency in smoking a four-cent stogy while he was rolling home in a seven-thousand-dollar touring car—Mr. Samuel J. Bowker broke off his serene meditation upon his own greatness, leaned forward from the hips, and spoke in his colorless, slightly metallic voice to his new chauffeur.

"See that man who's walking so fast up ahead there? Stop a little bit the other side of him. And, by the way, I've noticed you don't quite cut off all the gas when I tell you to stop, just for a minute or so. Please cut it off, after this, as far as it goes. You'll find she idles down very well; and if she doesn't, you can put in some of your spare time adjusting the carburetor."

The chauffeur said no word; he made no sign; but his shoulders and the back of his shaven neck seemed almost blessed with the power of speech. Mr. Bowker sensed this miracle, and knew that it was time to sing his favorite canticle.

"To waste—to waste—even as little as a quart of gasoline a day," he said, "is like throwing away three hundred and sixty-five dollars into that gutter over there. My three hundred and sixty-five dollars. Because, when a quart of gasoline costs six cents or more, that represents the interest on One Dollar for One Year. So even if it sounds to you like a small thing—remember it's my money that's being wasted."

By now the unresponsible chauffeur had swung the car in close to the curb, and Mr. Bowker was lifting his hand, in a lukewarm gesture of invitation, to the young man who had walked, and was still walking, so swiftly. The footfalls of this young man were almost as rapid and staccato as his name, which was John Huntington Bangs. Pedestrians gave him, voluntarily, the right of way; his impetus, with a hundred and seventy pounds of energy behind it; his eyes, always intent on the world before him; his jaw, suggesting that he had just made a quick resolution to get somewhere as soon as he could—all these factors combined won him the ready precedence which generally goes to a man who acts as though he expects it. People often stared at him on the street as he went by; but to-day, when the thermometer was still hovering round par, there were twenty heads turned in a single block. It made one hotter, and perhaps a trifle resentful, simply to look at him; for he possessed that rare physique which permitted him to live through these sultry days at high speed without becoming deliquescent.

"There's a Head of Lettuce Fallen Clear Down Behind the Ice, Bruno. I Wish You'd Come and Get it Out for Me"

"John," said Mr. Bowker, as the young man came hammering abreast of him, "John, you're a fool to walk that fast on a day like this. It's bad for the heart. And you've melted your collar. I'd wear soft shirts in the summertime if I were you. Get in, and I'll drop you two squares from your house."

Mr. Bangs, who had a tightly folded newspaper in his hand, climbed briskly into the tonneau and threw the newspaper over into the trolley tracks.

"It's an outrage!" said Mr. Bangs, his eyes snapping. "It's getting darned near unendurable!"

"Go ahead—er—go ahead, chauffeur, and don't drive in the tracks. It's bad for the tires." Mr. Bowker turned to his guest. "I'd offer you a cigar, John, but you wouldn't have time to half smoke it anyway. What's the outrage?"

"Oh, the whole infernal thing!" said Mr. Bangs roundly. "It's getting sickening. By George, I wish I had some say in the Government! What these people need is some two-fisted fighter who'll stand up to 'em like a man, like Teddy Roosevelt, or Ole Hanson, out there in Seattle. It's the shame of civilization, by George! And we're either too cowardly or too lazy to lift a finger about it." He shook his head vigorously, as though to stop the buzzing in his ears. "Have you seen the newsboys to-night?"

"Yes."

"Seen the celluloid buttons they're wearing?"

"Yes."

"Those buttons half as big as a soup plate—'I Don't Sell the Wellington Journal!'"

"Yes."

Mr. Bangs glared at him. "Well, what do you think of it? The newsboys have struck! It's some row of theirs to buy their papers fifteen for ten cents instead of ten for ten cents. And it isn't going to affect us, anyway—not unless the Journal goes to three cents, which I suppose they'll say they have to—but we have to suffer until it's settled. I've got my Journal at the stand in the Bowker Building every evening for four years. Never missed it till to-night."

"Why didn't you subscribe and save money?" inquired Mr. Bowker calmly. "Then you'd have had your paper at home to-night just the same."

Mr. Bangs gestured impatiently, but took pai to restrain himself, for Mr. Bowker was almost o enough to be his father. And in addition, Mr. Bowk was a landowner, and a holder of mortgages, and director of many industr corporations and two ban and his wife was regent of t set which called itself exc sive, and was really quite exclusive as any of them. T best people—to quote M Bowker. And Mr. Bangs w thoroughly married.

"That isn't the point. tried every stand and eve boy for a quarter of a mi It's concerted action, tha what it is; and it ought be stopped. And then so smart Aleck sold me what thought was a Journal, and charged me a nickel for it b cause he said he was risking fight with the Newsboys' A sociation to sell it at all, a when I opened it it was Herald, anyway."

"I'd have gone back," sa Mr. Bowker presently.

"I did—but he'd gon And that isn't the poi either. The point is that consumers are letting ou selves be held up right a left by these infernal unio It's going too far; by Georg it is! There's a trolley strik and an express strike, and machinists' strike, and Lo knows what else, right in th one town; and now the new boys have got the fever a started a boycott, and I su pose the Journal'll use it an excuse to boost their pric and then make more mon than they did before! Y can't turn round witho stepping on some union other. And we consume have to sit still and wait un they get through bickerin and then pay higher pric than ever. Striking ought be a criminal offense, b George! I've had enough of The time to talk has gone b it's time to do something!"

"What'll you do?" aske Mr. Bowker, cocking his hea dispassionately.

Mr. Bangs, who had e pected to be agreed with—o financial grounds, if not o ethical considerations—M Bangs looked rather blan

"Well," he said, "I haven't altogether made my mi up yet, but I'll be hanged if I intend to stand for this so of thing much longer. And I don't believe anybody el does, either. I don't believe you do. What we've got to d is to take matters into our own hands. We certainly hav If we consumers would ever once get together and do little organizing on our own hook—why, why we'd cut th cost of living down thirty per cent."

Mr. Bowker bent forward to the chauffeur.

"Stop at the next corner. . . . Well, John, mayb you're right, and maybe you're wrong. But I guess n body'll ever get up that organization unless you do yourself."

Mr. Bangs, dismounting, flicked up his jaw in a fin display of belligerence.

"Well, maybe I will, at that." He ventured an aud cious challenge—audacious because Mr. Bowker was personage who didn't like to commit himself to anythin That was why Mr. Bangs, who was partly serious, smile as he said it, in order that Mr. Bowker could take it as passing pleasantry if he chose. "When I do, can I coun on you as a member?"

"You can count on me," said Mr. Bowker, wit slightly more enthusiasm, "to do anything that'll sav money, John. That's why I'm where I am to-day. Get u your organization and we'll talk it over." He nodde gol night, but had an afterthought. "I wish you'd n what paper it was you were throwing away, ıgl back there. My wife sort of likes the Herald every i a while—but I don't subscribe. It ain't hardly th."

II

R. BANGS, who was an understanding woman, once sıd of her husband that he had a nature like plative. He bent to the smallest pressure, but he didn't k. And he also had a great readiness to glow into ry eat when there was only a little blaze to warm him; ıcooled as swiftly. So that when he turned into his k pathway three minutes after he had waved to Bıker in farewell, his mood was seraphic again, and ıs looking forward with eagerness to the joy of re-ıcquaintanceship with his wife.

ıe had been married now for more than half a dozen s, nd all the wives of the neighborhood, when their ısbands forgot little incidents, such as birthdays ıeling anniversaries, or when they dashed off after kıst with a flourish of the napkin as a valedictory,
r. Bangs as an illustration of male fidelity to roc Mr. Bangs, in leaving the house in the morning, y and invariably halted at the first oak tree, again at ırant, and finally at the letter box, to wigwag his et at being compelled to depart and earn an honest
g And his halts were no superficial performances orfor he came to a sincere standstill, and cast brave ck astern to Sylvia and the baby on the veranda.
d night when he returned in weariness, Sylvia often e ying down the walk to meet him; or, at the worst, jıt over the threshold; and she was always fresh and rıl and affectionate. And the husbands of the neighıcd sometimes countered with these illustrations, too.
ıno discredit to the romance that when Mr. Bangs, ı short distance, perceived no Sylvia in ambush for ı consciously shortened his stride. She claimed the ıt to detect his footfall half a block away, and he was ıgher time to get downstairs. In going up the bricked pathway he scuffed his feet loudly, heedless of the cold chills that promptly brushed up and down his spine. He trod the steps with the stamp of a milkman, and produced heavy reverberations on the veranda. All these were additional signals to Sylvia, in case her watch had misled her, or her ears had gone temporarily out of tune. There was still sufficient latitude for her to take her station just over the threshold.

But as Mr. Bangs fumbled tardily for his keys he was aware that no wife was on the other side of the glass door. Not yet distressed, but merely contemplative, he went over to the shoe scraper, which was loose enough to rattle pleasantly, and he scraped the soles of both shoes free from the imaginary mud of pavements on which no rain had fallen for the past five weeks. There was still no Sylvia in the hallway.

Mr. Bangs let himself in very noisily, and began to hum in a lugubrious barytone. His attention wandered before him to the stairs; he expected every instant to see a contrite Sylvia come dashing down them, freighted with welcome and consolation. He hummed as though the duke would say: "Let him hum again! Let him hum again!" He stood posed at the foot of the stairs and called, softly and tenderly: "Sylvia!" Then, less softly, and with tenderness somewhat diluted: "Oh, Sylvia, dear!" Then, with frank intent to be heard and answered—and the rest of it could come later: "Hi! Sylvia!"

Mr. Bangs said "Humph!" and stood for a moment scratching his nose. No one, to observe his present helplessness in the emergency of a mislaid wife, would have pictured him as an avenger of the rights of man. His eyes had positive consternation in them, and he was deeply aggrieved. This failure of reception had happened only twice before in all his married history.

Reason returned to him, and he started for the kitchen to interview Ingred, the tall and stately blonde who would probably know where Mrs. Bangs had gone, whether or not Mrs. Bangs had told her. The kitchen was redolent with dinner, but empty of personnel. But from the back porch, where the ice box was located, vague murmurs floated to him, and then a stifled voice saying "Oh, sugar!" Mr. Bangs put out an ear, and was rewarded by a larger and more heartfelt exclamation: "Oh, ding!" And the voice wasn't the voice of Ingred, and Ingred had a different and a more convincing set of expletives anyway.

Mr. Bangs sprang to the porch. "Sylvia!"

From her knees the wife of his romance looked up at him; and it was a tribute to his constancy that he adored her then as much as ever. To be sure, no mere warmth of atmosphere could destroy her permanent charms, and a vivid color became her well; but something had tried her temper, and a looping strand of her hair was acting as impediment to her vision.

"Sylvia!" said Mr. Bangs. "What on earth are you doing here?"

It was evident that she had to make an effort to control herself, but she did it beautifully. She even managed to produce a very narrow smile for him. Nevertheless, the style of her greeting created a brand-new precedent:

"There's a head of lettuce fallen clear down behind the ice, Bruno. I wish you'd come and get it out for me."

As he helped her up Mr. Bangs' orderly mind clamped itself round the fact that this was only Tuesday.

"What's the matter with Ingred? Is she sick?"

"No. I'm the one who's sick," said Sylvia, just a trifle brusquely; and as she struggled up from her cramped position there was a sound of ripping.

"Oh, darn! Everything—— Oh, it's only my apron. Why, I'm sick of the whole servant problem, Bruno. I guess we've got pretty nearly to the limit. I'm sick and tired of it, and I don't care what happens any more. Ingred's left."

"Left?" repeated Mr. Bangs incredulously. "Left?" He knew from long experience what woe was in the announcement, and what inconvenience in store for Sylvia.

Sylvia nodded, and put her hair back.

"And without any notice." She regarded her hands with great esteem. "I'm not sure, but I think I've frozen

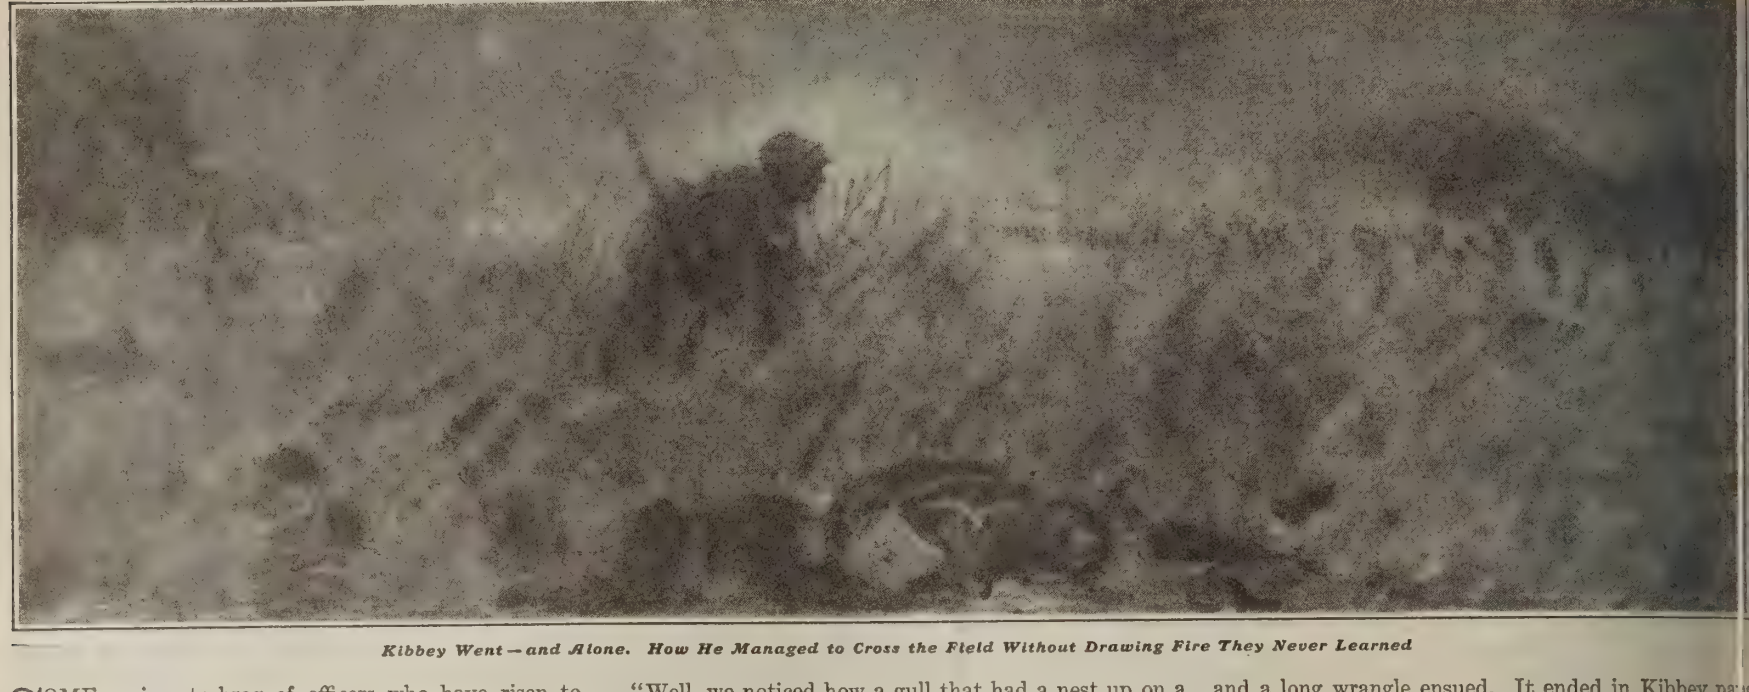
(Continued on Page 91)

"We Might Start an Antistrike Strike," Said Helen Everson Cheerfully. "Only I Don't Exactly See How We Could Do It. Does Anybody Else?"

THE CAPTAIN

By GEORGE PATTULLO

ILLUSTRATED BY CLARK F Ar



Kibbey Went—and Alone. How He Managed to Cross the Field Without Drawing Fire They Never Learned

SOME regiments brag of officers who have risen to command divisions and corps and armies, but the proudest boast of the Blank Infantry is a captain who was demoted to the ranks. Kibbey has become an object of such idolatry to them that 'twere safer to speak slightingly of their wives than to hint that possibly Kibbey was really pickled on the occasion which led to his disgrace.

Yet the evidence in his case was indisputable. That he was a teetotaler all his life renders his misfortune more tragic, but does not—as the Blanks profanely argue—prove that the charges against him were impossible. The top sergeant swore to them and every man of the patrol substantiated his story. What else could the court have done?

Kibbey had been a teacher in a boys' school somewhere in New England. He ought to have been an army chaplain, because his every inclination ran that way and the Army needs more of his caliber. Instead he went through a training camp and received a captain's commission in the infantry, and came over in command of Company F in the Blanks.

To hear the boys talk now, you would suppose he had been the finest company commander that ever stepped, but I recall that in those early days Kibbey was variously known to his men as Rosy and Fathead and Holy Joe. Which is not to say they did not like him; every officer receives a nickname, and a hero to the public may pass as Dopey Dick to his own command.

As a matter of fact, the majority of Company F would have taken off their shirts for Kibbey. A few hated him with a deep and malignant hatred, but those few would have hated anybody, and their only complaint was his discipline. However, the average American doughboy is so constituted that he doesn't give a hoot how strict an officer may be, provided he is impartial and just, and Kibbey had bowels; so his hold on the loyalty of Company F was secure.

"Wait till we git up to the front," declared Private Oskowitz, who had been detailed to K.P. for malingering, as he whittled savagely on a spud, "an' I'll fix the —— I'll put a bullet through him if they croak me for it."

Ike O'Brien, né Roberto Pasquale, the wop cook, straightened from an inspection of the contents of an oven and picked up a pothook.

"You quitta that right now," he warned Oskowitz, "or I bumpa you with this."

Kibbey got along well enough with the other officers of the battalion. True, they always grinned when he hove in sight or even when his name was mentioned, but that was because Kibbey looked so absurdly innocent and was so mightily serious and earnest. He had a round face, blue eyes and a baby stare, and he believed everything anybody told him with a straight countenance.

"The hungriest I ever got," declared Lieutenant Dougherty one afternoon in the mess while a group of officers were discussing the effect of slum on morale, "was during a summer in Michigan. My uncle and I were marooned on an island in a lake—boat floated off—and there we were for a week without a bite to eat or so much as a fishhook. Guess how we got along?"

A curious silence fell. Only Kibbey rose to the bait.

"How?" he inquired.

"Well, we noticed how a gull that had a nest up on a rock used to fly over our heads every afternoon about four o'clock with a fish in its mouth. So uncle would up and holler 'Boo!' at him, and it scared him so he always dropped the fish."

Nobody offered any comment; but after he had gone out Kibbey grew thoughtful.

"Do you know," he said at last, "I believe Dougherty draws on his imagination sometimes. Yesterday he told me his uncle owned a bottle mine in Wales, but traded it off for a cheese swamp in Switzerland."

A credulous individual is always made the butt, and Dougherty rather overdid his practical jokes; I never met a practical joker who didn't. For instance, he proposed a wild-boar hunt while the regiment was in the training area near Gondrecourt, and narrated so many hair-raising tales of the chase that he had Kibbey half crazy to take part.

A few boar roamed a forest between Neufchâteau and Gondrecourt, and Dougherty's plan was to form a line of armed beaters and drive them into an open space where one of the officers could kill them.

"Yes, but who gets that job?" they demanded.

"We'll draw lots."

"But why not have more than one man there to kill them?" suggested a shavetail.

They squelched him instantly by a pressure of silence.

"Probably we won't find more'n one boar," explained Dougherty, "and to avoid an argument we 'll leave only one man there. The question is, who'll do the dirty work? It'll be taking a chance, of course."

Volunteers instantly raised a clamor. Kibbey was too modest to push his claims, but he was fairly shaking with eagerness.

"To make it all fair and square," Dougherty proposed, "let's draw lots."

Kibbey won, of course; and the hunt was scheduled for the following Sunday afternoon. How they ever persuaded the captain of Company F to rig himself up as he did, I don't know, but Kibbey appeared on the scene with three pairs of spirals wrapped round his legs, to prevent the ferocious creature gnawing at his calves; a helmet on his head; a fur coat to protect his body; and in his hands an automatic revolver, a trench knife and a heavy club.

"Hi, wait a minute!" cried Dougherty. "How're you going to save your face? Get a mask, somebody!"

So they hung a baseball mask on him, and the hunter was equipped for the fray. They stationed Kibbey in a glade and blithely departed to round up the quarry.

In half an hour or thereabouts the captain heard the shouts and huzzas of the beaters and presently the worried grunting of a hog. Next moment the animal broke cover directly opposite him and halted, eying Kibbey with a suspicion tinged with a great wonder. The captain sighted carefully and fired; and the pig scampered away into the woods, squealing.

Hardly had the noise died away when an old peasant burst into sight, waving his hands and crying that the American captain had ruined him utterly—mais oui, had blighted his life beyond redemption! What did he mean by shooting their only pig, the prop and mainstay and joy of their old age? Then the beaters appeared, with a precision strongly suggestive of the chorus in a comic opera, and a long wrangle ensued. It ended in Kibbey pa[y] the farmer a hundred francs for injury to the porker. [To] be sure, he would not die, but he would inevitably [lose] weight from the wound because his feelings had bee[n] grievously hurt.

Kibbey could take a joke on himself, additional p[roof] that he was devoid of a real sense of humor; and he bor[e] grudge against Dougherty for the incident. Neither [did] he flare up or show rancor when the lieutenant play[ed] scurvy trick on him at La Folie.

It happened that the Blanks were going into the lin[es] the first time, and after a long day's hike Compan[y] rested for the night in a ramshackle group of farm b[uild]ings about twelve kilometers from the front. The bille[t] accommodations were scant: One bedroom for the officers; the men slept with the cows and sheep in barn, and up in the haymows.

It had been a punishing day, and Kibbey slept li[ke a] log—slept so hard that the outfit was about ready to r[ide] before he dragged himself out from under the warm fea[ther] quilt. Consequently he had no time to wash or make [a] sort of toilet—simply grabbed his blouse and ran int[o] yard.

When he appeared a titter rippled through the r[anks] The sleepiest doughboy there grew wide awake. Gal[es] laughter; for the captain's face was as black as the a[ce] spades. Dougherty had worked on him with a burnt [cork] during the night.

It might have gone hard with Dougherty, of Com[pany] M, had not the Old Man begun to snigger when that y[oung] was brought up on the carpet. But the colonel could[n't] forget the glimpse of Kibbey he caught in passing [at] Folie. So: "Get out of here. Quick! I'll atten[d to] your case later." And next day the Old Man had too [many] matters of importance to worry over, to bother with [the] pranks of a shavetail.

The Blanks got their first taste of war in the Toul [sec]tor. It was very quiet. They didn't know it then; [they] learned that later. To the untried Blanks, going into [the] line opposite frowning St.-Mihiel was like plunging [into] the jaws of hell. They had been reading about carnag[e] three years; they had listened to the tales of the Fr[ench] who had been through it; a thousand times they [had] talked over what might happen. As a consequence ev[ery] body was jumpy.

Especially taut were the nerves of the officers an[d] those who had to shoulder responsibility. Major Bi[ll] in command of the battalion to which Company F [be]longed, displayed a hair-trigger temper during the w[hole] tour.

"What's the matter with Kibbey, anyhow?" he snap[ped] while discussing patrols with two other company [com]manders in the battalion P.C.

"Why, I didn't know there was anything the m[atter] with him, sir."

"Something's on his mind. Mopes round like a [dog] with the mange."

There was a discreet silence. If the Front worrie[s a] officer—or should one break under the strain—the o[ther] don't care to talk about it.

The major went questing for information. [He] walked through every foot of the trenches his batt[alion] occupied and stopped for lunch and most of the after[noon]

th salient held by Company F. He found Kibbey slee in his dugout, after being up all night, and did not akeim.

Wadering back to the company kitchen, located under e rns of a house, the major opened up a conversation ith se O'Brien, whilst he drank a cup of coffee.

"Ow's the captain?" he inquired casually.

"Yell, sir, I don't believe the capatin isa feelin' good," wed the wop, always ready to talk frankly on any jet.

"That so? What's the matter?"

"eculiar whine, rising to a shriek, delayed the cook's k They heard a scurry of feet as the doughboys loaf-rir the kitchen ducked for cover, and then the crash rapnel shell above the door. "Where did that baby
"Keep count on 'em, Dan." "Watch me when them G-I cans comes over. Oo, là là! Ten yards r-fifth flat."

k waited until the usual salvo had burst. "Does the jt want to know what I think?" he demanded, placidly i the fire.

"Soot."

"Yell, sir, I think it's a skoit," said the cook, from the it of dark experience.

h there the conversation ended, because a battalion mander can't talk over a captain's affairs with the k it simply isn't done. However, O'Brien had given new angle.

"Ou'll have to rig up some other way of carrying off nsmoke," the major cautioned before departure. nody could see that five miles." Then he made a k for the trench, because a kitchen is about the un-fe spot in the line to loiter near, and it was the hour
th afternoon when Heinie was wont to open up.

"skirt, hey?" he muttered as he sloshed through the ud "I wouldn't be surprised. Unless a man's sick it's fe o figure there's a girl in it when he loses interest.
nd Kibbey's health's all right."

On the day before they were to be relieved the top sergeant of Company F came to his dugout to see him. And when he had told his story Biggar didn't know whether to send for a medico to examine the sergeant or to put him under arrest on the spot for deliberate, malicious lying. Had somebody mentioned casually to the major that the Archbishop of Canterbury was being talked about for having done the shimmy in Trafalgar Square he could not have been more amazed.

"It's the truth, sir. The captain was so drunk he couldn't walk good. And he kept talking and making a noise. It's a wonder they didn't hear him and get the whole patrol."

"Of course. Of course," answered the major kindly, for it was plain that the top sergeant had gone out of his head. "Sit down, sergeant. You're worn out."

With some warmth: "If you don't believe me ask any of the men, sir. Or just send for the captain himself, major. He's still stewed."

"I suppose you know," remarked the battalion commander, "that Captain Kibbey was never known to take a drink. He's a teetotaler."

This information appeared to jolt the sergeant, but he immediately recovered. "Maybe so, sir. But if he wasn't soused last night, then we've throwed a lot of birds in the jug for nothing. Why not send for him before he sobers up?"

The merest child reared in a prohibition state could have seen from Kibbey's demeanor that the sergeant was right. To be sure, he stood very straight and saluted smartly, but he leaned much too far back, and it was obvious that the rich hue of his face owed as much to moonshine as to sunshine.

"The complaint is that you were drunk on night patrol, Captain Kibbey."

"No, sir. Perf'ly sober."

"Had you been drinking?"

The captain pondered this question long and carefully, but it wasn't in him to lie. "Yes, sir."

"How much?"

"Just some out of bottle. Coupla drinks."

"And where did you get a bottle?" the major continued, stern now.

"Rather not say, sir. No fair."

"We'll see about that later. You know the orders. Why did you take those drinks?"

"That," responded Kibbey solemnly, teetering on his feet—"personal matter."

The battalion commander stared at him a while. He hated to do it, but there was no alternative.

"You're under arrest," he said. "Lieutenant Cooper will take over the company. Report at regimental headquarters in two hours."

"Yes, sir," answered Kibbey, dazed. He saluted and went out.

In due time a court tried Kibbey. The evidence against him was overwhelming. Not a man on the patrol but tried to soften the story, and several of them lied nobly; but the captain himself admitted that he had drunk an unknown quantity of cognac, because he was wretched and worried over a personal matter, and it was proved beyond a doubt that his behavior had been reckless and criminally careless in No Man's Land, thereby endangering the lives of the men under his command.

As character witnesses his counsel, Lieutenant Dougherty, called Major Biggar and the Old Man himself; but though they gave him a spotless reputation the offense with which he was charged could not be overlooked or glossed in war. Kibbey was sentenced to loss of his commission and ten years in Leavenworth. You see, sometimes an individual has to be sacrificed as a warning to others.

Then the members of the court did a curious thing. They about-faced and unanimously signed a recommendation for clemency, pointing out his previous exemplary conduct and character. And Kibbey did not go to prison.

(Continued on Page 81)

Not by Any Act of Congress Was He "Officer and Gentleman," But by Gift of the Men He Had Led

DOWN TO CONSTANTINOPLE

By Eleanor Franklin Egan

JUST for your information, in case you should happen not to know, I would assure you that the Black Sea is black. It is rightly named. And it is not beautiful either. Its rugged and mountainous shores may be beautiful, but itself is not—at least not often. I have seen it in a spectacular sunset which lit its far horizons with flame and capped its somber waves with color, and then perhaps it was beautiful. But even then it had a sinister look. Its depths are peculiarly forbidding. It never smiles; it gleams grandly at times, but it never smiles. It has none of the friendliness in its heart that one feels on other seas and oceans.

This may be the rankest imagination on my part, but I think it is not. Nearly everybody gets the same impression of it; nearly everybody recognizes its austerity—vaguely no doubt, but unmistakably—and the hostility that is expressed in its darkness and its depths. It is the deepest of the deep, deep seas.

No, the Black Sea is not alluring at any time; but I do not mind telling you that when the little French destroyer on which I was making the trip from Constantza to Constantinople wallowed out into it in the teeth of a lightning-illumined tempest I felt as though I were saying good-by to the world, and I got a vision of myself being received away-way down somewhere in a black coral palace where an Othellolike Neptune held court in the midst of darkly iridescent Ethiopian mermen and mermaids. With a fine old gray-bearded Neptune and with blond and blue-eyed sea folk—children of the sun—it may be that one would feel more or less at home. But the idea of landing among creatures of an unfathomable dark filled me with a kind of fear. I did not want to drown in the Black Sea.

We were all sitting in the tiny cabin amidships—the messy little place where the officers get their meals. We were battened down; every crack and crevice was closed and the atmosphere was suffocating. We braced ourselves and clung to anything that offered a handhold in order that we might not be hurled against the bulkheads. The little craft stood on her beam ends every so often, then rolled so far over that it seemed impossible that she could ever right herself. I thought of the great mine field we were skirting. Nobody has ever yet had time to sweep up the mines. Was it not possible that one of them would break loose from its cable in such a storm and float across our bows? Bang! Zoo-roo-o-of! And then what?

I was on a French destroyer because there was nothing else in the Black Sea at the moment that I could travel on. There were American food ships coming and going, but the next one was scheduled to sail from Constantza a week later, and a week in Constantza was not to be thought of. A small Rumanian mail boat was plying between Constantza and Constantinople semioccasionally, but aside from the fact that it was Rumanianly ill-kept it was thought to be exceedingly unsafe. I was told that I would be merely foolhardy to venture on it. The French officers invited me to go with them, and as they were sailing under orders they put out at their appointed hour regardless of the weather. It was pretty awful!

The Beauties of the Bosporus

THE gallant French captain smiled at my vagaries about the denizens of the deep—which were smilingly expressed, of course—and said he was surprised to find that I was such an excellent sailor. In the sense he meant, I am. A ship may do any blessed thing it likes, I am never seasick. But just the same I prefer an even keel. There is no discomfort I can think of to be compared with the discomfort of being tossed about by the sea. And how the boys in the navies—on the torpedo boats, the destroyers, the patrols and all the little craft—live through it year in and year out passes my understanding.

The captain let all holds go in order to light another cigarette, and just as he was tossing the burnt match away a big wave struck us and he was thrown violently across the table. He picked himself up, looked at the glowing and uninjured tip of his fresh smoke and said: "Bon! Très bon!"

"Bon?" said I. "Wha-d'ye mean—bon?" He was collecting American phrases and the slipshoddier they were the better he liked them.

He laughed and repeated: "Wha-d'ye mean—bon?"

"I wish we were a submarine and could get down under all this and be quiet," said I.

"My dear madame," he replied, "we are a submarine. This little brute of a boat is convinced that she's a submarine. And I assure you she is more successfully submersible than many a real submarine I have sailed on. Please to be entirely reassured."

Mrs. Egan on a French Destroyer in the Black Sea

I needed no reassurance. My confidence in the nonchalant French sailors was sublime, but I glanced with increasing frequency out through the sea-washed port, hoping to catch a glimpse of the headlands that are the pillars of the gate of the Bosporus.

It was earliest morning when we gathered together in the cabin, and we had been tossed about and tormented for something like fifteen hours. But even so we were nearly on time. She was a sturdy little vessel and her engines never missed a beat. The sun was just spreading a mantle of morning rose over a very wonderful world when we passed the lighthouse rock which guards the entrance to the Bosporus and steamed into quiet waters. Outside as an aftermath of storm the monstrous seas were climbing the great black cliffs in walls of wind-blown foam and spray into which the sun sent level rays. It was thrilling to look at, but not at all nice to be out in.

It is commonly conceded, I believe, that the Bosporus is the most beautiful stretch of water on earth, and to its natural grandeur the Turks have added an Eastern charm that is beyond anyone's power to describe. Not that I have any wish to describe it. Descriptions are supposed to be tiresome. I read somewhere recently that no one enjoys a description except the person who writes it. Or was it that no one enjoys a description of a sunset except the person who writes it? Yes, that was it. In any case I shall not attempt to describe the Bosporus, though it would please me to gather up all the world that loves sublimity in God's handiwork and enchantment in man's to companion me through that amazing waterway the existence of which, as it exists, is said by those who analyze events to have been the basic cause of mankind's most self-ruinous upheaval.

In 1915, when the British guns were hammering at Gallipoli and the Turkish guns were hammering at them, I was in Constantinople, and I remember climbing the heights of Ayub one afternoon at a point just below where the Sweet Waters of Europe pour down to freshen the salt that is freshened, too, by the Sweet Waters of Asia afar off on the opposite shore. These sweet waters of East and West come near together in the vast sweep of the Bosporus, but it is said they never meet. The swift currents carry them their separate ways and the eternal strife between them is made manifest by a kind of broad No Man's Land of underwhirl that is as dangerous as a maelstrom. It roils and boils beneath a smooth shining surface—an opalescently oily, grinning, coaxing surface—and hurls its elements eventually into the heaven-blue depths of the Sea of Marmora.

From the heights of Ayub I looked out over a scene that surpasses all others for sheer charm and spectacular magnificence: the splendid reaches dividing waters and the great glowing fringing the edges of two worlds, its sions as distinctive as the eternally irreconcil civilizations that created them. And as I g upon this scene I talked with the friend who was me about the war. I asked the question that not ever yet has answered, though he thought he swered it then. He had in mind, no doubt, the l cherished ambition of Russia.

"What are the Turks fighting for?"

"For this," he replied, making an all-embra gesture with his gray-green-clad arm to indicate wide-spreading city. "They are fighting to save th

"In that case," said I, "they are fighting on wrong side. If they were with the Entente they only would stand a chance of saving this but would be on the way toward rehabilitation an the people of the earth."

Turkey's Fatal Mistake

I DID not then realize how true this was. In light of what the Peace Conference has done, what would you say would be Turkey's posi to-day if she had been an ally instead of an ene The British thought of their inability to attach to the Allied side as a failure in diplomacy and rou berated their diplomatists. But what do you pose British diplomacy would do with a Turkey w interests had to be regarded as the interests of a fri a Turkey claiming aggrandizement and reward stead of a Turkey submitting to dismemberment punishment? Is it not an interesting question?

"You seem to be pretty confident that the A will win," said my friend.

"Eventually. I have never doubted it."

He laughed scornfully.

"And even if they don't," I continued, "what will a German victory do the Turks? Do they t for one moment that a victorious Germany will them back their Constantinople?"

Again he laughed—scornfully. And well he mi too—just then. Germany was for the time being conqu in many zones; it was the eve of a terrible British dis at Gallipoli and the city had draped itself in its triumpl colors. The Turkish flag predominated in all such cele tions, but from the roof of the German Embassy—l and isolated on the heights of Pera—the German stretched its folds always in the breeze with what see to me to be a consciously masterful and lordly air. I h it. So did many others in Constantinople. It was the of Germany's utmost ruthlessness and there was no q tion in anybody's mind as to what the Germans were fi ing for. I remember a week-end party at Prinkipo that arranged in order that we might escape for a little w from Germans and the German flag—at least that what we said; and we felt it too. It was an Amer Embassy party, with one poor little English girl who lived all her life in Constantinople and who had to get mission from the Germans to join us.

We enjoyed every hour. There was not a German German flag on the island. The Germans were busy fi ing the war and keeping the Turks on the move. They no time for Prinkipoing. And they had no inclination haps. The atmosphere of the island of Prinkipo is pe iarly soothing and not what one would expect a Germa those days to long for. The suggestion that the Bolshe meet their enemies for a conference at Prinkipo seeme me to be a good one. I thought the needle-carpeted s ness of the great pine forest through which one look through a million-pillared twilit temple, out into the of the Sea of Marmora would subdue them if anything co

The sun went down while I sat on the heights of A with my German-American friend. The flags were fu and saluting cannon boomed. The gray of a sumn evening settled upon the city and was made grayer l myriad gleams from lighted windows and street lar Constantinople was never darkened. Precautions taken in certain areas perhaps, but in general there wa fear of aëroplanes. The British jolly well hadn't got th as they would say. What the Germans and Turks fear, however, was the British submarines that came from Gallipoli—at what risk who can imagine!—loo for the Goeben and the Breslau and the Turkish ships carried men and munitions down through the Dardane They never did get the Goeben or the Breslau, but finished the Turks. It was along about this time that Barbarossa was sunk in the Sea of Marmora. It was Barbarossa, was it not, that was the last of the Tur fleet? There were a lot of battered old hulks lying a angles and leaning against each other up in the Go Ho: and the Turks referred to them smilingly as being 'sic—ver' ver' sick!"

Te sweet gray of the evening began to be cut across by on;white shafts from searchlights playing upon the surface of the Bosporus, in and out among the weather-roned houses, the heaven-kissing minarets of a hundred mosues and the white waterside palaces of the elect of Sta boul and Scutari. A long luminant ray fastened itself upo the massive and magnificent pile of St. Sofia—among he irst of Christ's princely temples on earth and for neay a half millennium a Moslem mosque—and I heaved a si that came up from deep depths of depression within me. I could not bear the report we got that day that the Brish landing at Suvla Bay had resulted in the slaughter of tenty thousand Englishmen, the capture of ten thousan more and a tremendous Turkish victory. This was a gre exaggeration, but it was what they told us. Why hou d I not have been depressed?

"Vell, so far as the Germans are concerned," said I, thy say to the Turks: 'Heads we win, tails you lose.'"

Ad my German-American companion responded: "Kmet!"

Tis man was the "Fritz" who figured rather conspicuus in my stories from Constantinople in 1915 and I have ften been asked what became of him. I did not know, nd, too, wondered. I know now. Only about a week ago e fated back into my circle of observation. I had known im rom his student days. His father and mother were ot born in Germany, and German had always been the on language of his family in the Western city where he asborn. But he went to public school and was as tanchly American as any boy could be. And he was ver ambitious. He had to work his way through school ecuse his people were poor, and he did it with a display f etermined energy and sustained purpose that won for im the admiration of everybody who knew him. He oied in restaurants as a dishwasher during school terms nd summer he went to lake-id resorts as a waiter and all-oul handy man.

He went through the medical nd surgical courses at the Uni-ersity of Chicago and becom-ng an extraordinary operator roan opportunity to work for w le with the Mayo brothers. Th he passed the necessary xa inations and got himself ak on by the Government for erice in the Philippines. By hatime he was all of twenty-nr years old and six feet of er promising Teutonic man-oc.

Fritz Comes Home

HE CAME back from the Philippines with a proud ecid and went to Harvard. He oo post-graduate work in one epartment of the medical col-eg and taught in another, and n te course of a year or so he was ento Germany as an exchange ro sor. There the war caught im He was thoroughly Ger-ain in his sympathies, naturally, ndin a nest of German scien-ist he was not likely to hear nyhing that would tend to hage his sentiments. He oind up immediately and was en to Constantinople to take hage of a military hospital, and s was there—to my very great stnishment—that I found im He was getting all the op-rang that any surgeon could osbly desire, and my frequent ugestions that he get out and nup on the right side of the orict were met with good-atred assurances that I didn't nw what I was talking about.

He saw the light eventually, ov ver, and when his own ou try went to war with Ger-nay he made a brave effort to et out in order that he might join n merican hospital unit. And I ow him well enough to be erictly sure that he was sin-er But it was too late. By ha time he had been trans-er d from Constantinople and va operating in an evacuation oital just behind the German lines. He had no American passport because he went to Germany at a time when passports were not necessary, and even his request for permission to go to Berlin for the purpose of registering as an American at the Spanish Embassy was denied. Then one dark night he made an attempt to escape. He was caught and sent to prison, where he stayed for several months. He was finally let out on parole within a restricted area, but was compelled to report to the authorities every few hours. At the beginning of the armistice he went to Berlin, but he was not permitted to leave the country until after peace was signed.

Penniless and somewhat shabby, after more than two years without work of any kind, he landed in the United States late in July; and having been with the Germans for six years and speaking nothing but German he came home speaking the American language with a marked Teutonic accent. He took his courage in his hands and went back to his native city to meet the inquiries of his American brethren who have known him always, and there is no doubt in my mind that they will make everything just as difficult and unpleasant for him as they can.

Poor old Fritz! I thought of him as my little French destroyer steamed up the Bosporus and as the city of domes and minarets, of towers and terraced hill slopes, of ancient grandeurs and fascinations came into view. I thought also of the flag that had been so long my pet abomination. The too boldly dominating German Embassy on the heights of Pera had a barren and deserted look. The imperial eagle still spread its wings on the corners of the roof, but from the tall flagstaff no flag was flying and the windows were all shuttered and blank. This seemed to me to change the look of the whole city.

I missed also the comfortable emptiness of the harbor. The outbreak of the war did not catch many vessels in port at Constantinople, and afterward, of course, none could get in. There was one big German passenger ship from Hamburg called General, which lay always up alongside the Galata bridge and was used as a kind of club by German sailors. Then there were a number of submarines that were operating in the Mediterranean. The U-57 I remember particularly, because she was so big and had such a bad reputation; a good reputation from the German viewpoint. I got caught on Galata bridge one day when it opened to let her pass out on a mission of destruction, and I thought to myself: "Oh, if I only had a bomb!"

And there were a few old cargo tramps. The fine white yacht of the ex-Khedive of Egypt lay out in midstream in the Golden Horn and was supposed to be a rendezvous for certain persons who reveled in unseemly ways at unseemly hours and held secret meetings, while our naval yacht Scorpion was tied up on the Stamboul side of the Golden Horn between a couple of Turkish revenue cutters. Sedate she was, merely sedate and unquestioning. The wrecked remnant of the Turkish Navy stood close in against the shore under the cliffs of Pera. That was all; and the harbor, being very large, looked curiously empty. To keep them safe from British submarines the Goeben and the Breslau were hidden away in a tiny bay a mile or so up the Bosporus, while all their guns had been sent down to Gallipoli.

Breakfast on the Scorpion

BUT what a difference now! We could hardly find a place to drop our anchor! And when we did it was in the shadow of the great hulk of a British superdreadnought—the Iron Duke. And besides the Iron Duke there were battleships and cruisers, torpedo boats and destroyers, patrols and mine sweepers—a whole British fleet. And there were many Frenchmen, too, and Italians and Greeks of all kinds, to say nothing of cargo vessels, troop ships and dozens of very busy-looking tugs and launches moving laboriously or swiftly hither and thither.

The only American in sight was still the old Scorpion, but that was because Admiral Bristol had taken the Nahma and the Nohma—small converted yachts—and a destroyer or two for a cruise down the coast of Asia Minor. The Greeks were going in at Smyrna and it was desirable that our admiral should be on hand with the rest of the world's representatives for a look-see, as our Chinese friends would express it. As the only friendly enemy the Turks have, we should have been represented by a more formidable naval force perhaps. I thought we should. If there had been a mate for the Iron Duke, for instance, taking up Iron Duke space in the harbor under the Stars and Stripes it would have given the Americans present a better chance to feel that they were just as good as anybody. But we don't seem to care much for display.

I left my French destroyer and went aboard the Scorpion for breakfast and to get the news of the day. The principal news item, so far as I was concerned at the moment, was that they had been holding a room for me at the Pera Palace Hotel for four days at ten dollars a day.

"And lucky for you too!" said the captain. "There hasn't been a vacant room in Constantinople since Odessa was evacuated. But we got your wire and went up and demanded a room as a right and they turned somebody out. We thought you would be in that evening, of course, else we'd have waited. But once we got it we didn't dare give it up."

I expressed my heartfelt gratitude and tried to act as if forty dollars meant nothing to me.

"But why the grand and glorious price?" I asked. "I didn't know there were any ten-dollar rooms in the Pera Palace."

"There 'aren't, but that's what they make you pay. And it's nothing but a dinky little room at that. The town is full of Russians and they have run the cost of living up until it beats anything the world has ever seen. A great many of

(Continued on Page 165)

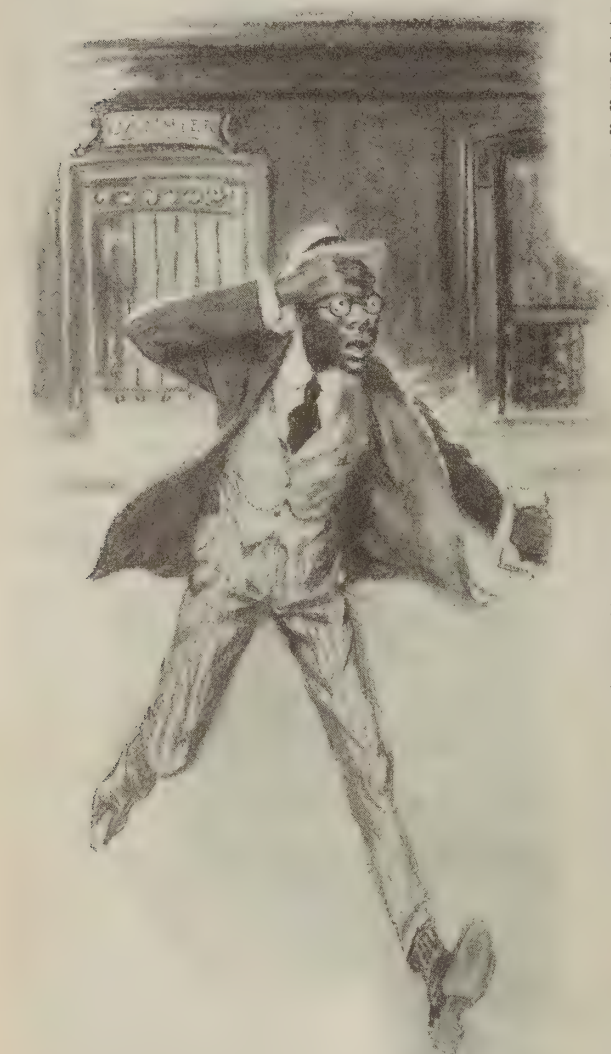
COPYRIGHT BY UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD, NEW YORK CITY

Looking Down the Bosporus. A Building of Robert College Next to the Ancient Wall Tower

All's Swell That Ends Swell

By Octavus Roy Cohen

ILLUSTRATED BY H. WESTON TAYLOR



THE sleep-laden eyes of Mr. Florian Slappey opened reluctantly upon a flood of midmorning sun which streamed in through the uncurtained window and made terribly visible the worn spots of the rug which partially covered the floor. Mr. Slappey yawned, shook his head and sent forth inquiring fingers to a chair which stood by the side of his bed. They closed about a package of Turkish cigarettes and a match. Mr. Slappey lighted one of the cigarettes, inhaled luxuriously and lay back upon his pillow.

Christopher Traveled in High With the Accelerator Depressed to the Limit

But Florian was not happy—at any rate not to the point of inconvenience. His worldly assets consisted of the best wardrobe boasted by any colored man in the city of Birmingham, an overdue account for the room which he occupied, nine dollars in cash and an insistent yearning for the fleshpots.

Florian was up against a proposition. From a nebulous background a form was emerging and the form was labeled "Job." Florian was not personally opposed to work—provided it was the other fellow who was working. As for himself, he considered it beneath his dignity to labor at regular hours for someone else. Much of his social preëminence was due to the fact that he was looked upon as being a man of means, one to whom work might be a delight but certainly not a necessity. And Florian cared no more for his social prestige than a one-eyed man cares for his sole surviving optic.

The cigarette burned down to the chocolate fingers which clutched it and was flipped through the window. And then Florian sniffed. He sat up in bed and sniffed again. The odor was unmistakable—he had smelled similar smells before. He knew that it was bacon in the process of broiling. He had become poignantly aware of the fact that 'a rapidly depreciating cash balance had carried with it the necessity for gustatorial retrenchment. His meals of the past three days had been scanty and unnourishing. And now—he rose quickly and made a dive to swap his lavendar pajamas for a union suit.

"You is in the house with fresh broilin' bacon," he soliloquized. "I think you both needs a intraduction to each other."

He broke all records for quick dressing, despite the extra half minute which pride of place forced him to devote to the knot of his four-in-hand. Then he sauntered languidly down the steps of the rambling house and made his way with well-simulated indifference toward the kitchen, the bacon and his landlady.

Mrs. Lorelie Shoots smiled in a most friendly manner. The picture presented by Florian as he lounged consciously in the doorway was one which demanded tribute. Into the breast of Mrs. Lorelie Shoots there came afresh a surge of pride in owning Mr. Slappey as one of her three roomers.

"Mawnin', Mistuh Slappey."

"Mawnin', Missis Shoots. How you is makin' it this fine day?"

"Tol'able, thank the Lawd! An' you?"

"Oh, kind of! Where yo' husban' is at?"

"He's done been down to the barber shop sence seven-thutty. He's a workin' man, Christopher is. It's jes' a shame that a man which is got his education an' 'bility is got to be a barber."

Florian nodded sympathetically.

"Times is boun' to change, Missis Shoots. With all them swell pieces Christopher is writin' for the papers they is boun' to reckernize him as a great man some day soon. Yas'm, Missis Shoots, you sho' was lucky when Christopher puck you out to get ma'ied to."

"Wa'n't I jes'?"

Florian glanced round.

"Semore Mashby is went out too, ain't he?"

"He's been gone sence seven o'clock. He's the workines' man. But he pays his room rent—in adwance, which is mo' than some of my roomers does."

Florian affected not to notice the personal barb.

"Does you mean to infohm me," he inquired with righteous indignation, "that Spokane G. Washington, which has the room next to me, owes you fo' his rent?"

"Yeh, I does. N'r neither that ain't all. The man which has the room next to him owes me fo' two months—twen'y dollars altogether."

Florian smiled genially.

"The room nex' to him? I 'clare to goodness, Missis Shoots, you is got the jokines' way of reminding me that I owes you a triflin' sum. It takes a ginuwine lady to be delicate like'n to that."

She was pitifully insistent. It was plain that she did not wish to jangle Mr. Slappey's high-strung nerves or offend his obvious gentility.

"You is gwine pay me real soon, ain't you, Mistuh Slappey?"

He waved his hand airily.

"Co'se I is. Ain't I tol' you that befo'?"

"You is been tellin' me that fo' two months. Co'se you un'erstan's, Mistuh Slappey, that I don't noways question that you is got the money, an' I is shuah that you ain't paid it on'y 'count of the fac' that you hates to bother with such small 'mounts, but my husban' is kinder worryin' me lately—Ise consid'able skeered he's gwine fin' out ——"

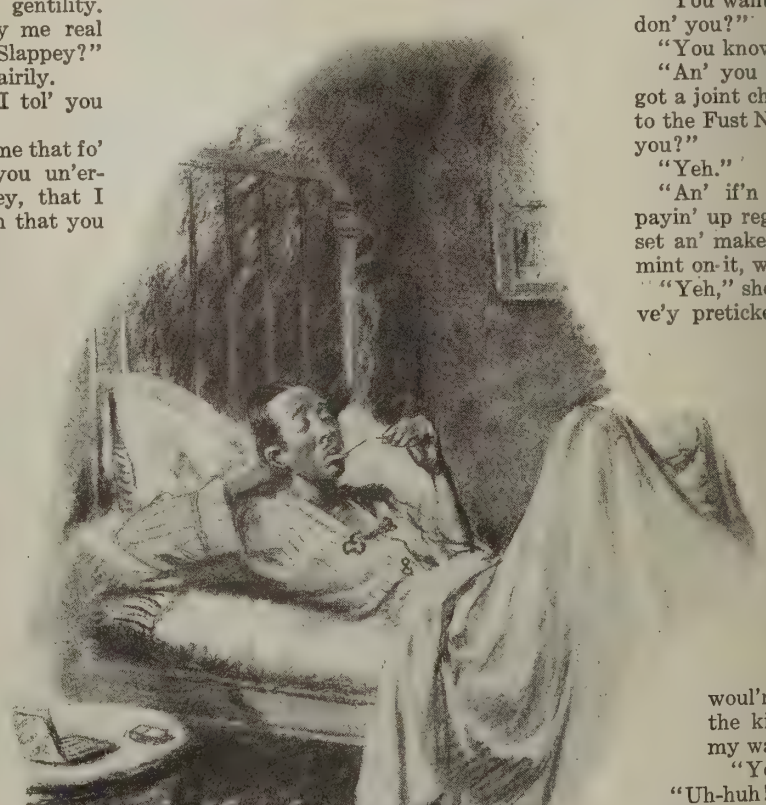
"Fin' out which?"

She seated herself at the kitchen table and happened to intercept a longing glance which Florian cast upon the platter of broiled bacon and the pan of new white biscuits.

'He'p yo'se'f, Mistuh Slappey. I'll bet you ain't et no breakfas' ontil yet."

"No-o, I ain't hahdly b'lieve I has."

She rose and poured for him a cup of steaming coffee. Florian went at the meal delicately, with the air of a connoisseur.



Florian Was Up Against a Proposition. From a Nebulous Background a Form Was Emerging and the Form Was Labeled "Job"

"Hm! Y some swell Missis Sh Now, reegal yo' husban'?

"It's thisaway," said Mrs. Shoots, immensely reliev the prospect of unbosoming her troubles. "From the go-off when I wanted to rent this heah house on a y least at thutty dollars a month Christopher was against it. He said we should keep the li'l house wh had on Avenue F ontil the future shaped itse'f mo' de an' suttin.

"But I an' Christopher ain't be'n ma'ied fo' so lon I soht of argied him out of hisse'f. I splained that I git me th'ee roomers at ten dollars a month each would pay the rent an' we could save up the rent whi was payin' in the other house.

"Livin' in a house like'n to what this is, Mistuh Sla makes us as swell as any cullud folks in town, an' t puck my boarders careful. Fust off I got Semore Ma which while mebbe he's a ol' skinflint is sho' nu riches' cullud man in Bummin'ham. Then I got which is the swellest young feller in the city."

"You sho' called 'em that time, Missis Shoots."

"An' then I got Mistuh Spokane G. Washin'ton, w thought was a respectful an' sicksesful business man. so far fo' the two months I is been heah, Mistuh Sla you ain't paid me nothin' an' Mistuh Washin'ton is paid fo' the fust month. Semore Mashby is the on'ies which has paid in full what he owes."

Florian leaned confidingly across the table and ered himself of sage and sympathetic advice.

"Lis'en heah at what I is sayin', Missis Shoots. you never let no money troubles git yo' goat. It don you nowhere."

"But," she wailed, "I is had to skimp on the keepin' to pay the rent an' I ain't even been able to fust paymint on the set of mahogamy fu'niture plannin' to git fo' mine an' Christopher's room."

Florian tchk'd commiseratingly.

"Ain't that too bad? An' all because that wu Spokane Washin'ton is dead-beatin' you."

"N'r neither you ain't paid me nothin', Mistuh Slap

"Me? Don' you worry none 'bout me payin' you. is as suttin to git my money real soon as you is th got it."

"An' I is fallin' behime ev'y minute, an' Christ knows that you an' Mistuh Washin'ton ain't paid u I ain't got my mahogamy bedroom set."

"You wants that set a don' you?"

"You know I does."

"An' you an' Christop got a joint checkin' 'count to the Fust National Bank you?"

"Yeh."

"An' if'n yo' boa'der payin' up regalar yo'd bu set an' make yo' fust cash mint on it, woul'n't you?"

"Yeh," she moaned, "a ve'y pretickeler set whic done puc is gwine b ve'y soo promp'ly. A if'n I was it now C pher woul where the come fro then he'd had gone debt some an' ——"

"Huh! S h o o t s woul'n't learn not the kin' if'n you my way."

"Yo' way?"

"Uh-huh! You see, I bestes' man in this heah fo' gittin' swell scheme you is tore at my heart with yo' story of how meb is gwine lose the ve'y pret mahogamy set which you so I sigges's that you dr fust paymint outen the an' buy the set. Then wh s it ah put it in my bedroom ontil I an' Spokane is d ujin full an' a few months in adwance. Ontil that e y husban' c'n think that I is bought the furniture wh ev'ything is straightened out he c'n learn that s yarn. An' if'n things ain't go right I is willin' to me ill 'sponsibility fo' the paymints on same."

Lore was dazzled. There was no gainsaying the fact t Frian was a mighty persuasive talker, and Lorelie s wes in pride of house. She had set her heart on that rticlur set and was willing to mortgage her future to ow tat it was positively to be hers. She hesitated.

"I c git that soot fo' a hund'ed an' ten dollars—ten lars own an' five dollars a week."

"An hutty dollars drawed outen the bank would make i allafe an' you could buy the fu'niture an' put it in my om s' not tell Christopher anythin' bouten it ontil all e de was straightened out."

"Mi" Lorelie rose and prepared to wash dishes. ria was right with her.

"Le me he'p you, Missis Shoots."

"Yo he'p me wash dishes?"

"Wh suttinly," he came back, seeing in the future ny ore succulent breakfasts to be paid for by this ght anual labor. "Washin' hes the fondest thing I'm

She ve in, thrilled with the ory being assisted in postlina labors by this mascue soal light.

"Yo is the democratickest ler, listuh Slappey."

He nned a gingham apron er h suit of checkered gray d pished in with a will and eyes o future reward. And h worked he lke—and Florian s considerable talker. me here in the back rt of his head there d bin born the very rm an idea which omid big things for r. lorian Slappey, qui. It had come ther suddenly and he in't know just extly hat he intended ing, ut Florian had o leg lived by his ts t fail in sowing ed fr a crop which ight be needed.

An so he extolled the glo- s wich would come to Mr. d Irs. Christopher P. S. noot by the possession of a ven oom house and a suite of ahcany furniture. He exains to her that the withdrawal a sall amount from the joint nd aintained at the bank by an d wife would merely be the ature of a loan returnable th immediate future when he—Florian Slappey—oulpay the two months' rent already due and six ont in advance, and that meanwhile the suspicions of Ir. Soots would be lulled by the claim that the furniture elond to Florian.

"A' anyway," reflected Mr. Slappey, "even if it don' uk at I ain't riskin' my money, an' I is gwine sleep on inuine mahogamy fo' a month."

If Irs. Shoots had fancied that she entertained a passion or th furniture in question she learned now that her revis desire was as nothing to that which Florian lapy deliberately implanted in her breast. And Florian eingpy nature a man who lightly assumed liabilities and wea d his way out of them was honestly unconscious of ne fit that he was sowing seeds of discord in the herefor happy Shoots household.

Ar Florian was still dilating upon the prestige inevitably ttendant upon the ownership of ginuwine mahogamy urniure in conjunction with a seven-room house with the dvaage, as Lorelie explained: "You is got yo' bath ightheah. You don' have to bring it!" when Sis Callie luk s appeared.

Sis Callie Flukers, dressed in the very excrescence of tyle skinny beyond belief, occurred upon the back porch vhil Florian was wiping off the erstwhile container of the roil bacon. She tapped lightly and slipped into the itch n, narrow-set eyes darting suspiciously from Florian o Lelie and then back again to Florian.

For a brief instant Florian's poise deserted him. He ipp off the domestic apron, flung it into a chair and tart d for the door. Sis Callie Flukers' nasal voice punc- ure the intense silence:

"Looks like I was int'ruptin' sumthin'."

"You ain't int'rupted nothin'," flashed Florian. "I is done finished."

"You ac's right at home," commented Sis Callie.

"Why not? I rooms heah."

"In the kitchen?"

"He—he on'y jes' been he'pin' me," commented Lorelie weakly.

"Tha's it, Sis Callie—I on'y jes' been he'pin' her."

"Fo' a man which never hol's no job you is got fon' of wuk right suddint. We-e-ll, I ain't blamin' you so much. Lorelie is a pretty gal."

"Sis Callie!"

"Don' you min' her, Missis Shoots," interjected Florian hotly. "She don' do nothin' with her mouth on'y talk."

And then Florian fled. He walked downtown at top speed and came to a halt at his favorite lounging place in front of the Champion Moving Picture Theater. He leaned against a telephone post, readjusted his necktie, took notice that his trousers were wrinkleless and idly surveyed the seethe of midday traffic.

Sis Callie Flukers, Dressed in the Very Excrescence of Style, Slipped Into the Kitchen, Narrow-Set Eyes Darting Suspiciously From Florian to Lorelie

"'Lo, Brother Slappey."

Florian turned to face a tall emaciated negro who wore baggy clothes and a worried look. A smile of welcome decorated Florian's face and his hand clasped that of the other man.

"Well, well! If'n 'tain't Editor Vanguard Collins of The Weekly Sponsor! How you is, Editor Collins?"

"Tol'able fine, thank you, Brother Slappey," rumbled the other. "How you is?"

"Prosp'rous. Ve'y prosp'rous." It was not written in Florian's book that others should know of temporary financial embarrassment. "An' how The Sponsor is gittin' on, Editor Collins?"

Vanguard Collins appeared enthusiastic.

"Mos' elegant. Entirely elegant, I might say, Brother Slappey."

"Ain't thinkin' of sellin', is you?" questioned Florian indifferently for want of something better to say. And because he was indifferent he didn't notice the eyes of Vanguard Collins narrow to speculating slits.

"Why you asts that?"

Florian shrugged.

"Jes' int'rusted—tha's all."

Editor Collins pressed the point.

"Int'rusted how?"

"Dunno," laughed Florian. "Mebbe I is consid'rin' goin' into the newspaper game. It's easy an' they's lots of money in it, ain't they?"

"Yeh," retorted Vanguard with a significant nuance, which was unnoticed by Florian. "You said it."

"An' I reckon yo'd be makin' mo' money than what you is if they wa'n't no competition, woul'n't you?"

Vanguard nodded his enormous head.

"Yassuh, you reemahked a wise reemahk that time, Brother Slappey. Co'se my paper is makin' a heap of money, but I is let Brother Crispus Breech, which owns an' edits The Weekly Epoch, know that I stan's ready to pay him a thousan' dollars spot cash fo' his newspaper."

"On'y a thousan' dollars?" exclaimed Mr. Slappey. "That ain't sech a big price fo' a newspaper, is it?"

"We ain't got no mechanical 'quipment," explained the editor. "We runs our 'counts from month to month an' has the printin' done at a job plant."

"I see! I see!" said Florian vaguely. "An' you wants to buy out Editor Breech's paper fo' a thousan' dollars?"

"Uh-huh."

"Why won't he sell?"

"I an' him ain't ve'y good frien's, an' it makes him so' to know that my paper is makin' so much money it wan's to buy his'n out. His pride is ag'in sellin'. He's jes' on'y spitin' his nose to cut off his face."

"How come that?"

"'Cause his paper ain't wuth five hund'ed dollars."

"Then why," queried Florian craftily, "is you willin' to pay a thousan' fo' same?"

Editor Vanguard Collins snapped his fingers.

"A thousan' dollars is a mere baggytelle to me, Brother Slappey. An' it'd be wuth that in col' cash to have a clear fiel' an' no rival. I is tellin' you, Brother Slappey, if'n you is thinkin' of enterin' into the newspaper business don' you go foolin' with Brother Breech. His paper ain't wuth nothin', or even less'n that."

"An' you is willin' to pay a thousan' dollars?"

"Cash money." He paused, and then: "Lemme heah from you an' give you a few adwices when you gits to thinkin' serious bouten the newspaper business, will you, Brother Slappey? On'y jes' cause'n I an' you is feller members of The Sons and Daughters of I Will Arise."

"I is gwine do that ve'y same thing, Brother Collins. You is sho'ly stahted me thinkin'."

They parted. But the languid expression which had rested on the face of Florian Slappey had also departed. He was having another thought. And to a brain constantly alert for a method by which nothing could be made into something the possibilities developed by the casual dialogue with Editor Collins were limitless.

The thing was plain as two and two. Editor Breech's Weekly Epoch was in a bad way, but it was still strong enough to injure as a piece of business property the flourishing Weekly Sponsor as owned and edited by Vanguard Collins. Editor Breech would probably accept five hundred dollars from an outsider for his decrepit journalistic venture, provided he was kept in ignorance of the fact that it was designed to become the property of his nearest and dearest enemy.

It was all good reasoning on Florian's part, considering that he was not a mind reader. Had he been able to see the workings of Editor Collins' mind he might not have thought as he did think or plan as he planned.

For contrary to his words Editor Vanguard Collins' Weekly Sponsor was in an exceeding bad way. Its bills were far overdue and its creditors insistent.

Vanguard, in common with about ninety-nine per cent of Darktown's population, was victim to the delusion that Florian Slappey was a man of exceeding affluence. Certainly he was a natural recruit to the Afro-American Fourth Estate. Vanguard had come to the belief that Florian was contemplating buying a newspaper and proceeded to press-agent The Weekly Sponsor. It never entered Vanguard's head that Florian was planning to sell him The Weekly Epoch for a thousand dollars. In fact it couldn't have entered his head that anybody was planning to sell him anything. He wasn't in the market for anything but his next meal.

And so Florian stumbled. He had taken Vanguard's hectically optimistic statements at par and in his breast had been born the desire to purchase from Editor Breech The Weekly Epoch for five hundred dollars and then sell it to Editor Collins for a thousand—a clear profit of five hundred dollars without the risk of a penny.

(Continued on Page 122)

The Anthology of Another Town

By E. W. HOWE

Sammy Hemingway

AMONG the children in the school I attended in the country when a boy were the five Hemingway boys, particular friends of mine. Their father was killed at Shiloh, and when I went to their house to stay all night and found their mother in bad humor I forgave it, as people said the death of Mr. Hemingway had ruined her disposition. Besides, she had seven children, and only one of them was a girl and she was married and lived in a distant state.

One of the Hemingway boys, Sammy, the oldest one, didn't go to school. He was simple-minded, owing to the doctor giving him strong medicine when he was a baby, it was said, so he remained at home and made boots. His father had been a bootmaker before he went away to the war, and Sammy had assisted him. When the father went away it was discovered that Sammy knew the trade, and after that he made the boots for the men and boys in the neighborhood. Most of the men and boys in our section wore rough boots made by Sammy Hemingway. When a man became a little more prosperous than the others he ordered kip boots, with red tops, and Sammy Hemingway made these too.

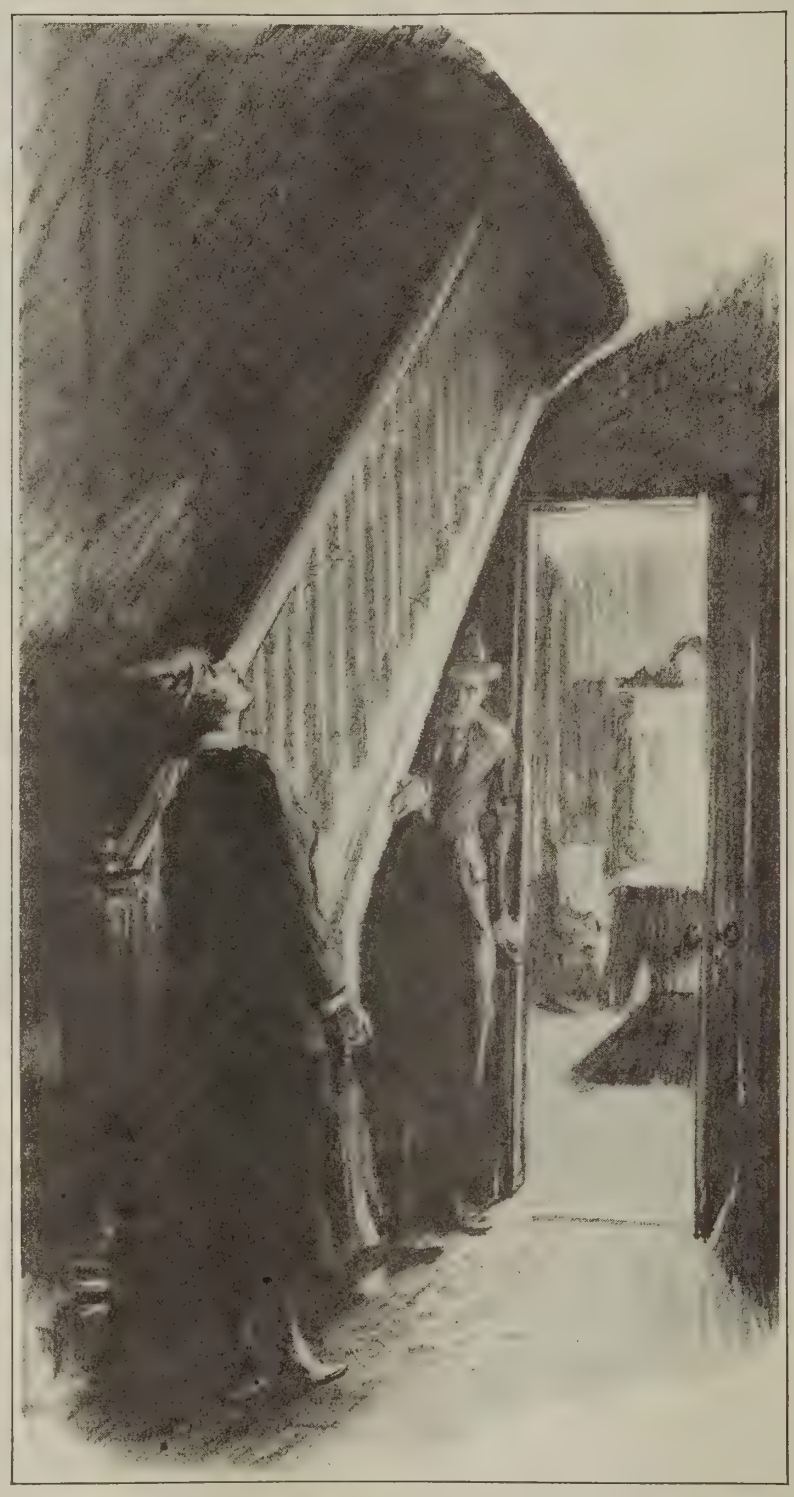
When I needed new boots I was sent to Mrs. Hemingway's, where Sammy measured me; when my old boots needed repairing I was also sent there, where I took off my boots and sat in the room with Sammy until the repairs were completed.

I therefore knew Sammy pretty well, but never knew his mother very well until I began going there to stay all night with her boys, two of whom were near my own age. When we arrived from school we always found Mrs. Hemingway fretful, but the boys would whisper to me that she would be all right after a while, so we kept out of her way and did the evening chores. By the time supper was ready she would usually be a little better natured, but not always; sometimes she would give us all a slap, including Sammy.

Sammy was twenty-five years old, and had black whiskers all over his face, which his mother trimmed occasionally. She also cut his hair and made his clothes. When supper was ready Mrs. Hemingway would put food on his plate, and he would eat it, but he never asked for more. Indeed, he couldn't talk very well, and it was necessary to lead him to the table, and to his room upstairs.

When there were no boots to make or shoes to mend Sammy was led to his room and locked up. When a customer came his mother went for Sammy, and he seemed to understand what was wanted; he had learned it from his father, and measured, and pegged, and sewed, until the work was done. Then he was locked up again.

But though Mrs. Hemingway was always in a bad humor when I went there to stay all night she gradually became better natured toward evening; and when all the work was done she would sit about the fire with us and tell about the people she used to know in Indiana, where she came from. By eight o'clock she was as good-natured a woman as I ever knew, and said she was glad I came, and insisted that I come often.



Though Apparently the Daughter of George Hart and His Wife Margaret, The Princess Was Very Superior to Her Surroundings

Sammy never paid any attention to me; when we children played in the evening he pegged away at his bootmaking without looking up. His workbench was in the main sitting room at one end of the fireplace, and we paid no more attention to Sammy than he paid to us. If he ran out of work he would go over to his mother, tug at her dress and indicate that he was ready to go to his room and be locked up. Occasionally at night when we children went upstairs to bed Mrs. Hemingway would give us the key to Sammy's room, that we might go in and see that he was all right. If he were awake we found him convulsively working his hands, as he always did when not mending or making boots; if he were asleep his right hand was always lying across his forehead, as though he had a pain there. If Sammy ever disturbed anyone it was his mother, for no one else ever took any care of him or knew much about him.

One day when I asked permission of my mother to stay all night with the Hemingway boys she refused, saying Mrs. Hemingway was poorly. After that Mrs. Hemingway's sickness became the topic of conversation for months, and I learned that her fretfulness was due to the fact that she had long been a sufferer from some serious malady. She grew gradually worse, and had no one to help her. The neighbor women took turn about calling on her every day, straightening up, but finally it became apparent that someone must remain with her all the time, which the women could ill afford as they had big families of their own.

About this time I heard that Mrs. Hemingway's married daughter in Indiana had been sent for. It was the custom when anyone went to town to bring home mail for the entire neighborhood, which was distributed by the children. After that when we met anyone coming from town we asked if Mrs. Hemingway's letter had come, for Mrs. Hemingway was growing weaker and greatly needed her daughter.

At last the long-expected letter came; father brought it from town one afternoon, and while I hurried over to her house with it the other children went to the houses of other neighbors, and told them the good news—that Mrs. Hemingway's letter had at last arrived.

When I arrived at the Hemingway house and knocked, Sammy was sitting near the door making boots, but paid no attention to me, but his mother, who was lying in a bed in the same room, told me to come in. She looked dreadfully pale and weak, and asked me to read the letter. It was full of affection, and the w said she would start three days later. Hemingway told me to carry the lett once to my father, which I did, and h cided that it would be necessary for h start for the railroad that night in orc meet her.

When I took the letter to Mrs. Heming I noticed that Sammy, though he was si minded, seemed to realize that some was wrong with his mother. My bringi letter excited him, and he quit his boot ing and went over to his mother and p hand on her forehead, and moaned like a in pain. When he returned to his cha swayed to and fro and forgot about his making for a time, and I was compell hurry out of the room, to keep from c it was so pitiful.

After that we watched the road for of the visitor, for Mrs. Hemingway wa bad off; but when the visitor did arrive, ing two little girls with her, things seem go better at the Hemingways'. The dau whose name was Latimer, straightened t out, and made her mother more comfor Mrs. Latimer was one of the nicest w we had ever seen, and the manner in she was up with her mother night an won us all.

After Mrs. Latimer had been there a r people began to wonder how Mr. Latime it; there were predictions that he wo like doing the milking and the cooking one day when Mr. Latimer arrived we th he had come after his wife, and to make But he hadn't; he had come to help hi and Mrs. Hemingway. We heard of his to town after delicacies for Mrs. Hemin and on returning from these trips he a brought things for the Hemingway boy

Soon after his arrival I was sent over how Mrs. Hemingway was. She wasn better; in fact she was a great deal wors didn't know me. Even Sammy had n some great change, for while I was th rose from his bench, went over to his mo bed and tried to induce her to get up.

Mr. Latimer was in the room, and h tience and gentleness greatly attracted had not been accustomed to that sort of His fondness for his wife and her fondn him also surprised me. I was sent to Hemingway's many times after that to i how she was, and Mr. and Mrs. Lati devotion to each other was a won thing; I had never before seen wive husbands who seemed to think a great d each other.

One night word came to our house Mrs. Hemingway was dead, and I went my father to ring the bell. It was the c in our neighborhood to toll the churc when there was a death, one ring for year of the deceased's age. I sat shi in the church until my father tolled th fifty-seven times, and then we went As we walked along through the darkness, ret home from tolling the bell, my father told me tha day during Mrs. Hemingway's illness she asked th leave the room except Mr. Latimer. When she was with him she asked as her dying request that he be to Sammy. And Mr. Latimer promised, and my seemed much moved by the incident, and I think a people in the neighborhood were. The gentlenes kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Latimer did us all good.

The day after the funeral Mr. Latimer announce he intended taking the family back to his home in In Mrs. Hemingway had requested it, and he thought as little as he could do; so on the fourth morning aft death they started, Sammy sitting on his shoem bench and the boys climbing all over the wagon.

And then, after saying good-by, about the only husband ever known in our neighborhood drove aw

Joe Stevens

WE HAVEN'T a daily paper in our town, but don't greatly miss one, owing to Mr. Steven milkman. In summer he delivers morning and ev

(Continued on Page 158)

STORIES OF THE OLD WEST

Tombstone—By Frederick R. Bechdolt

DECORATION BY JAMES H. PRESTON

UT about forty years ago a raw ing mining camp
n Southeastern
. was preparing to assume the functions of a duly ned municipality, and its population—at that period everyone in the place was a male of voting age—sidering the important question of a name.

camp stood out against the sky line at the crest of a the foothills of the Mule Mountains not far from xican boundary. For the most part it consisted of ts—out there were a few adobe buildings and some ous creations from goods boxes and tin cans. Facing el of its single brief street you looked out upon a f high-grade silver ore, and if you turned the other u surveyed a sprouting little graveyard hard by a rral. From almost any point you had a good view Dragoon Mountains across a wide stretch of te-covered lowlands, and at almost any hour of the u were apt to see the smoke of at least one Apache ire rising from those frowning granite ramparts.

men in the camp were nearly all of them old-timers West—miners from the Comstock lode whose boom ten on the wane, teamsters who had been freighting the blazing deserts of the Southwest, investors and nts from Tucson, buffalo hunters from Western and Colorado, gamblers from Dodge, El Paso and Fe, Indian fighters, cattle rustlers, professional umpers and some gentle-voiced desperadoes of the leed, equally willing to slay from behind or take a iance in front according to the way the play came w of these men wore coats; a great many of them single-action revolvers in holsters beside the thigh;
d-fashioned cattleman's boot was the predominant ur; and, excepting among the faro dealers, there was y general carelessness in sartorial matters. Nick-were even more common than surnames and it was ously bad form to ask a man about his antecedents
e had volunteered some information on that point.
uch a crowd it is easy to see there would be many son any given subject, and the question of the new town's name had evoked a multitude of suggestions. Amusements were still few; the purveyors of hectic pleasure had thus far succeeded in bringing only one piano and a half dozen dance-hall girls—all decidedly the worse for wear—into the camp; and even faro or whisky has its limitations as a steady means of relaxation, so it came about that any advocate could usually find an audience to hearken to his arguments for his pet selection.

At intervals when they were not toiling at assessment work in the shafts, which pocked the hillsides, or dodging Apaches in the outlying country, the citizens found diversion in discussing the ideas thus submitted. And the merits of these propositions were debated by groups in the brief street, by players seated before the tables in the gambling halls, by members of the never-absent lines before the bars and by dust-mantled travelers within the Concord stages which came tossing over the weary road from Tucson.

Gradually public opinion began to crystallize. One name was spoken more often as the days went by until it became evident that the great majority favored it, and it was chosen.

They called the town Tombstone and placed one more tradition on the Western map.

The old-timers always showed a pretty fine sense of the fitness of things when they christened a river, mountain range or town. If one were to devote his time to studying the map of our country west of the Mississippi and resuscitating the dying traditions whose titles are printed thereupon he could produce a large volume of marvelous stories. But the entire compilation would contain nothing more characteristic of the days when men carried rifles to protect their lives than the story of that name—Tombstone.

It deals with a period when Southeastern Arizona was Apacheland. Geronimo, Victorio and Nachez were constantly leading their naked warriors into the mountain ranges, which rise from those mesquite-covered plains, to lurk among the rocks watching the lower country for travelers, and when these came to descend upon them for the sake of loot and the love of murder. A few bold cattlemen like John Slaughter had established ranches in this region. These held their homes by constant vigilance and force of arms. Escorts of soldiers frequently guarded the stages on their way to and from Tucson, and there was hardly a month in the year when driver, guard and passengers did not make a running fight of it somewhere along this portion of the route.

Such were conditions during the summer of 1877, when the tale begins, in the dry wash which comes down from the Tombstone hills into the valley of the San Pedro, near where the hamlet of Fairbank stands to-day.

Fragments of horn silver lay scattered among the cactus and dagger plants in the bed of the dry wash. There was a point where the stony slope above the bank was strewn with them. A little farther up an outcropping of high-grade ore showed plainly in the hard white sunshine. The flank of the hill was leaking precious metal like a rotting treasure chest.

A solitary Apache stood on a mesa ten miles away. He had cut a fresh trail down in the valley at dawn and had dogged it, reading every minute sign—a displaced rock, a broken twig, a smudge of disturbed earth—until he had the fullness of its meaning: two prospectors leading a pack mule, both men armed and keeping sharp lookout against attack. Then he had climbed to this remote vantage point and caught sight of them as they turned from the river bottom up the wash. They were traveling straight toward that outcropping.

The Apache stood at the edge of the mesa facing the newly risen sun, a savage vision in a savage land. His narrow turban, shred of loin cloth and knee-high moccasins merely accentuated his nakedness. They held no more suggestion of clothing than his mass of rusty-black hair and the ugly smear of paint across his cheeks. A tiny

(Continued on Page 149)

THE WATER'S FINE

"But You're Goin' to be Miss Lolita Somebody. I'm Goin' to Drop You Right Into the Direct Center of the Front Page of Every Paper in the U. S. A."

By John Peter Toohey

ILLUSTRATED BY JAMES H. CRANK

JIMMY MARTIN'S heart persisted in acting like the well-known eyes of the young lady in the song. He just couldn't make it behave. Up to the third week of his summer season as press agent at Jollyland, the big summer amusement park near New York, it had always been a fairly well-mannered and dependable organ, which performed its physiological functions with becoming regularity and which was not accustomed to respond to any external stimuli with anything beyond an occasional slight flutter. To be sure it had acted up a little three years back in connection with a certain dark-eyed beauty who presided over the destinies of the cigar counter up in the Grand Hotel in New Haven, but that had been only a slight attack and it had resumed the even tenor of its ways after a brief interval and had been unobtrusively going through its routine activities ever since.

A most prepossessing young person whose parents had inflicted upon her the name of Miss Lolita Murphy was directly responsible for the alarming symptoms already hinted at. From the precise moment that Lolita came within his ken Jimmy ceased to be a rational being in full control of his faculties; and his heart, in sympathetic accord with the agitated condition of its owner, began to put on an antic disposition and indulged in curious palpitations of a most annoying nature on the slightest pretext. The usual provocation at first was the sight of Lolita herself, but after a day or two even the thought of her produced a cardiac rataplan that would have done credit to the trap drummer of a jazz band.

Lolita, it may be mentioned in passing, lived up to all the implications of the somewhat picturesque cognomen given her by McClintock, the park manager, when Jimmy first pointed her out to his superior.

"She sure is Miss Lulu Looker," McClintock had remarked emphatically.

Lolita was all of that and a little more. Jimmy was not a poet, and he was therefore unable properly to voice the feelings he had about her beauty. Had he been one he might have justly said that her cheeks seemed to have been kissed by the rosy flush of dawn; that in her sable eyes there lurked the eternal mystery of night beneath tropic skies; that her dark hair was as fragrant as the spices of Araby and that her lithe figure had all the gracile curves of a bounding antelope. As it was, he contented himself with the frequent repetition of the decidedly unpoetic expression "some gal," but this represented to him all the ideas noted above and a liberal assortment of others equally glamorous.

Lolita hailed from a small city in Iowa, and ever since the memorable occasion when Maude Adams played Peter Pan in that city for one night only she had cherished a great and overwhelming ambition. Her father ran the drug store next door to the opera house and was a great crony of the manager's. A number of boys and girls were picked up in each town to play the children in the Never Never Land scene and Lolita's fond parent had inveigled the manager into selecting her as one of the group. It was a step that father was to regret vainly for many years, but on the night of her début he was blissfully unconscious of the possibility of any bitter repining in the future and enjoyed the proceedings almost as much as Lolita did.

From that time on Lolita felt the call of the footlights and became convinced that, given the proper opportunities for the externalization of the emotional feelings that lay dormant within her, she was destined to become an international celebrity and the queen regnant of the English-speaking stage. Chauncey Olcott came to town a few weeks later and she persuaded father to work her in as one of the youngsters to whom he sang a lullaby in a high tenor voice down in the "glen," which is always the setting for the third act of an Irish play.

After that there was no holding her. She became a student at Miss Amanda Holliday's School of Dramatic Expression, which occupied three rooms on the second floor of the Turner Block on Main Street, and she participated in the semiannual entertainments given by the budding geniuses who were under the tutelage of that small-town preceptress of the arts. Versatility was her middle name. At one time she would play Ophelia in the mad scene from Hamlet, and appear later on the program in a Spanish dance with castanets, a lace mantilla and all the other necessary properties. Six months later she would combine the balcony scene from Romeo and Juliet with an imitation of an imitation of Eddie Foy she had heard given by a monologue artist at the Orpheum Theater.

At the age of nineteen she was the town wonder. The dramatic editor of the Democrat-Chronicle predicted that within a short time "this talented daughter of our esteemed fellow townsman, Henry P. Murphy, seems destined to occupy one of the stellar places in the front ranks of the worth-while artists of our fair country."

Lolita moved on to New York armed with a letter of commendation from Miss Amanda Holliday setting forth that she was "worthy of consideration for any rôle no matter what its importance" and urging theatrical managers "not to neglect this opportunity of obtaining the services of one who is a mistress of the mimetic art in all of its manifold manifestations." She also carried a full set of clippings from the Democrat-Chronicle, one half of her male parent's attenuated account in the First National Bank and an overabundant supply of cheery optimism.

The metropolitan managers' office boys were decidedly cold to the advances of this gifted daughter of the Middle West. They treated her with that air of careless indifference so characteristic of their profession. With one accord all the big and little producers decided to take a big chance and neglect the opportunity which Fat offering them. They were unmoved by the pings from the Democrat-Chronicle with Lolita bombarded them through the mails they were callous to the eulogistic outpou of Miss Amanda Holliday, copies of which accomp each written request for an interview. Lolita's cash r grew perilously low and disaster threatened. Then morning when disillusionment and despair moved i took lodgings in her soul she saw an advertisemen newspaper which was like a life buoy tossed to a dro man.

"Ambitious Young Women Wanted for Stage W it read. "Opportunity Afforded Ambitious Amate Perfect Themselves in Dramatic Technic—Apply mediately at Manager's Office, Jollyland."

Lolita, filled with high hopes, took a trolley to the playground by the sea. There Destiny handed her those cold douches that are sometimes held in reser those whose ambitions o'erleap themselves. The dra opportunity promised in the advertisement proved what might be vulgarly termed a job.

A great free open-air spectacle was in process of pre tion at Jollyland under the supervision of a famous mo picture director who specialized in that form of anir art technically known as serials. He had personally ducted a gazelle-eyed cinema celebrity known as Delight through four fifteen-reel affairs of this sort, in she had been threatened with mayhem, aggravated a and battery, felonious wounding, and total and com annihilation at the hands of numerous bands of cutth bandits, thieves and white slavers. In the course of proceedings she had performed every breath-catchin that the festive imagination of the director had been ble of conjuring up, and had succeeded by a mira keeping out of both the hospital and the obituary col of the daily press.

Now it was proposed to let the public have a clo view of this death-defying marvel in the flesh in the performing one of her most famous exploits "before very eyes and for your attention," as the circus anno would put it. To permit of this the director had ev something which he called a dramatic spectacle an persuaded the management of Jollyland to arrange f production in a huge, specially constructed open-air torium as a special added attraction intended to put a quietus on the presumptuous efforts of a rival gro showmen who were endeavoring to rouse interest in a park just opened that summer.

Lolita found herself in a long line of applicants, ma whom were pathetically peaked and undernourished ing, and when her turn came to meet the director she up her mind to pocket her pride and accept whatever offered rather than run the risk of finding herself i straits. Ambition still fired her soul and she was d mined not to return to the little old home town unti ld ıter it in something at least closely akin to a spirit triuıph. To be sure the opportunity offered her was pticularly roseate. It did not hold forth much ni of either pecuniary reward or even of passing ıt it meant that Lolita would not have to telegraph r funds and there was a faint glimmer of hope in nk made by the director.

can mingle in the front ranks of the crowd," he We'll pay you eighteen a week. There'll be only ws a day." Then he had looked at her critically. almost a ringer for Miss Delight," he concluded. if you're a good little girl I might take a notion ou out as understudy."

olita Murphy, the pride of her home city, became a nd almost infinitesimal part of the great outdoor e entitled Secret Service Sally, which was the big n of the Jollyland season.

rôle of an agent of the United States Secret Serv- charming and fascinating June Delight was swept a series of thrilling adventures set against spectac- kgrounds depicting scenes in Berlin, Tokio, Rio iro and other world capitals, and as a culminating she was pursued to the roof of a building in London owling mob which suspected her of being a spy in ploy of the Central Powers. She was saved from nds, in the proverbial nick of time, by her fiancé, Lieut. Thurston Turner, commander of the United Dirigible N-24, who happened to be cruising about ghborhood at the moment and who effected a rescue ling his ship round the roof and deftly lifting the woman into the of the gondola hung from the great lloon just as she out to be beaten to by the crowd.'

namuch as the spec- le was given in the en ir it was possible us for the purposes of s ene a real dirigible, ic was manned by a w ommanded by one bt Wilkins, a person- le young gentleman m Chicago who had me back from France th major's commis- n, a reputation for re-eviltry as an avia- r surpassed by no other e i the American serv- nd a collection of naldozen assorted war eda bestowed by three ate nations. Bobby d ft a snug berth as eis nt to the president a g varnish company g into the Army, the id president being a m hat indulgent par- t ho had sanguine pe ations concerning s n's commercial and du rial future and who as even now sending m laily wires to the itz Carlton urging him "it the cabarets and t own to a solid rock ur ation."

F her labored under e elusion that Bobby as simply vacationing New York. Had he adan inkling of just ha his son was doing he oul have—to use the ou major's own ex- res on—"tried for a ewultitude record him- lf. He couldn't be ex- ec d to know that ict ing fool business let- ers nd checking up the ew efficiency expert's no hly report of econo- ni effected at the Day- or plant wouldn't xa ly appeal any more o n adventuresome ou g man who had been kypooting through the pu r reaches of the at- no here for nearly two re and dodging Ger- na machine-gun bullets.

Bobby had overheard the general who commanded the aviation camp at which he was demobilized remarking about a request made by the moving-picture director that he recommend some aviator for the task of piloting the dirigible which was to play such an important rôle in the spectacle, and he had offered himself for the sacrifice just as a lark. He found the experience rare sport and until something giving greater promise of adventure appeared in the offing he was determined to go on with it. Twice a day he reached down and plucked up the beautiful Miss Delight as lightly as if she were a fragile doll while the assembled thousands, on the qui vive with excitement, burst into rapturous applause. In order to insure the peace of mind of Robert Wilkins, Sr., Jimmy Martin had consented—rather reluctantly, it must be admitted—to respect the wishes of the impersonator of Lieut. Thurston Turner, U. S. N., who had expressed a desire to remain incognito. Otherwise the consequences might have been lurid.

Jimmy itched to give out a story concerning the social and business connections of the young soldier, but he had given his word and, being an ex-newspaper man, that was sacred. He temporarily forgot about Bobby and devoted his spare moments to figuring out ways and means for the sensational exploitation of Lolita Murphy, to whose charms, as previously recorded, he had become a shackled slave from the moment he first glimpsed her at rehearsal.

Lolita, it may be mentioned in passing, was a trifle discouraged at the comparatively slight opportunities for uplifting and otherwise ennobling the American stage offered by her participation in Secret Service Sally. Her name wasn't even mentioned on the program. She figured under an impersonal heading at the bottom, together with a couple of hundred other young women who were listed as "Berlin citizens, Japanese geisha girls, South Americans, Londoners, etc., etc."

It needed all the soaring optimism of Jimmy to keep her from slipping into a nervous decline. The press agent had obtained an introduction through the stage director, and his sympathetic interest in her temporarily sidetracked ambitions had won him her esteem and high regard from the beginning. Jimmy was a rapid worker and within three days from the time of their first meeting he had vowed his ardent and palpitating devotion, and though Lolita had not completely committed herself to a reciprocal affirmation she had succeeded, nevertheless, by devious and subtle devices not unknown to her sex, in conveying the distinct impression that the star of hope was visible in the eastern sky.

There came a night when Lolita's disappointment was past all bearing and when she sobbed out on Jimmy's shoulders a bitter protest against the fate that had driven her into believing that she was destined to be a great actress. They were sitting on the beach in the moonlight after the show, and off in the murky distance the great Sandy Hook light was blinking like some monster firefly.

"Jimmy," she said half chokingly, "I just don't belong. I wish I was back in Iowa."

"Gosh, that's an awful wish, girlie," responded the press agent with a foolish attempt at a pleasantry which he instantly regretted. Lolita drew away from him quickly and flared up.

"Iowa's all right," she retorted. "It's better than this lonesome place." She lapsed almost immediately into a wistful mood. "It's just ten o'clock there now and the movies are letting out and there's a crowd in dad's store and the fellows are treating the girls to sundaes or just plain ice cream and dad is fussing round and yelling to poor Porky Brooks to get a move on and keep the orders filled, and like as not he's helping out himself. I want to go back, Jimmy; I want to go back."

Jimmy touched her gently on the hand and then squeezed it softly.

"Listen, girlie," he said comfortingly. "I know just how you feel—the cards ain't runnin' right and you want to quit the game, but I'm goin' to cut in with a clean deck and start a new deal. I'm goin' to fix things so that when you do go back for a visit to the little old home town and the old folks the Peerless Silver Cornet Band is goin' to be down at the station, and the Mayor is goin' to speak a few well-chosen words of welcome in the presence of a cheering crowd of friends and well-wishers. Leave it to me."

Lolita laughed a little in spite of her mood.

"You're a great little jollier, Jimmy," she said, "and I'd like to believe you, but somehow I can't. I'm a nobody, a small-town nobody."

"But you're goin' to be a little Miss Lolita Somebody of the well-known world," he responded cheerily, "before I get through with you. I'm goin' to drop you right into the direct center of the front page of every paper in the U. S. A. from the New York Gazette

(Continued on Page 186)

Lolita Was Getting Ready for the Performance of Secret Service Sally and Making a Brave Effort to Control Herself

LOOKING BACKWARD

Men, Women and Events During Eight Decades of American History—By Henry Watterson

IN BRINGING these desultory—perhaps too fragmentary—recollections to a close the writer may not be denied his final word. This shall neither be self-confident nor overstated; the rather a confession of faith somewhat in rejection of political and religious pragmatism. In both his experience has been ample if not exhaustive.

I was born in the Presbyterian Church, baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, educated in the Church of England in America and married into the Church of the Disciples. The Roman Catholic baptism happened in this way: It was my second summer; my parents were sojourning in the household of a devout Catholic family; my nurse was a fond, affectionate Irish Catholic; the little life was almost despaired of, so one sunny day, to rescue me from that form of theologic controversy known as infant damnation, the baby carriage was trundled round the corner to Saint Matthew's Church—it was in the national capital—and the baby brow was touched with holy water out of a font blessed of the Virgin Mary. Surely I have never felt or have been the worse for it.

Whilst I was yet too young to understand I witnessed an old-fashioned baptism of the countryside. A person who had borne a very bad character in the neighborhood was being immersed. Someone, more humorous than reverent, standing near me, said as the man came to the surface, "There go his sins, men and brethren, there go his sins"; and having but poor eyes I thought I saw them passing down the stream never to trouble him, or anybody, more. I can see them still floating, floating down the stream, out and away from the sight of men. Does this make me a Baptist, I wonder?

I fear not, I fear not; because I am unable to rid myself of the impression that there are many roads leading to heaven and I have never believed in what is called close communion. I have not hated and am unable to hate any man because either in political or in religious opinion he differs from me and insists upon voting his party ticket and worshiping his Creator according to his conscience.

I suppose I must have been born an insurrecto. Pursuing the story of the Dark Ages when men were burnt at the stake for the heresy of refusing to bow to the will of the majority, it is not the voice of the Protestant or the Catholic that issues from the flames and reaches my heart, but the cry of suffering man, my brother. To me a saint is a saint whether he wears wooden shoes or goes barefoot, whether he gets his baptism silently out of a font of consecrated water or comes dripping from the depth of the nearest brook, shouting "Hallelujah!" From my boyhood the persecution of man for opinion's sake—and no matter for what opinion's sake—has roused within me the only devil I have ever personally known.

My reading has embraced not a few works which seek or which affect to deal with the mystery of life and death. Each and every one of them leaves a mystery still. For all their learning and research—their positivity and contradiction—none of the writers know more than I think I know myself, and all that I think I know myself may be abridged to the simple rescript, I know nothing. The wisest of us reck not whence we came or whither we go; the human mind, unable to conceive the eternal in either direction; the soul of man inscrutable even to himself.

The Night has a thousand eyes,
And the Day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done.

Mrs. Henry Watterson

All that there is to religion, therefore, is faith; not much more in politics. We are variously told that the church is losing its hold upon men. If it be true it is either that it gives itself over to theology—the pride of opinion—or yields itself to the celebration of the mammon of unrighteousness.

I do not believe that it is true. Never in the history of the world was Jesus of Nazareth so interesting and predominant. Between Buddha, teaching the blessing of eternal sleep, and Christ, teaching the blessing of eternal life, mankind has been long divided; but slowly, surely the influence of the Christ has overtaken that of the Buddha until that portion of the world which has advanced most by process of evolution from the primal state of man now worships at the shrine of Christ and him risen from the dead, not at the sign of Buddha and total oblivion.

II

THE blessed birthright from God, the glory of heaven, the teaching and example of the Prince of Peace, have been engulfed beneath oceans of ignorance and superstition through two thousand years of embittered controversy. During the Dark Ages coming down even to our own time the very light of truth was shut out from the eyes and hearts and minds of men.

Partyism—ch
ism—will ever to its fetish. Too many churches shall I say, church fabrics—bre controversy where there should be ment, each sect and subdivision fig phantoms of its fancy.

In the city that once proclaimed eternal there is war between the Qu and the Vatican, the government of and the papal hierarchy. In Franc government of the republic an Church of Rome are at daggers d Before the world war England and many—each claiming to be Protest were looking on askance, irresolut as to which side might be right which wrong, but "on which side bread to be buttered?"

In America, where it was said b witty Frenchmen we have fifty reli and only one soup, there are p who think we should begin to org to stop the threatened coming c Pope, and such like!

"O Liberty," cried Madame Ro
"how many crimes are committ
thy name!"

"O Churchism," may I not say, much nonsense is trolled off in
name!"

I would think twice before tr
the wisest and best of men with abs power; but I would trust never body of men—never any Sanhedrin sistory, church congress or party vention—with absolute power. H men are often led to do or to asse association, to what they would di upon their conscience and responsi
as individuals. En masse extre always prevails, and extremism is ally wrong; it is the more wrong the more dangerous because it is wanting for plausible sophistries, fu ing congenial and convincing argu to the mind of the unthinking for ever it has to propose.

III

TOO many churches and too partyism! It is love—love th grace of God—truth where we ca
it—which shall irradiate the life th
If when we have prepared ourselv the life to come love be wanting no else is much worth while. Not alon love of man for woman, but the lo woman for woman and of man for the divine fraternity taught us b Sermon on the Mount; the religi giving, not of getting; of whole-hearted giving; of j
the love and the joy of others.

Who giveth himself with his alms feeds three—Himself, his hungering neighbor and Me.

For myself I can truthfully subscribe to the formul believe in God the Father Almighty; Maker of heave earth. And in Jesus Christ, his only-begotten So Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was cruc dead and buried; He descended into hell; the third da rose again from the dead; He ascended into heaven, an teth at the right hand of God, the Father Almighty; thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

That is my faith. It is my religion. It was my c song. It may not be, dear ones of contrariwise be your cradle song or your belief or your religion.
boots it? Can you discover another in word and dee luminous, far-reaching power of speech and exampl walk by the side of this the Christ of my belief wh was a Jew?

I would not inveigh against either the church or its istry; I would not stigmatize temporal preaching; I w have ministers of religion as free to discuss the thin this world as the statesmen and the journalists; but this difference: That the objective point with them sh

(Continued on Page 197)

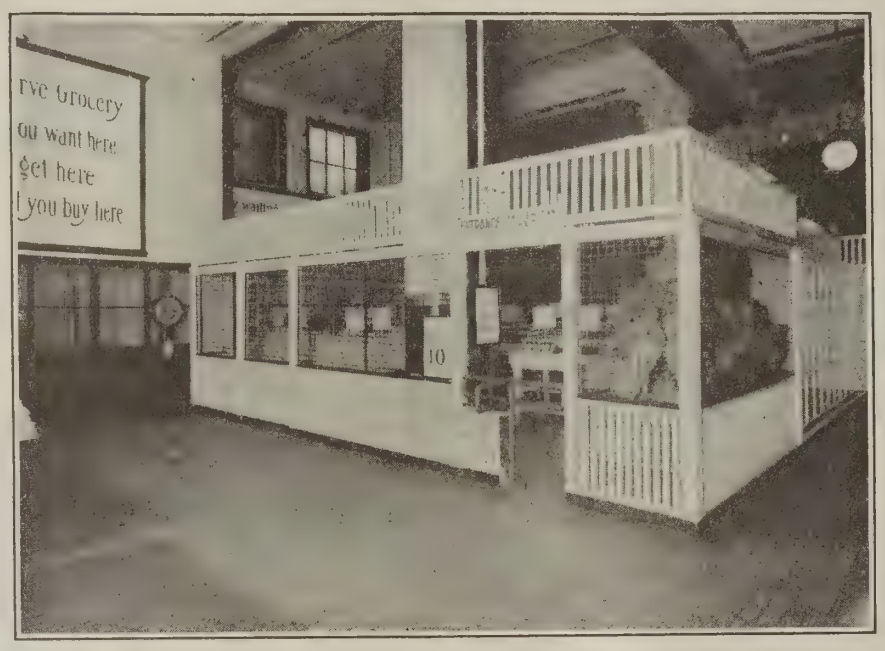
Self-Serve Knocks the H Out of H. C. L.—By Mary R. Reynolds

ETHA is a iddle West unty seat. A ngr would find ity in distin- it from a thousand other such nat enshrine courthouses on their in Indiana, Illinois and Michigan. ng to the last census it numbers en, women and children within limits. It is located in the center farming country and has a large ade that Saturday nights parks treet solid with its machines.

Ma Street, five blocks in length, is ed, and that stretch of smooth nt is the pride of every loyal son ughter of Oletha. The school- eight churches of assorted kinds mmunity that could adequately two, a movie theater, and the use in a weedy square surrounded hing posts well carved by the f dead and gone dobbins, con- Oletha's public buildings.

Main Street of this town of a little an two thousand inhabitants, in ing of 1918, were to be found rug stores, dispensing ice-cream o the well and medicine to the our dry-goods emporiums; two re shops and seven grocery stores. the seven regular groceries Mike s sold fruit and some vegetables, 's bakery sold factory-baked as well as fresh goods, re was a mill from which many, especially the farm bought their flour.

Ho could seven groceries make money in a town of ousand, even one like Oletha, which had a good y trade? The answer is that they could not, and n question changed hands with great regularity.



Entrance to Self-Serve Grocery

Losing Ventures Easy to Sell

N grocer and one only was to be found there in 1918 o had been selling sugar and spice and everything far back as 1908. Oletha had always had six to groceries during that decade, but with the one ex- the turnover in their owners had been rapid.

The strange thing was, however, that every time a decided he couldn't keep his head above water longer and that y thing to do was out, he always someone ready the good will, and few staples wolesaler had been to extend credit en he saw how were going. Ap- ly the world is those who think groceries is an nd lucrative job, ing only sufficient to make change. te of its record a y store is seldom n the market.

In town of Oletha's e retired-farmer is the one that hes the majority embryo grocers. farmer who has his place and into the nearest after a few months tired of doing ng and is lone- He has a little y to invest, and grocery store he s out he would work to fill his and the opportu- f meeting his old s, so it doesn't much of an argu- to induce him to defunct grocery.

MacGregor, who ran the one prosperous and paying grocery in the town, was a Scotsman who had worked up from the bottom. He possessed, besides long practical experience, natural business acumen. The cream of Oletha's trade was his. The skim milk went to his six competitors.

The wives of the prosperous business and professional men of the town patronized MacGregor, as did also the more prosperous farmers. His prices were a shade higher than those quoted in the other stores, but his goods were reliable and his store was neater and more attractively arranged than were those of his competitors. He gave credit, but was too wise a business man and too canny a Scot to extend it long to any about whose ability to pay there was any doubt. He gave delivery service, as did the other six, the only difference being that he numbered among his customers practically everyone in Oletha who really needed the service or could afford to pay for it in groceries priced high enough to cover its cost. Unless it was a bag of flour or some other heavy commodity the rest of the town were rather glad of an excuse to go over on Main Street and to carry home the wherewithals for the next meal.

Three of Oletha's groceries still delivered with a horse and wagon. The others used flivver runabouts with trailers for delivery work. Not one of the seven knew whether his delivery outfit was an asset or a liability. They just took it for granted that a grocery store couldn't run without one.

In the spring of 1918, Jones, one of the seven, unable to obtain more credit or to collect his outstanding bills, sold out and found himself after four years of hard work, long hours and much anxiety, six thousand dollars poorer than when he tried to break into the grocery game.

Jones' failure, like every previous local-grocery failure, caused the rest, excepting MacGregor, to shiver in their shoes and to speculate on how long it would be before they followed suit. Four shivered at the handwriting on the wall and did nothing to head off the inevitable. The other, a shrewd New Englander named Stephen Todd, shivered, but while shaking decided that if there was any way out of his present predicament he was going to find it before it was too late. During the past year his store had just made expenses, minus pay for his own time and work. Money sufficient for him and his family to live on had had to come out of his fast-dwindling account at the savings bank. Six months at the outside would find him broke.

Todd Takes a Chance

TODD had been a railroad engineer for many years. After a prolonged nervous breakdown he had been ordered by his doctor to get into something less nerve-racking than running an express-train engine unless he wished to repeat the performance. While convalescing up in the country he had heard of a grocery store which was for sale in Oletha, the nearest town. The one thing he really wanted to do was to get into his greasy overalls and run an engine. Barred from that, keeping a grocery looked as good as anything else to him. Then, too, it required no experience. Two years had changed his mind regarding that particular bid which the grocery-store business had made for his favor. It seemed to need a blamed lot of experience to make a go of it.

His stock was lower than when he had started out, his delivery car might be tinkered up so it would go another year, but no more, and unless he could make larger monthly payments to the wholesaler than he had found it possible to do in the past, autumn would find him with his supply cut off.

Jones' failure depressed him and that night to an old friend from his home city he confessed that the grocery business wasn't all that his rosy fancy had pictured it. Though he hated to admit that he had failed in anything he had undertaken, Todd, feeling the need

(Continued on Page 116)

Practically All Staples are Sold in Bulk and are Classified in Sections

THE GOLDEN NAM

By George Kibbe Turner

ILLUSTRATED BY RALPH PALLEN COLEMAN

YOUNG CHRIS VANDALAER was a boy of high spirits—handsome, impatient and self-willed. He had been in the great war, and had seen life and death and strange lands. But now he was back again exactly where he started—back in the deep country, where men came up and lived and died, like corn, in the same field where they took root; and days were long and empty; and nights with no lights outdoors but the stars and, in summer, the fireflies. And he would often say that he would give his soul and body to get out and away to some city.

Some nights, in fact, when he grew desperate, he would almost decide that he would make a break, take a chance and show himself at the great offices of his powerful namesake—the great Christian Vandalaer—in New York. For it was a singular fact, and one he could never quite forget, that he, so far as he could learn, was the only other bearer of that feared and famous and unusual name, in the entire world. However, he never ventured—being in the first place too proud to do so, and in the next knowing in advance how useless it would be. For the great Vandalaer, as is not entirely unknown, is in general a man of dominant, driving and almost savage humor; and in particular his relations with the other branches of the family would make an identity of name much more certainly a matter of offense than of liking. So the visit to his great offices was never made by his young kinsman; nor was there any advantage from his great name to come to the latter in any way that he ever could have dreamed.

Young Vandalaer was turning away one evening from the dim-lighted post office after the coming of the evening train, and was going home, discouraged, without mail. The only sound was the inspired monotony of the whippoorwills in the dark wall of woods; the only street lights the fireflies sliding down the pale mauve road. He had gone some little way when he marked the sounds of footsteps hurrying behind him, and turned to hear a stranger calling out his name.

"Mr. Vandalaer! Oh, Mr. Vandalaer!" cried the strange voice in the twilight.

"What?" he called back.

"One minute, please!" the stranger called; and in less than that much time was beside him.

"How are you?" he said, and shook hands with him in a spirited way.

He was a dark man, with a rather foreign voice, and a smile very white in the dusk. And after some brief explanation he stated that he desired to talk business with young Vandalaer; and then sat down by the roadside with him and offered him a long and fragrant cigar.

"My name," he said, "is Poco—David Poco. I am of foreign descent—my parents coming to this country when I was a boy. Yet in spite of this I have prospered and done well. When I was no bigger than nothing I went into a Broad Street brokerage house and worked up till, in the last two years, I have been in business for myself. And I've made a big thing out of it—done a business as big as anybody there, if I do say so!

"What's that?" he broke off with a start, and almost an oath—and a sudden apprehensive look close behind him.

"Just a whippoorwill," said young Chris Vandalaer; "go on."

"Oh! A bird, huh?" said the stranger. "It sounds more like a murderer." And he puffed twice nervously at his cigar, and went along.

"I got another man—a friend of mine," he said, "only older, who's come along about the same as me. Built up a big brokerage business, with plenty of profit in it." He named the motor car that he owned—all nickel-plated from radiator to gas tank. "Money's no object," he explained, "to him to-day. His name is Grabstein—Abram Grabstein."

And young Chris Vandalaer made mental note of this.

"But just the same we ain't satisfied, neither one of us. We got to go on—that's us both! And so to-day we are going in together into a new business, bigger yet, that'll make us one of the biggest on Broad Street, without exception."

She Called Him That Most Terrible of All Names in the Great City

"I get you," said young Chris Vandalaer, carefully husbanding and drinking in the fragrance of his long cigar; watching him, and wondering meanwhile why he was there telling to him his personal fortunes on that country road.

"We got everything," the black stranger went on telling him. "We got money, we got political pull, we got the greatest stocks to sell in this whole country. All we want to-day is just one thing!"

"What's that?" asked young Chris Vandalaer, when he stopped.

"That's what I'm up here now to see you for," the stranger answered him.

"What is it?" young Vandalaer reiterated, staring at him through the dusk.

"A name," said Mr. Poco.

"A name!" Chris Vandalaer said after him.

"Yes," he repeated; and then explained himself. "You've got no idea," he said, "what names mean in business in this country—unless you are, like us, foreigners; of the difference between a good name and a bad one; an old name and a new one. It's thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars. It might be millions, probably, when you get once going."

And he again flinched slightly at the curt loud liquid cry of the whippoorwill, close behind his head.

"New names are rotten," he reiterated then, with something very like an oath. "You look at ours, for instance. Alone we were bad enough, yes. Together we are all wrong. Grabstein and Poco!" he said with a high hard laugh. "What boob would buy a stock from that? Oh, we know it," he said. "We are wise," he said, and stopped.

"So that," he continued, "is why I'm up here seeing you to-night." And he stopped again, regarding him.

But young Chris Vandalaer did not reply. To say he was astonished would be much too mild.

"You've got a name; we ain't," the stranger then went on. "You've got a name—one of the oldest and best known in the country. And ours is, no laugh! I'll tell the truth to start with, be you'd learn it anyhow. We want your n to use it in our business. There was a lot of others— big names that we were thinking of that we might had. But Vandalaer we like best, if we can get it ways reasonable; because it's one of the oldest an known in the country, without doubt; especially line of business. So we come to you," he said, speaki more briskly now; "we give you the first chance. I here to-night to get your decision. I'm up here nov I'll make you my proposition. And you'll give me and we'll settle it up right now, agreea everybody. For I've got to go back ag the midnight train, and get some sleep."

"How did you find out about me?" young Chris Vandalaer, curiosity colorin words as he rose on his elbow from where h

"We seen it somev I guess; your name papers."

"When I got my s medal, maybe," said Vandalaer, rememb when it must have be

"Probably—I gues said Mr. Poco, proce "Now, what do you How would you like down to little old New and enjoy yoursel make a barrel or t money at the same ti

"Or would you r stay up here and spend days working like a co and your nights wit whippoorwills?" h quired when his comp did not answer in diately.

"For we ain't no pil he said again. "We you right for what y got. That's my idea my partner's. He's a good fellow the same as I am," said Mr. "Good and liberal. And we wan to be satisfied. For for us it wo an expense exactly; it will be a vestment."

But still young Chris Vandalaer did not answer hi yet feeling competent to do so. And after looking sh at him through the dusk the stranger, Mr. Poco, to the conversation once again, apparently to urge him

"You can stay here all your life," he said, "and wh you be in the end? Feeding chickens for your board in old age! But if you come with us you'd live while y living; and when you died you'd have something besides to die on.

"Are you afraid? Is that it?" the man now inq with a slight show of temper, after another wait.

"Afraid of what?"

"To give us a price on your name?"

"Why would I be?" asked young Chris Vand "It's my name, isn't it?"

"Sure," the other answered. "Then what is it y got on your mind?"

"How much? How much would you pay me?" re young Vandalaer; and his voice sounded gruff to hi even as he said it. For he could not make out wha thing could be. He had never before heard of going i buying other persons' names.

And again the stranger looked sharply at him thr the dusk, studying his face.

"How would ten thousand dollars a year suit you said. "To begin with," he went on when young Vand did not answer. For, to tell the truth, he had not b enough to do so.

"Besides the profits from the stock we would give the New York stranger said, in the other's still conti silence. "What do you want?" he asked finally, evid misinterpreting young Chris' inability to speak. " that enough for you to start on? Do you want me said, making a start at getting up, "to go off and get body else with another name? Because there's plen them that will want it—if you don't."

"All right," said young Chris Vandalaer, swallo hastily, and finding his voice at last. "All right," he detaining him, "I'll go!"

He was dazed by the thing. He did not know ho take it—or whether it was real or he was dreaming it.

n new thought struck him: Suppose this thing were a fraud, a trick? And at once, of course, the idea came of tin this.

'I'go—that is," he told him then—"if I can fix it!"

'If ou can fix it?" the stranger answered, staring once m uspiciously.

'f can get the money to get there with," young Van- e aid bluntly.

id v much?" the other asked at once.

) hundred dollars maybe," said young Chris Van- making it good and big.

ould worry," said the other. And taking out his e opened it and handed the sum to him in one yel- bi. "You can sign for it over at the station when we the," he said, and got up again.

they went along down the railroad to the station, h e was now quite a heavy dew, and the mosquitoes re ot inactive where they were; and they thought it uld be better on the station platform.

So oung Chris Vandalaer signed his receipt and his ag nent to come to New York and to let them use his ne and then he waited on the platform, listening to . Ico telling of New York and the lights at night, so ut from this; and the money that would be made i ne combination, such as they would have—with ir oney and their experience, and his famous name.

Th said good-by when the one o'clock train that rie the milk into the city rolled in, having already poized the time when young Vandalaer would come te city. And when he had watched the tail light of tin round the curve young Chris went home at last l nt to bed. But he did not sleep; and the night was ctally gone and the whippoorwills had started singing ins as they do in the hours before the dawn, before any ep; all came to him. For he lay there, half stunned by od ortune—wondering about that night's adventure—ich he might in fact easily have thought a dream but

There's One Thing, Don't Forget! It Ain't Us He's After First. He'll Get You for the Worst Thing He Can Cook Up" of a mere name. It was like finding money; or like the story in a child's book, of a common man suddenly made prince—because they found out at last his real name; that he possessed unknown the golden name of a prince.

There was still doubt in the mind of young Chris Vandalaer when he woke again—even of that yellow bill in his hand. And the first thing he did that next day was to assure himself that this was genuine. Such it proved to be. Yet the man whom he visited and confided his story in—the keeper of the general store—still doubted. For there must be, he claimed, some trick somewhere. No man alive could pay ten thousand dollars a year for just a name.

Nevertheless on Tuesday young Chris Vandalaer took his hundred-dollar bill and bought his ticket to New York City, as agreed. And, as agreed, the black Mr. Poco with his black cigar was there to meet him and carried him at once in a public automobile, whose hire cost him a laborer's daily pay, through swarming, noisy streets southward to a tall building; and then up to high spacious rooms, where Chris saw, with some surprise, his own name upon the doors in golden letters.

"The Great Vandalaer Exploration Syndicate," he read as he was passing in, and he saw the costly furniture and the handsome company of stenographers inside, and the other names in golden letters on still other doors—out of one of which appeared a small baldheaded somewhat leering man to greet him.

"This is Mr. Grabstein," said Mr. Poco, introducing them to each other. "Abe, meet your president."

And Mr. Grabstein leered a rather pleasant and good-natured leer and took young Chris Vandalaer by the hand and drew him inside the glass door with Mr. Grabstein's name in golden letters on it. He closed it, and they then sat down and smoked three long fragrant black cigars, while Mr. Grabstein talked.

"How do you like it?" asked Mr. Grabstein. "Your name upon the door? Good? . . . Good," he said, and smiled. "We're glad you do."

And then he explained everything to him.

"These here exploration companies," said Mr. Grabstein, "are all the thing to-day—very, very fine! The big men with the big money to put up are all in them to-day! For there's big money in there—sure and big! And why? Because big money should make big money, always. Don't it? Sure."

Mr. Poco, who sat black and silent, smoking, echoed: "It does, sure thing."

"Once, in the old days, all us poor boobs bought gold mines and silver mines and copper mines, if we wanted them, from the fellers that done 'em up in packages—like all the rest of the suckers. All of us—the rich fellers, as well as you and me. They were all suckers then."

And Mr. Poco grunted his assent.

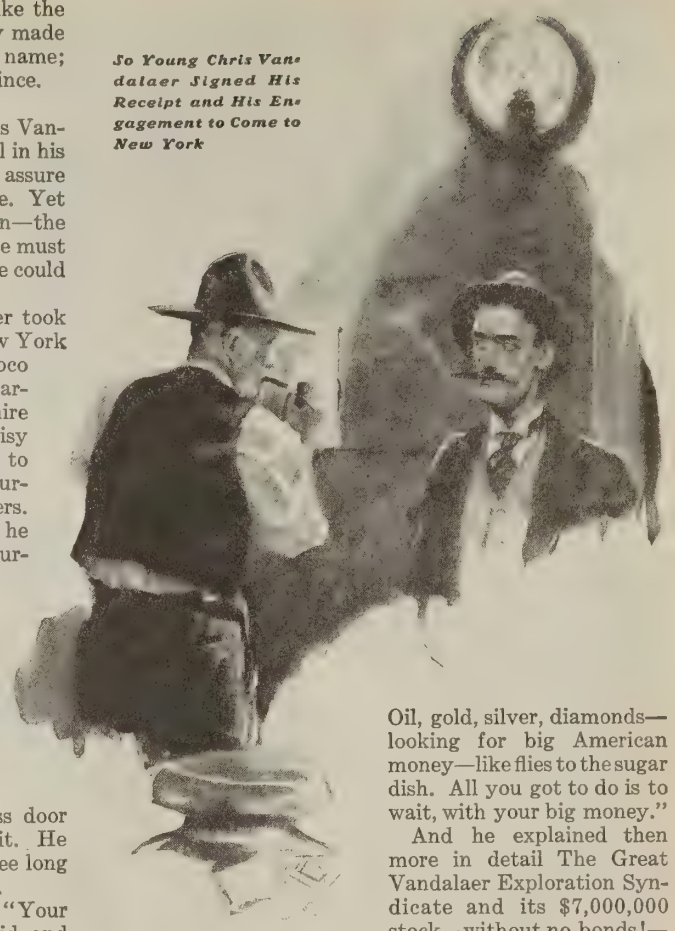
"But now the rich ones," said the persuasive Mr. Grabstein, "have got wise to themselves and their money. They see they've got it all their way. They got the money, and the other man's got the mine. Now money can get along without a mine—very nice. But how can a mine get on without money?" inquired Mr. Grabstein genially. "You tell me."

But this young Chris Vandalaer could scarcely do.

"So then," said Mr. Grabstein, going on, "what they do, they do this. Like they should done years ago. They let the mine come for the money—and they take it—but only when they look it up for themselves and find out that it's good for something. And for a big lot more than they pay for it, generally. Sure!"

"The suckers on the other side," commented Mr. Poco tersely.

"All over they come to-day," said Mr. Grabstein, with a large imaginative wave of his hand. "From this country and Alaska and South America—and soon Siberia even. Oil, gold, silver, diamonds—looking for big American money—like flies to the sugar dish. All you got to do is to wait, with your big money."



So Young Chris Vandalaer Signed His Receipt and His Engagement to Come to New York

And he explained then more in detail The Great Vandalaer Exploration Syndicate and its $7,000,000 stock—without no bonds!—and how sure it was—all big safe money; till young Chris Vandalaer could understand at last about the great new offices and the many workers and the golden name upon the door; and how it was they could pay him without a thought ten thousand dollars annually for his name.

This ten thousand dollars he was to have was not all in cash, however, it now seemed; but a great share, much more than he had anticipated, must go out for his living expenses.

"For I tell you what we want you to do, Chrissy," said Mr. Grabstein, who now called him only by his first name—"for your own interest as well as ours: We want you, first away, to take, say, fifty dollars a week in your salary; and the rest in a drawing account, until you get acquainted with the ropes. For naturally, you've got to learn—ain't you?

"You'll be president, yes, all the time; but we got to run the business first off with our money; and that's right too, Chrissy, for we know about it and you don't. Naturally you got to take time to learn it.

"Naturally what you got to do, and what we want that you should do," said Mr. Grabstein, "is get acquainted first—with people and things, and learn the ropes the way they are here in New York, so after a while you should be useful to us. Now and then we probably might have something that we got up that we should just want you to sign—some letters or some things like that, but you can sign them mostly right there at the hotel, where we put up; and give you your drawing account." And then he told young Chris of the hotel where he was to stay—a great golden hotel which even he had heard of.

"You'll like it there," said Mr. Grabstein. "You'll get acquainted with plenty of people, and write your letters out from there; and all the time you'll be seeing life, enjoying yourself. For that's the first you've got to do in New York—talk with other men and get acquainted. And some ladies, maybe. Oh, you'll have the best end of it," said Mr. Grabstein, winking. "While we're down here sweating, taking care of the business, you can go on and enjoy yourself. And now, why not go up there?" said Mr. Grabstein, looking across at Mr. Poco.

"Not now. To-night!" said Mr. Poco, answering. "After I take him out and see my tailor first. For a good-looking boy like this, he's got to look right!" he said, half to Mr. Grabstein and half to young Chris Vandalaer.

"All right then, sure," said Mr. Grabstein, raising up his hand and his eyebrows at the same time. "And I'll meet you there to-night."

So those two visited the tailor that afternoon—and young Christian saw again why it was that ten-thousand-dollar salaries were given in New York. Yet there was a great satisfaction after all in what the tailor said, and showed that he could do with him—for he certainly was going to look well. And after that—that evening they met and the three dined together in the great golden hotel—in

(Continued on Page 143)

Forty Years of a Diplomat's Life

XIX

By BARON ROSEN

Former Ambassador From Russia to the United States

MY SUCCESSOR, Mr. Iswolsky, who six years later was to become Minister of Foreign Affairs, arrived with his family in the end of June on board one of our naval vessels coming from Vladivostok. We had everything prepared for their reception so that they were enabled to proceed straight to the capital and take up their residence in the legation building, which was one of the finest houses and perhaps the most comfortable one in Tokio.

As the fates would have it, Mr. Iswolsky and I were destined to succeed each other in different posts. I had succeeded him as Chargé d'Affaires at Washington in 1886; then he succeeded me as Minister to Serbia in 1897, and now he succeeded me again in Japan, and I succeeded him at Munich; and three years later I was to succeed him a last time on my reappointment as minister at Tokio nine months before the outbreak of the war. I had first made his acquaintance when he was still at school at the Imperial Lyceum at St. Petersburg, and I had already entered the civil service, having finished my studies at the Imperial Law School. We met accidentally in a railroad train between Moscow and St. Petersburg and spent half a night in animated conversation. He impressed me as a gifted youth of great intelligence and, for his years, remarkably cultivated mind. In later years though we were colleagues in the diplomatic service we could only meet occasionally, when we happened to be home on leave or when we were succeeding each other, as on this occasion, at some post abroad. He was by long odds the ablest man in our service. His solid erudition, his breadth of view, his profound understanding and thorough earnestness in the treatment of affairs of state, his liberal mind trained in the school of Western political thought stamped him as—what had always been so sadly wanting in Russia—a real statesman in the European sense.

The telegraph has recently announced his death, which occurred in Paris in August last. I am fulfilling a sad duty in paying homage on these pages to the memory of a distinguished statesman and former colleague and chief, for whom I always entertained the highest regard and with whom I shared many views, though we fundamentally disagreed on the subject of the policy, the tragic collapse of which it was his cruel fate to have witnessed, a result which may have hastened his untimely end.

We were detained at Yokohama for some time longer, waiting for the arrival from Hong-Kong of the Empress of India, on board of which we were to sail for Vancouver. I think it was some day in the beginning of July when we saw her steaming up the bay and casting anchor in the roads opposite our hotel. The day before, if I remember rightly, a telegram was received at the legation announcing the sudden death of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Mouravieff, but it was only when we reached New York that we learned of the appointment of his successor.

When we sailed from Yokohama we were still, as we had been for more than a week, quite ignorant of the fate of our unfortunate colleagues besieged by the Boxers in the legation quarter at Peking, and we had almost given up all hope of their being rescued in time to save them from starvation. Beyond the natural concern we felt for their fate there was nothing to mar the joyous expectation with which we were looking forward to an ocean voyage, always a matter of unalloyed delight to me, and a new visit to Canada and the United States. In leaving Japan this time, and ever, as I then thought, I felt that I had don duty to the best of my ability and for the interests of my country as I conceived ther also felt that in my thre journs in Japan, at diff times, I had been particu favored in having been al a witness of the new bir an old and highly culture tion; in having been ab watch her first tentative on the road to the assi tion of an entirely new terial civilization; an having seen, a quarter century later, the rejuven nation, on reaching m estate, stretching her lim eager readiness for a co with any power bold en to challenge her newly achi station as an equal. Alas, that power should have the country of my birth, w rulers, blinded by overwee pride, persisted in underr the potentialities of the force that had sprung t after centuries of obsc and isolation.

St. Mark's Cathedral, Venice, and the Fallen Campanile

PHOTOS. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

The Campanile and St. Mark's

This time again the P Ocean treated us most ciously, in such a way as to belie its name, and af very pleasant crossing came in sight of land o twelfth day after weig anchor at Yokohama. watched the pilot com board, but he did not wear a frock coat a silk hat as in olden days San Francisco p used to wear in boarding incoming stear in any kind of weather, presumably to their superb indifference to the dangers o deep. He had, however, bulging out o pockets the usual supply of newspapers, w he took up to the bridge.

A few minutes later the captain's ste brought me a newspaper, on top of the page of which the captain had written in pencil these illuminating words: "All thi lie!" I guessed at once that it mus something relating to the siege of the lega at Peking. It turned out to be a long tele sent from Shanghai to his paper in Londo the local correspondent of that journal, reproduced in extenso in the Vancouver n paper. It was a harrowing description o events which had followed the taking b sault of the legation quarter at Peking b Boxer forces, giving among other horro particularly detailed account of the tort by which the unfortunate diplomats had put to death. Particularly affecting was story of the martyrdom of our Minister, Michael de Giers—at present happily safe sound, residing at Rome as Russian Amb dor—who was described as having been b alive in a large caldron filled with oil and ing up to his last breath been confessing C tianity. As far as I can now remember it also stated that his secretaries, presum not having been considered worthy of honors of oil, were boiled to death in water.

I sat in my deck chair immersed in the p sal of the account of the dreadful happen at Peking, when one of the missionaries, gees from some of the mission stations in C who had joined the steamer at Hong-K came up to me and said that he had noticed deeply I seemed to be moved by what I reading and he wanted to reassure me i gard to the fate of my friends, being convi that there was not a word of truth in the w story. I confessed that I had some do myself, but that I could not help being pressed by a story adorned with so many such minute details concerning an event after all could not very well have been vented out of whole cloth.

"It's just the very reason why you should disbelieve wole story; plain, honest truth does not need so ch dornment."
Thi argument seemed indeed to be convincing enough, me so as it was based on the generally accepted belief rogd to the unadorned condition in which Truth is od to emerge from her well whenever she chooses to a to mortal eyes—an appearance of which, by the se has been rather chary all these years. But the nir of that sensational story may justly derive some astic pride from having caused a considerable stir all r t: world, a species of pride which, let us hope, is not ay accompanied by some qualms of conscience upon ecn on the cruel and needless pain which such joursti achievements may inflict on tender hearts tremg r the fate of those dear to them.
n tis connection I was on arrival at St. Petersburg told or about the sister of one of the members of our legas ff at Peking who, after having read in the morning er he famous telegram about the martyrdom of the in diplomats, started at once for the Foreign Depart-t the hope of learning some more reassuring news, wen passing in front of the house occupied by the ne: Legation noticed at the door one of the attachés
th establishment, whereupon she jumped from her , ride straight for the luckless Chinaman and began bing him with her umbrella, he, the while, taking his isnent like a gallant gentleman, only protesting his occ.ce in the few Russian dshe could command.
tres me that this par-ul Chinaman would e reasonable claim for nas against the author
the ake telegram.
On rrival at Vancouver found the place so attrace tit we decided to stay re few days longer than hl originally contem-te just to enjoy the vein the beautiful park
l te afternoon lounging
th beach, breathing the ndfully bracing and ex-rang air of the Pacific ea so different from the axig air one breathes on opposite, Japanese, shore the ame ocean, under the uece of the warm Kurowocurrent.
n planning our journey
os the continent we deed his time to try a new teso as to include the ea Lakes and Niagara ls
Fm Vancouver we took tin for Fort William, Lke Superior, where we baxed on one of the gelake steamers which ou not quite so large th Mauretania provide rly omfortable accommo-tic for passengers.
Th lake route seemed to me to be less favored by nsontinental travelers than one would expect and than unestionably deserves. I may have been mistaken but eeied to me that all the people on board except our party reical passengers. During the summer season the voyage down the Great Lakes though it takes a little more time is certainly infinitely more comfortable and enjoyable than the journey in the hot and dusty railroad cars. The extremely interesting passage through the locks of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is in itself a sufficient inducement for choosing this route. I regret not to have at my fingers' ends all the statistical data concerning the volume of the trade passing through this canal, but so far as I can remember the figures given me then by one of our fellow passengers, who seemed to be very well posted on these matters, the volume of this trade surpasses ever so many times that which passes through the Suez Canal.

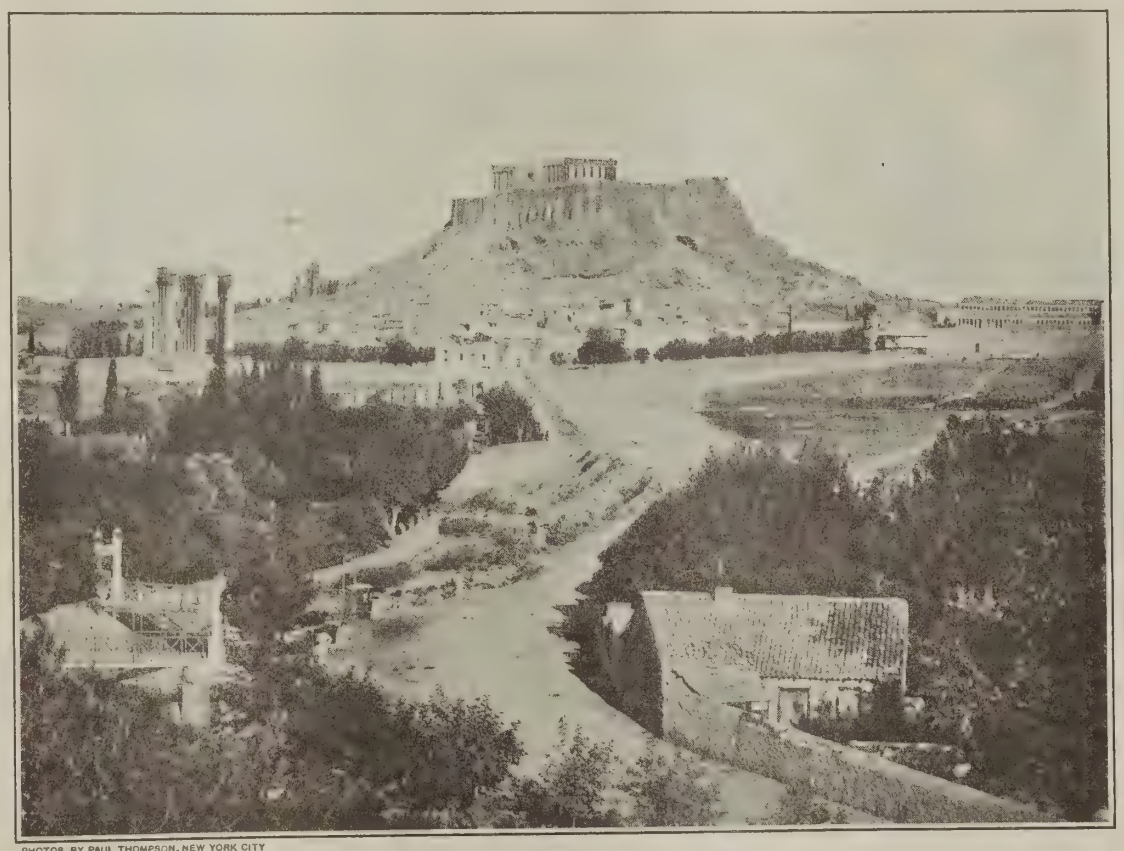
From Toronto we crossed over to Niagara Falls, where we put up at the old Cataract House, which had sheltered us many years before when we first came to America on our wedding trip. Here we learned that at last after so many weeks some kind of communication had been established between the besieged legations at Peking and the outside world, and that thus far all the diplomats were safe and sound. After a week's rest at Niagara Falls we went to New York for a day or two and sailed for Europe.

The Parthenon, Athens



PHOTOS. BY PAUL THOMPSON, NEW YORK CITY

Acropolis and Temple of Zeus, Athens

The Sentinger Gateway, Munich

Arrived at St. Petersburg sometime in the beginning of August, I found that Count Lamsdorff, the assistant minister, had been appointed to succeed Count Mouravieff as Minister of Foreign Affairs, having reached at last the goal of his ambition. He was one of those inveterate bureaucrats whose whole life interest centers in their chancellery, and to whom the outside world is more or less known merely by hearsay. A confirmed old bachelor, afflicted with an almost hysterical shyness, he had been leading the life of an anchorite within the four walls of his apartment in the Foreign Office Building and of his chancellery. Entirely wrapped up in the paper wisdom of his archives, of which he possessed a most extended and expert knowledge, he had been indeed a very useful, hard-working, conscientiously painstaking subordinate. That was evidently the part for which Nature had fitted him, and which he would have filled to the end with great credit to himself and some benefit to his country. But a puny intellect, a narrow mind and a merely book-and-paper knowledge of men and things of the outer world obviously unfitted him for the part he was to play at a critical time in the country's history.

That the emperor's choice should have fallen on him when it became urgently necessary to make an appointment to the most important post of Minister of Foreign Affairs was perhaps natural. He knew him to be a perfect gentleman, absolutely loyal and devoted to the throne; he also was aware of the fact that for the last three years, as Count Mouravieff's assistant, he had been supplementing the almost incredible deficiencies of the latter's knowledge of affairs, and he liked his humble attitude of a mere instrument of his sovereign's will. As misfortune would have it Count Lamsdorff was also a humble instrument in the hands of a statesman great in many respects but possessed of rather crude conceptions of international politics and of the way of handling them, whose strong will frequently clashed with the emperor's weak and vacillating will, without, however, being able to resist or dominate it.

The result was a situation upon which the Japanese were able to base their calculations when they decided to run the risk of an open rupture with Russia. I have no doubt that if that great statesman—I mean Witte, of course—had had the sole and undisputed direction of our policies, domestic as well as foreign, in the capacity, say, of an all-powerful grand vizier, he would very soon have found his way in the intricacies of international politics, a domain where, by occasional irresponsible interferences through the medium of a subservient lay figure such as Count Lamsdorff, he was apt to play unwittingly the part of a bull in a china shop. He would not only have prevented the outbreak of the war with Japan but he would also have averted the catastrophe which, with a statesman's vision, he foresaw, and the final outcome of which he was through merciful death spared the unutterable pain of witnessing, as was the cruel fate of all those of us who had shared his views and who had to stand by in impotent rage, seeing our unfortunate country being launched on the road to perdition and lastly pushed into the abyss of civil war and anarchy.

Count Lamsdorff received me with some show of pompous graciousness, congratulated me on the official recognition of my services, which had taken the shape of the bestowal upon me of some decoration, but did not seem to be greatly interested in what I might have to say on the subject of Far Eastern politics. Having already

(Continued on Page 85)

THE DOOR TO FREEDOM

By George Agnew Chamberlain

ILLUSTRATED BY CHARLES D. MITCHELL

"I Am Tired," She Said Evenly. "If You are Curious You May Call or Phone, as They Say in More Businesslike Advertisements Than Yours"

III

YOU can't," cried Mr. Blurt to Miss Livingston, reading a purpose to leave at once in her determined eye, "you simply can't abandon me now! Do you think I am so easy as to talk to these women without a stenographer taking down every word I say? Nobody need see you."

He pushed toward her a notebook and pencil. She took them up slowly, biting her lip in vexation, but a look of faint curiosity gleamed in her eyes as they watched her employer cross the office on tiptoe to a hole in the wall which seemed suddenly to absorb him. Without turning from it he beckoned to her imperiously, and at her approach he surrendered his place, inviting her to take a peep. So vivid was the vision of the outside hall which burst upon her that she drew back with a frightened gasp.

"Great, isn't it?" chuckled Blurt in a whisper. "Periscope. Take another look; study them well. I want your judgment."

Quite calmly now Miss Livingston inspected the three unconscious girls sitting in the hall. Never before had she realized how telltale is the human face at rest and how incredibly swift to put on a mask at the threatening approach of neighboring eyes. Each of these girls knew that the others had to turn sideways to look at her; none did, and as a result each felt herself to be alone and surrendered to every passing moment some intimate betrayal. Miss Livingston, seized by a depressing gravity, left the periscope and found Mr. Blurt sitting on one corner of his mahogany desk swinging his foot and apparently buried in thought.

"Well?" he asked.

"One," said Miss Livingston unhesitatingly, "is an operator of sorts, some kind of a paid sharper, I should say. Possibly a reporter."

"That's the one that's a bit sporting in her attire," interrupted Blurt. "She has a hole in her stocking just below the knee and her spats don't fit, but she's a hard worker."

Miss Livingston raised her eyebrows and continued: "Another is a professional manikin who has dropped in out of curiosity. She's full of L. J. Libbey dreams of the miraculous rise of the factory girl."

"I spotted her," said Mr. Blurt. "Red lip salve, beaded eyelashes and a pose."

"The third," continued Miss Livingston, unheeding, "is just a poor girl, desperate and catching at a last straw. None of them is what you want; if you'll allow me I'll tell Mr. Sutey to let them go."

"A poor girl, desperate," repeated Blurt absent-mindedly. "Is there anything on God's green earth more tragic than that? There was something about her face that I've seen far away and long ago in famine-stricken country. Have you ever been hungry, Miss Livingston?"

Deep color, half resentful, half ashamed, flooded the girl's smooth cheeks. "Not very," she answered slowly as though driven against her will to speech by his unnoticing sincerity.

"I have," said Blurt, his eyes still fastened afar; "damned hungry. I've tightened my belt till my backbone stuck out in front. Tell Sutey to put the sporting lady, the hard worker, in the lounge; that's the room next to this. The manikin of the foolish dreams should go in the drawing-room, the hungry girl in the kitchen. I'll walk through from here leaving the doors ajar, and you can follow on as the ladies depart, one by one. You'll find it works easily; there are screens."

Miss Livingston started to obey, and then paused as though still rebellious.

"Work, dreams, hunger," murmured Blurt; "three great words."

The mere fact that his heart could lead him to pick out unerringly those three kindly keynotes to the strange personalities beyond the wall settled things for Miss Livingston.

Five minutes later she was standing with her back against the door jamb midway between the office and the living room, protected from discovery by a high screen. She was an expert stenographer and while her pencil flew across the narrow pages of the notebook her wide eyes were almost entirely free to demand of space what manner of man was this Mr. Blurt, her employer by force of circumstances, or personality, or breathless insistence, or sheer will power, or a crying need of protection—she didn't quite know which in spite of her very level head.

Blurt found the first of i visitors standing in the cente the largest of his rooms making a shrewd mental inv tory of all it contained.

"You are Miss Mabel T ton?" he inquired. "Won't please sit down?"

The lady nodded her h but continued to glance ab quite cool and unhurri "Some room," she remar finally.

"Yes," agreed Blurt. "It lovely room, a model of its k Every living room should focused on some one feat Musical people attempt o sionally, to center on a piano, seldom succeed; it's alm hopeless to try. Folks wit home instinct fare better v the family reading lamp f pivot, but here you have so thing more ambitious. Can spot the note?"

"Sure," said the girl, as seated herself opposite h "The fireplace."

"That's it," said Blurt, face brightening. "Everyth radiates and takes chara from the fireplace. Its spaci ness, the rich but simple of its old brick, its inferenc wide embrace—permeate whole room. The rugs, couches, the deep seats and kindly shadows all bend to a sort of attending atmosph There is nothing cheap here cept perhaps you and me."

"What do you mean, chea flared the girl, and one could agine from her tones the sud flaming of her cheeks.

"Did you come in answe my advertisement?" as Blurt, unperturbed.

"Yes," she replied defiar

"Well," continued Blurt, "you won't do. You n have known you wouldn't do."

"Why not?" demanded Miss Trenton.

"Twenty reasons," said Blurt. "To give you one, cause you occasionally carry a small notebook in stocking."

The girl gasped. "How did you know that?"

"By the shape of the hole just below your left kn said Blurt calmly.

"And that—how did you know that?" demanded M Trenton, a touch of unaccustomed panic in her v

"So," said Blurt, "there is a hole there! My dear yo lady, don't think me a wizard, but the moment I laid on you I saw it was your business to spy out the land, nastily necessarily, but all in the day's work. From start it was easy to see the notebook and the hole."

"Mr. Blurt," replied Miss Trenton in a strangely dued voice, "you are right in all but one thing. I am agent of the Bureau of Injustice, never before so unwo of the distinction as I feel myself to be at this mom I came here on a hunch to spy out the land, but when ask me not to think you a wizard—why, I can't a to that. It would be too humiliating. Now, do mind telling me some of the other nineteen reasons I wouldn't do as an answer to that ad?"

"Do you realize how unprofessional that question countered Blurt.

"Quite," replied the girl. "It reeks of the personal is the measure of my surrender. In the language of bulls, you have bumped me off for the full count."

"Every woman," said Blurt after a pause, "will tell that she can stand the truth; God help the man that lieves it. I won't tell you the deep reasons, the one would hurt to tear out, but I don't mind giving you on two surface samples. One is that the woman who fits ad would never be in such a hurry that she couldn't 'advertisement.' Another is your spats."

Miss Trenton extended her ankles and stared at wrinkled and gaping spats as though she had not re noticed them for a long time. A rueful look, stran humanizing, crept into her eyes and drew down the cor of her mouth.

'Ve Americans," continued Blurt, "are bullied by standarc ed wares on the theory that what is good enough for the million is good enough for the one; take it or leave it. Bu unfortunately for you you have an individual foot wit its own intimate character and charm, visible at presnt nly through distortion. I have persuaded a New York ail r to make spats as he fits clothes, and if you will allow ne am going to give you an order on him."

' can't take it," said Miss Trenton promptly.

' see you are well versed in the shibboleths of convenio regardless of motive," remarked Blurt as he took out a lse-leafed notebook and wrote a few hasty lines. "If I we giving you only a pair of spats the matter wouldn't be orth pressing, but it goes much deeper than that." He laced at her with his peculiarly disarming smile as he ust the slip of paper into her unnerved hand. "If you ill wear them," he continued, "you will find that they ibe to your inner self as the fireplace is to this room, the e ote for an attitude toward life."

'You mean," said Miss Trenton quite gravely, "that a tt thing like that might wipe out the nineteen other ons?"

'Why shouldn't it?" asked Blurt. "Aren't you tired of e told that one bad apple will spoil a barrelful? We l e. Why not take comfort in the thought that the good ds just as surely and believe that one perfect article ar begets others? Clothes make the woman, my dear Trenton; never forget it. Man may shine through alls, but woman never; she lives at the exact level of ttire measured not at the cash cost, but by instinctive es."

'You men!" murmured Miss Trenton.

'Stop right there," interrupted Blurt pleasantly. "You en! A thought that's a little involved doesn't go in of your ears and out the other, it crashes and dies nst a wall of lazy negation. Haste is your individual Nemesis, Miss Trenton. You have never in your life had ir to get a man's point of view. What I meant by intitive values is that when a girl can't dress on the money h has it is generally because she's trying to dress some r woman, not her very actual self. For great Mike's a , take time to think. Do you imagine Almighty God ga perfection only to the orchid? To my eye the daisy n the buttercup are braver flowers."

I have caught up with you," said Miss Trenton, giving i the deliberate attention he had begged in the name of Mhael. "It all boils down to being the best of what you rely are. Time for stockings and hair and dusting your veet hat. You mean you really think I can keep pace wi the spats."

Mr. Blurt rose and frowned in concentration. "I mean iu that," he said as he crossed the room to open the door fo her. "I believe it because your foundations are genuine."

s she passed out he took her outstretched hand and lo ed straight into her thoughtful eyes. "You'll wear thn, won't you?" For the first time during the interviw Miss Trenton frankly smled, though with tremulous lip. "You know I will," she answered.

Blurt closed the door, called to Miss Livingston and passed though to the drawing-room were he found Miss Mallowe, maikin, seated on the edge of a formal chir and tapping th soft surface of the exquisite carpet with a slim foot that was more nervous than impatient. In that setting of Luis Quinze furniture, mellowed tapestries and chandeliers whose brass and festooned crystal seemed hung in the pale glow of light long filtered, the girl presented a vivid and repelling contrast. She breathed rapidly and was wilting almost visibly like an orchid suddenly exposed to a cold and unkindly air.

"You are not comfortable, my dear," said Blurt in a far different tone from that he had assumed with Miss Trenton.

"Not very," said the girl after a first startled attempt to assume a languid pose.

"You have taken the wrong chair," continued Blurt with just that touch of familiarity which says to the accustomed and discerning ear, "It's no use, kid, because you see, I'm on." He motioned to another chair. "Try this one and sit back in it. It's half an inch lower; all the difference in the world. Isn't that better?"

The girl nodded, straightened her skirts, displayed her moiré-silk bag to better advantage and with one gloved hand tugged at her veil to test the position of her hat. Her eyes were strangely restless and gave a weird impression of wishing to have nothing to do with the heavily beaded and immobile lashes above them. Blurt noticed this phenomenon and sat silent for a moment, plunged in speculations as to just how far deliberate masking of one's inner soul could succeed through tampering with externals.

"Don't you want to take off your hat?" he asked.

The eyes gave him a frightened look; the girl shook her head in emphatic denial. It was as though he had requested the commander of an elaborately portcullised and bemoated castle to let down the bridge and open the gates to sun his meager courtyard. Blurt knew that girls of this class have but one suit of careful armor in which they go out to conquer man and more clothes, and that only in its complete ensemble do they feel secure; his question had been malicious, to say the least. But behind it was a not unkindly intention to give her an impulse toward unburdening herself of all the predigested talk she had doubtless prepared through anxious hours for this momentous interview. However true may have been that surmise, words now failed the lady utterly. From behind their serrated defense her eyes called moist and despairingly for aid.

"Tillie," said Blurt, glancing at the slip of paper in his hand which contained his list of callers, "you know you're uncomfortable, but do you know why?"

"No," murmured Miss Mallowe, giving her surroundings a vaguely vindictive look.

"That's it," said Blurt, "you're getting it. What's happening to you has come to many a landlocked fish when the tide ran out. Girlie, you don't belong in this room at all. It's meant to evoke memories of an age that was artificial to the gills, an epoch of hair pompadoured and powdered, of beauty spots and penciled brows, of wasped waists above billows of foam, of the screening fan and the wicked tongue."

Miss Mallowe's eyes tried to look at her beaded lashes, rouged cheeks and reddened lips and at mention of a wicked tongue her own showed an exploring tip.

"I know," said Blurt with a gesture of his dangling hand, "but it wasn't the same, not by a jugful. The artificiality of the age that went with these faded tapestries was a thing long bred in the bone and clung to death and decay just as faint colors and fragrance hang to withering rose leaves. Some talk for an ex-contractor, eh? But we're paid to look at the big and see the little thing and that's why I can tell you why those mincing peacocks formed the wittiest community known to history. They were not unmoral, my dear, but deliberately immoral to the tips of their pink fingers, and in a world where license has no limits the tongue has an unfenced field. In other words, wit is the one bright flower that springs from any society on the road to the dungheap."

Miss Mallowe met this pregnant statement with a look that was not only blank but bored.

"And now we come to you," continued Blurt.

The girl's face immediately brightened.

"Against this background," said Blurt, his eyes hardening, "you are as crude as a Cubist outrage wandered into an exhibition of Watteau. I can say anything I like, you see, because you daren't cry; if you did and wiped your really lovely eyes your hanky would look like Pittsburgh. Tillie, why do you do it? Don't you know that men hate paint on daylight women and that that stuff on your lips looks and tastes nasty?"

"How did you ever find out how it tastes?" asked Miss Mallowe in quick and doubting wonder.

"Never you mind," replied Mr. Blurt unabashed. "You and I know that every woman is subject to circumstances, don't we? But we're talking about you now. I tell you

(Continued on Page 134)

"Against This Background You are as Crude as a Cubist Outrage Wandered Into an Exhibition of Watteau"

THE GREAT ACCIDENT

XL

By Ben Ames Williams

ILLUSTRATED BY F. R. GRUGER

THE matter of the check that Wint Chase had given Hetty Morfee stuck in his mind, disquieting him; this in spite of the fact that he tried to forget it, told himself it had no significance, that it meant nothing at all.

He gathered up the canceled checks and put them back in the bank's long yellow envelope, and stuck the envelope in a drawer of his desk. Hetty had not yet cashed the check; that was all. She would cash it when she needed the money. He tried to believe this was the key to the puzzle.

But it was not a satisfactory key; and this was proved by the fact that his thoughts kept harking back to the matter during the next day or two. When he gave Hetty the check he had expected her to cash it before she left town; in fact, his first thought had been to draw the money himself and give it to her; but this had been slightly less convenient than to write the check. So he had written the check and given it to her, and now Hetty had not cashed it.

It was characteristic of Wint that he saw no threat against himself in this circumstance. Wint was never of a suspicious turn of mind. He was loyal to his friends and to those who seemed to be his friends; he took them and he took the world at large at face value. So in this case he was not uneasy on his own account but on Hetty's. For Hetty had needed this money; yet she had not cashed the check.

He knew she needed the money. Her wage from his mother had left no great margin for saving if a girl liked to spend money as well as Hetty did. She could not have saved more than a few dollars; twenty, or perhaps thirty. Besides, she had told him she needed money. When he told her she had better go away she had said: "A fat chance of that. Where would I get the money, anyway?" It was this that had led him to write a check for her.

She had needed the money; she had accepted it. That is to say, she had accepted the check, but had not cashed it. Not yet, at least. Why not? What was the explanation?

His uneasiness, all on Hetty's account, began to take shape. He remembered the girl's sullen hopelessness, her friendlessness. She had been ready to give up, to submit to whatever misfortunes might come upon her. There had always been a defiant, reckless, fatalistic streak in Hetty. And Wint, remembering, was afraid it had taken the ascendant in the girl. He was afraid ——

He did not put into words, even in his thoughts, the truth of his fear. But he did write to a college classmate, who was working at the time on one of the Columbus papers, and asked him to try to locate Hetty at one of the hospitals. He told the circumstances. And two or three days later the man wrote to say that there was no such person as Hetty in any hospital in Columbus, under her own name; and that as far as he could learn there was no one approximating her description.

When this letter came it tended to clinch Wint's fears. He was not yet convinced that Hetty had chosen to—do that which writes "Finis" at the bottom of life's last page. But he was almost convinced, almost ready to believe.

It made Wint distinctly unhappy. He had an honest liking and respect for Hetty, an old friendship for the girl.

He did not tell either his father or his mother of the matter of the check; nor did he tell them what he feared had come to pass. There was no need, he thought, of worrying them. There was nothing that could be done.

The long lazy summer dragged slowly past, and nothing happened. Which is the way of Hardiston. That is to say, nothing happened that was in any way extraordinary. The Baptist Sunday School held its annual picnic in the G. A. R. grove, south of town; and everyone went, Baptist or not, Sunday-school scholar or not. Everybody went and took his dinner. Fried chicken and sandwiches and deviled eggs and bananas; and there were vast freezers of ice cream. And some played baseball, and some idled in the swings, and there were the sports that go with such an occasion. Cracker eating, shoe lacing, egg-and-spoon race, greased pole, and so on and so on, to the tune of a great deal of laughter and general good nature.

Wint Looked at Her, and His Heart Was Pounding Softly. "You Said There Were Some Who Would Watch Me—Lovingly," He Reminded Her

And the Hardiston baseball team played a game every week, sometimes away from home, sometimes on the baseball field down by the creek, where the muddy waters overflowed every spring. And Lint Blood, the hard-throwing left fielder, who was fully as good as any big leaguer in the country if he could only get his chance, had his regular season as hero of the town.

And there were a few dances, where the men appeared in white trousers and soft shirts and took off their coats to dance; and there were hayrides on moonlit nights; and Ed Skinner's nine-year-old boy almost got drowned in the swimming hole at Smith's Bridge; and Jim Radabaugh and two or three others went fishing down on Big Raccoon, thirty miles away; and the tennis court in Tom Jones' back yard was busy every fine afternoon; and the circus and Wild West Show paid Hardiston their regular summer visits. It rained so hard for three days before the circus came that the big show had to be canceled, which made it hard for every father in town.

And Sam O'Brien's brother caught a thirty-five-pound catfish in the river, and sent it up to Sam, who kept it alive in a tub in his restaurant for two days, and killed and fried it for his customers only when it began to pine away in captivity. And Ed Howe's boy fell off a homemade acting bar and broke his arm; and the Welsh held their County Eisteddfod in a tent on the old fair grounds, and John Morgan won the first prize in the male solo competition. Hardiston boys thought that was rather a joke, because John was the only entry in this particular event; they would remind him of this fact for a many years to come in their tormentin ments. And the hot days and the warm and the wet days came and wen the summer dragged away.

In September Joan suggested nic at Banner Caves, a dozen from Hardiston; Wint liked the so they discussed who should g how; and in due time the affair place. Joan and Agnes and t three other girls made the don arrangements, with Wint and Hoover and Jack Routt and o two besides to look after the fin end and the transportation. I old days they would have hire of the big barges from the liver ble, with a long seat running the l of each side; and they would crowded into that and ridde dozen jolting miles, with a good of singing and laughing and talki they went; but there were aut biles in Hardiston now, and n thought of the barge.

They started early—that is t at eight o'clock in the morni thereabouts. There were three mobiles full of them, with hampe boxes and freezers full of things in every car. And they made th at a breakneck and break-axle over the rough road, and reache caves by nine, and unloaded th bles and got buckets of water fro well behind the house at the ent to the caves. The farmer who in this house had an eye to busi and a year or two before he had pavilion in the grove by the and had begun to charge admi Besides the pavilion there were s and there was a seesaw; and were always the caves themselve the winding clear-watered little st that came down over the rocks feathery cascade and wound among the trees.

This day they danced a little i pavilion—Joan had brought a g ophone—and when it grew too to dance some of them went to about on the cool wet rocks o caves; and some took off shoes stockings, or shoes and socks a case might be, and waded in the b and some sprawled on the sand a base of the rocky wall and called d bugs. A pleasant, idle sport. The doodle bug is more s tifically known as an ant lion. He digs himself a hole i sand like an inverted cone, and hides himself in the sand at the bottom of the hole. The theory of the th that an ant tumbles in, slides down the sloping sides falls a prey to the ingenious monster at the bottom. T a doodle bug you simply chant over and over: "Doodl doodle up, doodle up." And at the same time you sti sand on the sides of the trap with a twig. Either the so the sliding sand causes the bug to emerge from his ambu the bottom of the pit, when you may see him for an ins a misshapen, powerful little thing.

If you happen to be an ant he looks to you as formi as a behemoth, bursting out of the sand and tumbli from his shoulders as a mammoth bursts out of the meval forest. If you happen to be a human you lau its awkward movements, and find another pit and another doodle bug.

Routt and Agnes, Wint and Joan, all four together vestigated doodle bugs this day. They had a good-nat time of it till Jack Routt caught an ant and dropped it one of the pits to see the monster at the bottom in ac The sight of the ant's swift end was not pleasan Joan; and she looked at Routt in a critical way. He Agnes seemed to think it rather a joke on the ant. and Joan moved away and left them there and clambering up among the rocks, and picked winterg and chewed it, and came out at last on the upper leve top of the caves. They looked down from there shouted to the others below. And when they tired of they sat down and talked to each other for a while. was one pursuit they never tired of.

Wint had been meaning to ask Joan something. It concerned that letter which he had received the day after his election as mayor. The letter had been anonymous; a friendly, loyal, sympathetic little note. He had torn it up angly as soon as he read it; because he was in no mood for good advice that day, and the letter had given good advice. He could remember, even now, snatches of it. He had wondered who wrote it; and this wonder had grown during the last few days, and he had considered the matter, and asked a question or two.

Now he asked Joan whether she had written it; and Joan hesitated and flushed a little, and then said, looking at him bravely: "Yes, I wrote it, Wint."

He said in an embarrassed way: "But that was when Conrad told me you would have no more to do with me."

She nodded.

"You tore it up," he said.

"I thought you would." She smiled a little. "But I hoped you—would remember it too."

"I did," Wint told her. "You said I had 'the finest chance a man ever had to retrieve his mistakes,' and you told me to buckle down."

"Yes, I remember," she agreed.

Wint looked at her, and his heart was pounding softly. "You said there were some who would watch me—loving," he reminded her.

For a minute she did not speak; then she nodded her head slowly; and she said, "Yes." Her eyes met his quietly.

Wint had been very sure before he asked her that she had written the letter; he had meant to remind her of this now, and if she confessed it, to go on. But now that he had come thus far he found that he could go no further. It was not that she forbade him; not that there was any prohibition in her eyes. It was something within himself that restrained him. Something that held his tongue, bade him not risk his fortune—lest, perchance, he lose it.

Anyone but a blind man would have seen there was no danger of his losing it; but Wint in this matter was blind—for the immemorial reason. So all the courage that had brought him thus far deserted him, and he said only, "Oh!"

That did not seem to Joan to call for any answer, so she said nothing; and after a moment Wint got hurriedly to his feet and exclaimed: "Well, I'm getting hungry. Better be getting back, hadn't we?"

Joan looked, perhaps, a little disappointed. But she agreed she guessed so; and they made their way down to join the others.

After they had all eaten till there was no more eat in them, there was a general tendency to take things easy. The dishes had to be washed in the brook; and the girls undertook to do that, Dick Glover found some horseshoes and started a game of quoits. Wint would have taken a hand; but Jack Routt drew him aside and said, "I'd like a little talk with you, Wint. Mind?"

Wint was surprised; but he said so. "All right," he agreed. "Shoot."

Routt offered him a cigar, and Wint took it, and they walked slowly away from the others, back toward the caves. Routt came to the point.

"It's like this, Wint," he said frankly. "A good many people have been telling me I ought to get into politics."

Wint had ears to hear; and he had heard something of this. But he pretended ignorance and only said, "I thought you were in politics. Thought you were linked up with Amos."

"I have been in the past," Routt agreed. "But the trouble with that is if you tie up with a big man you get only what he chooses to give you. I've been advised to strike out for myself."

Wint said: "I think that's good advice. It ought to help your law practice too."

"Matter of fact," said Routt, "they're telling me I ought to run against you."

"Against me?" Wint seemed only mildly interested. "For mayor?"

"Yes. On the wet issue. You know my ideas on that. I'm not on your side of the fence there at all."

"Well, I don't find fault with any man's ideas, Jack."

"The trouble is this," Routt explained: "You and I are pretty good friends. Always have been. I don't want to start anything that will spoil that friendship."

Wint laughed and said: "Good Lord, Jack, I guess there's no fear of that."

"I knew you'd say so!" Routt exclaimed. "Just the same, I was leery. You know what kind of a fellow I am. When I go into a thing I go in with both feet. If I run against you, Wint, I'll give you a fight."

"Go to it. We'll show Hardiston some action."

"I'll lam it into you, Wint."

"Well, I can give as good as you send," Wint promised.

"The only thing is," Routt explained, "I just want an understanding with you, first—that is, I want you to know there's nothing personal in anything I may say. It's politics, Wint; and if I go in it will be hot politics. If you'll promise to take it as that and nothing else."

Wint said easily: "I don't suppose you can tell Hardiston anything about me that it doesn't already know."

Routt grasped his hand. "That's the boy, Wint," he exclaimed. "You're a good sport. I believe I'll go into it."

"Come ahead. It's no private fight," Wint assured him.

"The only thing is, I wanted you to know, first. I want you to know I'm on the level with you, personally."

"Well, I should say I know that, Jack."

Routt thrust out his hand. "Shake on it, Wint."

Wint laughed. "You're dramatic enough." But he shook hands.

They rejoined the others after a while, and Wint was glad of it. He had hidden his feelings from Routt; but as a matter of fact he was a good deal surprised and chagrined at Jack's news. He had heard rumors; but he had not believed Routt would come out against him. It was a thing he, Wint, would not have done. It smacked, he felt, of disloyalty to a friend. He had even for a moment a thought of withdrawing and leaving the field free to Routt. But he put it away. After all he was first in the fight; it was Routt who had brought about this situation, not he. He could not well avoid the issue.

Nevertheless, he was troubled. The world that had seemed so bright and fair a month ago had a less cheerful aspect now. His fears for Hetty, his anxiety over her, were always with him, faintly oppressive. Now Routt's desertion, his projected opposition.

Try as he would to shake it off Wint could not rid himself of the feeling that there were rough places on the road that lay ahead.

His anxiety over Hetty was relieved—though only to take a new turn—in the last week of September. For Hetty came back to Hardiston.

Wint met her on the street one day. He was surprised; and he was immensely pleased to see her, safe and sound. He cried, "Why, Hetty, where did you come from?"

She looked round furtively, as though she would have avoided him if it had been possible to do so. "Didn't you expect me to come back?" she asked sullenly.

"Of course. But—how are you? All right? Where have you been?"

"Summering in New England," she said ironically. "Where'd you think?"

"Mother's been wondering when you'd come back. She needs you."

"She'll have to go on needing me."

"Aren't you ——"

"I've got a job in the shoe factory."

Wint said, "Oh!" He was disturbed and uncertain, puzzled by Hetty's attitude. He asked, "Is the —— Did you ——"

"The baby?" said Hetty listlessly. "Oh, he died." There was dead agony in her tone, so that Wint ached for her.

"I'm sorry," he told her.

"That's all right. I can stand it."

He asked: "Did you need any money? The check I gave you never came through the bank."

"I lost it," she said.

"Why, you must have had trouble. You didn't have enough ——"

"I went in as a charity-ward patient."

"Columbus?"

"No. Cincinnati. I didn't want anyone knowing."

Wint smiled in a friendly way and said: "I was worried about you."

Hetty laughed. "You'd better worry about yourself. Do you know people are looking at you while you're talking to me? It won't help you any to be seen with me."

Wint said, "Pshaw! You're morbid, Hetty."

"Besides," she told him, "I've got to look out. Mind my p's and q's if I want to hold my job."

Wint flushed uncomfortably. "Why—all right," he said. "But if there's ever anything ——"

"Oh, I'll let you know," Hetty said impatiently and turned away.

He had been afraid that she had killed herself; that her body was dead. He was afraid now, as he watched her move down the street, that something more important was dead in the girl.

It was at this moment that he realized for the first time that a man had been responsible for what had come to Hetty. He wondered who the man was; and he thought it would be satisfying to say a word or two to the fellow.

XLI

JACK ROUTT was as good as his word to Wint. Early in October he announced his candidacy for mayor; and he proceeded to push it.

In their talk at the caves he had

(Continued on Page 98)

"You Wondering What Kite Aims to Do to Trim You? Know Any Way He Could Hit at You?"

A PARABLE OF TRIFLES

By William Ashley Anderson

ILLUSTRATED BY HENRY J. SOULEN

THE company, having dined, retired to the shadowy darkness of the broad veranda, from which—comfortably fixed in cushioned summery chairs—they could look out across the water where the gray-blue veil of night was punctured by the yellow twinkles of ship lights. The sharp silver tones of bells, more musical even than the tinkle in the ice-filled glasses, seemed to strike upon their hearts, awakening strange thoughts and longings.

In the first fluttering silence after they had adjusted themselves they presented a picture strongly suggestive of a Whistler nocturne: the white blotch of a shirt front above which a cigarette glowed and dulled; a faint gleam of curving shoulders and pale arms; slowly waving fans and the shadowy suggestion of a servant passing in and out with a tray. It was a moment to be filled with the soft strains of an old waltz. The rich sensuous perfume of dew-soaked grass and summer flowers filled the air. All breathed deeply and tremulously as though they had attained the degree of contentment where all craving seems satisfied, yet a vague uncertainty, a vague longing stirs the soul.

"What a dull company!" exclaimed the hostess brightly. "Like animals, having eaten, we just loll about, contented!"

"Why not?" said the traveler.

"But how easily we're satisfied; and yet there's unhappiness in the world!"

"I think most people are unhappy without any reason at all," stated a débutante.

Not content with being at ease, human nature began to assert itself. It was necessary to analyze symptoms. It was incumbent on all to agitate themselves by talking about it.

"Otherwise the world would not move," observed a husband solemnly, banal but determined. "Contentment kills progress, but of course there are degrees of happiness. I don't see why people should be miserable. It's a trite enough saying that happiness is inside. If people would only practice it ——"

"Sometimes they may practice it in vain, dear," said his wife sweetly. Her tone made the others feel a sudden slight discomfort.

She was seated away from her husband on a wicker settee beside a stranger—one who had been invited to the dinner as a friend of her and her husband. This stranger was a foreign visitor of a vague distinction, fostered by an interesting intonation that spelled culture to the unsophisticated and impressionable and a reserve of manner that implied depths unplumbed. He moved slowly and listened with lifted eyebrows with an air of tolerant amusement that saved him from the necessity of much conversation and wrapped him in a sort of glamour.

"There's not enough give and take," declared the husband stubbornly.

The wife laughed gayly, flippantly, and the hostess exclaimed with affected enthusiasm: "Good! Now we can have some opinions on the rôle of woman. Feminism! Who believes in it? Let's talk about it."

And they proceeded forthwith to discuss and argue over all the points of relationship between man and woman that have been themes for similar conversations in all lands, among all peoples, for all time. They gave the subject a modern tone with a broadly exaggerated scorn of common convention by which they convinced themselves it had never been treated quite similarly before.

Finally, having described a circle, they came back to the husband's original proposition of give and take.

The traveler then observed that many people threw away happiness because they could not see it in the right perspective.

"That," he declared, renewing his cigarette, "is because of our state of civilization. Modern life kills simplicity and therefore kills genuine love or any other powerful emotion, because after all they are all related. There are too many superficial distractions. A boy may love a girl in the Follies, but it's not the same emotion as that between Paul and Virginia, for instance. You may momentarily hate a man who steps on your corns in the Subway."

"Oh, pooh!" said the débutante with amused contempt. "Corns! The Subway! The party's getting out of hand."

"Well," said the traveler gravely, "I'm afraid I lost a sense of the conventions in the course of the conversation. I might have known the line would be drawn somewhere."

There was a moment's silence.

Then it began to dawn on the company that it was the traveler talking, a man whose ideas were based on a very broad and diverse experience of the world and its people. He had recently returned from Western Mongolia, where his explorations had as their true purpose an inquiry into the political history and traditions of the nomadic tribes that inhabit the great desert belt extending across Central Asia. Having given birth to and supported in their conquests Jenghiz Khan and Kublai Khan it was believed they possessed grave potentialities. Some knew the speaker's reputation; others suspected it; therefore all listened with attention.

"As a bachelor I've always supposed," he said, "that the ordinary relations of husband and wife—living in constant and intimate personal association, where nothing is concealed, nothing restrained and every little trait and peculiarity of character is at last revealed—give rise to moments of irritation that may cause a terrible bitterness between the two. With those who are wise these moments of irritation pass away quickly enough; but to those who are inexperienced they probably indicate what is popularly understood as incompatibility of temper. Actually they are probably due to a pressing corn—my apologies to the young lady—or a sleepless night and a liverish morning. You know the saying that no man is a hero in the eyes of his valet.

"Well, this incompatibility of temper is not peculiar to misunderstood spouses. Anyone who has traveled any distance with a solitary partner knows that. You remember Bret Harte's story of the man who put too much saleratus in the bread—and it caused the breaking up of a wonderful partnership and ended in a lifelong hatred?"

No one answered.

"I suppose," observed the traveler, "that Bret Harte is too homely an American philosopher to be read much nowadays. However, I know a somewhat similar case that sums up pretty well what we've been talking about.

"There were two chaps sent out by a firm in Shanghai to make a trip to the borders of Tibet, crossing through Southern Mongolia, along the edge of the Gobi. The object of the trip was to find out the commercial possibilities of the provinces along the way and to report extensively on the country and any natural resources that might be exploited. The plan was to make up a caravan of several hundred camels loaded with special and appropriate articles of merchandise which were to be bartered along the way. The caravan was got together at Kalgan at the mouth of the great pass leading up to the Mongolian plateau, and required a great deal of time and preparation.

"The directors of the company felt an interest in the expedition that was beyond the ordinary commercial nature of the undertaking. Every single one of them was touched by its romantic nature. Some would have been glad to venture on it themselves if it had been at all practicable. Since it was not practicable, however, they took special pains in selecting their men.

"Robert Gay, an American, was one of them. He was a college man—traveled extensively, had a lot of shrewd common sense, a blithe spirit and a degree of refinement, as we understand it. He was essentially a gentleman. His companion was equally a gentleman. man was a Dane—somewhat of an errant scholar; bub over with high spirits and good nature, knew his busi as thoroughly as a Continental usually does, and wa familiar with horses and the plains as any Mongol. name was Janssen.

"The American was strongly built and had great en ance, while the Dane was lithe and active and until They were the best of friends. They had known each o for several years, both in Peking and the Treaty P where they had many friends in common, and as mem of small hunting parties that were often made up du the Chinese New Year and at Christmas time. Every agreed that no better selection of men to live alone months under trying conditions could have been mad

"Both Gay and Janssen were delighted. They m Shanghai before going north and enthusiastically over their plans, outlining the delightful times that coming.

"When they reached the dusty lanes of Kalgan found that the caravan had already been made up every last detail was complete. There was a party night of course. Everyone was jubilant, and the morning a small cavalcade rode up the pass in high sp

"It was a clear cool morning, one of those wond mornings in Mongolia when the sky seems to dissolve space. You breathe deeply with sheer enjoyment of tingling atmosphere; your eyes glisten; your hair acti seems to curl with the vital joy of living.

"The caravan filed away in its strings of six came dusty Chinese or Mongol boy at the head of each, unti line stretched away for nearly a mile. The clunking o camel bells gave music for the procession. Dogs bar the impatient ponies tossed their heads, gathered hind legs under them, whinnied; the Mongols grinned shouted guttural greetings or rode gravely by, mor piping on flutes; the camels gurgled as they shuffled thr the pebbles; and the few friends who had ridden out Gay and Janssen pushed their mounts close in, bant gayly and called out the final chin-chins. Unless yo actually experienced such an occasion you can't appreciate it. It is more significant in a way than a c tening; and more jubilant, I can assure you, than a ding. If you consider it, though, you'll see that it many of the elements of a wedding.

"When the caravan was well on its way the last fr dropped behind and the whole expedition coördina with a general feeling of fixed comfortable pace, com purpose and confidence in the leaders, Janssen drew pony alongside Gay's, slapped Gay on the shoulder exclaimed happily: 'Well, old chap, we're off!'

"The American smiled slowly as his eye took in long winding column headed westward and his thou went ahead to the days of delightful work and adver that lay before them.

"He held his hand out to Janssen and said delibera 'Yes, we're off at last, thank God! You know, I kep worrying that something would turn up at the last mo to spoil our plans. The thing that worried me most that they'd send someone along I didn't like. There a lot of possibilities, you know—Eccles, Dunston, H mond and several others put their names in.'

"'Yes, yes! We're certainly lucky,' agreed the D 'We ought to have a great time! As the Englishmen Here's happy days!'

"Chatting easily together with the absence of consciousness that comes with a complete mutual un standing, they over plans together cussed their nativ sistants; divided their tasks so that would not infringe the other; and changed opinions the country, its pe peculiarities of the ert and little trick which an old tra profits. For a they continued in fashion.

"That first week near perfection for who enjoyed the open life of the pl The practical deta

"The Two Men Stood Facing Each Other, Confused, Desperate, Their Minds a Chaos of Mad Impulses"

e caravan rested in the hands of the Mongol caravan ade and the Chinese comprador. For the rest, the two nit men accustomed themselves again to life in the dd! There was some good shooting and the red dust l sub of the rolling plains were still tinged with the t reen of spring. Food was plentiful and of excellent ne. The Chinese cook took pains to produce the best.
Te camels grazed by day and traveling was done at nt the caravan moving off at about one or two in the ng. These silent rides across the plains and desert a most beyond anything you can imagine. The stars nd flash like blue electric sparks while the great planets glow like lanterns. The air is thin and cool, omes very cold, and sends an elixir into the blood that s every nerve d with life and
g. It causes
ca reactions.
m travelers
rs into exuber-
t s uts; others ow lumb with e tensity of ir elings.
"A the long col-
n vings along,
d y and silent
ve or the soft ff and pat of mels' pads,
Mo golsuddenly re ms — the ea becomes a n., a high-old, piercing g at vibrates rigly through es lair. Flutes plover strange uting mel-ies The ponies ow ie dust from ei nostrils with go us snorts.
In he distance, er he sounds of raan life bem muffled, you n ometimes
ar ie thin howl
a olf, which ac-nt tes the com-rtable sensation harmony and ellbeing that rvles the peo-
e cthe caravan.
ne eady propulon provides a rt n stimulus at ves all from aging content-en

"uring these ight marches e lemn grand-r the desert and the desert night grew on Gay. His unreached out to the great eternal mysteries that seem intimate, so near comprehension in places like these.
he ttle shocks that recalled the trivialities of existence m imes annoyed him.

"nssen, possessed of more volatile spirits, took the des-t ls seriously. He knew it well. Its mystery was no or significant to him than the mystery of fire is to a cook. e joyed more the tattle of the caravan folk. He was erwhere up and down the line, chatting, laughing, idi, picking up quaint bits of information. It was su-rfial, though, because these people too were more or less monplace to him and he found no abiding pleasure in ei company, any more than any of you might find in the many of laborers. It was with entirely different feel-gs-profound feelings—that he drew his pony alongside Cy's to retell the tattle he had heard, for Gay was his mide.

"or long minutes at a time he would yarn away, interering with snatches of song he had picked up or showing ic some Mongol had taught him: how to spin yarn on the camels' shaggy wool raked out with the fingers; wo make a flute from the shin bone of a lamb or braid a hide whip onto the horn of an antelope. Gay listened a this with smiling good nature. He delighted in Jans-n's sprightly company and learned a great deal from s ance-flung remarks.

"mong other things there was a game Janssen played at first interested Gay keenly. Janssen carried a n's ball in one of his saddlebags. If dawn broke while e were still on the march he would take this ball out nd setting his pony at a canter, bounce it on the desert floor, catching it deftly on the rebound. It was really a difficult trick, requiring an excellent seat, good judgment, a keen eye and a quick hand. If he missed the catch the Dane would swoop out of his Cossack saddle, hooking his spur in the cantle, and snatch the ball from the ground as he overtook it. His lithe frame and quick movements made this an agreeable sport. But when Gay attempted it he met with continued failure.

"Urging his pony to a canter he would bounce the ball vigorously, but it would bound far over his head or he would be too slow by seconds in reaching for it. Furthermore, his short heavy frame made it difficult for him to retrieve the ball when once it rolled on the ground; and it was aggravating continually to swing out of the saddle and clamber in again, readjusting the paraphernalia. Finally Gay abandoned the game altogether after losing his temper once or twice and contented himself with watching Janssen. This, however, did not please him long.

"Janssen's swift youthful movements, his graceful hawklike swoops, the light airy ease with which he darted after the bounding ball, began to cause Gay a slight annoyance. By contrast he seemed so heavy and slow and dull. He even somewhat resented the implication his companion's buoyant spirits contained. When Janssen's pony rushed by in the first flush of dawn, the hoofs rolling dully in the dust and the ball sounding thud—thud—thud at rapid intervals he began to draw aside with suppressed exclamations.

"Roused from deep reveries, the trivial nature of the interruption annoyed him.

"'For heaven's sake, Janssen!' he exclaimed one morning, 'are you going to keep up that fool game forever?'

"'Why,' said Janssen, reining in, 'don't you know there's good practice in this? The Western Mongols play a game like it. They throw a sheepskin on the ground between two sets of players. The first side to reach it, then, snatches it up and tries to carry it across the opponents' line.'

"'The devil!' grunted Gay. 'You don't intend to compete with them, do you?'

"'Why not? It's fun and it's good business. A Mongol respects a good horseman better than almost anything else.'

"'That means they have no respect for me?' demanded Gay with senseless heat.

"'Oh, don't be an ass!'

"'Easy!' said Gay, restraining himself. 'Keep your tongue to yourself, if you can't control it—and your damned kid's game too!'

"A shadow came across Janssen's face. He darted a swift, indignant glance at his companion, but checked the hasty words that rose to his lips and moved aside. Gay, saying nothing more, plodded forward morosely.

"After that their conversation was constrained. Each felt foolish and guilty, but without a mediator they refused to yield.

"The next morning Janssen did not play his game with the same degree of abandon, and Gay felt a sardonic satisfaction in noticing this. Now that the subject had been broached, however, everything to do with that silly tennis ball became significant. Janssen wanted to play with it—and Gay derided the game. At the same time the savor had gone out of it for Janssen; while for Gay the satisfaction was modified by the knowledge that his companion resented his attitude. This created a certain defiance in his mood which increased the more he brooded over it.

"They ate their meals with longer silences between bits of conversation, and were stiltedly polite or designedly offhand in their conversation, as though they feared they might say something that would cause an outburst.

"Janssen now began to think over the situation. He decided that Gay's attitude was both stupid and insulting. His fiery nature suddenly blazed.

"'Very well, the cuckoo! If he thinks I'm childish ——'

"And thereafter he mingled more with the Mongols and less with Gay, and his conversations with the latter became more austere and abrupt. One day the caravan came to a desert inn where there were wells and a large building of sun-baked brick, formerly used as a yamen when the district had been more populous. Here they rested for two days.

"On the second day, while Gay was stretched on a kang inside dozing, Janssen in the yard, for want of something to do, brought forth the tennis ball and began idly to throw it against the wall of the building. The intermittent thudding sound against the bricks roused Gay. Unable to resume his sleep he listened with growing exasperation, until at last, unable to restrain himself longer, he jumped to his feet and burst through the door into the yard.

"Gay's sudden wild appearance, his face distorted with rage, startled Janssen. He stood stock-still looking at his companion inquiringly.

"Gay cried in a loud angry voice: 'Damn that ball! I'll put an end to that!'

"And he drew his revolver and deliberately sent two shots into the ball, bursting it as it dribbled along the ground.

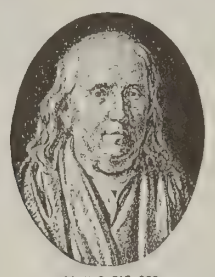
"Janssen was stupefied with astonishment. Then he almost choked with the rage that boiled up within him. The two men stood silently facing each other, confused, desperate, their minds a chaos of mad impulses. In a second their calm reason, their culture, their mutual sympathy and understanding—their friendship—were burned away because of a tennis ball. Worse than that, it actually unbalanced their sanity, for if Janssen had been in possession of a weapon he certainly would have shot Gay and Gay was equally prepared to shoot Janssen.

"All codes and conventions were forgotten, the sentimental bonds that united them were broken; they felt only

(Concluded on Page 79)

"The Cargo Was Lightened at the Villages Through Which They Passed and the Unladen Camels Sent Back"

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST



REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

FOUNDED A. D. 1728

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

INDEPENDENCE SQUARE PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, U. S. A.

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, EDITOR

By Subscription $2.00 the Year. Five Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers. To Canada—By Subscription $2.50 the Year. Single Copies, Ten Cents.

Requests for changes of address must reach us at least two weeks before they can become effective. Be sure to give your old address as well as the new one.

Foreign Subscriptions: For Countries in the Postal Union. Single Subscriptions, $4.50. Remittances to be Made by International Postal Money Order.

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 8, 1919

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST is fully protected by copyright. Nothing that appears in it should be reprinted without special permission. The use of our articles or of quotations from them for advertising promotions and stock-selling schemes is never authorized.

Drives, Drivers and Driven

THE law was off on November first and it is now the open season for rabbits and millionaires. Unafraid and trusting in September, the rabbits now cower trembling under the protective coloration of the brush. At night the swarming hunters gather in camps and clubs to count the spoil of their guns and to tell how the warier and nimbler bunnies got away.

Coming back on Labor Day from their vacations and from safety, with only one installment of the income tax left to pay, people were beginning to go about their business with something of their pre-war boldness. But now they dodge along from doorway to doorway, and in his office the millionaire cowers behind a protective screen of secretaries, jumping nervously whenever the telephone rings. At noon and night the weary teams gather round the long table, exhibiting their bags and lamenting that this year the game is neither so fat nor so plentiful as last.

The fall drives are on, the winter ones are coming and the spring ones are being planned. And they are being planned along the lines of the President's prescription of force for the Germans—without stint. No one who wants money seems able to think in terms of anything except a million or multiples thereof—also without stint. There are no pikers, no pessimists in the ranks of the drive promoters when they talk in terms of other people's money.

A good many of the professional promoters thought that they must be dreaming when they found how easy it came during the war. When they find how hard it comes this year they are going to wake up. The four-minute days when the public was pretty soft are over. The giver is getting to be a little hard-boiled; he wants to be shown, and properly so. During the war, charities for the support of indigent grafters, titled, near-titled and finger-printed, were common; entertainments that split fifty-fifty between the refugees and the ballyhoo boys were given almost daily; and bazaars that returned thirty cents net and a handsome amount of charity jazz to the innocent ladies in charge, while the promoters wheeled away the "important money" in pushcarts, were not unknown.

So far as the effect on the country goes, money given to a wasteful or unnecessary charity is just as badly spent as if it were handed directly to a grafter. This year a dollar must be one hundred cents useful, whether it is invested in business or charity. No cause is so good that it can sanctify waste.

Any organization that is asking you for money should first show exactly how it has used that already given to it and at the same time present a detailed budget setting forth how the new sums demanded are to be expended. It should prove that it is asking for a minimum, not a maximum amount; that an undue proportion of its receipts are not going for publicity and drive expenses, for salaries and commissions to professional promoters, puffers and solicitors; that it is not duplicating the work of better-equipped agencies in the same field; that its program is constructive and calculated to lift people up to a place where they can help themselves; and that it is one of genuine humanitarianism, not sloppy sentimentalism. We need charities that put men to work and ever fewer that support them without work. Lady Bountiful is one aristocrat who must lose her title in this age of democracy. Her giving has hurt everybody except herself.

The prevalent jazz is getting into our charities even. This "Hurrah, come along, boys!" spirit that is behind so many drives should be met with the Missouri counter attack, "Show me." You might better blow in your money on Broadway than to let one of the fifty-fifty boys have it, because that is where it will be spent if he gets it; you might just as well buy something that you don't need as to give it to some good-looking and well-meaning woman who will waste it on an imitation charity. If money must be frittered away it is pleasant to do the frittering yourself. Every man his own fritterer, is a good slogan.

It is the plain duty of everyone before giving to any organization to post himself on it thoroughly. It is equally his duty to exercise a certain amount of discrimination in choosing between charities. There are certain home debts that must be discharged before one is free to spend abroad. Because almost everybody is giving to a certain object, because friends and neighbors bring pressure to bear on one, because one is cornered and afraid or ashamed to say no—these are the three worst reasons in the world for saying yes, but they influence more people in their giving than conscience or conviction.

This year charity does not begin abroad, though it still has a big job there. Our first duties are to our home hospitals; tubercular sanitariums; children's societies; charity organizations that seek to alleviate distress temporarily while aiming to make the one helped a useful, working member of society; educational institutions, provided the money is used this year for salaries and not for frills; housing and slum improvement work; civic organizations that are genuinely concerned with better government and are actually getting it, and so on up the line. Out of this multitude of philanthropies that are pressing for his money the average man should choose a few, investigate them, concentrate on them, stick to them.

Wise charity will decrease, unwise increase, the cost of living. The latter is simply another tax, lightly imposed, wastefully spent. Also, when one helps an undeserving object he is keeping men and women out of useful industry where they are needed to make and sell goods. Necessary and well-managed charities will naturally demobilize every worker that can possibly be spared to production.

The time has come when we must turn over our foreign work to a few large, well-manned and well-equipped agencies like the Red Cross, concentrate under the big top and take the wagon shows and the side shows off the road. We are rapidly approaching the point, according to reports of competent observers, when we should withdraw from Western Europe altogether, leaving the continuance of such relief work as is needed to the people of wealth in the several continental countries. There are many of them in the larger areas untouched by war who should under it, and who have that understanding of their fellow c trymen that is necessary to make any help effective. final efforts should be directed to getting people in de tated areas back on the farms and into other forn productive industry.

American aid will probably be more needed in Ea than in Western Europe during the coming year, wherever it is really needed we should extend it in tional help-them-to-help-themselves manner. If Am is misunderstood in Europe, if Americans are dislike many Europeans, as returning travelers report, no could be more necessary or more sensible than for try to understand and to like Europeans. We nee turn the other cheek, but we should turn our best toward them.

We do not wish to minimize the need for giving, b emphasize the need for sane giving; to caution the dr to confine their drives to the plain necessities and the luxuries of giving go over to a more propitious The backbone of charity is not the spectacular mi aire. He will give at times and give large sums—if he i the reporters will get his name and spell it right. It i the easy-come, easy-go man. With him it goes easy for pleasure. He contributes oftenest to charity afte third drink—and the country is going dry. It is the majority that is overtaxed, overcharged and too ofte derpaid that is the backbone of giving in America. dug often and deep during the past five years. It is b ning to feel a little crowded right now. The reaction overgiving is undergiving. If too many demands are on a man he will often refuse them all, where a few erate ones would be honored.

A clerk was complaining bitterly of his wife's na him for money.

"There's no let up!" he exclaimed. "One da comes to me for ten, another for twenty and then she wants fifty—money, money all the time!"

"But what does she do with it all?" asked the sy thetic friend.

"Oh, I don't give it to her!" was the answer.

The men who growl most about the drives are apt those who do not give anything. But there are other are willing in spirit but weak in the pay check, an others who feel like putting all they can spare into absolutely necessary home organizations that have eating at the second table during the war or have turned away from the back door with a handout- charity for charity. It will be wise to let them follow inclination, without nagging them to do somethin Unfortunately, among the promoters and solicit almost every drive there is an element that is imp of convictions that do not square with theirs in the r of giving—busybodies with other people's philanthr They are open-handed folk, who could always sp millionaire's money to better advantage than he doe would always give more freely than the old tight if they had it. But they never have it. There worth-while charities in the world except those tha happen to be driving. They are the only authoriz cording angels of philanthropy. If your name is their little book you are damned. And if it is y damned, because the sum beside it is not larger.

There is little doubt that all the various organiz asking for large sums will find it impossible to raise this year. It is not desirable that all of them should. memorials, art galleries and similar projects shou over until enough houses for the people have been And some of these promoters who are always sayin it is just as easy to raise a million as a hundred tho should be shown that it is not. The organization tha for a million this year should be made to do a lot of e ing before it gets it. Only if it can actually show spective million dollars' worth of essential, prod good, not in vague hopes and generalities but in colo facts, can the country afford the expenditure.

Because charity means goodness and benevolen assume that almost any enterprise that calls itself a is worthy; that the mere use of the word and the d tion of a philanthropic purpose assure virtue; that rus·d to a charitable organization, even if we know t ose in charge of it are unbusinesslike in ordinary ir will be expended prudently; and that methods t ·uld bring censure and bankruptcy to a store will so e mysterious way bring good results in philan·r. It was because of this curious attitude that such ·palling number of fakes and fakers flourished during ·r; that so much money was given without any real ·sgation to burglars, second-story men and perfectly e but perfect fools of men and women who operated h name of charity. All that is not only a charge on in·osts, but on honest constructive philanthropy.

Fa·h, hope and charity—these three, with "Show me!"
ar mperative fourth. The faith that investigates be-·/believes is the only faith worth having.

Railroad Exploitation

N VERY plea for government ownership of railroads
o for their so-called nationalization or socialization er·s to be found a common argument, like a thread ro·h a garment. It is charged that Wall Street has pl·ed the railroads and the public is paying the price.
is rther implied that bondholders and stockholders are ey g upon the public. In the handbook of a very ·li· organization four or five of the country's largest i·tual owners of railroad stock are referred to by n with the statement that in case of a general trans·rtion strike and tie-up they would be directly respon-·le or the blood of women and children.
Bu precious good care is taken never to mention the ·t hat it is the investing rather than the shipping ·bl which has paid the price of past financial abuse and ·an ulation. Rates have been too low in this country to ·ak an argument based on the suffering shipper one to ·pl to common sense. Exploitation is such a choice·uring word that radical handbooks do not spoil the ·fe·t by showing who has been exploited. They do not ·in·charts of failures and receiverships. They never ·bute the investment losses. All stockholders, to ·er loll on private yachts, solely because of their own-·sh· of railroad shares.
N·turally if railroad capitalization was vastly in·t· and if the companies were able to procure rates
·gh·nough to pay dividends on ·e·s of watered stock there might be some logic in constantly shouting Wall Street exploitation. But there is just about as much evidence of undercapitalization as the other way round, and the rates are fixed almost entirely by Federal and state commissions.

Of course railroads have tried to establish as high a value as possible for their properties in the various rate cases, but the assumption that they have put anything over—broadly speaking—is certainly not plausible. The low prices for their securities during a number of years past and the recurrent periods of receivership are facts which do not fit in with the theory that the shipping public has been exploited.

At intervals of about every ten years a large part of the railroad mileage of the country has gone into receivers' hands, with disastrous effect upon an equally large part of the stocks and bonds.

As far back as 1874 one-fourth of the bonded debt was defaulted upon and as recently as 1913 well over half a billion dollars of bonds were in default. In 1894 no less than two and a half billions of securities were injured by receivership.

Whatever the causes of financial abuse and failure, the effect has been a large measure of actual loss to investors. These losses have fallen upon scores of thousands of English, French and Dutch, as well as Americans. In several cases from a quarter to a third of the stock or bonds of companies recently in straits were and largely are owned by Europeans.

Of the many thousands of stockholders in the New Haven Railroad not one, big or little, has received a dividend in six years, though this is the largest system in New England. Many railway reorganizations have been effected only by the writing off of millions of dollars' worth of securities once regarded as sound investments.

Whatever may have been the shortcomings of private ownership of railroads in the past, it is a futile waste of time to be barking at the owners and accusing them of predatory qualities.

To make faces at these investors and accuse them of being nonproducers, parasites and even worse is about as helpful at the present time as to blame a dead man for being the cause of an automobile accident.

War Savings and Prices

THE director of the Savings Division of the Treasury Department says that one reason for high cost of living is that millions of people are spending not only current earnings but savings of past two years; "Liberty Bonds are being cashed at a loss to purchase luxuries at prices exorbitant even for luxuries." Sales of Liberty Bonds on the New York Stock Exchange alone run near two hundred million dollars a month. There is no doubt a great deal of cashing in of wartime savings and a great deal of extravagance consequent thereon—all of which contributes its share to high cost of living.

"Work and save" is the great permanent cure; above all, save your wartime savings. Every extravagance now means not only the loss of that particular bit of money but an upward trend of prices that makes all the rest of your money less valuable.

You not only spend that money but set up a needless tax on yourself. Furthermore, you spend your dollars at a time when they buy only one-half as much as they would under normal conditions.

There is still, fortunately, the class of thrifty habits. The superintendent of banks at Albany recently reported that in the six months ending July first last, deposits in savings banks in New York State increased a hundred and thirty-seven million dollars, or about six per cent, and now stand considerably above two billion dollars—to the credit of about three and a half million depositors. But no one can look about without knowing that there is a great deal of extravagant spending.

Whatever else you do, save your wartime savings.

PORTER!

BLACK SHEEP

By WILL PAYNE

ILLUSTRATED BY CLARENCE F. UNDERW

x

AT A QUARTER to five that afternoon Louise's electric wheeled up to the curb at the side door of the Bank of Elsmoor. Ned Proctor had stepped out of the door a minute before and was waiting for her, obedient to her telephone message. She opened the car door for him and gave him a hand as he climbed in, but it struck him that she was uncommonly grave.

She directed the car mechanically back to Sheridan Road and turned south, keeping near the curb and driving very slowly; but even at that pace she had to keep her eyes ahead on the road most of the time. When they were finally set in their course she looked round at him very gravely indeed and said: "Ned, will you tell me the exact truth?"

It was a plea and he answered promptly, "I surely will, Lou."

"You said something to me a little while ago—that you were being watched. I thought afterward you meant you and I were being watched. I want you to tell me exactly what you meant."

"Oh, I supposed somebody was keeping tab on me," he replied at once; "probably on account of that old business of father's and so on. It might be the state's attorney's office, you know. My friends were trying to get them to quash that indictment against me—wipe it off the slate for good. Maybe they were keeping tab on me to see whether they ought to do it or not. Of course if they were watching me, and you were along—why, naturally, they'd be watching you too. You might figure in whatever reports they made, don't you see? It's nothing to worry about, Lou."

He said it readily, looking down the road; but somehow it didn't ring true to her. It sounded like polite subterfuge. So she replied with a more intimate impulsive plea:

"You mustn't try to fool me, Ned—saving me or saving anybody else. I'm banking on you." There was a little appealing cry in her voice as she said it. "I'm in trouble. I don't know what to do. You're not telling me all. I want you to tell me just what made you say that—just what you meant. You must, Ned!" She had fairly let the car stop then and was looking into his face, appealing and troubled. "Don't you go back on me!"

It was naturally a very disturbing plea, yet he tried to ward it off.

"Why—it's really nothing, Lou. Just as I say, somebody's been watching me—but it's nothing to worry you."

"But I've got to know!" she insisted. "I'm in trouble. Won't you? We're old friends. Ned, please tell me the exact truth! I must know!"

It was hard to resist that. He looked into her pleading face, his face perplexed, and said ineffectually, "I'd do what I could for you, Lou."

"I know something happened—something made you say that to me," she urged. "You'd save somebody else, but I want saving myself, Ned. Won't you—for me—please?"

It wasn't in him to resist longer.

"Yes, I'll tell you; you come first," he said. Then he looked down the road a moment, passed his hand over his thick hair and took another moment to arrange the facts in his mind.

"I've Been Thinking of It All the Time, Whether or Not I Ought to Tell You"

"There's a young fellow in the bank—Fred Perkins is his name. He's a good youngster and he likes me. Maybe his conduct out of business hours isn't just what a bank clerk's ought to be, you know. In fact, he's quite a suburban sport. Nothing very wrong about it or about him, you understand. But probably he knows more about the road houses and pool rooms over at Leedsdale than a right young bank clerk ought to know. It's about what I was doing at his age, only he's in the fifty-cent row instead of up in front.

"Well, Fred came to me one day, meaning to do me a good favor. Seems there's a fellow round Elsmoor named Hines. I never heard of him before. Fred says he used to work in that billiard parlor back of Macy's. He's older than Fred—thirty or more—and not much account, I guess. Over at Leedsdale one night he got to talking to Fred and another young chap. Fred says he'd been swilling quite a bit of beer. He got to blowing, you know—bragging. He told the boys he was a detective now—regular professional. That interested them. You can imagine it was a more or less beery conversation all round. Finally, Hines told the boys he was shadowing me. Yes, Lou—you and me. That's what he told them—in alcoholic confidence, he being all swelled up with the notion of his importance and anxious to impress the youngsters. Regular detective, you see—dime-novel stuff. That's what he told them.

"As I told you, Fred is on of me. When he thou over afterward he got th that I ought to know abo a good romantic kid, yo derstand, who wanted t his friend. So he did amateur detecting on hi account. He got hold of again when there wa beer in the conversatio pointed out that he wa good position to watch being with me in the ba day. He suggested th there was any suitable re in sight he might enli Hines' assistant. Well, agreed to that and talk all over with him in p sobriety. He didn't say was hiring him—only t was a regular detective a downtown. The upshot was that Fred felt per sure the other talk h been just beery brag, bu Hines was really employ a detective agency to me—and you. So then re came to me—to put n guard, you see. That' exact truth, Lou."

She had turned a bit and was looking str ahead, driving very slow

"I wanted to know, murmured. "I had to l It was fine of you to tell

"Naturally—it was thing I couldn't very v more than barely hint he observed, also lo straight ahead, for the tion bristled with emba ments.

"I suppose not," she absently.

He gave a little sig continued, laboring wit barrassment:

"Naturally, I coul Now that it's come out- see how it is, Lou. It worth your while. It means trouble for you. been awfully fine of mighty fine of you—c round to see me and s That's been fine. But y how it is. I'd liked to told you before, but nat I couldn't. It just n trouble for you."

There was the que Who had set a spy them?—with the humiliation for her which that que naturally implied. He was keeping as far away from as he could. There was a little silence, while she mechanically, staring straight ahead.

"If I let you in for—anything disagreeable—I'd to go jump in the lake," he said. "What would be the You've chosen the way you want to go. It's all righ you to choose. I'm out of it. It isn't worth your wh get yourself into a mess about me. It's a poor subje talk about, Lou. I'd have given a leg if this thing h come up at all. But it has come up, so we may as well it in the face. It's been mighty fine of you; but, you it isn't worth your while. Just cut me out, Lou. Sti the ticket you've picked out."

Without answering that suggestion she said abru "My father must have done this."

She obviously meant that her father must have hire spy. With astonishment he considered it a moment then protested.

"No, you must be wrong. You must be, Lou!" considered it again and flung away the imput decisively. "You're certainly wrong. It could never been your father. It's rotten enough to think of any doing it. But your father—no, he never did it. It wou be like him."

(Continued on Page 34)

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF CAMPBELL'S SOUPS

From Campbell's famous kitchens

Campbell's Beans are made in kitchens renowned through half a century for good food products. Quality is the strict Campbell's standard. Only the best ingredients and only the best culinary methods are employed. Campbell's Beans are the best-liked beans in the world. Hand-picked beans, slow-cooked until thoroughly digestible, are blended with red ripe tomatoes—a delicious, wholesome nourishing dish.

One size 15c a Can One kind

Except west of Mississippi River and in Canada

Campbells' BEANS

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

(Continued from Page 32)

"It was my father!" she repeated. "It must have been."

Incredulously, very much as though she had affirmed that her father had given her a beating, he considered her astonishing assertion; but as her father came up in his mind he could not fit him into that rôle.

"You're wrong, Lou; you must be," he declared. "You're certainly wrong."

"Why do you say so?" she asked.

He answered plumply:

"Whoever did that was a sneak. Your father's no sneak."

She recalled with a touch of bitterness that her father had not been so kind in his judgment of the young man who was now defending him.

"See here, Lou," he urged, "we may be all wrong about this. It's rotten enough to think it of anybody." By anybody he meant of course Lowell Winthrop. "It may have been just some sneaking busybody; maybe somebody with an interest in Winthrop, you know, and wanting to break it off—between you and him. Anybody can go hire a detective; doesn't cost a great deal either. Probably it was just some sneaking busybody."

That might have sounded more plausible, only she knew that her own maid had been hired to spy, too, which looked like a more elaborate system of espionage than a mere busybody would have embarked on.

"Forget that notion about your father," he counseled her.

"I don't know why you should be defending him," she said. "He never took much pains to defend you."

That was a very intimate sort of thing to say. It boldly put him closer to her than her own father and it made his heart beat.

"I'll tell you," he said after a moment. "I've had a thundering good licking. Plenty of people will tell you that a man no older than I am ought not to take a licking. I thought so myself once. But if a five-ton truck has run over you, what you think it ought to do to you doesn't make much difference. You're smashed up, whether you ought to be or not. That day when they took father down to Joliet—well, probably you can imagine it. I was pretty well smashed up.

"And then, after that—you see, I found out that I was to be turned down. I was out of it. Probably I resented that for a little while as much as anybody would under the circumstances. But it kept running over me. There was my father in prison. I was indicted myself—a trial coming along, when like enough I'd join him. It kept running over me. Finally, I just took the licking—I threw up my hands."

There was something in the electrified air between them which said that he hadn't really told the story yet; it was incomplete. He looked down at the crown of the straw hat on his knees and compressed his lips.

"Probably you know I hoped to marry you. That was what I couldn't give up. But it kept running over me. What business had I to hope that? Your father was right enough. I mean he had a right to take that course. By all the rules I was out of the game. Why not be a square sport—square to you, even supposing there'd ever been a time when I might have stood a show? You let me know I was out of the game. You had a right to. Of course if you'd cared—I mean cared really—it would have been different. But you didn't—and what was the use of sticking round and gumming things up? I took my licking.

"It's true, I cared more for you than anything else. I said I'd keep that, you see—not gum anything up. I'd be off on the back row of the bleachers cheering, with nothing mean on my conscience. I took the licking. That's about the way it stands, Lou," he added, as though he had made an admirably lucid, coherent statement. He looked round at her, continuing: "So I'm saying to you now, don't think your father put spies on you. That isn't true. I don't want that in your mind."

Her heart was beating at the base of her throat. Looking ahead she said: "I'm going to see you as often as I like."

"You're terribly sweet, Lou," he said helplessly from his end of the seat.

"I'm not engaged to Lowell Winthrop any more," she said, her eyes ahead, though the car was barely creeping and she was not much aware of the road anyway. "The engagement is broken."

He stared at her and heard himself saying: "Would there be any chance for me?"

Then she was saying, "I like you, Ned." And he noticed how the half-opened rosebud on the lapel of her jacket rose and fell with the laboring of her breast.

"You know how it is, Lou," he said, and choked a bit over the name that time. "I've got no money. It's twenty-five hundred a year there in the bank, and my mother to support. It would have to be a long time. I didn't tell you, but the state's attorney has promised to quash that indictment—wipe it off the slate. You know how I'm situated. I never loved anybody but you."

She was looking stonily down the road. He looked that way too—off into space as though that typified the void future—and tried to present the case candidly.

"It wouldn't be fair or decent. I'm mortgaged up to my eyebrows—my father's name and his debts to the savings-bank depositors—over seven hundred thousand. I'd said I might dig myself out of that at forty or forty-five or fifty. Then I'd just stand at taw, you see. It wouldn't be decent to ask this of you. As I told you, I've had a thundering good licking, so I don't want to hurt anybody else or get anybody else into that hole—you of all the people in the world. I never loved anybody but you. But it wouldn't be decent. It would be like sticking you in jail for twenty years. Your father doesn't like me."

He kept his voice steady and his eyes ahead and had an impression that he had presented it coherently.

"My father doesn't count," she retorted with a sudden passion. "He shouldn't have interfered. Spying on me is unbearable! I'll not stand it!"

That was easier to talk about than the other, and he replied earnestly, "I'm sure you're wrong about that,

Ned Proctor Was Waiting, Obedient to Her Telephone Message

Lou. He wouldn't have done it. The engagement's broken now; it must have been Winthrop—or some of his family that wanted to break it up."

At that she looked round at him, her brows knitted, saying, "It wasn't only this that you've told me about. My own maid is spying on me—in his house. I know it." Also with an idea of being coherent she continued: "That's why I had to know—from you—know what made you say that to me. I made up my mind to know the truth—and have it out. I'll not stand being spied on in my own house. Nobody can use me so. I wanted you to tell me so I could have it out. I'm going to follow it through now. I know you haven't any money, Ned. That doesn't matter."

More than her voice, which she strove to control, or her face, the motions of the rosebud showed the storm. And in whatever other respects her statement lacked coherence, the words, "That doesn't matter," were sufficient; both of them understood what that meant.

"Let me talk to your father about us," he urged.

"No, Ned," she replied with a decision as sweet as though she had fallen into his arms, "I must do it myself."

No great significance could be recovered from those mere words, but they were speaking of a most intimate thing—her relations with her father—and her way of speaking took him into the heart of it. Bride speaks to bridegroom that way. It was as though she had put herself into his arms, but he had not so much as touched her hand. And for an excellent reason. For some minutes, then, the car had been standing still against the foliage at the curb. Other vehicles were swiftly passing in either direction along the much-used thoroughfare. The occupants of those other vehicles naturally looked over curiously at a shiny electric car standing at the curb, through whose glass windows a young man and young woman were seen to be conversing. Merely conversing in that situation attracted sufficient attention; and Louise half mechanically started the electric again.

In that pause of three or four minutes under the eyes of passers-by a tremendous thing had happened and their minds were under its spell.

"I'm not going to quarrel with my father, Ned," she said after a long moment. "I'm going to find out—have it settled. You wait until you hear from me."

He had the advantage of her in that he could sit back in a corner of the seat and look at her as she drove.

"I'm mighty good at this kind of waiting, Lou," he said, and laughed in fatuous exultation. But his face darkened at once and he said with illogical but poignant remorse, "All the same, it's damnably tough luck for you—like sticking you in jail."

He felt that a heroic nature would never have consented to her making such a sacrifice as was involved in an engagement to marry him. But he was looking at her all the time, and flesh and blood—at any rate his flesh and blood—ruthlessly vetoed the heroism. Besides, there was no engagement ring.

In that situation there could hardly be anything really; and so there was really nothing else that could be said just then. As bride and bridegroom—perhaps provisionally—they rolled on in a happy, troubled silence, and in only two or three minutes more they came to the intersection of that street up which stood the little cottage where he and his mother lived. That he should alight there had somehow made itself understood in both their minds and she drew up to the curb as though they had verbally agreed upon it.

"Wait till you hear from me," she said as he stood looking into his eyes and faintly smiling.

"I think you're wrong, Lou," he urged anxiously—meaning about her father and the speed at which she understood. As he reached to open the door he added: "I wouldn't have anybody under me to anybody to-day."

She stooped a little toward him, her eyes aglow with soft light, and murmured, "I know!"

For a short moment she sat in the car looking after him as he walked vigorously up the street, with a fullness in her throat. Then she turned and drove north, the car gaining speed under her hand as she addressed her mind resolutely to the business ahead. She meant to know—and to have it out once for all.

Entering the house, she looked about her and glanced into the living room with a purposeful eye, like a general surveying the terrain on the eve of action. Going upstairs and down the hall there, she also took note of the aspect of the house. In her own sitting room she immediately rang for her maid and closed the door as she led into the bath and bedroom.

When Jenny Dupee stepped in, her mistress was sitting over by a window with a beautifully polished silver-bound wooden casket in her lap.

"Sit down here, Jenny; I want to talk to you."

The thin dark maid crossed the room obediently and seated herself, her hands in her lap, her nervous face—with little veins at the temples that somehow made one think of neuralgia—turned to her mistress, her heart beating fast with vague apprehensions.

"How long have you been here?" Louise asked in neither friendliness nor hostility in her voice, but only a level tone that expects obedience.

"Three years in February, ma'am," replied Jenny promptly, feeling relieved. It was the sort of question that might precede a discussion of wages.

"You know I will do as I say; my word is good," Louise continued in the same tone.

"Oh, surely, Miss Louise! No one would doubt that," Jenny replied, surprised.

"You are not rich? You would like some money?" her questions seemed more like statements of open facts.

"Surely I would like some money," Jenny replied, puzzled by this odd approach to wages. And she explained: "I can save a little. It is not much, you know. One grows older all the time. I have no one to depend on but myself."

"I understand," said Louise. "I am going to give you some money—a good deal of money—perhaps."

The little veins in the maid's sallow temples distended. Her eyes looked nervous. This didn't sound like wages.

In a composed voice, looking the maid calmly in the face, Louise went on:

"Somebody has hired you to spy on me—open my letters and so forth. I have watched and I know it." She paused.

(Continued on Page 36)

Solid Tires for Heavy Trucks

Frank Statement to American Business Men

We have been asked to give our opinion of the type of tire which is better fitted and more economical for use on heavy trucks.

Our experience leads us to advise owners of trucks from two-and-one-half-tons capacity, up, to stick to solid tires.

Our reasons for this radical statement are given below.

The Republic Rubber Corporation
Youngstown, Ohio

We feel it our duty to urge upon the truck owners and truck buyers of America the very great advisability of using solid tires on trucks of high tonnage. The simple facts, as we have found them, leave us no other course.

Heavy trucks, as they are designed and built today, are intended primarily for solid-tire equipment.

Truck manufacturers make it plain that their guarantees are drawn to cover solid tires. Many of them annul their guarantees if another type is substituted.

Their interests naturally are in the performance, the life and the upkeep of their vehicles in owners' service.

They say that in order to use other types with the same success and economy that attend the use of solid tires, engines would have to be re-designed; crankshaft bearings made larger; high-duty force-feed oiling systems employed; and gear ratios altered.

In addition, larger and stronger rear axles would be necessary, they say, and more powerful brakes; and spring suspensions redesigned.

It seems to us sound reasoning, then, that, with heavy trucks as they are built today, the wise thing is to use solid tires.

At least, business men about to purchase trucks owe it to themselves to investigate carefully the different types of truck tires.

A good solid tire is troubleproof from the day it is mounted on a wheel to the day when it is worn out.

It never requires a change. It provides a thick cushion of resilient rubber between the road, and the truck and its load. It does not call for replacement until the tread is no longer serviceable.

We are equipped to manufacture, and are manufacturing, pneumatic truck tires.

But, until the manufacturers of heavy-duty trucks change their designs, we will continue to advise the use of Republic Solid Tires.

In thousands of carefully recorded cases, these tires have proved that they do last longer—last longer, we believe, than any other solid tire in America, or, so far as we know, in the world.

This statement is not made idly. It is based on the results of actual service tests in which Republic Solid Truck Tires have consistently outlasted other makes.

They last longer because of the Prodium Rubber of which they are made, the extra quantity of this rubber in the tread, and the method of combining the tread with the hard rubber base, so that separation cannot occur and the tire is good until the tread is worn right down to the flanges.

REPUBLIC
SOLID TRUCK TIRES

(Continued from Page 34)

that statement with a quiet assurance that had the effect of forestalling any protest. "I understand it perfectly, Jenny. You are poor and have to work for a living and are getting along in years. The saving is slow. Why should you care particularly about me when you know I would discharge you to-morrow if you didn't do your work satisfactorily? I understand it. I'm not scolding, you see."

"I have saved only twenty-eight hundred dollars," said fluttered Jenny Dupee. "I didn't get as good wages before I came here. I am thirty-five years old. No one wants an old maid unless she has been long in the family."

Her startled eyes looked as though she might fly away and she spoke with a kind of swift breathlessness; yet she seemed to be meeting her mistress' frankness with equal frankness.

"Certainly; I understand that," Louise replied. "I'm not scolding or threatening. But you wouldn't have done that unless someone paid you for it. I can pay you more than anyone else will. You can make more by working for me."

She opened the polished silver-bound casket, disclosing a small top tray full of glittering things.

"Probably you know what these things are worth better than I do." Suggestively she picked up a jeweled brooch, then a diamond pin. "You know I will do as I say. My word is good. Tell me who hired you, what your instructions were and all about it. Satisfy me that you are telling the truth and I will pay you three times what you can make from the others. But I must have the whole truth, Jenny. Tell me from beginning to end and I will make it well worth your while."

That put Jenny Dupee in a painful quandary. She knew what she had been hired to find out—those things which her mysterious employer paid her seventy dollars a week for reporting. But she also knew something of far greater moment that she had not been paid to find out—namely, what she had heard as she lay under the lounge in the library when Mr. Dinsmore received his unknown caller. That knowledge showed her that the enterprise in which she was playing a humble rôle ran into astonishing dimensions. The strange caller had coolly mentioned two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Jenny's painful dilemma was as to how she could profit by her unsuspected knowledge. The idea of demanding a fairer share of the spoils from the formidable man whom she had met on the street corner was rather terrifying. The idea of attacking Alfred Dinsmore single-handed was more terrifying. How and where was she to find a market for what she knew? That was her dilemma. But her mistress' proposal suggested a market.

With a little tremulous motion of her body, therefore, and bending forward slightly in her chair, she said, "It is worth the pearls."

That suggestion struck Louise not with indignation but with surprise. Her maid was as well acquainted with the contents of this polished box as she herself was—or better. It held jewelry that she might wear at almost any time. The costlier, more rarely used ornaments were in a securer place than her dressing table. In this glittering top tray lay half a dozen rings, a brooch, a flexible bracelet, earrings, slipper buckles—all set with precious stones. Between thumb and forefinger one might pick up a marketable value of five thousand dollars, say. Louise had supposed a marketable value of that extent would be sufficient.

"It is worth the pearls, Miss Louise," Jenny repeated. "If I wished, I could sell it to someone else for more than the pearls."

That was a quite astonishing statement to Louise and she looked it.

The maid was bending farther forward, her thin body atremble.

"You said I was to tell you all—just what has happened and all about it. I am willing. I will tell you and nobody else. It is worth a fortune to me, Miss Louise. The others expect to make a fortune. They said two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. As I said, the saving is slow—I am thirty-five. It is a fortune in my hand. I could sell it to them. Give me the pearls. I will tell it all to you—every word. Then I will go away and say nothing to anybody else—ever."

All this was utterly different from anything Louise had expected to hear and she could make nothing of it. But as her blue eyes, round with astonishment, studied the maid, she believed Jenny was telling the truth. From the beginning she had managed the affair very much as her father would have managed it—with a composed efficiency; no outbursts or emotional displays at all, but a cool thrust at the heart of her target. Her father would have managed it very much the same way. She liked to lay bets on horse races and nothing daunted her at bridge. In a way Jenny was tempting her now into a bigger play for higher stakes than she had thought of in opening the conversation. Instead of daunting her it stirred the paternal blood in her veins. So she lifted the tray out of the polished box. Among other articles beneath lay a string of pearls—not a long string, but of fine, perfectly matched stones. She had worn it as a girl and had a liking for it. Its commercial value might be about twenty-five thousand dollars.

"You will say yourself that it is worth the pearls," said Jenny, and wetted her lips with the tip of her tongue.

"If it is worth the pearls I will give them to you," said Louise with the milky string in her hand.

"If you say it is not worth them you can make me give them back," said Jenny.

With a touch of disdain at whatever imputation upon her sportsmanly honor that suggestion might imply, Louise tossed the pearls into Jenny's lap and Jenny put a long, slim hand upon them. She was trembling, but she went straight at the business:

"It was about four weeks ago. A woman came here to the house—to the back door. She wanted to insure our lives—a very smart woman, interesting to talk to. She came three times. She made us laugh. Then she talked to me alone. She said she could get me three times as much wages as I was getting here. I met her over in town and she talked to me a long time. I talked to her too—about myself. Then she proposed it. She gave me seventy dollars and said I would get seventy dollars from her each week and a thousand dollars more when it was finished. I was to watch everything that went on in the house. I was to watch you—if there was any trouble between you and your father and mother and when you went out and came in. I was to look at your mail as much as I could and listen at the telephone. I was to find out if you were writing to Mr. Proctor and he to you and if you made appointments with him. I was to write it down and mail it to her every day that anything happened. Martha Woods is her name. The address is Room 641, Rosser Building, Adams Street. That is how it began."

Jenny drew a tremulous breath and went on with her recital:

"Then Martha Woods telephoned to me. She had arranged with me how she should do that—in case anything turned up—in such a way that the other servants wouldn't suspect anything. She telephoned me and I met her at the same place over in town. She said I was to keep watch of the library that evening, for a colored man was to call on Mr. Dinsmore at half past eight. They would be in the library. If I found out what happened I would get fifty dollars extra."

Jenny's nervous eyes questioned her mistress a moment.

"Perhaps you know about that colored man coming to the house. He comes every month and sees Mr. Dinsmore in the library."

She paused a little as though for an answer; and Louise, remembering the colored caller, said nothing.

"You know the big leather lounge in the library," Jenny continued. "I hid under that. The colored man came in and Mr. Dinsmore gave him some money out of a drawer in the library table. Mr. Dinsmore said, 'How is Collins?' And the colored man said something about his being at a club. That was all they said. Then the colored man went out with the money in a brown leather bag. I wrote that to Martha Woods. She paid the extra fifty dollars. She has always paid promptly. Then another man came to see Mr. Dinsmore—a white man.

"Mr. Winthrop came here that evening. He and Mr. Dinsmore talked in the library. That was right after dinner. They were doing something to the telephone. Then they went upstairs and Mr. Winthrop went in Mr. Dinsmore's den and Mr. Dinsmore went downstairs. The door was open a little. I heard Mr. Winthrop at the telephone up there. He said he could hear very well. I thought they had fixed the telephone so Mr. Winthrop could sit upstairs and hear what was said in the library."

This was the crucial point and Jenny hesitated an instant, but went on:

"I watched a chance and hid under the lounge in the library again. Soon Mr. Dinsmore came back there and talked to the telephone again and I was sure he was talking to Mr. Winthrop upstairs. Then a strange man came in. I could see a little now and then, you know, peeking under the lounge cover. This man had his hair brushed up at the sides like that dark young man in the barber shop right across from the railroad station. He sat at one side of the table and Mr. Dinsmore sat at the other. They did not say good evening to each other."

Jenny's nervousness increased and she was obviously tacking away from the main point as though her courage and breath had failed her.

"They talked some time—not raising their voices," she said, and bit her lip to keep it from twitching.

"What did they talk about?" Louise asked by way of bringing her to the point. "I want the exact truth, remember."

Jenny took a shuddering breath and plunged at it:

"This strange man said Mr. Dinsmore had helped to rob a bank thirty-one years ago at a place out in Nebraska. He said Mr. Dinsmore had shot the cashier of the bank and killed him. He said Mr. Dinsmore had been paying this colored man money all the time because the colored man knew about it."

Now that she had plunged, she rushed on with it desperately.

"He said the cashier had shot Mr. Dinsmore, too, wounded him. He said a doctor out there had atte Mr. Dinsmore. He said this man who was shot—the the doctor attended—gave the name Tom Wilson, an chin had been broken so he had a big scar across it. said they had found the doctor and brought him he Chicago and he had looked at Mr. Dinsmore and w swear Mr. Dinsmore was the same man. He said this who had been shot had lost his cuff button. The cuff ton had fallen out of his shirt and the doctor had pick up—at the time when the doctor attended him—and cuff button had the initials A. D. on it. He showed Dinsmore the cuff button. He said he must have two dred and fifty thousand dollars, and they talked a and Mr. Dinsmore said he would send him seventy thousand dollars in the morning and the man went aw Jenny's breath completely failed then and she sat her lips apart, her thin breast laboring. Louise's eyes grown even rounder and the color had washed out o face. She confronted the maid, a marble mask of asto ment. For a moment nothing more was said, then J plunged again:

"The next day Martha Woods telephoned me a Certainly I didn't wish her telephoning often or comi the house. She telephoned me—saying to Tillson, a fore, it was my cousin who had come to town. So I to the telephone and it was Martha Woods. She said without fail I must go to the corner of Elm and L streets at a quarter to five and meet a man who woul waiting for me there. That he was the man who was ing me the money and he wanted to ask me some ques and I must do it without fail and I would get a hun dollars. You see, she didn't say it in just those word fear somebody might overhear; but I knew what meant. I didn't like to do that. It seemed dangerous; she said I must, and I knew then from what I had heard the evening before that it was a big thing wi great deal of money in it.

"I met the man. He was waiting for me on the co He was a savage-looking man and I said nothing to about what I had overheard. He asked me whether Dinsmore had gone downtown the night before. I sa had. I had heard it from the servants. He had cha his clothes and gone downtown and stayed away all and in the morning Benjamin took some other cl down to his office for him. That was the day before ye day. That is all true, Miss Louise—just exactly as I told you."

"And this man you met—did he give a name? Do know who it was that hired you?" Louise asked.

"No," Jenny replied. "The only name I know is woman's—Martha Woods—and the address Room Rosser Building, Adams Street."

A moment later Louise asked: "Is that all—ev thing?"

"Yes," Jenny replied; "only the strange white man came here said Mr. Dinsmore had run away from I that time out in Nebraska. He would be, you see, a y man then—twenty-one or so." She hesitated an ins tremulously regarding her mistress, and suggested think Mr. Winthrop must have heard it—what this str white man said to Mr. Dinsmore. He was upstairs in Dinsmore's den. They had fixed the telephone. I t Mr. Winthrop must have heard it. That is all."

There was another little silence and Louise said: " well; there's nothing further now."

It was a strange situation for mistress and maid Louise's eyes acknowledged it, but there was no acknowledgment.

"Thank you," Jenny murmured in the manner of a trained servant, and rose and left the room with the p tightly held in her thin hand—and, after all, the pearls the great fact. She believed their commercial value thirty thousand dollars. Nothing else mattered because for her life's grand problem was solved.

Louise watched the familiar, thin, black-clad figure the room with the odd sense of its being a quite unkn person.

Absurd, of course! That was her instinctive reacti it—absurd and completely incredible. But she knew father did pay a colored man money. Absurd! Fe that she shouldn't do it and that she was acting in an reasonable way, she got out a classified telephone direc and ran her finger down the list of detective agencies she came to Morden Detective Agency, Rosser Buil Adams Street. So there was a detective agency at th dress Jenny had given. Undoubtedly it had been money that somebody was paying to Jenny and to the Ned Proctor had mentioned.

Presently she slipped out into the hall and down it t father's den. The door was open. There was the table chair—the telephone, which she regarded with fascin eyes. The room turned a familiar face to her and yet a completely strange. There, by Jenny's story, Lowell throp had sat and overheard what the strange man to her father down in the library. What her father said to herself and her mother the next evening ins

(Continued on Page 38)

STYLEPLUS CLOTHES

America's known-priced clothes

The big name in clothes

Styleplus Clothes

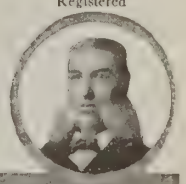
Trade Mark Registered

Copyright 1919
Henry Sonneborn & Co., Inc.

$30-$35-$40-$45

For 70 years we have made medium-priced clothes. In Styleplus we have achieved a great outstanding success because we have produced "regular clothes" at prices extremely moderate for real style and good tailoring. Conditions today make men more eager than ever to seek this style and quality at the moderate Styleplus prices. All-wool fabrics. Satisfaction guaranteed. The sleeve ticket, attached by us, tells the price. Clothing prices are sure to be higher. Buy liberally now. Buy Styleplus!

Trade Mark Registered



Henry Sonneborn & Co., Inc. Founded 1849 Baltimore, Md.

(Continued from Page 36)

upon coming back into her mind. He had said Lowell had found him in a disgraceful situation and so broken the engagement.

Her mind was full of matter so strange and bewildering that it seemed fairly to belong to some other person and she had an oddly uprooted feeling as though her life had been violently pulled up and cast into a new place. Nothing fitted in the old way.

She was back in her own room and noted that it was only a quarter past six—an hour and a quarter to dinner time. Her father would be coming home about now, and she remembered that she had resolved to have it out with him at the first chance—before dinner if possible—in case Jenny confirmed her suspicion. That resolution had a strange look now—like everything else. Jenny's narrative had changed everything.

She walked aimlessly over to the window, her mind without anchor or compass, going in its own way now. It was saying to her that he was only twenty-one or so at the time—hardly more than a boy. Boys get into scrapes—queer accidents happen in this queerest world.

His car rolled through the grounds and up to the door. She saw him get out of it in his usual vigorous way and enter the house; and she remembered that the last two days he had looked worn and disturbed, as though he were very tired or ailing. Somehow she felt a deep hunger to see him closer. She thought her father was the handsomest man of his age in the world—with his air of cool, competent daring and the subdued humor peeping out from behind it. So strong and able he looked!

Morden Detective Agency—a great deal of money. She couldn't really understand it, but she felt the dogs were biting at him now; he was in a great danger; she felt a deep hunger to see him closer.

When she went downstairs at a quarter to seven she was wondering how she would meet him, for the absurd idea that he must know what Jenny had told her kept presenting itself. She went into the living room and saw him there alone, sitting in an easy chair, his eyes on the rug. Again she thought he looked worn. Then something else caught her eye and her heart as in a trap—his neatly trimmed graying beard. By Jenny's story that hid a fatal lifelong scar. At that the whole import of Jenny's story flashed up as though it had been suddenly thrown on a screen theretofore dim or as though someone had shouted "Murder!" As though his beard became transparent, she seemed to see a frightful mark upon him, and a mortal danger.

She was near his chair then and he looked up, aware of her, with a slight smile—perhaps faintly wistful—saying as usual, "How are you, daughter?"

She slipped down to her knees, looking him in the face beseechingly and said, "I love you with all my might, daddy," and with a continuance of the same motion folded her arms on his lap and laid her head upon them.

Dinsmore laid his hands on her glossy head and struggled as though under a great blow, biting his lip.

"Dear little Louie," he said huskily.

When she looked up she saw with awe that tears were running down his face.

She snuggled closer and got an arm round him, resting her head on his breast, saying in a deep little confidence between them: "We shouldn't have quarreled, should we?"

"No, sweetheart," he replied. "It's been the bitterest thing that ever happened to me. It was my fault."

"No, it was my fault," she said, hugging him and weeping. "We'll never do it again."

That was the way she really had it out with him.

Yet at the dinner table amazement kept stealing over her mind, for he laughed, his eyes shone, he joked. And she couldn't help looking at his beard. Was Jenny's story a dream after all?

She had simply to give it up—for the present. And for the present Ned Proctor must wait.

When they were alone a minute, just before bedtime, she said in an anxious undertone, "Are you in trouble, father?"

"No," he replied, and kissed her. "You've ended the trouble." Then he said, "Why do you ask?"

"I thought you looked troubled," she answered—giving it all up again.

XI

THE twenty-eight hours that Dinsmore prescribed until they should meet again at the Consolidated Bank were anxious hours for McMurtry and Morden, yet hopeful—a brief time of trial with millions at the end!

Their chief anxiety was with regard to James Collingwood. Leaving the lawyer's office after the interview with Dinsmore, Morden repaired to Luke's Hotel. Such nosing about as he was able to do without exciting too much curiosity left a doubt as to whether Collingwood had been in the hotel since the detective searched his room the night before; at least, Morden wasn't able to satisfy himself that the man had been there. Never very conservative in his methods, he finally found his ally, the porter, and had another look at the room. It seemed exactly as when he had visited it before. The man's belongings were there, even to his trunk and battered old traveling bag. Presumably he would return. Morden then engaged a brother detective to shadow the hotel for him and report as soon as Collingwood did return. That was as far as he could well go under the circumstances.

"He may have skipped," the detective observed grumpily to McMurtry as they canvassed this situation late in the afternoon.

"Well, say he has," the lawyer replied confidently. "A man can't skip very far in two days. We can get him back if we need him." He twinkled over it a moment and continued positively: "But we won't need him. I've thought this case all over—every inch of it. We've got Doctor Dill's positive identification and we've got Dinsmore—absolutely! He can't get away from it and he knows it. Everything checks up. I said in the beginning that if Dinsmore had been paying blackmail all these years the negro's story was true. It is true. It all checks up. Doctor Dill confirms it. Why, it's so plain that Dinsmore don't even enter a denial. If there was the least chance in the world for him to contradict it do you think he'd have gone so far with us as he has? Not for a minute! No chance of it. He'd have told us to go to the devil. He's already paid down seventy-five thousand dollars in good money."

"That you pocketed," Morden reminded him illnaturedly.

"We'll square that, Jake," McMurtry put in hastily—regretting his friend's bad manners in rubbing it in.

Having touched upon this subject of conspiratorial honor, Morden was naturally reminded of the third member, so he asked, "What about Purcell?"

"We'll give Charley a good show of course," McMurtry replied, as though there could be no question of that.

"How much?" Morden asked with brutal directness. He proposed, in fact, to be a party to the settlement with Purcell—or, rather, he proposed that McMurtry shouldn't hold out anything on him in that connection.

The lawyer understood that and diplomatically swallowed whatever reflection on his honesty it might imply. Taking up a pencil, he did a little sum in short division and remarked, "One-third of half a million would be a hundred and sixty-six thousand, six hundred and sixty-six dollars."

"That's a great plenty for him," Morden growled. "He's got no more sand than a spring chicken. Half of that would do."

"Well, we want to keep Charley good-natured," McMurtry rejoined good-naturedly himself. "You see, he got Pomeroy's original story. That's something of a point, now that Pomeroy is dead—and our doctor may up and die on our hands any hour. He looks as though he was due at the hospital now. This Dinsmore's a tough customer. We don't want to send Charley Purcell trafficking with him behind our backs. If Dinsmore once got hold of him he might cook up something that would queer us for good. We can afford to keep Charley good-natured."

"Well, I suppose so," the detective assented.

"Certainly!" said McMurtry with conviction. "You see, Dinsmore's paying the shot; we're not. We can afford to be pretty generous with his money." He did a further little sum in arithmetic. "Giving Charley a hundred and sixty-six thousand, six hundred and sixty-six dollars will leave eight hundred and thirty-three thousand, three hundred and thirty-three for you and me to divide."

"Seventy-five thousand out of yours," Morden reminded him ruthlessly.

Ignoring that exhibition of bad manners, McMurtry continued: "Out of the first million. There'll be another million pretty soon."

He contemplated the figures with a sort of fascination, an avid glow rising in his mind; a grin overspread his swarthy face and there was an uncanny glee in his chuckle.

"Lord, man, there's a killing for you!" he exulted. "It's a bear cat!"

Morden realized all that as much as his friend did; but in his mind there was a firm determination not to be done at any point by this same friend. He proposed to take a hand in all the settlements, so, with no outward response to his friend's exultant outburst, he said: "We may as well get Purcell over here. He'll want to know how it's going anyway."

Again McMurtry quite understood his motive; but, in fact, he had been wanting to get rid of Morden in order to have a talk with Purcell, for the managing editor had been kept in the dark and put off with brief cryptic telephone messages as long as it was safe. Charley must be kept good-natured. So to Morden's suggestion he assented with a cheerful, "All right," and reached for the telephone.

Before using the instrument, however, he reflected a moment and asked, "What would we best tell him?"

"Tell him Dinsmore's coming through with half a million day after to-morrow," the detective replied promptly.

"I don't believe we best make it quite as positive as that," said McMurtry thoughtfully, hand on telephone. "We'll tell him about what has happened and that Dinsmore's hooked—sure—and we've struck for half a million and he's asked till day after to-morrow to raise the money."

"Well," Morden assented in grumpy indifference to the finer details.

So McMurtry telephoned and about fifteen minutes l the gaunt managing editor of the Leader entered the room—in a ner state after many hours of suspense and conflicting h fears and suspicions. To him the lawyer affably and c ingly explained the situation as he and Morden had ag Purcell listened, once or twice wetting his dry lips wit tip of his tongue, once shaving them with his bent finger, and all the while with wavering lights playing i depths of his cavernous brown eyes. Of course he ha accept their statement, but there was a persistent le misgiving in his heart. He knew he was pretty compl in their hands and he didn't really trust them.

"It's a sure thing, Charley—a bear cat!" McMu repeated in pursuit of his duty of heartening his lumpy partners in crime. "At this time day afte morrow you'll be a rich man. Meanwhile just sit tight

There was obviously nothing else to do, and on the back to the newspaper office Purcell heartened him They couldn't double cross him; he knew as much o affair as they did; they'd got to give him a share o money. Holding to that assurance, he waited a nerve-racking time, with nothing whatever happenin of the usual mechanical routine, and no sign anywhere a great drama in which he was cast for the rôle of a man was shaping itself—until twenty-five minute three the next afternoon. Then he received a star telephone call.

McMurtry and Morden waited also with nothing pening—especially, as Morden's shadow reported, wit sign of James Collingwood at Luke's Hotel. That vexing, yet McMurtry insisted that they didn't really him and if they should need him they could find him.

Three o'clock was the hour. They both consulted watches twice or thrice as that hour drew near. At minutes to three they were walking down La Salle St as innocent looking to the casual eye as any other pedestrians on that thronged, bustling street. The clock on the Board of Trade tower showed two minut three when they reached the beetling Consolidated Building that loomed far overhead. They paused a ute—not to seem overanxious—then passed through glass doors into the marble lobby. Wide marble straight ahead led up into the main banking room, Dinsmore had said they would meet in the safe de vaults, so they took the narrower stairs which led d ward at the right.

Just beyond the foot of the stairs mighty bars of ished steel reaching from floor to ceiling and wall to confronted them. Beyond this formidable barrier la safe-deposit vault proper, with huge steel doors a glimpse of the serried rows of lacquered boxes. A g in the gray uniform and stiff cap of the bank's private stabulary force stood at the ponderous gate in the ba Another guard in like uniform stood near, and approa the visitors with an inquiring look when they halted

"We're looking for Mr. Dinsmore," said the lawye

"Yes, sir," said the guard consulting a little card palm of his hand. "Mr. McMurtry and Mr. Morden

"Yes," replied the lawyer.

"This way, please; Mr. Dinsmore is waiting for said the guard in a way which implied that it was a honor to be waited for by Mr. Dinsmore and very ki Mr. Dinsmore to be waiting.

He led them away from the steel barrier and throu anteroom from which opened a number of parlors sui for snug business conferences—parlors of various two or three in which half a dozen people might gathe two in which twenty or more might be accommodate visitors in an uneasy frame of mind it was not a very c ful place. In spite of sedately handsome furnishin looked too cold and tight and steely and closely gua vaguely suggesting a place that might be easy to get but exceedingly difficult to get out of.

The guard led them to the closed door of one o smaller parlors, opened it and stood aside for the enter—with an official smile and slight nod. Steppir they saw a snug, square room with low ceiling, grave cold in tone, the walls painted a steely gray, a gray r the cement floor, a severe but highly polished oak t several chairs. Their eyes took in an impression of i an impression that it was empty. But at the next they saw two men standing over at the right so tha opened door hid them from anyone on the thres Evidently the men had been engaged in conversation at the opening of the door had paused, turning their that way.

McMurtry, who was ahead, saw them; then Mo and from that instant neither of them had eyes or wit anything else.

One of the men was the lean, big-handed, big-f managing editor of the Leader. The other man was A Dinsmore, clean shaven, presenting a chin as smooth scarless as any in the room. It was Dinsmore who f broke the thrilled silence.

"Of course you lied to me about not having an ciate," he said coolly. "I knew that. You lied to this too. You lied to each other. You rogues that can't

(Continued on Page 181)

THE STANDARD OF THE WORLD

CONFERENCE among Cadillac engineers, designers, and craftsmen has been continuous over a long period of years.

It begins anew each morning, with the one unchanging thought of bringing the car to a higher degree of positiveness and certainty.

There is not so much as a nut or a bolt in its construction that has not passed under rigid scrutiny times without number.

Every Cadillac which leaves production is like every other in the application of these principles—excepting that the process of improvement is continuous.

When some other car has engaged the same skill over the same long period—then, and not till then, can there be another car comparable to the Cadillac in reliability.

CADILLAC MOTOR CAR COMPANY, DETROIT, MICH

CADILLAC
STANDARD OF THE WORLD

EVERYBODY'S BUSINES

By FLOYD W. PARSONS

On Benches in the Park

IN THE very heart of New York City and occupying the same block are two things—a park and a library. The park is one of the smallest in the town; the library is one of the greatest marble monuments to knowledge that were ever erected by man. In the big building are hundreds of rooms with thousands of people searching for hidden truths. In one room are hopeful young artists trying to reproduce the master paintings that hang on the wall. In another room are little children listening in wonder to a silver-haired fairy godmother who comes there day after day to entertain them with wonderful stories of gallant knights who rescue beautiful ladies from robber chiefs.

In the library everyone is busy. In front of the building is the chief avenue of fashion of the whole nation. Back of the library is the little park. It contains just two kinds of idle people—those who have slipped over there for a little well-earned rest in the fresh air and those who are without employment and often without homes or friends. Some weeks ago several business men were sitting by a club window that overlooks the park. The subject under discussion was the scarcity of certain kinds of labor.

"Have you noticed the faces of some of the unemployed who sit over there on the benches?" said one.

"Can there be any possible excuse for men being idle to-day?" said another.

This started me thinking and I recalled that many times while crossing the park I had been tempted to stop and chat with some of the characters who often occupied the benches. Sometimes I had seen a face that appeared out of place above ragged clothes and torn shoes. Frequently I had noted a physique that seemed to be built for service in a steel mill or a shipbuilding plant rather than for duty in the ranks of our city loafers.

I asked myself, "Has not every town a park with benches? Is this not a national problem and are not the causes everywhere the same? Are we only interested in success, and is failure a matter of no concern to us?"

As a result of such thoughts I decided to investigate. Day after day I picked one or more of the park subjects. A few were noncommittal; several told what were evidently exaggerated tales or deliberate lies; many had no story worth repeating—they were idle because they were just plain lazy. But let me save my summation for the end of the story and proceed to tell of the cases I met.

First, there was the foreigner. Last Christmas night the man's wife died of influenza, leaving five forlorn little girls. At the time of the tragedy he himself was in the hospital suffering from pneumonia. Olga, the oldest child, then eleven, became mother to the family. Somehow she managed to wash, cook, clean and sew for six people. The father had never wholly recovered from his illness. He was melancholy and tried to commit suicide, but the police came in time and again took him to the hospital where the doctors saved his life—much to his disgust. The man was without a trade, and because of his weakened physical condition could not hold the hard manual jobs he obtained. For him the outlook was blue, and I found many others like him who had been landed on the park benches by those twin demons—sickness and death.

Then there was the bitter old man who in his youth during an Indian uprising had been appealed to by an officer of the United States Army for money to assist in keeping the soldiers in the field to protect the community against the warring redskins. The Army needed hay, grain and other kinds of feed, as well as funds to defray the cost of transporting supplies. The young man gave the officer three thousand dollars, practically all his savings, and still holds a voucher for the loan.

Of course the old man's loss occurred through a technicality of the law. The Government has ruled that only by an act of Congress can any claim be paid after the expiration of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. In this case the numerous delays incident to frontier conditions prevented the presentation of the voucher until after the fiscal year had ended. Then the lender was told that only special legislation could help him. No one has ever denied the justice of his claim, but each time a bill was presented some congressman would object and that was always fatal. Said the old man: "Many others like myself have suffered from such a system. Most of us are now old and poor. Perhaps redress will come—too late."

Next was a strange type. He could hardly be placed in a class. More than a decade ago this man had been a member of a famous party of explorers in Egypt and the Orient. The study of ancient civilizations had absorbed all his time and thought. For ten years this person had devoted his winters to lecturing before schools and clubs and often filling in on a regular lyceum or Chautauqua circuit. Unfortunately his compensation for lectures on the Holy Land and the Far East was just sufficient to pay current expenses, and each summer he had started the idle season with practically nothing to carry him through until fall. During the warm months he did anything that came to hand. Among his summer occupations was dishwashing, but he did not relish this work because of the rude manners and coarse talk of his associate workers. Nothing could persuade the man to accept a steady job. The lecture game had him, and this winter he expects to make a great hit with his new lecture that "will be better than anything done before."

The park holds many members of one class—the dreamers. There is no difference in their basic methods, their hopes or their prospects. The only variation lies in the trivial detail of their similar stories. They are slaves of their imag and their ideas froth on the se
They are gener fined to failure too much ton too little juc
One such liste eleven totally ventures he h engaged upon
than four years.
he had been u
stand the strai
ting a positi slowly working up. He cam landing a for promoting the opment of a n in photography
he had a grea
in the way of structible stop bottles. Then a freak autom puncture-proof revolutionary company adv
a riding and sw school project
ciety buds, an posed business course in inc psychology. J present my fri
on the call li number of m picture studios quently played ing part in mob
In the meantin expecting to pr great movie c that will prod
tures of a ki
grade that hav been shown.

COPYRIGHT BY UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD, NEW YORK CITY

Back of the Library is the Little Park Which Contains Just Two Kinds of People discovered just what the moving-picture busines and is confident that "next week the final obstruct his plan will be removed and the bankers will all co

Many were the impractical dreamers I met on the b

The other afternoon I crossed the park when raining. My umbrella was up and I was hurrying avoiding the puddles. The benches were all desert
one. There sat a solitary figure, clad in rags, uns dirty and wholly unconscious of the wet. I st made friends and asked if I could be of any help.
some encouragement the man's story was told.

He came from a Christian home and after a good tion arranged to read law. He had begun to drink already at eighteen. At twenty-three his family dis him. One year later he had reached the Bowery i York and a few months after this was confined to an asylum as a dipsomaniac. Shortly after his releas the asylum he was arrested for stealing and sent to though the lawyers tried to point out his irrespons
He had been out of prison one month. For the fi weeks he had tried to start straight, but his cr record was against him. Then he got drunk and for days had been "carrying the banner" in the back r a Bowery saloon. For all those days the man ha living on hot rum and pea soup, sleeping with his h
the table and going without a bath or a shave.

On the previous night he had suddenly been s
by the death of his pal, who dropped dead besi and was carried to a pauper's grave. That morn had gone over to the Bowery Y. M. C. A. to get a p stamp to write a friend for money. There he met Hickey, an old pal of his former days. Mike begge to try religion as a last resort, and he had come promising to think it over. Here in the park, unshe from the rain, this man had been wrestling with the lem that confronted him. Could he make good?
there still any chance for him? A hundred dim and ing hopes fought against the cry for more liquor.
here the reader may know that wartime prohibition traveled far on New York's Bowery. At any rate, lowed this story out of the park and met Mike F and his associates, who are grabbing hundreds of unh despairing men from the Slough of Despond. The

(Continued on Page 42)

YOU are to be congratulated if you have decided to order your Pathé Phonograph for Christmas right now——congratulated because you will be able to give, or own, the world's most distinguished music-maker, and because you have realized that it's action that is needed, not good intentions, if you are going to get it ahead of some other Santa Claus!

Pathé

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

COSTS NO MORE THAN THE ORDINARY

PHONOGRAPH

Various Models
$45.00 to $1000

Latest Hits—FIRST on Pathé Records

Pathé Freres Phonograph Co. of Canada, Ltd. Toronto

PATHÉ FRÈRES PHONOGRAPH COMPANY
BROOKLYN, N. Y. 81 City Road, London, E. C., 1, Eng.

E. A. WIDMANN, President

(Continued from Page 40)

looks very much brighter for my park acquaintance, who—I am told—has started his new life in dead earnest.

Many are the bums and beggars one meets in a city park. Without attempting wholly to dissipate the reader's sympathy for this class, because of the exceptional ones that are deserving, I must confess that I found the professional tramp a worthless creature. One day I stopped to watch a character of this type who had succeeded in collecting a nickel from a passer-by. The man was quite dirty, but appeared to be healthy and strong. After getting the coin he slipped across from the park and entered one of these nickel-in-the-slot restaurants. I followed and watched him while he debated whether he should get rolls or coffee. Finally coffee won. I went over and gave him a quarter. He got it changed to nickels, used one to get rolls and put the remaining four in his pocket as surety for another meal. When I asked him how he found the outlook for work he replied that it was very good—he managed to get a couple of hours' employment every day or so. But what worried him was the high cost of living. Said he: "Prices are sure scandalous just now. Only a little while ago I could get a good bed and a dinner at several places for 15 cents; now the same thing costs me 30."

Here was a new angle on the big problem of the day. This man didn't want a regular job and wouldn't have accepted one if it had been offered to him. He was one of the large class that refuses responsibility.

An elderly man of rather scholastic appearance chatted with me in the park on another day. He had been doing clerical work and met with a street accident that put him in the hospital. On his release he walked with a cane and was quite lame. His funds were gone. At last he started to beg and found that his story, appearance and language brought in the money. Men gave him very little, but women were easy. He found begging so lucrative that he postponed his further efforts to get a job, and practically confessed to me that begging seemed to be an interesting and profitable business. He had reduced it to a science; played certain fashionable residence streets and never approached men. He was always clean, wore glasses and looked everything but a bum. Several weeks have passed since I first met him, and he still reads his morning paper in the park.

A few days ago I met a boy of eighteen. He was a machinist and though he had been getting better than forty dollars a week he talked to me loudly about the injustice of his wage. He was on strike for nine dollars and sixty cents a day. When I asked him if forty dollars wasn't a pretty good wage for a boy of his age he replied that it wasn't enough. That same day I met two bricklayers on strike and two bakers. I phoned the baking company. They said that twenty men had gone out, but they employed in this particular plant more than five hundred. The wages they were paying were concededly the highest in the city for the same kind of work. The trouble was that during the war they were short-handed and had been obliged to employ a number of foreigners. These new men had caused them much trouble and had finally gone on strike. None of the old employees, however, had followed suit, and all condemned the action of the newer men. I went up to the bakery and investigated and found the statement true.

Then I met a big fellow who said he was an electric welder. Nobody seemed to want to pay him as much as he thought he was worth. He told of working at a certain plant in Pennsylvania during the war and mentioned wages that seemed preposterous. I procured his name and wrote the company in question. Here is the reply:

Dear Sir: The man you inquire about, Mr. ——, was in our employ last year. In some government work we were turning out there was need for an electric welder and none were available at our plant. We applied to a certain department of the Army and they sent the man to us. His wages had been fixed at three dollars an hour for an eight-hour day. These unusually high wages caused us to look upon the welder and his pay more in the light of an experiment.

The first two weeks things went well and the man worked a full eight hours each day. Then he slackened and after a few more weeks, when he had accumulated several hundred dollars, his actual daily effort was limited to three or four hours at the most, though he was still being paid for a full day. His next move was to brag to our men about his high wages and poke fun at them because of their lower pay. As a result we discharged him, feeling that we were fortunate at least in learning what abnormal wages will do to a certain class of men, who immediately relax when they have banked a little money over and above their immediate needs.

Yours truly,

_____,
GENERAL MANAGER.

This was not the only man I found who had been settled on a park bench because of prosperity rather than adversity. In more than a dozen cases young men told me that they could easily get a job, but they didn't intend to go to work until they got the exact wage they were holding out for. I failed to find a single man who was unable to get some kind of employment. In two instances I sent young men to an employer who had promised to give work to any that were in earnest. In neither case did these idlers show up, though they were provided with car fare.

One of the strange conditions I met was the fellows who had regular jobs, but who had knocked off for a day or a half day. Several I asked didn't know exactly why, but said they didn't just feel like working. One printer had started for work and got as far as the door of his shop, then had turned back and made for the park, where he was basking in the sun. He guessed that "there just naturally was a bit of the animal in all of us, and sometimes the savage instincts mastered our ambitions and sent us off where there were no cares to annoy us and no discipline to restrict our freedom." All of which simple philosophy was nearer the truth than many a finespun theory of serious students in their final analysis of the causes of human idleness.

When I asked the vaudeville theater manager how he accounted for so many husky males in attendance at the afternoon performances he replied that these men generally were not of the unemployed. They were fellows who had knocked off for a half day in order to mix in a little additional play with their work. This seemed to agree with the idea of my printer friend in the park.

Nevertheless, facts are facts. The big library will go on being filled with workers and the little park will entertain its loafers. It is more a question of humanics than economics and can be solved only by education. On the same bench sit the old man and the youth. Often the one failed because he did what the other is now doing. But Youth seldom looks and sees the image of his own future sitting beside him.

Observation says: "See what you will be if you continue in your way."

Vanity replies: "You're not like him. He was foolish while you are wise."

So while it is true that evil conditions and a faulty social system have seated many men on our park benches it is likewise a fact that practically all of our strong and healthy loafers to-day are leading a life of wasted hours from choice and not necessity.

Three Enemies

ONLY a little while ago when the war was on each one of us would be stirred to the greatest degree of activity by even the faint suggestion of a hope that we might find a better way to do an essential thing. Every saving in effort or time meant an earlier victory. I remember one day I spent a couple of hours with two of the busiest, brainiest men in the nation figuring on plans to save cargo space in our ships. A good part of our time was occupied in estimating just what would be gained by doing away with the holes in macaroni. Supposing someone went to Washington to-day and started talking about the transportation losses resulting from the holes in spaghetti, the first person spoken to would call an officer and suggest a sanity examination.

After the armistice many people held to the hope that the economies and efficiencies taught us by war would stay with us in peace. This was a fallacy. Notwithstanding our sacrifices in lives lost and property wasted we have been slipping back ever since the last gun was fired. We are tired of being annoyed with reminders of small things and insist on reserving our attention for matters momentous. Therefore as a professional annoyer, who must ever acquiesce to the public taste, I have selected as the subject of this article not one important thing but the three most ferocious enemies of the human race—flies, mosquitoes and rats. No invading army ever caused such destruction as is rendered daily by this invisible triumvirate. Talk about your cost of living! Read on and get some additional facts.

Of all living things that cause disease and death the fly is the most dangerous. He has killed more people than all the wars of the world—more even than tuberculosis. Some of the most deadly germs that afflict human beings are carried almost exclusively by the fly. If he were a million times as big we should hunt him with guns. But being so small we let him kill those dearest to us and hardly raise a finger in defense. Disease cannot spread itself. It must be carried by some moving agency.

There are many varieties of flies. The biting stable fly is one of the blood-sucking variety and is often responsible for the spread of anthrax. Another fly breeds in the excrement on the backs of sheep and has been known to ruin a whole flock. The tsetse fly is the sole cause of the spread of that fatal infection, sleeping sickness. The cheese fly produces the so-called cheese skippers, and the fruit fly is the one often found in the dregs of wine.

The house fly, however, is the champion of them all and 90% of those we meet are of that variety. Here we have an animal with several thousand eyes, known as compound eyes. Above these big eyes are three simple ones arranged in triangular form. The two upper ones are closer together in the male, which makes it easy to differentiate the sexes. But notwithstanding this extensive arrangement of eyes the fly does not have acute vision. His chief attribute is his marvelous sense of smell.

Flies are rapid breeders. The stages in the life cycle occupy only a few days and sexual maturity is reached in three or four days from the date of birth. The mature female deposits a hundred or more eggs at a time. Propagation is usually carried on in organic filth, and the instinct of the female always leads her to place her eggs in the most favorable locality. The range of flight of flies is not great. They seldom travel more than half a mile from the breeding place. As a general rule they remain within a few yards of their point of origin.

The fly transmits disease in two ways: First, by mechanical transference—the wings and hairy legs of the fly are particularly adapted to the act of carrying dangerous parasites; second, disease may be transmitted by infection from the bite of a blood-sucking fly, just as typhus fever is injected by the louse and the plague by the flea. However, in this country the biting fly is not so common so that it is the other variety that endangers our safety.

The most common infection conveyed by flies is typhoid fever. In 1917 this disease killed more than 10,000 people in the United States, and 100,000 other victims suffered from the infection. Another disease frequently conveyed by flies is summer diarrhea. More than 60,000 infants die from this trouble in the United States each year. Cholera and dysentery, as well as a dozen other diseases, are disseminated by flies.

The fly, like every other living thing, has its enemies, such as spiders, lizards and toads. Birds, chickens, beetles and ants devour the larvæ, but the total effect of this destruction on the fly population is not appreciable. The diseases of the fly family are more deadly. The typhoid disease is from a parasite that invades and destroys the fly's internal organs. If man could only invent some way to have this disease manifest itself earlier in the season the doom of the fly would be sealed. At the present time, however, the elimination of the fly curse depends upon our activity in certain lines.

First of all it should be remembered that prevention is better than eradication. Suppressive measures are useless unless we do away with breeding areas. Only the highest standards of community cleanliness will prevail against the pest. We must permit no accumulations of refuse or rubbish, and it is essential that there be proper disposal of garbage and waste. Horse manure in stables should be kept in closed or screened bins. Household refuse should be kept in water-tight metal cans. All waste should be removed at least every three or four days. The best protection against adult flies is the screened house.

Though the fly is the chief enemy of man there are people who accord this honor to the mosquito. One thing is sure—the two insects form a dangerous team. Malaria is a serious disease, and though it kills only about 2[illegible] people in the United States annually it affects our industrial life in serious measure. There is only one way a person can get malaria and that is by the bite of an infected mosquito. The disease cannot be contracted from the water, food, exposure to the sun or in any way except through contact with a female Anopheles mosquito.

The female insect of this particular kind bites a person in whose blood there are malarial parasites. She draws these from this person into her mouth and stomach. Then she bites someone else and the malarial parasites which have developed in her get mixed with her saliva and are injected into the person bitten. It takes one to two weeks for the parasites to develop in the mosquito. If she bites a person before that time has passed the insect is not infective.

Not all mosquitoes are dangerous. The Anopheles, or malarial, mosquito is slight and graceful and the wings are generally spotted or dusky. This mosquito when resting on a wall stands almost on its head, while the other mosquitoes rest humped up. The Anopheles is very shy, and bites in the daytime. Her favorite trick is to catch you asleep.

As before stated, malaria does not give a high mortality but its effects are very serious from a physical and economic standpoint. It causes many a death in which it is not the terminal factor. But its great injury results in the loss of industrial efficiency it causes. One death from pneumonia corresponds to approximately 125 sick days or workdays lost; one from typhoid corresponds to 100 days; one from tuberculosis to 550 days, while a death from malaria corresponds to 2000 to 4000 days. The malaria victim is frequently half sick all the time. If 1% of people in a community are stricken with typhoid we have a bad epidemic. But think how trifling this is, from an industrial point of view, when compared with a community where 50% of the population are affected with malaria each year. In some sections outbreaks have touched 90% of the people.

The South particularly has been cursed by this disease. In numerous localities there are splendid local resources and yet manufacturers have been unwilling to establish plants in many of these communities because of the prevalence of malaria. In one Southern town six years ago the mill managers estimated the efficiency of the employees at 50% during the summer months. The company doctors made fifty calls a day. Systematic malaria

(Concluded on Page 157)

The Liberty has quickly won its way, everywhere, into the high esteem of people who are particular and discriminating. It is classed not with the nondescript many, but with the excellent few, among motor cars.

Liberty Motor Car Company, Detroit

LIBERTY SIX

MATTERS OF OPINION

John Marshall

KNOWLEDGE of the past is never more useful than when it helps to solve the problems of the present. When we are debating a momentous experiment in government no small advantage is to be derived from examining, step by step, other notable attempts at beneficent government which have been thoroughly tried out and whose results have been accurately recorded.

Every American who ever thinks at all has for many months been thinking about the League of Nations, appraising its potential benefits, weighing as best he may those dire possibilities which its opponents say it conceals, wondering all the while precisely what the country and Congress ought to do about it. History affords no parallel whereby the workings out of a League of Nations may be accurately forecast; but in default of a better guide we may reëxamine, not without profit, our situation in the year 1783. It was in this year that one of the most daring attempts at free government the world has ever seen was made upon American soil, when our thirteen revolted colonies, newly made states, torn by factional and selfish politics, jealous and suspicious of one another, were asked to put on the shackles of the Federal Constitution.

It is our national habit to take the Constitution for granted and to bracket it with those other inevitables, death and taxes, quite forgetting that the issue of its adoption or rejection was bitterly fought out through many a heartbreaking month and was decided by a margin none too broad. Turning back to the debates of that period we can scarcely read without laughter—broken by exclamations of incredulity—the terrors with which its enemies invested it. The provision for the District of Columbia, tentatively called the Federal City, was regarded as such a menace to our liberties that a grave Southern clergyman, candidate for his state convention, solemnly warned his hearers that it would become the armed and fortified fortress of despotism: "Here an army of 50,000 or perhaps 100,000 men will be finally embodied, and will sally forth and enslave the people, who will gradually be disarmed."

Every schoolboy knows at least a line or two of Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty or give me death" oration; but how many have ever even heard of that later speech during which he pointed at the still unratified Constitution and passionately exclaimed: "I look on that paper as the most fatal plan that could possibly be conceived to enslave a free people"? Even James Monroe, then a young legislator of thirty, attacked the document as setting up "a dangerous government," and Thomas Jefferson stoutly opposed its adoption unless it were first amended to his liking.

Is there not a singular timeliness in the recollection of these now utterly discredited objections? And may they not serve as rough and ready but still useful standards wherewith to gauge the probable truth of many of the indictments against the international Siamese Twins that Mr. Wilson brought home from Paris?

This excursion into the critical period of our history is inspired by the appearance in the bookshops of the two new volumes that comprise the second half of Mr. Albert J. Beveridge's important and significant Life of John Marshall. Though he rose to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Marshall was by no means the most learned lawyer the nation has produced. Blackstone's Commentaries fell into his hands a dozen years after its publication, but he devoted to that great compendium of the law no more than what New Englanders call a lick and a promise.

In due time he entered his name for the law lectures at William and Mary College, but before his course was six weeks old a pretty face lured him from his books; he made a hasty exit from the halls of learning to pursue, to court and to marry the lovely and amiable Mary Ambler. Poor as he was, and with his own way to make, he found time and money for balls and barbecues, horses, cards, wrestling and outdoor sports.

John Marshall learned law by practicing it. He became acquainted with the Constitution, still unratified, by defending it against the attacks of such sturdy opponents as Patrick Henry, James Monroe and Thomas Jefferson. A few years later, as envoy to Paris, he pitted his wits against those of the astute and devious Talleyrand and safeguarded the interests of his own government with a grasp and adroitness nearly if not quite equal to that of his illustrious predecessors, John Adams and Benjamin Franklin.

He had already served in the field as an officer under Washington. He had built up a large practice in the law courts of Virginia. Well aware of the scantiness of his legal equipment he used it with all the resource of a vigorous intellect and with a mind of rare penetration. Early in his professional life he acquired that common attribute of great men of affairs, the ability to reach into a haystack of irrelevancies and draw forth the needle of essential fact.

Such, in part, was the schooling of John Marshall for the great destiny that awaited him, for to this rawboned Virginia lawyer fell the task of giving to his country what in his day it needed above all else: Cohesive force working through a newborn national spirit.

At the period of the adoption of the Constitution the newly liberated colonies that formed the Union were like so many rookies in the bull pen—bashful, suspicious, unused to working together, new to a common superior, ignorant alike of the school of the soldier and the school of the company, devoid of esprit de corps. If the young states were to act together in company formation it was indispensable that some great mind, some man of unusual vision, not lacking in the arts of persuasion, must supply the unifying impulse.

Of all the drill sergeants of public opinion John Marshall was chief. He it was who taught men to forget that they were Virginians or Vermonters, and to think, to feel and to say: "I am an American!" That was the great work of his life, and two thousand pages are not more than its absorbing story deserves.

We have it upon the authority of a former law partner that Mr. Beveridge's interest in Chief Justice Marshall dates back to the years when he was himself a law student and had occasion to read Marshall's decisions and opinions. He studied them with such devotion and insight that he used to declare he could tell which opinions were written in chambers and which were composed out of doors; which ones harked back to the writer's awful winter at Valley Forge and which were reminiscent of the mission to Paris or of the Constitutional Convention. These strange readings between the lines so piqued his interest that he was eager to learn all he could of the man as soldier, lawyer, diplomatist, patriot and jurist. To his amazement he found that no adequate account of the chief justice had ever been written. There was Magruder's Life and Judge Story's appreciation; but no one had taken the trouble to search out and assemble the vast mass of scattered material which had only to be set in due array to assure the statesman once and for all time his lofty and rightful place in American history.

Even before he was called to the bar Mr. Beveridge resolved that some day he would see that Marshall got his due. Twenty years passed, some at the bar, others in the Senate, before he could address himself to the object of his ambition, and it was not until 1912 that he could begin work in earnest. Now, after seven years of constant research, Mr. Beveridge has fulfilled his pledge and American biography is the richer by the most important work that has appeared since Nicolay and Hay's Life of Mr. Lincoln.

Readers who are fond of studying history in the pages of the great biographies will soon discover that Mr. Beveridge has not written for a narrow circle of lawyers and students of our Constitutional history, but for the average citizen who seeks a clear and exact understanding of the early years of the Republic and the problems and perils that beset it upon every hand. Vivid and animated, yet lucid and precise, the author's style is admirably suited to the taste of a general audience; and his assured mastery of his subject, coupled with an almost boyish enthusiasm for it, recreates before our eyes many of the most stirring and dramatic scenes in our history and reminds us anew of the rough, hard and often tragic winning of those national blessings which for the most part we as much take for granted as our coal measures, our ore deposits or the fertility of our soil.

What Washington, Franklin, Adams and Hamilton planted, John Marshall watered; and he will ever be remembered with esteem and veneration for his services to his country in giving solidarity and separate entity to the young confederacy of states and making it a nation in fact as well as in name.

Ask Congress for the Figures

THE Fourteenth Census, work upon which will begin in a very few months, will enumerate and analyze down to the last pickaninny, pill box, bantam's egg, shingle and slate pencil our population, manufactures, agriculture, forest products and those of mines and quarries.

The results of the vast labor implied will be neatly set out in twenty or thirty or fifty stout quarto volumes printed in fine type; but unless business men, trade organizations and chambers of commerce bestir themselves promptly and vigorously not one of these imposing quartos will contain a line of information or a single row of figures devoted to the purely mercantile operations of the country.

The director of the census is not to be blamed for the restricted scope of his work. He freely states that statistical information concerning the operations of wholesale and retail merchants would be very instructive; but unfortunately the law which provides for the Fourteenth and subsequent censuses does not permit him to enlar field of his activities.

A moment's reflection on the part of any merch manufacturer or large consumer should suffice to co him of the vital importance of a complete anal wholesale and retail trade over the whole country have not, to be sure, had such figures in the past; b fact that our great mercantile houses have surviv costly mistakes made in merchandising and distrib made for the lack of them, is not the slightest proof indication that they are not now indispensable to con tive trading and the elimination of untold waste.

There now exists no body of facts and figures on manufacturers may base their merchandising meth determine how to get their products to the consu the least expense; nor are there any considerabl furnished by the Government to enable merchan consumers to compute and check the costs of distri and display the leaks and wastes that lower profi raise prices.

The hardships caused by inflation, unprecedented tion and the high cost of necessaries and luxuries ali out as never before for every figure that may as bringing conditions back to normal.

Rough guesswork, rule of thumb and hit-or-miss m have been forced out to the scrap heap by the new tions of mercantile trade; either that or the users o are bidding for space in the column headed Bu Troubles in the morning paper. Most of the larger and many of the smaller ones employ capable merch experts; but if these specialists are not supplied with figures with which to work there will inevitably come on which they will find themselves in the shoes c historical personage who was all dressed up and h where to go.

If every business house which is losing money f lack of these statistics would urge its congressman troduce legislation requiring that the requisite be assembled in 1920, it is safe to predict that the teenth Census might be made one of the most usef profitable enterprises in which the Government ha been engaged.

A Voice From the Tropics

WE ARE indebted to an American missionary of who writes from a Latin-American capital th uncomfortably close to the equator, to inclose and co upon some typical American advertising that ha distributed broadcast over that portion of the t zone which lies in the western hemisphere.

Our correspondent calls attention to the fac advertising illustrations designed for use in the States cause more merriment than orders when without alteration in equatorial regions. He poin with much show of reason that high collars, stiff shir quilted smoking jackets constitute the broadest k humor when displayed in latitudes in which the m perches on the 110 mark; and he appears to ha little sympathy for manufacturers who advertise boats on the slopes of the Andes and umbrellas nitrate fields of Chile, where it has not rained for than thirty years. Meanwhile the cheerful Latin man laughs at the antics of the Gringo, and waits pa for the European to come again to serve him.

Our correspondent goes on to say: "The bigge richer the corporation the bigger and richer its blu
In spite of all our advantages we shall never be a compete with Europe in the markets of the world we stop thinking that the sun of the universe kno other course than that encircling the habits and m of the great American business man. American busi ignorant when entered in foreign fields, and it unwilling to learn.

"Occasionally one of our big banks hires a clerk architect's office and, by making him a vice presider paying him fifteen thousand dollars a year, intrust with full charge of Latin-American affairs, and dee duty well done. The fact that there are real foreign experts working for fifteen dollars a week right in own establishment never penetrates their office doo

"We in the States never look beyond the first o month's bank balance. We bend all energy proc something to-day for ten cents and selling it to-m for eleven dollars. The pitiful part of the whole th that we spend the $10.90 profit on broiled live lo and taxicab fares and go over the top the following d more. American business does not yet know the alp of foreign trade and it will never learn till it gets the kind of men and comes into these countries in the way."

(Concluded on Page 157)

ESSEX MOTORS DETROIT U.S.A.

The Essex Satisfaction

It Comes From the Ability to Out-Perform Others and in The Knowledge That it is a Fine Car Even Though it is Not Large

That is Distinctive

One thing we can't forget in buying a motor car, is the pride of ownership.

The automobile is a pleasure vehicle and it spoils the fun to be hopelessly out-rivaled by a car that is smaller and costs less to buy.

And for the same reason there is a lot of satisfaction in having a car that, though it is small and its cost is less, does out-perform all of its class and has few rivals among the large, costlier automobiles.

That is Why You Hear So Much of Essex

You will get his feelings best if you ride with an Essex owner who is inclined to show his car off to other motorists. All seem to experience the same satisfaction at being the first car away when acceleration is called into play.

Of course, anyone who has ever driven much knows that the greatest delight, where speed is concerned, comes with the ability to best a rival with extra bursts of speed. It is the situations which show a car's ability to out-perform others that give greatest cause for pride.

And, knowing that, there is little wonder they speak of the Essex as they do.

You don't hear Essex owners compare their cars to others of similar size or cost. They always tell how they have out-performed some bigger, costlier car.

Did you ever ask an Essex owner to tell you what he thinks of his car in comparison to another in the same weight and price range? He didn't hesitate to express his disdain, did he?

Essex Quality Didn't Just Happen

The Essex performs as it does because it is built to the highest type of car standard. Its smallness in size and moderateness of price have meant no sacrifice in either quality, durability or comfort to the user.

Do you know, for instance, that every detail in the construction of the Essex is comparable to one of the world's most famous fine cars?

That is why the Essex shows the performance that it does. It is why everyone knows it as an utterly different car than has ever been offered. As well attempt to judge the capacity of a man's brain by the size of his hat, as to determine what the Essex can do merely by its type or size and the fact that it sells for only a little more than other cars whose limitations you recognize. That standard doesn't work when the Essex is considered.

Note the Advantages of Such a Car

The Essex is not a large car, neither is it tiny. No space is wasted. No extra weight is used. Neither passengers nor driver is crowded. They have plenty of room on the seats and for their legs. The size of the Essex gives it many advantages. It accounts for its moderate cost. It makes it a more economical car to operate. And think how much more convenient to drive. It slips through traffic where a larger car would be delayed. Parking space can be found that others can not squeeze into. It can be turned in a short radius.

So Don't Forget This Fact

The Essex in every particular, save in its price and weight, is comparable to cars that cost much more, and it possesses the further advantage in economy that comes from its lighter weight.

It is not a light weight car in the sense that others of its size are usually judged. So examine the Essex with that thought in mind. And remember, 16,000 owners are telling of more good qualities about it than any Essex salesman can tell you. Essex owners will advise you to buy an Essex in either the five passenger touring, the sedan or the roadster models. We advise that you be prepared to wait for delivery, for the demand exceeds the output of more than 100 cars a day.

The Letters of William Green

By JAMES W. FOLEY

ILLUSTRATION BY S. GORDON SMYTH

MY DEAR AUNT: Henry Begg and me thoght we would rite you a last long letter befoar school starts tomorrow witch is the last you are apptoo here from us for sum time on account of being so bizzey unless sumthing importunt should come up but you will know we are boath well eaven if you do not get wurd from us for sumtime. It seams to be onley a short time since Sumer vacashun started and now it is all gone and nobuddy nose ware. Vacashun seams to be a long time to look ahead to when it starts but onley a short time when school starts again and you look back and wunder ware it all went.

Henry said it seams to be short on account of being so happey but it would seam long enugh sitting on a red-hot stove all the time dont you think so?

Vacashun this year was mostly swiming and fishing and playing witch is always the most of it until you are grone up and makes it verry pleasunt for a boy when he gose back to school verry brown and helthy and a grate appetight for moar nollidge after he gets in the habbit of studdying again.

Ware my appendicks came out is now quite strong again and will probily not interfear with school but Henry said I otto be careful and tell the teacher at the furst sine of enny pane if too hard studdying should be bad for it as they sumtimes are. Henry said he thoght I otto walk quite slow and careful around the school house and to the bored sose the teacher would not think I was purfeckly well yet and have moar simpathy and not sett too hard exampuls at furst until I get used to it witch is the kind of a boy Henry is always thinking about sumbuddy else. Our hare ware it was clippt off tite to our head is grone out again and will be better for the cool wether in the Fawl witch is apptoo be quite cold for a clippt harecut. Exsept for my appendicks we boath came throgh the Sumer without anything seryus. Henry slidd off the barn once by axsidunt and nockt his wind out and had a few stummickakes from wottermelluns too clost to the rined but a littul panekiller fickst it. Henrys muther always has a bottul of panekiller handey on account of six or seven of them and a good deel of pane to be killed of one kind or anuther. She has one kind to rub on and anuther to take inside and most of the pane is one place or the uther so she is always reddy for sumthing to happen witch it genrelly does. Her hart is still quite week.

Henry and me were boath quite wurried for a wile on account of Henrys school pance witch met with a new axsidunt sevrel days ago and lookt as thogh Henry mite have to stay out of school unless he should ware his Sunday ones and he hated to do that on account of not haveing enny speshul pance for Sunday school if he did and if a boy onley has one pare and ennything hapens to them it is quite searyus for him becaws pance are the most importunt but a cote does not matter becaws you can go in your shurtsleaves but pance you do not and if a boy onley has one pare he has to watch them pretty careful.

The axsidunt to Henrys pance was by a dog witch watches the nabers orchered when they are not around and Henry and me cut throgh it to get hoam quicker on account of being late for super after swiming too long. Henry and me had no ideaya of the dog and were boath going along in the orchered without hardley ever thinking of apples or pares when we hurd a loud bark verry fearce and savvidge and saw the nabers dog coming on a fast run for us witch was not a pleasunt site for me and Henry. We could have climed a tree but Henry said no dog would chase him up a tree and besides if we climed one the nabers would think the dog coght us up thare witch would be quite susspishus agenst us. So Henry and me started to walk fast but not run toworeds the barbwire fence and when we were both crauling throgh Henry let me go furst on account of ware my appendicks came out witch he was afrade mite brake open or sumthing and when he started to craul throgh it was too late and the dog grabed Henrys pance on the part witch was not throgh the fence yet and toar out a big part of them befoar Henry could get cleen throgh witch he finelly did but the nabers dog had a good sighs peace of his pance to show for it and was still barking verry loud and fearce.

It Was Ware Henry Could Not See How Mutch Dammidge Was Done But When He Turned Around I Could See it Was Quite Bad

It was ware Henry could not see how mutch dammidge was done but when he turned around for me to look I could see it was quite bad and would neaver do in school if Henry should be cauled up to the bored or have to resite in frunt of the class witch would be bad for Henry the way his pance were now. Henry hated to tell his muther on account of her hart being week and Henrys muther and my muther too would be hard to understand about the orchered and us being thare becaws it was the shortust way hoam and neather of Henry or me could think for quite a wile of how to get Henrys pance fickst befoar Monday and it was Friday alreddy.

After wile I happend to think about Lilly Purl and how good her muther was to us about gelly cake and I told Henry probily she mite ficks them and be verry confidenshul about them and nobuddy would know about it if we could get his pance over thare without being susspishus about them. So Henry and me went hoam and Henry put his cote on and ett his super and his muther could not see the part of his pance when he was sitting down and after super Henry went upstares and told his muther he gesst he would studdy a wile for the furst day of school witch was a pleasant supprize for her and she was glad Henry was going to witch never happend befoar.

So Henry went upstares and put on his Sunday pance and I went outside and stade under the window and after wile Henry let down the old pance by a string out of the window wile his muther was washing the dishes and could not see witch Henry was glad of on account of her week hart. I got Henrys pance when they came down on the string and went out of the yard the frunt way sose Henrys muther would not see me with Henrys pance on my arm and I mannidged to get to Lilly Purls without enny excitement on account of H pance on my arm and went rite in the frun Lilly Purl and her muther were boath frunt poarch when I ca and boath verry pleasu polight and all the time wundering how to bra news of Henrys pan them and see if Lilly muther would ficks the be verry confidenshul it witch would be a grat to Henry and not ha ware his Sunday pance days witch would be a ressponsibillity for onl pare. After wile I t about Henry upstares room aloan with no pa come out and play i Sunday ones and how h over and told Lilly Purl my appendicks and m ridge came up and I tol Purl and her muther Henry and me and t chered and the dog ch us and how it happe Henrys pance ware the throgh the fence last a muthers week hart a Henry and me thog mite be abul to ficks and be verry confid about it and save Hen me a grate deel of wurr trubble. Lilly Purls n was mutch interuste spred Henrys pance the tabul and sent Lill for sum neadles and and the ragbag and it done in haffanowr an would hardley know wa dog toar them.

Lilly Purl was very a about Henry and how and I told her the d not do Henry enny dam but onley to his pance and it was all over now and m to wurrey about and Henry would be abul to be soon as his pance came back by me.

After Henrys pance were all done we had sum ler ade and Lilly Purls muther said always bring enn pance to her and she would be glad to ficks them verry confidenshul about it on account of Henrys m week hart witch is a fine thing dont you think so? I stade quite a wile I happend to think about Hen stares all aloan and probily wundering how his panc coming out and so I started back to Henrys hous wisseld under Henrys window quite easey sose wurrey his muther on account of haveing a week When Henry hurd me wissel he opened the windo let down the string again and I tide the pance Henry pulled them by the string and Henry said wurds he could hardley beleave his eyes when he lo them and could hardley tell ware they were fickst.

After Henry put them on he came downstares agai told his muther he gesst he had studdied enugh f nite and he better get sum fresh are and his muthe it was all rite and not to studdy too hard and promist not to and came on outside. Henry said he never forget me for what I did for him and his pan never to thank him again for being good to me was in the hosspittle becaws it was all even now boath shook hands. Henry ast me if Lilly Purl s to be scairt about him when I brought his pance ov mite be the last of him for all she knew and I told h was quite a good deel wurried at furst but I told was not hurt but onley wurried and after that she rite and verry swete and cumfurtable to me.

I gess you and Uncle William will think I am ma a lot of Henrys pance becaws it is not important but it was to Henry and shose what kind of a womar Purls muther is to take in a pare of purfeckly strange and ficks them witch Henry will never forget and gr all the rest of his life and sum day he will surpri with a fine presunt Henry said.

Henry said he otto thank her for saveing his pan him but he was quite bashful to talk about it now

(Concluded on Page 49)

(Concluded from Page 46)

s fresh and on account of Lilly t ould be hard to go over thare and bat it becaws it would be dellicut k bout Henry said espeshully ware oghappened to bite them. I told he would rite a noat to her I t e it over and he could go over w when it would not be so fresh enry did and I am sending you a it to see if it is all rite, but it is eo change it now becaws it is gone y respective Mrs. Smith: My pance b k safe and sound by kindness of n Green and I am riteing you a few h I hoap you will exsept the way n from the bottom of my heart and not for you I would be waring my pance every day and no way to r new ones witch would be quite s or me. I hoap you will ecksuse i was quite bold to send a pare of r strange pance over by William l t I was upstares in my room with Sday pance on and my muther has k art and would wurrey a grate deel new it and we boath haypend to you and how good you are and if not want to do it it would be all we would boath feal the same to- ou becaws you have been so good reddy and the pance would not bit of difrunce with us.

t you could see how happey I felt e pance came back all fickst sose o d hardley tell the place you would l pade for the grate trubble you took m and I would consider it a grate i you would cawl for me enny hour y or nite if you should knead enny oppt or choars done or errunds run ning would be too mutch trubble to r ou. I would come enny day after ock schooldays or all day Satterday t ould be onley a grate pleshure and u at all. Henry lookt at my pance er I put them on and could not tell ivas witch is a grate complymunt to r I hope you are boath well and will clhes with the best regords of

HENRY BEGG.

S If it would be all rite to send best dto Lilly Purl I would consider it a ver if you would do it but you will est about it and I will leave it all ound remane as befoar H. B.

S2 and last. I would not want you ir or Lilly Purl that me and William nvas in the orchered with false pre- esecaws we were not and never thoght kng enny froot but a dog does not v iat and onley bites becaws you are e all witch is the way it happend and vagilty I would never think of sending r pance to ficks but it was all a dogs a and not ours but now the pance are cft and I remane as befoar H. B.

ey and me wrote it together. We did knw wether it would be too fammilyer to say Dear Mrs Smith so Henry said probily verry respective would be moar polight for a grone up lady from a boy dont you think so?

Tige was tide up the day we cut acrost the orchered witch was a good thing for the nabers dog Henry said or Tige would probily have killed him but it was all over now and no dammidge. Henry will probily let Tige at him sumtime thogh. Henry is a good deel wurried about Tige when school starts again becaws he has been with Henry and me nearly all Sumer and hardley likes to be tide up nites away from Henry. He will have to be tide up moast of the day now exsept Satterday and part of Sunday and will probily houl a good deel and be bad for his hellth on account of missing Henry so. Henry was wundering the uther day ware he mite get a coller for Tige to tie up with and let him ware when he is loose for a kind of ornamunt around his neck witch is a grate help to a dogs looks. Henry and me saw sum in the stoar windows quite hansum and not verry exspensive and one for a doller witch Tige would probily be verry proud of but thare is no way to urn a doller now on account of going to school all the time and so Henry and me have just about got over the ideaya of a coller for Tige but it would be a fine thing dont you think so? If you or Uncle William should happen to think of enny way to urn a doller Henry and me would be verry glad to here from you and Tige would get the bennefit of it becaws it would all be spent on him. A chane would not be nessary becaws Henry could use a closeline but a closeline around a dogs neck is apptoo choak him if he pulls too hard and sumtimes in the nite Henry wurreys so he can hardley slepe for feer Tige mite be choaking and does not go to slepe again until Tige houls again and Henry nose he is all rite. It is a grate houl of releef for Henry.

I went to Lilly Purls house Satterday after dinner to take over Henrys letter to Lilly Purls muther witch was a grate pleshure for me becaws after Henry was so good to me when my appendicks came out I was glad to have a chanst to do sumthing moar for him even if he did say his fickst pance made it eaven betwene us. Lilly Purl was thare verry swete and cool on the frunt poarch and quite pleasunt to be with on a worm day. Lilly Purl took Henrys letter in to her muther and she redd it sevrel times and said the dear boy but I could not tell if it was me or Henry but probily boath of us dont you think so? Afterwurds she rappt up a big peace of gelly cake and said it would be the anser to Henry and enugh for boath of us and said if enny choars or errunds mite be kneaded she would let Henry know the furst thing, witch was a great releef to Henry becaws the gelly cake on top of the fickst pance was almost too mutch. I told Lilly Purl about Henry wanting to come over sum day but being a littul bashful becaws the fickst pance were so fresh and mite make him kind of nurvice on account of haveing them on ware her muther fickst them and she said her muther would be glad to see Henry enny time and she was always hoam in the afternoon about fore oclock and Lilly Purl too and boath of them would enjoy Henry being thare fickst pance or not just as Henry felt about it. So Lilly Purl said she would rite Henry a note to make his mined easey about his fickst pance witch is the kind of a girl Lilly Purl is always verry swete and thoghtful dont you think so? Henry onley got it last nite and said we could coppey it wile it is still fresh and interusting on account of you knowing all about the fickst pance:

Dear Henry: I thought I would rite you a few lines to say we are all well including my muther and would be verry glad to see you if you would care to come over enny time you want to and a worm welcome from us boath. The frunt poarch is cool and shadey in the afternoon about fore or five oclock and if you onley want to see my muther I could verry easey be away sumwares that afternoon and not come back till after you are gone and you knead not wurrey about that becaws you can see me in school enny time and probily walk hoam sumtimes if you want to and you kno the way I genrelly go hoam down Forth street and apast the park and verry easey to find me on the way hoam. My muther is sending you sum gelly cake by William (Green) witch is part of a too big one she maid and mite get stail and too bad to waist it she said and will be a grate faver to her if you and William (Green) would look at it that way and no thanks on your part. We are haveing quite worm wether now but probily moar pleasunt soon. School starts Monday morning and I suppoas you will be thare and I will probily see you the furst day if you should happen to go. I genrelly start about kworter to nine and go strate down to the park and up Forth street witch is the shortust way for me. I always go the side of the park ware the big oke tree and the bench is. I get thare about ten minutes to nine and then I can get to school in plenty of time eaven by walking quite slow. The bench is on the side of the oke tree toworeds the school house. I hoap you are well and happey and Tige too and hoaping to see you sumtime befoar long probily I remane Verry respectively yours,

LILLY PURL.

P. S.—I was wundering what you are going to do with Tige when school starts and you have to be gone. It will be quite hard on him to stay home tide up dont you think so? I always thoght he was a fine dog.

LILLY PURL.

Henry said when he read it the fickst pance must be gone out of thare mineds alreddy becaws thare was not a wurd in it about pance from one end to the uther and the nurvice fealing is gone alreddy. Henry wundered if Lilly Purl would be mad if he wated on the bench by the oke tree for her tomorrow morning or would she think he took advantidge of what just happend to be menshund in a frendly letter but I told Henry I thoght it would be all rite so I gess he will. That way he can see her the furst time since her muther fickst them and make it easey afterwurds. Henry and me thoght it was kind of curyus how Lilly Purl happend to think about Tige and what he would do wile Henry was away at school and made Henry think about the coller again but he said thare is no use wurreying about that but just give up the ideaya. Unless sum strange thing would happen to help him urn a doller and thare was not mutch chanst of that Henry said.

Henry and me will have to clothes now on account of getting reddy for school tomorrow. One of Henrys littul bruthers toar sum pages out of his arithmetick ware the hardust exampuls are and Henry did not miss them all Sumer but he will eather have to find them or get a new arithmetick and he hoaps to find them sumwares tonite. A peace of his jogafy is gone too and all of the Wesstern Hemmaspear is gone betwene Brazil and the Bay of Funndy witch Henry never mist till Satterday. Henry thoght mice ett the Wesstern Hemmaspear but his littul bruther toar out the exampuls becaws he found sirrup on a lot of uther pages witch makes them quite hard to get appart without sokeing in worm wotter witch makes them swell quite bad so it looks like a pretty hard time for Henry in arithmetick but probily he will get throgh it all rite if he can fined the gone pages. Thare is no chanst of finding the Wesstern Hemmaspear thogh becaws the mice have probily put an end to that. The mice ett sum of neerly all of Henrys schoolbooks this Sumer and Henry said it was luckey he did not have the Boy Rangers Manuel with them or it mite be the last of that but the boys kept it too bizzey for mice most of the time. Henry put all of his schoolbooks on the flore of the clossit way back ware thay would be purfeckly safe when school was out for Sumer vakashun and mice ett a littul of all of them but ett the biggest peace out of the Wesstern Hemmaspear.

Henry and me will probily get up brite and urley tomorrow sose not to be lait the furst day and mite get the reword for not bring absunt or tardy the furst turm of school but not sure about it. So we will clothes again for good this time. Henry just hurd Tige houl in thare barn so he is not choaked yet by the closeline but it mite happen enny day but Henry hoaps not. Henry and me will stay togeather tonite witch is the last of vacashun and talk over old times and tomorrow school starts and not mutch chanst after that. Henry sends love and wants to know if Uncle William nose how to tie a slipnott in a closeline sose it wont slipp and choak Tige to deth witch mite save his life if he was tide the way Henry meens.

Your affectionate Nephew,

WILLIAM GREEN.

P. S. Henry said thare is a grate deel about Tige and his pance in this letter but it could not be helpt becaws it was the mane thing that happend last weak. W. G.

MISS KENT UNDERSTANDS

By Ralph E. Mooney

ILLUSTRATED BY WILSON C. DEXTER

THERE was a bit of new-hung printing on the far wall of the cafeteria at the Business Women's Club. In rather marked type and color it advised each reader to "Make Yourself What You Want To Be." Though insistent and peremptory and a wise enough precept to merit consideration, the slogan was drowned, paled into insignificance by the mighty clatter of noon hour, so that to hundreds of women it went unheeded. Indeed had they been consulted afterward it would have developed in most cases that they had not seen it at all.

Justine Kent, facing the inscription, was vaguely aware of it, though her attention was taken by the pert features and edged voice of the girl at her elbow.

"Did you go out there?" asked the girl, laughing in shrill tones.

"Yes," answered Justine with a smile.

"Wasn't it terrible? Girls like us can't take that kind of place."

And again the laughter rose at Justine's elbow.

"He said, 'young man preferred,' anyhow," offered Justine.

"Oh, but he'd take a girl!" sneered the other. "He'd take anybody that would work in such a place. He'd open his arms to anybody that knows the tire business."

"Did you go in?" inquired Miss Kent.

"Yes," answered the other; "didn't you?"

Justine Kent shook her head.

"I knew it would be no use," she replied. "He couldn't offer me anything."

"Well, I should say not," praised the girl at her elbow. "How could the old man's private secretary go back to an experience-and-no-money job. That's a place for a girl just out of business college."

"Make Yourself What You Want To Be!"

Miss Kent, staring at the inscription, recalled that she had come upon it before. It had been an exercise at business college. As her mind dwelt upon the circumstances she saw again the barren room with its rows of typing tables, and heard the ghosts of thirty typewriters clicking off its letters in her ears.

"What was he like?" she asked mechanically.

"I was right surprised. He looked like a hustler. Another case of too much ambition and no money, I guess."

At this moment an elderly woman came to the table.

"Did either of you get a job?"

"No," answered the pert lips, "it's the dull season and nothing doing."

"Terrible!" said the newcomer. "Terrible the way you were let out after five years!"

"It was good while it lasted," answered the girl at Miss Kent's elbow. "And there's other places. You going shopping? Me too! So long, Justine."

Miss Kent, left alone, stared reflectively at the far wall of the lunch room. Unconsciously her lips formed the words which by now the ghostly typewriters had imprinted on her brain: "Make Yourself What You Want To Be!"

II

NEXT day as a certain Mr. E. Z. Abbott stood at the front of his little shop he was surprised to find himself a subject of inquiring scrutiny from a girl upon the street. She was poised on tiptoe in the rain-soaked February slush, making frank survey of him. For a moment she remained so. Then with peculiar intensity of manner she entered the store and bowed.

Young Mr. Abbott, who dealt in automobile tires, advanced confidently, with approving eyes for her slim serge-covered figure.

"What size?" he asked.

She smiled.

"You advertised for a stenographer?"

"Oh," nodded Abbott, "yes, but ——"

"My name is Justine Kent," interrupted the girl. "I came yesterday, but didn't like the looks of your place. Last night I thought it over and decided to take the job if it is still open."

Her keen gray eyes, looking from under a small blue-velvet hat and heaps of light-brownish hair, dominated the situation at once, but as she was not fully aware of this her manner was marked by the hesitancy of woman engaged in vital business transactions.

Abbott, a lithe good-natured personality, smiled at her frankness.

"I'm sorry—but I advertised for a young man."

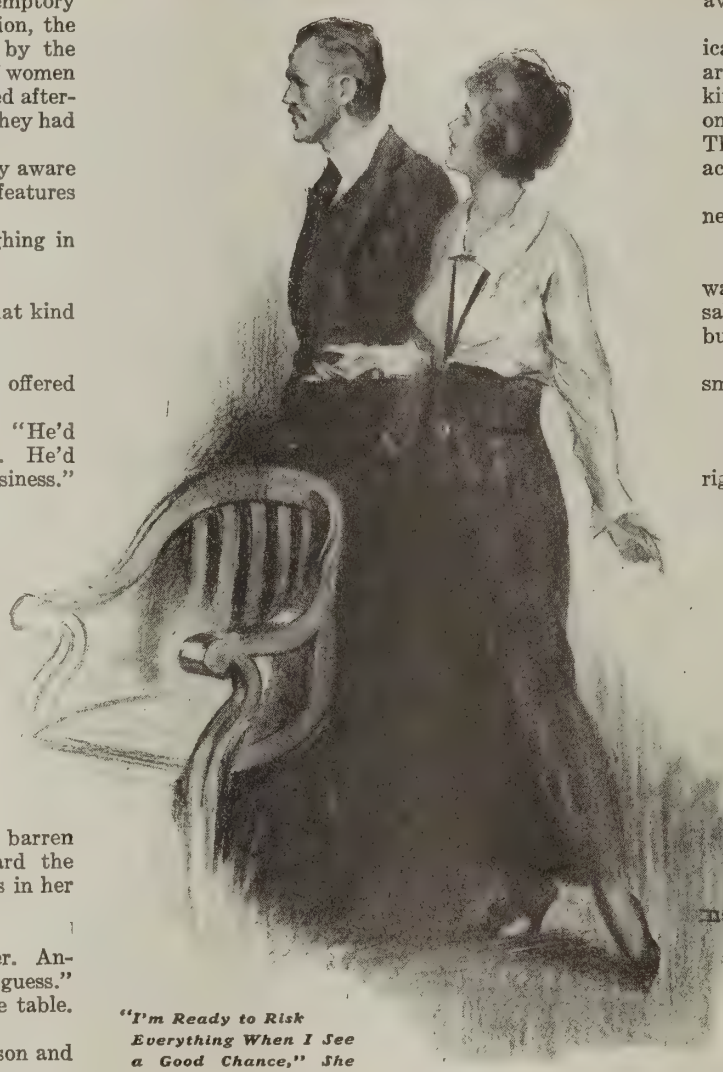
"Did you get one?"

"Not yet."

"I didn't think you would."

"Eh?" gasped Abbott, startled out of his complacency.

The girl nodded and made explanation.



"I'm Ready to Risk Everything When I See a Good Chance," She Sneered. "I'm No Piker Either and I'm Tired of Doing Piker Business. Aren't You?"

"Young men who want to start at the bottom, as you advertised, don't pick this kind of concern. They go downtown to the big tire agencies. The man who would come here wouldn't be worth much to you."

Abbott's eyes gleamed angrily.

"Say, what are you getting at? I don't care for your opinion of my place. Such as it is, I built it myself and I'm not out on the streets asking for work anyhow."

Miss Kent nodded approval.

"I admire you for that," she acclaimed.

Young Mr. Abbott's mouth flew open.

"What? You—you admire me for it? Well ——"

As the young man's confusion increased the girl became more at ease.

"Pardon, please. What I mean is that your place is not the sort to attract young men. Is it now? Does it look a growing business—with heights to climb to—or doesn't it simply offer the bottom to start and end with? Please be frank."

Abbott somewhat dazedly followed her eyes about the front of his shop and grudgingly was forced to admit that the effect was indiscriminate at least. His tires were racked carelessly and sizes were misplaced. The floor was a litter of paper, bits of burlap and miscellaneous tire tools. The shop had all the earmarks of being exactly what it was—a small one-man store. System was unnecessary, because the one man knew by sad experience where everything was.

Abbott finally grinned and made a deprecatory motion toward his own greasy overalls.

"Maybe so," he admitted, "but this is a one-man business and a low-priced one at that. My customers like confusion and overalls and carelessness. Brass railings and carpets mean more expense to them."

"Granted," responded Miss Kent. "But so far no young man has seen the glint of gold through the tarnish and I—maybe I have. I've come for the job."

Abbott shook his head.

"I'm sorry, but I'm not looking for a manager or an efficiency expert, and it's a man's job anyhow."

"That's the sort I'm after," flashed the gi man's job. I mean, I always answer the adv ments for male stenographers. The places ways better and have more pay. I'm just as fast average man at shorthand and typing."

"I know." Mr. Abbott's dark head nodded symp ically. "I can see in a minute the sort of stenograph are. I wish the business was big enough to go afte kind, but as you see it's just a small place and you'd only woman here. There are no accommodations f The nearest wash room, for instance, is at that mi across the street."

"Where did you get your experience in the tir ness?" Justine asked abruptly.

E. Z. Abbott jumped. His bright eyes flickered.

"Well, say ——" he began, only to smile and go o was with the Lawler people. I was a tire changer, salesman, after many other things. My parents wer but inclined to be honest."

"Do you handle the Lawler goods?" she asked smile for his ridicule.

"No, seconds only."

"Oh!" It was a disappointed murmur. "Secon

"Here, wait!" protested Abbott. "Seconds right. There's two sides to every business, you The straight-out, factory-guaranty, brass-rail-a and-wrapped-product side—and then the job-lot, 'em-up-in-the-open side. That's mine!"

"People want to pay the price and get th goods," stated the girl sharply.

"One kind of trade does," defended A "Another kind isn't averse to paying prices and getting real goods too."

"Quality pays for itself in the long argued Miss Kent with considerable w quoting a line of advertising.

"Of course it does. Also it pays for quicker if the price is low.

"Listen here, if you had the time w you rather go to the open market and ge country vegetables at low prices than charge account at a large grocery store you had to pay for rent, delivery servic general overhead?"

"Oh, I see!" answered Miss Kent. "' the open market end of the tire business

"Exactly!"

"It will be worth while to take the job nounced the girl. "And I'm going to take it."

Mr. Abbott gasped for breath.

"First," he asked, "how about your crede You've been thorough enough about mine."

"Private secretary to Dan Farwell—nearly five y she answered carelessly, naming one of the big tire the city. "He died, you know, and the factory ope own branch here. I was let out. References ready you want them."

"I beg pardon," laughed Abbott. "You're a goo But as I've said, there's no use going further with it looking for somebody that wants to stick and try an the business. Stenographer, bookkeeper, salesman say—oh, twenty a week. I know it wouldn't suit because you couldn't do half of it and because a gir your experience can walk into a plush job somewhe do a lot better."

He indicated the door with a gesture of finality.

The girl laughed in her turn, remaining steadfast quiet dignity.

"I thought that too," she answered. "It's pr true. Yesterday when I came here first I was dis with the lack of order in your store and left it, intend go after the plush job you name. Last night I chang mind. Mr. Abbott, I'm tired of looking for the ide I'm going to make it to suit myself and make it her

The man wandered toward the big plate-glass w shaking his head.

"But ——" he began.

"You won't regret it." Miss Kent spoke quickly. about salary—you said twenty a week. That's mor you can afford."

"Help!" gasped Abbott. "Now listen ——"

"I didn't say that to offend you. I merely want to you I understand. Now, Mr. Abbott, let's talk bus What do you say to taking me in here and agreeing t me what I'm worth? I mean by that, of course, w make myself worth. Are you—ah—game?"

Abbott scratched his head.

"You mean I hire you on no stated ——"

She interrupted.

"You don't hire me! I hire myself and come in h what it's worth to us. I want to make good by ma siss good. I want to build—and not sponge off a ilder. I know a lot about the tire business. If you ot tires we'll win. Are you willing?"

(Continued on Page 53)

(Continued from Page 50)

M Abbott, young, hesitant, self-made though half-is d business man, could not refuse the demand of her y yes. He could not overreach the purpose that lay i l them.

"] you've decided on it there's no use talking," he "I might try it, anyhow."

"lave decided."

bott smiled doubtfully.

"elcome then! Please report yourself to Miss Kent. e res all our stenographers."

"iss Kent says take her," answered the girl promptly. "le's took! What's the use?" He shrugged his shoul-rs. "I've got to say yes. I've never learned to say no."

"l teach you that," smiled Miss Kent.

A in did Mr. Abbott's jaw drop.

"ne of us is crazy," he affirmed with heavy sarcasm.

III

UTINE KENT'S action in joining Abbott was an experi-nt decided upon after a night of feverish planning and otion. She had been urged to it, partly by the sudden p tunity in Abbott's place, partly by the advisory nc'd in the cafeteria. Also—and this most al—by the conclusion she had reached during rc or more of serious thinking.

Ihad all come about very naturally. In the giaing—five years before—she had been just clinary business-college grad-t Later she became just an diarily good business woman t higher class. But even as e ad achieved competence and oinence in her overcrowded olsion she began to think el. How could she go higher? h was the next step? The glst places seemed barred to a or.n.

S read much and found such ogis as "Make Yourself What ot Want To Be" constantly aig at her from modern busi-ss literature. What did they e? They were so indefinite, so tagible. How much truth was in them? o did one go about carrying them out?

Te answer came while she was at lunch in e afeteria. The mottoes were true. You did v chances to carry them into effect. Here as n opportunity provided. She had qualifi-tins for it. She knew the tire business and e new business in general. Why not, for in-ae, select a definite objective such as, say, l a partner in a growing retail business—and begin by sming she was just that. Then think, plan and work r othing else. In a word, why not make herself what e wanted to be?

S began the joint existence of Mr. E. Z. Abbott and isne Kent as subjects of an experiment. It was to be a n drawn and painful experience. The chemicals were to bind fizz for many weeks. The elements, matured con-r tism and new determination, being both positive, pled each other at first, and the experiment seemed oned to failure. Frequent discussions rose over the e ing up and systematizing of the firm's books and airs and these discussions soon degenerated into quar-l n which E. Z. Abbott aggrievedly defended his past o s and existence.

Dthing is more wearying than strained relations be-vn employer and business woman. For Mr. Abbott's a within three days the young man's figure became rcpy. He felt as though he was carrying a tenacious bit of the sea on his shoulders. Inwardly he was re-ling to cast away his burden.

"ran this place all right until she came," he told the o who changed tires.

"Yeah," said the boy. "You were all right. But she—a heller!"

Thereupon Mr. Abbott, safe from the quizzical gray y, decided virtuously and indignantly to dismiss the girl t e end of the week. She was wasting herself in his la. She was one accustomed to every office convenience n was not for him. For these sentiments Mr. Abbott a ot be blamed. He had struggled to independence by himself and he had founded the business with his own a gs. Having achieved so much, he was willing to let re enough alone. The store would keep him and he was a y in it. He resented the presence of a girl who re-a ed the place merely as a fair beginning and who tried to p him into greater efforts.

"iss Kent, up to her eyes in his desk's litter of corre-pidence, sales memorandums, charge notes and bills—q receipted and unpaid—had a way of stopping work o watch him as he puttered about among the few tires that made up his stock. It was particularly irritating. Her eyes seemed constantly to question his activities, to ask why he was so occupied when there might be better things for him to do.

"She'll never be any good here," Abbott concluded definitely on Friday. "I'll let her go to-morrow night."

When the time came, however, he hesitated as usual. After picking his way through the tire stacks and the litter of the forward end of the shop he was too astonished at the appearance of the office in the rear to proceed immediately with his carefully rehearsed speech. All of his heaped-up papers were filed—in hatboxes borrowed from the milliner. His old received-and-paid-out daybook was gone. Instead a neat sales book and ledger lay open upon his desk and a typed statement attached to the ledger informed him what his bank balance was—and why. He decided to soften the blow as much as he could.

"You've certainly done wonders, Miss Kent," he praised. "And—but—oh, here's the week's pay as I promised." He handed her twenty dollars. She bowed.

"Thank you—but you were going to say something more?"

E. Z. Abbott flushed.

"Yes, but—ah—time for that later. We'll try another week."

"Now Listen, Miss Kent, I Appreciate What You've Done, But I Can't Stand Your Trying to Run the Place"

Her eyes were faintly scornful as they looked upon him. Soul militant, she took her resolution in hand. She would—she would make herself what she wanted to be in spite of everything, in spite of herself and Abbott.

"I think I know what was in your mind, Mr. Abbott," she affirmed. "You were going to send me off."

Abbott nodded somewhat angrily. She noticed his manner and flashed into anger herself.

"You are foolish, Mr. Abbott! You'll never get anywhere, running as you are, yet you resent my trying to help you. But you shall not discharge me—unless I'm incompetent. I'm going to stay!"

"I've got a word to say about that," cried Abbott. "I'm running this ——"

"I'm going to stay," declared Miss Kent in fury. "For a month anyhow. At the end of that time, if you haven't got this business in shape I'm going to quit you. You are on trial just as much as I am. If you can't make good I don't want to stay with you."

And while Abbott was still gasping she left him.

IV

THE next week saw no improvement in the relations of employer and extraordinary employee at the Abbott Tire Company. The chemicals of the experiment boiled more furiously and the doubt was very evident as to whether it would end in a grand explosion or a useful reaction of ideals upon materials. Things started badly on Monday morning when Miss Kent entered the shop with a folded newspaper. She seemed greatly pleased over something.

"Did you see to-day's paper?" she asked.

"No, I hardly ever read the papers," replied Abbott, who was leisurely enjoying his morning pipe. "They don't interest me."

"You should read them," she reproved.

In a flash Abbott's temper rose. He had been nursing his anger since Saturday.

"Some more of your efficiency?" he stormed. "Now listen, Miss Kent, I appreciate what you've done, but I can't stand your trying to run the place. I'm through, that's all. You can stay here till Saturday night and then quit. Start in business yourself if you want to, but don't try to start me!"

Miss Kent turned a grave countenance upon him.

"You'll find I'll stay a lot longer than Saturday night," she announced gently.

"And you'll need me, I think. You'll be glad of it before the day is over," she added.

"What do you mean?" asked Abbott.

"If you will read the paper you will see part of what I mean," she announced.

Abbott took the paper and scanned it rapidly, announcing: "I don't see anything here!"

"No?" asked Miss Kent. "Let it go then!"

With this unpropitious beginning every hour of that day was a period of argument. Abbott felt his resolution to discharge Miss Kent strengthening with each controversy. This was because the young lady after the first passage at arms relaxed into noncontentious silence.

"Have it your own way," she announced frequently.

Owning the upper hand for the time, Abbott thought the girl beaten and went out of his way to bring up new points for debate. He was mistaken, however. Miss Kent was merely saving her strength.

In the afternoon as he was dismissing a rubber salesman from the store the girl called to him:

"Oh, Mr. Abbott, will you come here, please?"

Excusing himself, the proprietor made his way to the office.

"Are you sending that man away?" she demanded, indicating the rubber salesman, who stood whistling at the front of the shop.

"Yes," bristled Abbott.

"He was here Saturday while you were out for lunch. It sounded as though he had a wonderful proposition. What is it?"

"A three-thousand-dollar lot of Barrett firsts. They list about three times that, but the Calvin Motors Company, which used them as car equipment, has liquidated and these are on the market at a bargain."

"Isn't it a good buy?" she asked.

"It's a corker," he said impatiently. "What are you getting at?"

"Let's take them."

Abbott threw up his hands in horror.

"Take them? Now—in the dull season? Why, you poor—you're crazy! Anyhow, I haven't more than five hundred in the bank—if I've that—and it's a cash transaction."

"Will you ever get a buy like this in the busy season?" she demanded fiercely.

"No, of course not. But there's no money now ——"

"Borrow!" commanded Miss Kent.

"I can't! I haven't credit!"

He moved away. With a little cry she caught his arm and went on speaking with a quiet fury that unmanned him:

"Listen, please! You've enough stock here to invoice at fifteen hundred dollars. With that and your bank balance behind you you can easily raise two thousand at your bank. That's the kind of business a bank likes—loans to merchants whose stock will indemnify them if the note is defaulted. In fact, since you are using the money to buy stock they are doubly protected."

"Wait!" commanded Abbott, swept off his feet by this unexpected attack. "It's insanity! I'm not justified ——"

"Mr. Abbott!"

The gray eyes, angry and desperate, ruled him with a kind of flaming hypnosis.

"Yes'm," he murmured and fidgeted, reduced to mere boyishness by her sincerity.

"Once my former employer, Mr. Farwell, went absolutely broke—backing the old Everwear Puncture Proof. On the day he wound up that business he managed to borrow a thousand and took up a new line. In two months he was clear. And never once did he weaken or show outwardly that he was down, nor did anyone but me know his true circumstances. That's the kind of nerve that makes good in business. When Farwell saw what he wanted he took it. He made a fortune in five years because he wasn't a piker—and never had been a piker."

"That's all right for you to say, Miss Kent," pleaded Abbott. "You're only a girl. There's Farwell's way of building a business and there's mine. Both are good. Mine is slower, that's all. Now it's all right for you to advise such a thing—when you aren't risking any money. But I decline to gamble my whole store on advice from a woman."

"I'm backing my advice," she said curtly. "Even when you've made your loan you will only have two thousand. What I was trying to tell you was that if you would raise two thousand I would lend you another thousand—my savings. The reason I do it is because—if the buy is as good as you say it is I'm sure we can't lose."

Abbott went into a panic.

"No, no! I can't let you do that! It's risking too much. Thanks awfully. I appreciate it—but I can't do it."

"I'm ready to risk everything when I see a good chance," she sneered. "I'm no piker either and I'm tired of doing piker business. Aren't you?"

Abbott stared at her for a long time, while his cheeks reddened.

"Are you serious?" he asked at last, eyes glinting.

"Are you never serious?" she scolded.

He made his way weakly to the salesman.

"I'll take the lot," he announced.

"Sight draft with bill of lading attached," added Miss Kent, who had followed.

"O. K.," smiled the salesman. "Is this your partner, Abbott?"

"No, darn it, she's the boss!" groaned Abbott.

"You're wise," laughed the salesman. "Sign here."

Very ruefully Mr. Abbott carried through the deal, borrowed the money with no great difficulty—as Miss Kent had foreseen—and very ruefully saw the new stock arrive at the end of the week.

"We'll never move it till next summer," he moaned. "Business is too dead now even to hope."

"We'll move the most of it next week," declared Miss Kent heatedly. "At least that's what I'm gambling on."

"Impossible!"

The girl laughed cheerfully.

"Do you remember the Monday newspaper?" she asked. "Honestly, didn't you see anything in there that would interest us?"

"No—what do you mean?"

"It was a big enough headline and it merely said, 'Car strike seems certain!'"

"Oh, the street car strike? Yes, I know about that."

"If you had read this morning's paper you would know that the strike begins to-night at midnight!"

"Well?" asked Abbott.

The girl made an impatient gesture.

"Don't you realize that by to-morrow every motor car in the city that has four wheels will be running? Why, we'll have a regular summer rush—in February! Where were you during the car strike four years ago?"

Abbott's mouth fell open.

"I believe," he muttered, "I believe—oh, Lord, you're right!"

"We must get an advertisement in Sunday's paper telling of our bargains," she affirmed.

Abbott nodded.

"Yes, of course," he said, then stared at her in awe. "And you saw that coming and you forced me into getting ready for it? If we unload this stuff we'll be made and it will be your work. My—my goodness, and you only a stenographer!"

"Not much," she answered. "I'm a partner now—I have a third interest here. And though to-morrow will be Saturday, I guess it will not be my last day with you."

"Oh, forget it!" growled Abbott.

He wandered away to the front of the store and stood looking at the heaps of blackened snow in the gutters.

V

MISS KENT took no great chance when she put her money into Abbott's business on the strength of rush days to come during the car strike. Even had the strike been averted, Abbott's normal February and March business would have enabled them to reduce their loans and carry them on into summer when the bargain lot would have been readily salable. Miss Kent knew this, be it understood, from her study of the firm's fragmentary books. So while a few may criticize that stretching of credit to the limit in a dead season the majority will admit she took a legitimate business chance. It took all her nerve to urge the unwilling Abbott to the step and all his nerve to carry it through, but had either of them lacked nerve they would never have been where they were.

As it happened, however, her so-called gamble turned out the surest of sure-thing bets. The car strike lasted seventeen days—long enough to bring out motor cars that had been held in dead storage for years. The demand for tires was tremendous. Faulty skid chains tore them up. Hard frozen snow cut them to pieces. In addition, thousands of customers who had laid their cars up for the winter were compelled to buy new rubber, which ordinarily they would not have needed before July. Now a four-thousand-dollar stock of automobile tires is not a large one, so that Abbott's bargain lot—and his old stock too—were gone before the strike was ended, and the banker—rubbing his hands—told the young man he could borrow five thousand if he needed it.

Whereat Mr. Abbott became very complacent indeed and began to tell customers about his foresight and gambling spirit. When he returned Miss Kent's money, however, he got a shock that all but destroyed his rapidly hardening system.

"Here you are," he said. "And I'm glad it came out all right for you."

"I am too," she answered. "If you please, I will l five hundred in the business—you need it. You nee the basic capital you—or we—can swing. But the o five hundred—I will have to pay back. I borrowed "Borrowed it?" cried Abbott.

"Yes, indeed," smiled Miss Kent. "From Farwell's partner."

"Holy mackerel! You risked that—on me?"

"Of course," she answered. "And now that the b ness has made good, Mr. Abbott, and you can easily af twenty a week—I'll stay indefinitely."

"You'll stay eternally!" vowed Mr. Abbott.

Together they carried the business on through the s mer season and through the seasons of the year that lowed. The chemicals for a time boiled ever less viole and the experiment fared well indeed. Mr. Abbott more amenable to her suggestions—since he had lea the worth of them. Controversies became a thing of past and conferences were much in order.

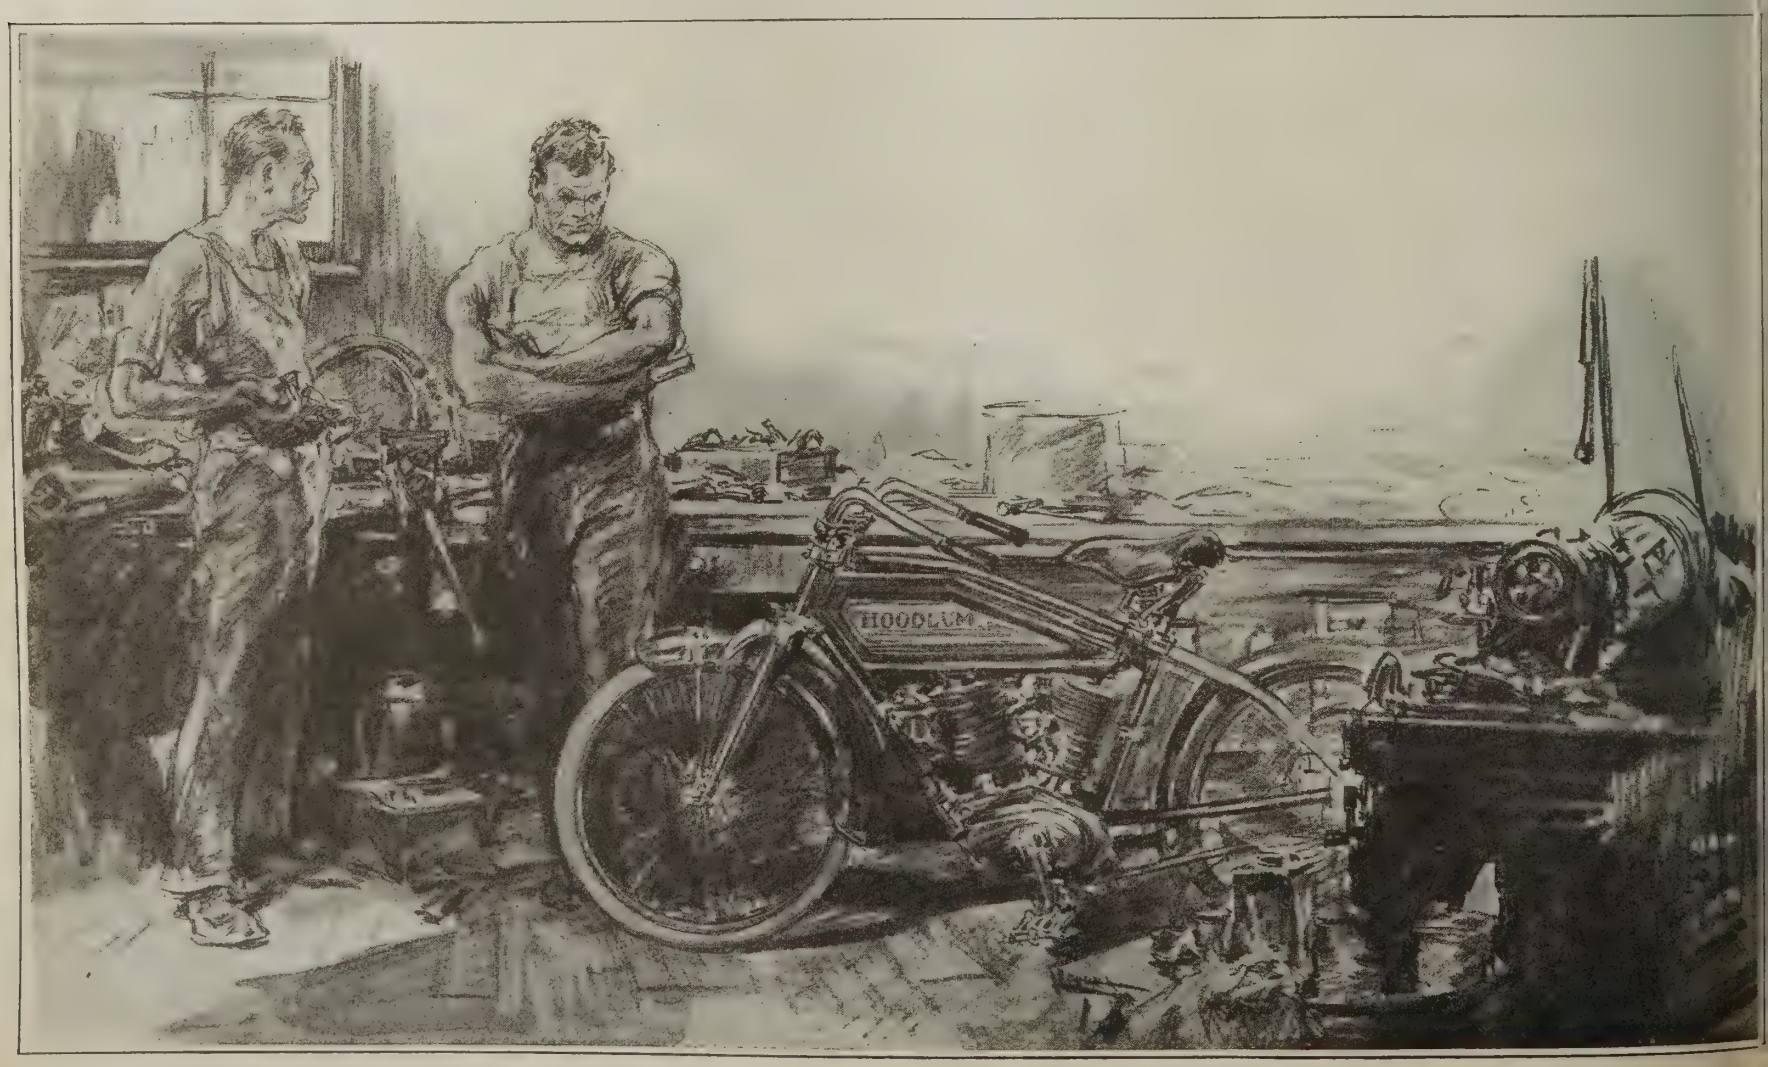
The increased sea room offered by the banker allo them to do some very pretty financial sailing. T money doubled and redoubled itself in the way curiou capital invested in a small business. By the end of first summer they were able to carry a sizable stock maintain a delivery and service wagon, to advertise a week in the city newspapers.

Further, Abbott found himself able to interest sm retail dealers than himself. Men who were operating five-hundred-dollar basis could do better buying from than from the big jobbers, who scorned little items would not offer sufficient discount to enable them to c pete with the market. In fact, Miss Kent spent hal every day at that time in writing to small dealers in lying districts, quoting them prices and urging their of C. O. D. express shipments. This mail-order end of business became a valuable asset.

When winter came and the dull days set in the girl s her time in systematizing the business and in kee Abbott from stumbling over his own feet, for as she long since realized, to create the ideal position for he she had to make Abbott into the ideal employer. And lowing the remarkable summer growth the young naturally displayed a tendency to watch details too clos He feared—as many men educated to small business do—that the affairs of the concern would get away f him. He spent fourteen hours a day trying to wait customers, buy new stock, run the office, operate the canizing machine and keep every detail of the Abbott Company under personal supervision.

Miss Kent, while carrying out her winter work, installation of a perpetual inventory system by which ckautomatically rendered account of lf gradually forced him to leave the ıdıg of details to subordinates and to ıgeof their handling by results. This ie:d, the girl adroitly set him to the ıjof buying, for this after all is a ıles real business. If the buyer's goods et ıe market or, better still, can be sold ıuprices, anyone with tact and knowl- e the stock can sell.

(Concluded on Page 57)



(Concluded from Page 54)

'k result of all this became evident ir their second summer. They had five s en, two men in the vulcanizing room .lf a dozen boys for service, with pro- ıo made for expansion where it might ıeled. Also most important of all, they .big stock in readiness—the result of er judicious buys and some bits of ıdick. It is always safe for people who c their toes to count on a little good k ong with the ordinary.

Tt season was the long and dry sum- r fore America entered the world war. w the making of the E. Z. Abbott Tire mıny. The unusually heavy stock re lasted through the first weeks of y and Abbott with countless other ılı was compelled to scramble in the ınnarket for new rubber. There were ıewhen certain tire sizes were exhausted o hout the town except in one or two re Abbott had his share of these cor- s ıd his full share of the rapidly increas- ıe business of America. His money n so rapidly that the end of the season n his stock and capital amounting to r than fifty thousand dollars.

Fr realize the arithmetical increase of n' put in movable merchandise and ot the business. Fifteen hundred may lyurn to two thousand, but the two ound turns to three and that to con- eibly more than four. The next step rs you well above six on your original pi l alone. By this time your borrowing cerying on a startling campaign of its n

Al yet in spite of all this the experiment s ot ended. Miss Kent had not created ıeal job—or the ideal employer. E. Z. bbt, though in many respects a big man ten, needed more scolding, more super- ik from his resolute amanuensis—more er han ever before in fact. The hardest tt of Miss Kent's career was yet to be ıgt.

VI

Mr. E. Z. Abbott was—as the old- fashioned people say—feeling his oats. ug and successful, having learned to be cive, quick and compelling, he was just e ype which attracts money leeches. e gan to listen to suave gentlemen who erfor making him a big financier—with e elp of his money and their brains. ıe talk unbalanced him a little. Having med so far, he began to assume care- ss, that he was on the mountain tops. Ao pleasure was crying out to him to la—stop slaving—and enjoy his success. ids began to force themselves upon m Still on the swing from over-attention ctail in the general supervision of his ıs ess, he swung too far and failed to p vise at all. He began to let go—over- aing his allowance from the firm, ap- ang late in the mornings and leaving r. He became impatient of the plodding rehop and longed for quick turns. He ıten thousand—borrowed money—in a o deal. He got into the habit of sign- ghings without reading them and hur- n off from the office as soon as the ng was over. Miss Kent could be ued. Why bother?

Then while out with other tire men he e girl who succeeded in fascinating him, ugh he felt the danger and the useless- es of it. She was a fluffy little thing with gat love for cafés and dancing—harm- senough, to be sure, but it is always the harmless women who are most dangerous to big careers. She demanded a great deal of his time.

"Don't let business interfere with pleasure," urged this cheerful moth of the bright lights.

Abbott was greatly pleased with her and cut his hours shorter still. He disposed of the rickety secondhand car which had become traditional among the tire men of the city as Abbott's bus, replacing it with a new and powerful roadster built to carry one man and a girl. At the same time a character analyst might have noted that a faintly desperate light appeared in his eyes and that a most unpleasing expression marred his countenance.

Miss Kent, who had become something of an analyst as far as this man was concerned, soon grasped the truth and for the first time since the experiment began was stricken with panic. Abbott was slipping from under control and was in a fair way to ruin himself and the business, and she knew it was going to be difficult to manage him. She learned of the other girl, too, and realized that she was not prepared for that sort of battle at all. She had had none of the training, bore none of the weapons of a coquette—and a coquette was what was needed to undermine the other woman's influence.

But as time went on and a plan matured she nerved herself to the attempt, realizing it was a question of making or breaking Abbott at one blow. The value of all she had taught him—of her own supreme theory of life—was to be tested, and she shrank from the crisis, as most of us will, but went ahead gamely to meet it—as some of us will.

And so Mr. Abbott arrived at the store one day to find a new shipment of tires being unloaded at the curb.

"What's this?" he asked Miss Kent.

"Guaranteed Bettergoods," she answered. "At fifty, ten and five off the list. It's a fine buy."

"I don't remember making it," answered E. Z. Abbott.

"You didn't—I did," she smiled.

"Well, that's all right this time, of course, but I'd rather you'd consult me in future. I have other investments ——"

"You weren't here," she answered, "and as president of the company I felt justified in going ahead."

For a moment the young man could not understand.

"President!" he exclaimed, numb from head to foot. "You?"

"Of course! Don't you remember signing articles of incorporation at my suggestion? Don't you remember issuing stock and signing the share certificates?"

"Y-yes!"

"Quite inadvertently, I know, but quite irrevocably you gave me a controlling interest in the business."

Overcome, Abbott sank down upon a heap of the new casings. It was long before the astounding import of it got home.

"Trickery!" he gasped at length. "From you!"

"Luckily," she answered, "from me!"

"Luckily—what do you mean?"

"Simply that as long as you don't intend to watch your business I will do it for you. Whenever you are ready to resume your authority as president I will turn it over to you—that's all!"

"When I'm ready? Look here ——"

"I merely remind you, Mr. Abbott, that our fates are bound up in this enterprise. When you begin to regard it merely as an income or a gold mine someone must act as trustee for you. Anyone could have grabbed it as I've done—for all you know. Incidentally your lack of interest has already lost us two good deals and the falling off in our deposits has caused the bank to demand that we reduce our loans. Also the bank president, noting the endorsement of the Indiana Oil Corporation on your ten-thousand-dollar check, says that he does not intend to finance any other corporation than our own."

"Damn!" said Abbott.

"I should think so!" replied Miss Kent.

Avoiding her eyes, the shaken man rose and walked off down the street. Her brows creased in worry, Miss Kent watched him out of sight. As the day passed and he did not reappear her worry and abstraction became more evident. She returned to the store after dinner and waited nervously until closing hour, but he did not come. At last she saw to the locking of the doors and went home. An observer might have noted that she touched her eyes with her handkerchief rather frequently as she made her way toward the street-car stop.

Next morning as she answered the mail she heard his step and looked up joyfully. As she perceived him, however, her expression changed to that of concern. Indeed by her last effort she had made—not broken—him, and the result was a most terrifying new man. Resolution unconquerable was in his bearing, cold anger in his face. Her handiwork frightened her. Her pupil had gone a step beyond her plans.

"Miss Kent," he began incisively, "I have been looking up the law in this matter."

"Yes," she gasped in dismay.

"Your work has been clever, but it will not stand five minutes before a court. My connection with this business is indisputable, and deceit, however well carried out, cannot take it from me."

Justine's amazed eyes saw only determined triumph in his gaze.

"Oh," she cried, "but I told you ——"

"I know," he interrupted. "You told me you intended to hold the business until in your opinion I was ready to manage it. Nevertheless you only control it by fraud, and you have incurred a civil liability—if not a criminal."

Her eyes widened.

"I can either wreck this business—or receive it back from you," he announced. "I can start in business elsewhere and ruin this store. You must say now whether additional action will be necessary."

At last she was able to face him with the faint scorn which had earned her many an early victory.

"As far as that goes," she answered, "the stock is yours now."

"You have already arranged the necessary papers?"

"It wasn't necessary. The stock was never assigned to me. I merely told you so—and you didn't know the difference."

He turned away from her and was silent for a long time. At last he spoke.

"Very well! That ends it! Now as to your connection with me—you can readily understand that after this we cannot remain on the same footing."

"No!" she gasped in protest.

"Your loan of five hundred—as partner, practically—entitles you to a fifth of our present capital—about ten thousand dollars. I will pay you that and take over your stock in the corporation for an additional ten thousand, or you may hold the stock if you so desire."

She managed a faint murmur in answer.

"It will, I think, be very valuable to you. While I was trusting you—leaving the business to your care—I found time during my alleged pleasures to arrange for something bigger than we had ever imagined. I have formed an alliance of five concerns like ours. We're going to handle the entire output of seconds from the Bettergoods factory and the entire output of five smaller factories. We're going to maintain twelve stores here and elsewhere, so your stock will probably pay good dividends."

Justine uttered a little cry of delight.

"Oh, that is splendid, Mr. Abbott! I never dreamed ——"

He stopped her.

"But of course you will probably not wish to trust me with the business, once you are out of it."

She winced.

"That isn't fair! You wrong me! I've never taken that attitude!"

"Nevertheless, Miss Kent, you have never seemed to realize that it was I, after all, who began this business and who provided the opportunity for you. Also it was I who really did the work after you came. I am the business, after all."

"Yes," she said quietly after a long silence, "you really are."

Abbott reached to the desk and picked up a package that lay there. As he fumbled with the strings which bound it he bent over and kept his face out of view. His shoulders began to heave in a strange way.

Suddenly he looked up, smiling—again the good-natured Mr. Abbott of former days.

"No use," he said. "I'm changing my mind. This package has something in it that tells me what to do—in spite of being mad. You can't keep a good-natured man mad anyhow."

Wounded, Miss Kent made no reply.

"Some change in me, isn't there?" he asked.

"Quite a little," she said coldly.

"Did you begin to think I didn't realize the cause?" he asked with firmness.

As reply was impossible, she waited.

"Anyhow, I did! I did yesterday when I left—and something I saw last night made me realize still more. All of a sudden I discovered the secret of it all. It is in this package. And I discovered that you had taught me that secret."

She remained mute, with lowered eyes.

"Justine!" he cried sharply.

A rush of emotion turned the cold current of the conference. It swept them both away.

"Justine!" he said again. "It wasn't a heartless joke—just now. I meant it—ever and always this business is mine and I must be head of it. But even as I went on with it something bigger took hold of me harder than it's ever taken hold before."

He paused at loss for words.

"Do you remember," he said spasmodically, "do you remember your Christmas gift to me last year? It's here in this package. I've laughed at it a thousand times, because it's so typical of you. But last night I learned to understand it—and to-day I've learned still more."

Justine rose.

"Don't!" she said. "Don't go on after ——"

But with a quick motion he caught her hand.

"Justine!" he pleaded. "Are you really all business? Haven't you seen this for a long time? I don't want to be your partner—your employer. I—I want to be your husband."

The gray eyes no longer dominated the situation. They were overborne by what they discovered in the brown eyes of the man as Miss Kent snatched a scared look at him. The last business barrier between the partners went down. Abbott caught the girl in his arms. The gray eyes, helpless, rejoicing, filled with tears.

"Will you marry me?" he begged. "Will you?"

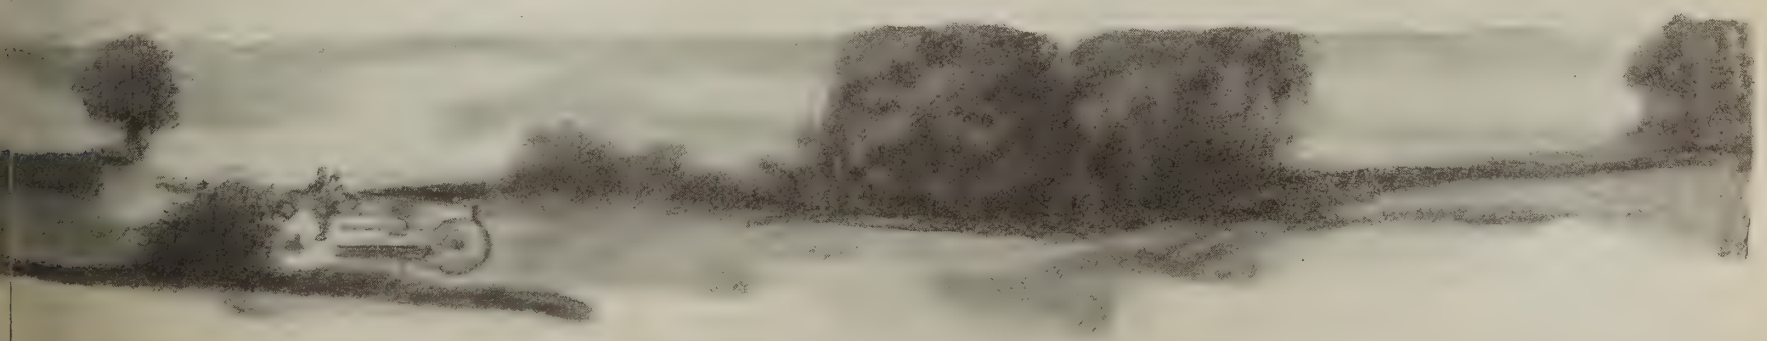
"I—oh, I hadn't planned this!" she gulped.

Abbott laughed ecstatically and as he did so the Christmas gift fell to the floor. With renewed laughter he pointed to it.

"There's the answer!" he cried. "Obey!"

But Justine Kent had no need to read the framed motto that lay by the desk. Already from deep in her subconscious mentality the ghosts of thirty typewriters were clicking in her ears:

"Make Yourself What You Want To Be!"



INSPIRATION JUL

By Richard Matthews Hallet

ILLUSTRATED BY ARTHUR WILLIAM BROWN

ON THE morning of the night of the graduation ball Jule Horrocks went into her Uncle Horrocks' private office in the ship chandlery to tell the old fellow about the expense incident to her buying a dress for the high-school graduation ball. When she came out again she said to his clerk, Jim Sanderson, who was untangling some ship's gear on the floor: "What's the matter with his nibs this morning? He's sitting there moping with a face as long as the moral law. I can't get a word out of him—aye, yes or no." Sanderson gave her an appraising glance before answering. Summer's witchery had got underneath her skin and well into her blood, and those who knew her best could see that some new spell had been laid upon her by the way she was experimenting with her hair. She had worked it up this morning into two glowing russet-colored spheres the size of baseballs—an elaboration of the early Persian lovelock—within which her ears were somehow nested like the grub in the cocoon. On her forehead were clustered quite a few claws of the bang known as the tarantula bang. She held in her hands a hat of black varnished straw in one of the new mushroom shapes with an acute crimson feather stuck in it. The keynote of her dress was the frivolous little cherry-colored girdle of velvet with forked ends, which contrasted alluringly with the girlish folds of her organdie dress.

"He's had a fracas with the savings bank," Jim drawled gently, straightening up and drawing on his pipe.

"I knew he would," said Jule. "I just felt it in my bones after Mr. Fordham persisted in hanging up that sign that reads, 'This safe is not locked.' I don't know what possessed him to do it myself. It's just one more temptation to these awful yeggmen hanging about, the way I look at it."

"They all but came to blows, I understand; and they tell me they would have if this runner for that big safe concern that's located I forget where hadn't stepped between 'em just while they were in the midst of scandalizing each other."

"Mustn't it have been a battle royal?" interjected Jule, dimpling mischievously. "I'd have given my eyeteeth to have been there."

"I wasn't there myself. All I know is your uncle came in swearing tearing mad and his pockets bulging with every cent he has in the world, and into the safe with it as if it was so many cabbage leaves."

"It's there now?"

"Every last red. Well, then, before he had time to turn round this runner that had parted them loafed in and wanted him to invest in a new safe. He put his ear to the combination and said he could open it just as easy as he could slide his hand into his pocket."

"Mercy!" shrieked Jule, looking toward the inner office. "And what did uncle have to say to that?"

Her sudden movement had loosed the essence of a domineering perfume she affected.

"I don't know," answered Jim lazily. "I was called out. But I think myself this safe is in a bad place. It can't be seen from the street, for one thing. Then again, what's to prevent a man from coming up under this shop in a boat when the tide is right, sawing a hole in the floor all round the safe, lowering it with one of these tackles and getting away to sea with it, and nobody the wiser? I told him as much.

"I said: 'If it was my safe I would move it into the front shop,' and he snapped out: 'Why not hang one of these newfangled signs on it? People are going mad, I say,' he says, 'but they can't frighten me.'"

"My soul!" exclaimed Jule, now thoroughly roused. "I've got a little more than a beggar's interest in this maneuver myself, I hope. He's holding my estate in trust and I suppose he took that out of the bank along with all the other things."

"Eyah," said Jim. "It's in a big yellow envelope. I saw that going in myself."

Jule Replied Coldly That if He Had Anything to Say She Saw No Good Reason Why He Should Not Say It Where They Were

"Well, if you have it's more than I have," countered Jule sulkily. "I don't know what I'm worth to this day, but he's so poison cranky about money matters I simply have neglected to ask him from day to day. I wouldn't humor him so far as to ask him."

"That's just as well then," said Jim, "because if I know the man he wouldn't humor you so far as to tell you."

"Still I don't half like the idea of my entire personal fortune being in jeopardy the way it is. It would be a great note, now wouldn't it, if the whole safe was to be hypothecated? We'd all feel pretty good, now wouldn't we, if we were to come down here some fine morning and find nothing but a swingeing great hole sawed in the floor?"

"Well, if you listen to this man that's what you're headed for," said Jim. "There he goes now," he added, looking through the window.

"You mean the dark-complected one with the cane and the straw hat with the orange band? Why, that is Mr. Hanrahan!" exclaimed Jule, beaming all over and producing an involuntary smile which was meant to encourage Mr. Hanrahan to spy her out there in the depths of her uncle's great musty shop.

He kept on, however, and disappeared round the corner of the fish market.

"So you know him already?" uttered Jim, taking a testing pull at his tobacco again.

"I should think I did!" re Jule. "Intimately. He's di guished looking, don't you think "I don't warm up to him myself, no," answered "But still I will admit that he is a smooth article, as the externals of the man go."

"He's not the cave-man type of course," Jule fl tartly. "He's more the clean-cut modern man. H such firm white hands too, with no more hair on the of them than there is on mine. The that's a sign of an artistic temperame Jim surveyed his own, which were s on their backs, before venturing to say suppose you are all of a flutter as the day approaches."

"I don't know whether I am or Jule muttered, looking angrily away. paced away a little and, coming laid a hand gently on her shoulder. shook it off.

"Look here, Jule," he said, ing closer, "do you realize Blatch will be coming in any now? You're not thinking of j ing sideways out of the fills are you?"

"I don't know that anybod appointed you guardian over said Jule, jamming down her roomed hat until the brim was up against the two spheres of even slightly flattening them on top sides. "Are you your bro keeper? Oh, if there's one th detest it's people who go poking noses into other people's busin

"You know you upset the cart once before," continued undaunted, "and I think you it to Gertie—if not to yoursel come up to scratch this time."

Jule had backed away from and got into the vicinity of a salt-stained ship's bell, which he father had used many a time in ing his way out of a dungeon o and on impulse she touche clapper daintily with her fore and was rewarded with a son vibration. She wrinkled her

"I want to know!" she said s "Well, as it happens, Miste quisitive, I am one of those unf nates who happen to have been with a mind of their own, and don't like the sound of wedding who is going to gainsay me? S all right of course; I've got nothing against Sam. I have spells, if you must know, when it comes ove with a rush that I shall just burst out 'No!' right a altar—if he succeeds in dragging me that far. Y no idea what a sinking sensation I get when I of it."

"That's all right as far as you are concerned, but w does that leave me?"

"Well, I've told Gertie often enough to go right a with her end of it, I'm sure," returned Jule wearily. ' been at her and at her and at her to go right on an herself in for it up to the throat regardless of me if she so inclined."

"She won't do it though," replied Jim moodily. doubles or quits with her."

"She may be coming round to my conclusion perhaps after all love is only a delusion and a sn suggested Jule in a light conversational way and loo down carelessly at Sam Blatch's diamond, which i absence she was wearing on her right hand, giving out it was a present from her father.

The truth is, Jule Horrocks and Gertrude Furlong made a girlish compact under the terms of which were to have a double wedding, and this treaty was u tunately concluded before either of them had hook man. Now Gertrude had been the original lagger or compact, since Jule had had two or three men dan and giving her a dangerous taste for variety, while trude, who was a sensible girl, had been all the time la hold of Jim. Indeed, when she ultimately closed with some of her friends thought she was doing herse injustice in order not to cause more delay to Jule, though he was big and kind-hearted he seemed one o easy-going kind that would never set the world on fire, ha always been one of the strait-laced kind that un looking for the perfect man.

(Continued on Page 61)

(Continued from Page 58)

ova strange thing: From the moment Gertrude's tu was fixed all Jule's knack seemed to desert her, e sid herself that when it came to men she was a bu er-fingers; and until Sam Blatch took pity on pr pect of a double wedding seemed far off.

Traker, who saw her coming out of the ship 's after her wrangle with Jim, from her milliner's a oss the street, said to Jen Higgins, who was in vi on hats:

ole an say what they're a mind to. I don't believe a angements girls make in regards to waiting for h. Of course it shows a sweet spirit and all that, ve ll heard about the rarity of Christian charity he un; but I think they're more apt to come to dig by it than as if they ro heir own way, each for y i suppose," ventured ul really and truly loves . latch? You know—h diamond on her right d l the rest of it. I don't if e was all in all to her, a , that she could bring o t as she does. There's n unny about it."

fit thing she knows she'll he looks with him as she h ie others," said Grace. nu they say he is just as a he can be and doesn't im er dancing with other h absence or calling her e n hardly. She's just a a lded cage, according to le goes into transports o uch as looks sideways he man. Deliver me from li that! I think anyone e ous disposition is to be m elf."

u ose they really can't p r things. It's a form of " ghed Jen. "I haven't e us bone in my body, n ul to say. If this Mr. c 't trust her to go her t ithout being indiscreet, e ne simply isn't the man — at's all there is to that; s ner she finds it out the o all concerned."

s unfortunate," continued "hat with his tempera- ll he should have fallen w a girl like Jule. She's a , you know. Not that n ny harm by it, but she's a giddy type that they a reconcile themselves to c wn to one man and giv- t others the go-by. Be- y ody's pet has just about Ir. She says herself we o rough this vale of tears e nd we've each got our e o live and so why not h most of ourselves while h e and not be all the time g ; trifles."

ve ll had her philosophy," li Higgins, "I'm sure I n v what the world would ; tell Mr. Styles I think ing back to the Dark an as it is."

"What Was That?" Hissed Hanrahan, Stopping the Movement of His Fingers lshe may come to a realization in time," Miss r plied. "I've said all I can."

h night of that same day—it was the night of the ti ball and a good many formal gowns were going yo to the dance given at the Owl's Pavilion—Jim s betook himself to Gertrude Furlong's. A bright w shining, and he found her busy in what she h sunken garden, which was in fact a garden d the cellar of a house that had been her grand- s d that had burned down in her grandfather's L ning his forearms on these ancient foundations, ol down at his inamorata, his head wreathed in e was a fine solid man, able to undertake almost n but Gertie's humors sometimes mystified him. a a veritable panther's tread and Gertrude was ' artled when he appeared before her and would m utter a faint shriek, start and exclaim: "You h lightest step for such a big man," to which his customary answer was: "I am treading the daisy tops these days, Gertie." And then he would champ the stem of his pipe and give her the special look for which she valued him. Jim had a head not unlike Julius Cæsar's and he had the same campaigning spirit. He was a road builder in affairs of the heart.

To-night, however, he was in a serious mood and broached his subject matter immediately.

"Jule is on the warpath again," he said shortly and with rather a bitter intonation.

"Is that so?" Gertie answered faintly.

Jim reached down silently into the glowing cellar crowded with old-fashioned flowers and getting hold of her hand, squeezed it four times. Thereupon Gertie squeezed his three times and then he squeezed hers twice, whereat—turning away bashfully—she squeezed his once with all her might.

Jim took a deep breath and said urgently: "Then in that case, why not set a date regardless?"

Gertie set her lips firmly.

"I have told you enough times," she said, "what the arrangement was between Jule and me. You can call it a girlish whim if you want to, but I guess girls have a sense of honor as well as the men, and when we say a thing we mean it. Jule was in a position to marry long before you deigned to look at me."

"How do you know how long I may have been casting sheep's eyes at you?"

"Well, you know what I mean. Faint heart never won fair lady. So poor Jule hung on and hung on and hung on, though I begged her on my bended knees to forget that childish agreement and obey the dictates of her own heart. But no, she wouldn't do it. Well, you know how she is. One thing led to another and the consequence was she began to accept attentions from different men and the first thing we knew her engagement was at an end."

"And now here's the affair with Blatch hanging by a shoe string just as he is coming home to claim her," broke in Jim, getting a new clutch on his pipestem and breathing out angry clouds of incense. "That little imp of Satan is over at the Owls' with a new man, a runner for a safe-and-vault concern that she met at a dance the other night. If Blatch should happen to walk in on her now I tell you we'd be right back where we began—dished. She might just as well throw the ring in his face, anyhow, as wear it on her right hand."

"What kind of a looking man is he? Dark, and carries a cane?"

Jim nodded.

"Poor girl! It's really all my fault. You see, when you came along Jule happened to be temporarily empty-handed and she was so afraid you would suffer the same fate at my hands, you see, if something wasn't done about it."

"She thought you were the same kind of a butter-fingers she was herself, hey?"

"Well, you can be cynical if you want to, but she meant it all right. She knew the danger in waiting if ever woman knew it and she knew I wouldn't go back on the agreement where she had held up to it so well herself, and just then she met Mr. Blatch and I suppose on the spur of the moment accepted him out of consideration for me. Well, then he went away to his ship—battle wagon, I think he called it—and, of course, that threw Jule back on her own resources. As she says herself she had nothing to do but clean her diamond three times a day with tissue paper and alcohol. Of course in those circumstances any girl in her senses is bound to rebel—and I don't know that you can blame them."

"We're about as near marrying as when we were staring through the slats of our cradles," said Jim gloomily.

"That's the selfish view to take," said Gertie tremulously. "I'm so afraid this Blatch isn't the man for her. I know I wasn't impressed from the beginning. He's a cigarette fiend for one thing."

Mr. Blatch in fact, as Jim recalled, could snap a cigarette end away from him with the smoothest motion possible, going to show that he had made, smoked and snapped thousands in his time. He used not only the thumb and finger, but put forth the whole arm sidewise gracefully as if he were pushing against something or fending something off while thinking of something else, at the same time letting the last intake quiver away from the corner of his mouth and through his nostrils in long thin streams. He was the last thing in poise at the expense of brain.

Mr. Sanderson's silence prolonged itself, and a resinous shriek of jazz rent the blue night, coming from the Owls' Pavilion. He and Gertie did not dance.

"I guess you and Jule will go on playing double solitaire to the end of the chapter," he said presently.

"You seem to think it is all my fault," murmured Gertie, catching her breath, with a bright sparkle all the length of her long heavily lashed lids. She suddenly dashed her face against that hairy arm encircling her and immediately turned away. The night wind touched the damp spot and thrilled him. She had seemed so placid when the first barriers of courtship were still unshaken that it was an enormous surprise to Jim to find that she shared this easy habit of tears with the rest of her sex, on its first appearance a touching and charming weakness.

"Here I am making an exhibition of myself," she said, collecting herself. "We needn't despair really. Jule has pulled the fat out of the fire before now when things were at their blackest. She just seems to have a faculty of putting her hand on the right thing at the right time. She calls them her inspirations. Ah," she cried, suddenly opening her eyes wide on him, "haven't you got the perfect forest on your chin? You march yourself over to the barber's, Mister Trampy—tramp and after that perhaps we'll have time for a little walk."

"By the way, what is your idea about hairy men?" Jim asked casually, looking at the backs of his hands.

"I always thought it was a sign of strength," said Gertrude, smiling.

Jim went away, still with that easy noiseless tread of his and throwing out massive clouds of smoke from the heel of his pipe. Fireflies were pulsating in the gloom and he could plainly hear water lapping in between the spiles of the various wharf properties. It was a May night and Jim had never felt himself in better condition for a fray. He looked in at Horrocks' store window in passing, but everything was black out. The old codger was probably at the Tall Stove Club playing checkers with Capt. Shadrach Sills, for they were cronies of long standing.

He wondered idly if the safe were still intact.

Turning into the barber shop he saw that somebody was before him in the chair, a black-headed individual, his face covered with thickly worked-up lather. Jim was of that phlegmatic temperament to which a long wait in a barber shop is a luxury pure and simple, but he had expected to find everybody at the dance and he was slightly surprised to see anybody outside himself taking the leading event of the season so calmly. His surprise turned to dismay when Mr. Herd, with a crisp movement or two of the steel, revealed the jaw line of his customer in its entirety. For Mr. Sanderson could be under no misapprehension as to the identity of that jaw. It was part of the facial equipment of Sam Blatch, who had come walking into town unexpectedly, just as Jim had feared he would.

Mr. Sanderson slipped out of the barber shop without a word and headed by a kind of necessity for the Owls' Pavilion. The dancers were having an intermission and Jim could see Jule seated under the balcony with Hanrahan.

He pondered. He felt instinctively that he would do more harm than good by coming out in plain terms. How then was he to pry that flighty little mortal loose from the arm of her damaging escort? He stepped out on the floor gingerly and, coming up to Jule, asked if he could see her privately a moment.

Miss Horrocks was a special study in fine feathers. Her gown, a formal one, was a conception of Grace Foraker's, embracing an underskirt of midnight satin, an outer drapery of tulle or some like filmy stuff the color of smoke drifting from a wood fire in the open, and finally for a bodice a broad band of delicate Nile-green pussy-willow silk arabesqued with beads of jet and falling away loosely from the armpits. It was held in place fairly well by narrow silken shoulder straps of baby blue slanting down to form a rosette at the girdle.

Thinking that Sanderson meant to throw more cold water on her bliss Jule replied coldly that if he had anything to say she saw no good reason why he should not say it where they were.

"I have no secrets from Mr. Hanrahan," she added, introducing the young man, who smiled and extended a shapely white hand devoid of hair. He was what Jule herself had best described as dressy looking, with cushiony lips and that fashionable nonchalant stoop or droop of the shoulders which some of our best young men affect.

Jim, who saw what her plight was with so much more clearness than the lady did herself, cast about for some figure in which to veil his communication and happened on a sentence from Ivanhoe which they had both read.

"'The lion is loose again,'" he said, and disappeared rapidly.

In point of fact the lion was still under the barber's hands. Every time he dipped his razor Mr. Herd threw out an interrogation or ventured an assertion which he must have been meditating and fearful of uttering during the actual operation of shaving; and each time Mr. Blatch answered with a slumberous grunt. In speaking the barber looked far away through the window toward the harbor, like a prisoner loaded with chains attracted by the hills of freedom. In point of fact he had offered Jule his own hand, and now having the successful claimant under his hand he was tempted to dip into his jugular.

A better solution seemed to be offered in the sudden appearance of old Horrocks himself, who had just finished his game of checkers with Captain Shadrach. Ordinarily the barber was loath to see the old man coming in, for his countenance had fallen into folds and leathery fissures and his neck was cut with diamond-shaped figures, deeply sunk, which made shaving him a task. As well try to shave the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, in Mr. Herd's opinion.

To-night, however, he felt that the old fellow might drop some compromising word which could have the effect of putting Blatch's romance to the right-about, and he hastily hid the face of his client under a second coat of lather and handed the ship chandler a fragment of a funny paper. Nor was he disappointed. Old Horrocks was not fairly seated before he inquired testily for Jule, whom he had not seen since supper time.

"I saw her headed toward the Pavilion some time since," the barber answered.

"Who'd she have with her?" inquired Horrocks, bringing his feet together with a rasp.

"That good-looking out-of-towner who has been elbowing her round the past few days."

"Black-headed feller with a cane?"

"That's him to a checker."

"Sand dab," muttered the old man. "That's the smart Aleck that is round here talking up electric protection. He told me my safe was about as much use as a spare pump in a cornfield. What business has she got with him? My understanding was that she was an engaged woman."

"I understand these new dances are being the ruination of a good many fond hopes," returned the barber. "When the cat's away—you know. Say the word if this edge doesn't suit you," he added solicitously to Blatch. "Well, the agony is about over, for the matter of that. I'm coming with a hot towel."

As soon as he was powdered Mr. Blatch sat up wildly and adjusted his black tie.

"You say there's dancing at the Owls' to-night?" he said, giving the thing a savage twist round his bull neck. His affair with Jule had been necessarily surreptitious, for she had given him to understand that old Horrocks abominated sailors. They were technically unknown to each other, but Blatch knew as well as he wanted to who was in question.

"Five imported pieces in the orchestra," affirmed Mr. Herd.

He had actually done his work too well. Mr. Blatch, fearfully preoccupied, was going out the door without another word, not even looking at old Horrocks, when the barber arrested him with one of those diplomatic utterances which barbers are often forced to resort to with absent-minded patrons.

"If you can't find your pocketbook when you get home," he said suavely but with a hostile glint in his pale eye, "you needn't think you left it here, because you ain't had it out."

Wordless, but with a bold insensate stare, Blatch plunged his hand into his pocket and brought out change, which he sifted through his heavy fingers into [illegible] limp hand, and blundered through the door.

Intermission was over at the Owls', dancing h[illegible] and Blatch—not wishing to be seen—went u[illegible] gallery. As it chanced, Hat Tyler obstructed hi[illegible] looking out cautiously over her mighty s[illegible] shoulder he could see some of the old practitio[illegible] the rounds with the pathetic assiduousness whic[illegible] long habituation to things terpsichorean. An[illegible] with a bitter contraction of the heart he saw Jul[illegible] with Mr. Hanrahan.

The runner's procedure was both correct and [illegible] he been separated from his partner and exhibi[illegible] relief alone against a plain white ground he [illegible] had the seeming of a hunter creeping up intenti[illegible] bated breath on some wild animal. But with he[illegible] personality as a foil to his maneuvering his pos[illegible] to have another and more festive meaning. At [illegible] ning of each dance he took her to him with delic[illegible] fingers, and in accommodating himself to her li[illegible] careful to swathe his hand in a handkerchief le[illegible] injure the fabric of her dress, for on hot summ[illegible] girls often come home with their dresses positiv[illegible] the men perspire so fearfully.

And now when all these adjustments had [illegible] Hanrahan tucked her carefully under his chin [illegible] strument of price, and indeed his subsequent m[illegible] all the dreamy dexterity of execution to which [illegible] violinists have accustomed us.

"I want you to see the attitude that Horroc[illegible] when she comes round again," said Hat Tyle[illegible] neighbor, "with her cheek not the width of my [illegible] nail away from his. She's right in her element. [illegible] all the world just as if she had fallen asleep in his [illegible] he looking down as if he was all wrapped up in [illegible]

"I know if she was mine," said Hat Tyler [illegible] voice, "she wouldn't go gallivanting round next [illegible] the altogether as she does. What kind of a kis[illegible] is that she's hooked herself into this evening? [illegible] would think we were back in the Garden of Eden [illegible] the goose flesh out all over me just to look at h[illegible] know what you think, but it strikes me it's abo[illegible] the authorities to step in and take a hand i[illegible] people can't do anything with her."

"I never did approve of these round dances [illegible] chimed in her neighbor. "I think they're just a[illegible] if the truth was known. Just you look at her! T[illegible] sticking to him closer than the paper to the wal[illegible] chances are she never saw him before in her lif[illegible]

"Hasn't she, though? I've seen her three nigh[illegible] with him."

The back of the speaker's chair creaked, and t[illegible] gasped to see a young man with heavy oily ha[illegible] there and sending down upon the fair obje[illegible] comments a burning vivid look that was of s[illegible] that at the very moment it drew an answering [illegible] Jule over the shoulder of her partner.

The glimpse she had caught of the darkling se[illegible] so brief that she could not be sure she had seen [illegible] but coupled [illegible] cryptic ut[illegible] seemed lik[illegible] that part of [illegible] in which the[illegible] together as i[illegible] by an ague s[illegible] to perfecti[illegible] the music t[illegible] Hanrahan a[illegible] she would [illegible] stroll outsi[illegible] and she agre[illegible]

"I shall [illegible] of sweat, I [illegible] said poetic[illegible] so styved in [illegible] her fair ar[illegible] not a hint c[illegible] as she held [illegible] for her cap[illegible] cate oyste[illegible] creation wit[illegible] of tobacco [illegible] be slipped [illegible] shoulders.

Her nerve[illegible] of pursuit le[illegible] she found he[illegible] ing on th[illegible] sidewalks [illegible] congenial companion by[illegible] Moreover, she had decid[illegible] there was to be a scene [illegible] she detested them, the[illegible] help for it. Why grow g[illegible] her time? She might as w[illegible] it out, and she several tir[illegible]

(Continued on Pag[illegible]

"I Don't Know What I'm Worth to This Day, But He's So Poison Cranky About Money Matters I Wouldn't Humor Him So Far as to Ask Him"

RELY ON ME

POWER enters the still mass of dead metal, and a thundering steam hammer leaps into crashing life.

So half a century ago the power of an ideal entered the dead metal of drop forgings, tools, and machines, to make them worthy of the Triangle B mark which says, "Rely on me—I am made as well as I can be made—I shall not fail."

THE BILLINGS & SPENCER COMPANY

W.D.T.

(Continued from Page 62)

Blatch's ring round her finger to make sure that it could be drawn off easily in a crisis.

